START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

August 1994

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE
NUMBER:
BSO-56-073

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO
	Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO
	Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO
	Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO
	Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO
	Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO
	Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO
	Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO
	Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO
	Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO
	Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO
	Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO
	Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO
	Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO
	BSO Advertisements
	Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO
	Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO
	Pops	1924
46	BSO
	BSO Advertisements
	Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO
	Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements
	Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO
	Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO
	Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO
	Pops
	U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO
	Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO
	Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959

VOL	TITLE	DATES
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copy-right law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: IA IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 16:1

FILM STOCK:

REEL 73

Volumes 123-125

Tanglewood, BSO, Pops

1970-1971

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS

VOLUME 123

Tanglewood

1970

TANGLEWOOD - 1970

Table of Contents

Pre-season---
Promotion, programming and general announcements.....pp. 1-24

Berkshire Festival Concerts---
Boston Symphony Orchestra:

1st week....p. 25
2nd week....p. 41
3rd week....p. 51
4th week....p. 61
5th week....p. 69
6th week....p. 79
7th week....p. 85
8th week....p. 91-104

The Berkshire Music Center---
Opening exercises including Leonard Bernstein's address to the BMC..... pp. 105-109
Music at the BMC..... pp. 110-111
BMC Personnel..... pp. 112-122
Finances..... pp. 123-124
A Day In The Arts..... pp. 124-125
Boston University Tanglewood Institute..... pp. 125-126
Festival of Contemporary Music..... pp. 127-136

Tanglewood On Parade..... pp. 137-140

Contemporary Trends Concerts..... pp. 141-142
Concert #1..... pp. 142-144
Concert #2..... pp. 145-148
Concert #3..... pp. 149-151
Mini-Trends Concerts..... pp. 152-153

Friends of Tanglewood..... pp. 153-154
Dinner Party in Honor of Leonard Bernstein..... pp. 155-158

The Boston Pops at Tanglewood..... pp. 159-162

Feature Stories---
Tanglewood as part of the Berkshire area and
Features on Tanglewood Personalities..... pp. 163-174

Tanglewood in Peril..... pp. 175-178

Post Season..... pp. 178-180

Esplanade 1970..... pp. 181-197

PRESS
BRISTOL, CONN.
(E) 17,955

DEC 20 1969

New England Newsclip

Preliminary Plans For Tanglewood Are Listed

— Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, Artistic Directors at Tanglewood, today announced preliminary plans for the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center in 1970.

The Berkshire Festival, which consists of 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on eight successive weekends, opens Friday evening July 3 and closes Sunday afternoon August 23, 1970. Among those who will conduct the Orchestra are: Leonard Bernstein, Laureate Conductor of the New York Philharmonic and Adviser to Tanglewood; Eugene Ormandy, Music Director of the Philadelphia Orchestra; Seiji Ozawa, Gunther Schuller; William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and Michael Tilson Thomas, the Orchestra's Assistant Conductor. Highlights of the Festival include a series of Beethoven concerts, honoring the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth; a concert staging of Mozart's Cosi Fan Tutti, Berlioz's Requiem. Mahler's Symphony no. 2 and Bernstein's Chichester Psalms.

The Berkshire Music Center, the Orchestra's eight week summer academy founded in 1940, will have its Opening Exercises on Sunday June 28 with Leonard Bernstein delivering the principal address. Mr. Bernstein was a member of the first class at the Center conducted by Serge Koussevitzky and subsequently was a member of the Center's Faculty. Major Berkshire Music Center faculty changes include the retirement of Assistant Director of the Center Louis Speyer, former Boston Symphony English horn player. Mr. Speyer has been a member of the Center's faculty since its founding and continues at the Center as an instructor. Leon Barzon, conductor of the New England Conservatory Symphony Orchestra is appointed Head of Orchestral Conducting and Playing for the Center. John Oliver is appointed Conductor of the Tanglewood Chorus.

The Seventh Annual 'Festival of Contemporary Music' will be presented by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago between August 15 and August 20. "The Festival within a Festival" presents orchestral, chamber music, vocal, choral and operatic works performed by members of the Berkshire Music Center and guests. The Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation has invited four young composers to accept commissions for new works to be premiered this summer during the Festival. The composers are: Richard Feliciano of Mills College, California; Barbara Kolb of the American Academy, Rome; Olly Wilson of Oberlin College, Ohio; and Jurg Wyttenbach of Switzerland.

A complete listing of programs, conductors and soloists for the Berkshire Festival will be released on February 1.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,287

DEC 23 1969

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood's Sticks

Half a dozen directors will share the conducting duties for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. They are: Leonard Bernstein, Eugene Ormandy, Sieji Ozawa, Gunther Schuller, William Steinberg, and Michael Tilson Thomas.

The Berkshire Festival, a series of 24 concerts by the Boston Symphoney on eight weekends, will open July 3 and continue through August 23.

Among the highlights will be a series of Beethoven concerts honoring the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth, and a concert staging of Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutti."

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Friday, December 19, 1969

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

DEC 18 1969

New England Newsclip

Theater News and Views

Berkshire Festival Announces Plans

BOSTON — Seije Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, Artistic Directors at Tanglewood, have announced preliminary plans for the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center in 1970.

Beethoven Series

The Berkshire Festival, which consists of 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on eight successive weekends, opens July 3 and closes August 23, 1970.

Among those who will conduct the Orchestra are: Leonard Bernstein, Laureate Conductor of the New York Philharmonic and Adviser to Tanglewood; Eugene Ormandy, Music Director of the Philadelphia Orchestra; Seiji Ozawa, Gunther Schuller; William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and Michael Tilson Thomas, the Orchestra's Assistant Conductor.

Highlights of the Festival include a series of Beethoven concerts. honoring the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth; a concert staging of Mozart's Cosi Fan Tutti, Berlioz' Requiem, Mahler's Symphony No. 2 and Bernstein's Chichester Psalms.

The Berkshire Music Center, the Orchestra's eight week summer academy founded in 1940, will have its Opening Exercises on June 28 with Leonard Bernstein delivering the principal address.

Bernstein was a member of the first class at the Center conducted by Serge Koussevitsky and subsequently was a member of the Center's Faculty. Major Berkshire Music Center faculty changes include the retirement of Assistant Director of the Center Louis Speyer, former Boston Symphony English horn player.

Speyer has been a member of the Center's faculty since its founding and continues at the Center as an instructor. Leon Barzin, Conductor of the New England Conservatory Symphony Orchestra is appointed Head of Orchestral Conducting and Playing for the Center. John Oliver is appointed Conductor of the Tanglewood Chorus.

Contemporary Festival

The Seventh Annual "Festival of Contemporary Music' will be presented by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago between August 15 and August 20.

"The Festival within a Festival" presents orchestral, chamber music, vocal, choral and operatic works performed by members of the Berkshire Music Center and guests.

The Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation has invited four young composers to accept commissions for new works to be premiered this summer during the Festival.

The composers are: Richard Feliciano of Mills College, California; Barbara Kolb of the American Academy, Rome; Olly Wilson of Oberlin College, Ohio; and, Jurg Wyttenbach of Switzerland.

A complete listing of programs, conductors and soloists for the Berkshire Festival will be released on February 1.

* * *

PRELIMINARY PLANS for the 1970 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood have been announced by Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, the new artistic directors at Tanglewood.

The season will consist of 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on eight successive weekends, opening Friday evening, July 3, and closing Sunday afternoon, Aug. 23. The orchestra wil be under the musical direction of William Steinberg.

Among those slated to guest conduct are: Leonard Bernstein, laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic and adviser to Tanglewood; Eugene Ormandy, music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra; Ozawa, conductor of the Toronto and San Francisco symphonies; Schuller, and Michael Tilson Thomas, the BSO's young assistant conductor.

Festival highlights will include a series of Beethoven concerts, honoring the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth; a concert staging of Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutti," Berlioz' "Requiem"; Mahlers' Symphony No. 2 and Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms."

The 7th annual "Festival of Contemporary Music" will be presented by the Berkshire Music Center, an eight-week summer academy, in concert with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago between Aug. 15 and 20. The foundation is headed by Paul Fromm, a millionaire wine merchant with a strong interest in encouraging young composers. The foundation has commissioned new works from four young composers to be premiered at the Festival.

A complete list of programs, conductors and soloists for the Berkshire Festival is expected by Feb. 1.

* * *

THE BOWTON Ballet Company will present a holiday program featuring "The Nutcracker," Act II, and "Swan Lake," Act II, Saturday Jan. 3, at the Adams Memorial Theater in Williamstown. The presentation, sponsored by Williams College's Dance Concert Series, will include a matince at 5 p.m. and a evening performance at 8:30.

Also to be danced at the evening performance will be "Suspicion," a contemporary ballet created by the Japanese choreographer, Saeko Ichinohe.

Tickets are available at the Adams Memorial Theater box office through Dec. 19.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

DEC 16 1969

Tanglewood lists initial schedule

Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, artistic directors at Tanglewood, today announced preliminary plans for the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center in 1970.

The Berkshire Festival, which consists of 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on eight successive weekends, opens July 3 and closes Aug. 23, 1970. Among those who will conduct are: Leonard Bernstein, laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic and adviser to Tanglewood; Eugene Ormandy, music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra; Seiji Ozawa, Gunther Schuller; William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and Michael Tilson Thomas, the Orchestra's Assistant Conductor.

Highlights of the Festival include a series of Beethoven concerts, honoring the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth; a concert staging of Mozart's Cosi Fan Tutti, Berlioz's Requiem, Mahler's Symphony no. 2 and Bernstein's Chichester Psalms.

Almost Tanglewood time

12/26/69 CSM

With New Year's Eve still to come, the Boston Symphony Orchestra already is full of plans for its Berkshire Festival which opens at Tanglewood on Fourth of July eve, July 3, 1970.

There will be 24 concerts by the orchestra over eight weekends through Aug. 23, with conductors to include Leonard Bernstein, Eugene Ormandy, Seiji Ozawa, Gunther Schuller, William Steinberg, and Michael Tilson Thomas.

Among the programs promised are a Beethoven bicentennial series, Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" in concert form, the Berlioz Requiem, Mahler's Second Symphony, and Bernstein's Chichester Psalms. Complete listings of works and performers will be announced early in the new year.

Local singers invited

Through the cooperation of the BSO with Boston University, Boston area vocalists will have an opportunity to participate in the 1970 festival. Joint announcement has been made of the formation of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, under the direction of John Oliver, to rehearse in Boston throughout the year and appear with the orchestra in major choral works at Tanglewood during the summer.

The first rehearsal will take place on Tuesday, Jan. 13, at 7:30 p.m. at Boston University's School of Fine and Applied Arts, Commonwealth Avenue. All interested singers are invited to attend. Quartet auditions for final acceptance will be held on Jan. 28 and 29. Further information about the new chorus may be obtained from Marilyn Wilt at Symphony Hall.

Music center

At Tanglewood, the Berkshire Music Center will open on June 28 with Mr. Bernstein as the principal speaker. A member of the center's first class in 1940 and later a faculty member, Mr. Bernstein is adviser to the 1970 festival, with Mr. Ozawa and Mr. Schuller as artistic directors. The summer academy, which runs for eight weeks, will have Leon Barzin as its newly appointed head of orchestral conducting and playing.

The seventh Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, presented by the music center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will take place between Aug. 15 and 20. Commissions have been given to four young composers — Richard Feliciano of Mills College, California; Barbara Kolb of the American Academy, Rome; Olly Wilson of Oberlin College, Ohio; and Jürg Wyttenbach of Switzerland—for works to be performed during this period. L. Sn.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
AMERIKANISCHE SCHWEIZER ZEITUNG
W. 2,000

JAN 21 1970

Tanglewood Plans For The Summer

With New Year's Eve just over, the Boston Symphony Orchestra already is full of plans for the Berkshire Festival which opens at Tanglewood on Fourth of July eve, July 3, 1970.

There will be 24 concerts by the orchestra over eight weekends through Aug. 23, with conductors to include Leonard Bernstein, Eugene Ormandy, Seiji Ozawa, Gunther Schuller, William Steinberg, and Michael Tilson Thomas.

Among the programs promised are a Beethoven bicentennial series, Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" in concert form, the Berlioz Requiem, Mahler's Second Symphony, and Bernstein's Chichester Psalms.

At Tanglewood, the Berkshire Music Center will open on June 28 with Mr. Bernstein as the principal speaker. A member of the center's first class in 1940 and later a faculty member, Mr. Bernstein is adviser to the 1970 festival, with Mr. Ozawa and Mr. Schuller as artistic directors. The summer academy, which runs for eight weeks, will have Leon Barzin as its newly appointed head of orchestral conducting and playing.

The Seventh Festival of Contemporary Music at Tanglewood, presented by the music center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, will take place between Aug. 15 and 20. Commissions have been given to four young composers—Richard Feliciano of Mills College, California; Barbara Kolb of the American Academy, Rome; Olly Wilson of Oberlin College, Ohio; and Jürg Wyttenbach of Switzerland—for works to be performed during this period.

2

THINGS YOU SHOULD KNOW

MUSIC FESTIVALS

The Board of Directors of the Santa Fe Opera (Santa Fe, New Mexico) and John Crosby, its founder and General Director, have announced that the 14th season will open on July 3 with Verdi's La Traviata and run through Aug. 22 with seven productions, four of them new. The season will feature the world premiere of Luciano Berio's first full-length opera, entitled Opera, and new productions of Stavinsky's The Rake's Progress, Mozart's The Marriage of Figaro and Donizetti's seldom-mounted Anna Bolena. Revivals from the past two seasons (since re-building of the new theatre) will be the double-bill of Stavinsky's Le Rossignol and Menotti's Help! Help! The Globolinks and La Traviata . . . Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, Artistic Directors at Tanglewood, have announced preliminary plans for the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center in 1970 (Lenox, Mass.). Highlights of the Festival, which consists of 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on eight successive weekends from July 3 through Aug. 23, include a series of Beethoven concerts, honoring the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth, a concert staging of Mozart's Cosi Fan Tutti, Berlioz's Requiem, Mahler's Symphony No. 2 and Bernstein's Chichester Psalms. The Berkshire Music Center, the Orchestra's eight week summer academy founded in 1940, will have its Opening Exercises on June 28 with Leonard Bernstein delivering the principal address. Major faculty changes include the retirement of Assistant Director of the Center Louis Speyer, who continues to serve as an instructor, Conductor of the New England Conservatory Symphony Orchestra Leon Barzin, who is appointed Head of Orchestral Conducting and Playing for the Center, and John Oliver who is appointed Conductor of the Tanglewood Chorus. The Seventh Annual Festival of Contemporary Music ("The Festival within a Festival") will be presented by the Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago between Aug. 15 and Aug. 20.

Pierre Boulez, Principal Guest Conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, will become Artistic Director of the Blossom Music Festival under a two-year agreement beginning this summer when he will conduct five concerts during the festival, which is scheduled from July 9 through Aug. 23. The Festival, at Cuyahoga Falls, Ohio, will again comprise six weeks of Cleveland Orchestra concerts plus one week of performances by the New York City Ballet. . . . The 77th Annual Ann Arbor May Festival at the University of Michigan will be held from April 23 to 26 and will feature the Philadelphia Orchestra for the 33rd year. Of the five scheduled concerts Music Director Eugene Ormandy will conduct three while Guest Conductor Thor Johnson will conduct two, and soloists will include pianists Van Cliburn, Rudolf Serkin and Alicia de Larrocha, violinist Itzhak Perlman, contralto Birgit Finnila and soprano Evelyn Mandac.

The 1970 Festival of the Bethlehem Bach Choir (Bethlehem, Pa.) will take place on May 7, 8, 9, 15 and 16 under its new Director Dr. Alfred Mann, succeeding Dr. Ifor Jones, who retired last year after 30 years as Director. Soloists will be Helen Boatwright and Phyllis Bryn Julson, sopranos; Elaine Bonazzi, contralto; Charles Bressler, tenor; and Kenneth Smith, bass . . . According to Edward Gordon, General Manager, the 1970 Ravinia Festival will open on June 25 with Eugene Ormandy conducting the Chicago Orchestra and Chorus in a performance of Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony, inaugurating Ravinia's new Pavilion stage facility which is now under construction. The Festival's Principal Conductor is Istvan Kertesz who will conduct six concerts. Two other highlights of the season will be concert performances of Lucia di Lammermoor featuring soprano Beverly Sills of the New York City Opera and Othello with James McCracken of the Metropolitan Opera in the lead role.

The Eastern Music Festival, located on the Guilford College Campus in Greensboro, North Carolina, will inaugurate its ninth season on June 17, with 22 professional and student concerts to be presented during the program's six weeks . . . The National School Orchestra Association will hold its 12th annual National Convention at Elon College, North Carolina, from Aug. 9 to 14. Also on the Elon College campus the first Creative Arts Institute for high school students will be held from July 1 to 31 . . . The Ninth Annual Virginia Beach Music Festival, which features the Nation's high school bands, will take place at Virginia Beach on June 15, 16, 17 and 18. Applications for participation received until April 15, 1970. Write for questionnaires to the Festival, P.O. Box 308, Va. Beach, Va. 23458 . . . Mario Bernardi, Canadian-born conductor and pianist, has been named Music Director of the Stratford Festival (Stratford, Ontario) replacing Victor di Bello, who retired last fall. Andree Gingras will assist Mr. Bernardi as Music Administrator.

The 38th annual Tri-State Music Festival will be held on April 30, May 1 and 2 at Phillips University in Enid, Oklahoma . . . Music and dance will again be a part of the education program this summer at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center in Saratoga Springs, N.Y. The New York City Ballet and the Philadelphia Orchestra will again be in residence. For information write the Education Department at the Center (Zip 12866) . . . The oldest continuous summer musical festival in the U.S. will be part of the summer program at Chautauqua, N.Y., from the last week in June to the last week in August.

But maybe it is to Austria that one should go for Festivals this year, for in 1970 Austria celebrates the 200th birthday of Beethoven, the 100th birthday of Franz Lehar, the 50th anniversary of the Salzburg Festival and the 25th anniversary of the Bregenz Festival. Salzburg looks forward to the Easter Festival under Herbert von Karajan from March 21 to 30, the Beethoven Weeks from June 28 to July 4 and Sept. 13 to 19, and the Jubilee Salzburg Festival from July 26 to Aug. 30, which opens in the restored Felsenreitschule with Karl Boehm conducting Fidelio. Beethoven's one opera will also open the Vienna Festival on May 24 in a production at the Theater an der Wien with Leonard Bernstein conducting. This Festival runs till June 21 when the final concert will be the Missa solemnis by Beethoven to be performed by the Vienna Philharmonic under Joseph Krips and the Choir of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde. The Bregenz Festival will run from July 23 to Aug. 4 and will open with Beethoven's Violin Concerto with Nathan Milstein as soloist. Here too the emphasis throughout will be on the great Herr Ludwig.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY 16,719

MAR 1970

TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,000

New England Newsclip

Oracle

One of the clerks at the Community Savings Bank, writing up a 30-year mortgage the other day, noted something which should bring the fleet passage of time to the forefront. The due date on the mortgage was Jan. 6, 2000.

☼ ☼

Seems to go hand in hand with this time of the year when sales follow the Christmastide. For instance, a large Cleveland emporium is offering a new form of transportation in the U.S. It's old in Asiatic countries and is called the rickshaw and it costs $450. It insures speed, no parking problem, requires no fuel and comes from Hong Kong. But it has one problem which would be your problem, that of having someone to pull you.

☼ ☼

It comes as no surprise that next summer's Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood will include a series of Beethoven concerts to commemorate the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth.

There will be no conspicuous change in format over several past years now that Seiji Ozawa is artistic director at Tanglewood.

Five conductors have been announced—Ozawa, William Steinberg, regular conductor of the Boston Symphnoy; Leonard Bernstein, laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic and adviser to Tanglewood; Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra; and Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor.

In addition to the Beethoven cycle, other highlights are a concert staging Mozart's opera, 'Cosi fan Tutte," "Berlioz" Requiem, Mahler's Symphony No. 2, and Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms."

The Berkshire Festival will run for its customary eight weeks, from Friday night, July 3 through Sunday afternoon, Aug. 23.

Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory, will continue as artistic director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The Center will have a new assistant director. Louis Speyer, former English horn player with the Boston Symphony, has retired as assistant director of the Center but will continue as a faculty member.

Leon Barzin, conductor of the New England Conservatory Symphony Orchestra, is appointed head of orchestral conducting and playing. John Oliver is appointed conductor of the Tanglewood Chorus.

Tanglewood Concerts Include Beethoven Cycle

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

It comes as no surprise that next summer's Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood will include a series of Beethoven concerts to commemorate the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth.

There will be no conspicuous change in format over several past years now that Seiji Ozawa is artistic director at Tanglewood.

Five conductors have been announced — Ozawa, William Steinberg, regular conductor of the Boston Symphony; Leonard Bernstein, laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic and adviser to Tanglewood; Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra; and Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor.

In addition to the Beethoven cycle, other highlights are a concert staging Mozart's opera, "Cosi fan Tutte," "Berlioz" Requiem, Mahler's Symphony No. 2, and Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms."

Runs 8 Weeks

The Berkshire Festival will run for its customary eight weeks, from Friday night, July 3 through Sunday afternoon, Aug. 23.

Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory, will continue as artistic director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The Center will have a new assistant director. Louis Speyer, former English horn player with the Boston Symphony, has retired as assistant director of the Center but will continue as a faculty member.

Leon Barzin, conductor of the New England Conservatory Symphony Orchestra, is appointed head of orchestral conducting and playing. John Oliver is appointed conductor of the Tanglewood Chorus.

The Center will open its activities June 28 with Bernstein delivering the principal address.

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

It will continue in operation to the end of the Berkshire Festival on Aug. 23.

Fromm Foundation of Chicago and the Center will co-sponsor the seventh annual Festival of Contemporary Music.

Four young composers have been commissioned to write works that will be premiered during the contemporary music sessions. They are Richard Feliciano (whose "Noosphere I for Flute and Tape Recorder,") was played by Albert Tipton about three weeks ago at Holy Cross), Barbara Kolb, Olly Wilson and Jurg Wyttenbach.

SOME SLIGHT recognition was taken of the fact that 1969 marked the 100th anniversary of Louis Moreau Gottschalk's death.

Gottschalk was the Van Cliburn of American pianists in the 19th century. In fact, Gottschalk was welcomed home from Europe with such frenzy as accorded Cliburn a century later.

It was in 1853 when Gottschalk was 23. He went on a triumphant tour of America and included Worcester. He played at the old city hall (corner of Main and Front Streets) and it could be that after listening to Louis play the piano the local citizenry decided to start a choral festival.

The Worcester Festival began five years later.

Having just returned from Europe, Louis serenaded his Worcester listeners with his "American Reminiscences." His other big piece was "Jerusalem."

It's never been verified exactly how Louis died in Rio di Janeiro in 1869.

One rumor was widely circulated that he was murdered by a jealous husband. Another claimed that he died of pneumonia after 13 days in a hospital.

In 1871, a Boston publication, "The Folio," reported that Louis had so agitated some college students at a recital in Sao Paulo that they hit him over the head with a sandbag as he was leaving the concert hall and that he died of an abscess.

Mentioned in Book

Harold C. Schonberg, music editor for the New York Times, gives a lot of space to Louis in his book, "The Great Pianists."

Says Schonberg, "Modern scholarship inclines toward peritonitis (as the cause of Louis' death) resulting from a ruptured appendix."

A paean about ill-fated Louis, titled "Gottschalk: Nationalist Composer, Native Virtuoso," appeared in last month's issue of Music Educators Journal.

Author John G. Doyle avoids any discussion of poor Louis' death.

Louis was hale and hardy when he left Worcester.

TODAY

Orchestra Sinfonia di Como, Art Museum, 3 p.m.

TUESDAY

Orchestra Sinfonia di Como, Montachusett Community Concert, Weston Auditorium, State College at Fitchburg, 8:15 p.m.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JAN 4 1970

New England Newsclip

THINGS YOU SHOULD KNOW

MUSIC FESTIVALS

The Board of Directors of the Santa Fe Opera (Santa Fe, New Mexico) and John Crosby, its founder and General Director, have announced that the 14th season will open on July 3 with Verdi's La Traviata and run through Aug. 22 with seven productions, four of them new. The season will feature the world premiere of Luciano Berio's first full-length opera, entitled Opera, and new productions of Stavinsky's The Rake's Progress, Mozart's The Marriage of Figaro and Donizetti's seldom-mounted Anna Bolena. Revivals from the past two seasons (since re-building of the new theatre) will be the double-bill of Stavinsky's Le Rossignol and Menotti's Help! Help! The Globolinks and La Traviata . . . Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, Artistic Directors at Tanglewood, have announced preliminary plans for the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center in 1970 (Lenox, Mass.). Highlights of the Festival, which consists of 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on eight successive weekends from July 3 through Aug. 23, include a series of Beethoven concerts, honoring the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth, a concert staging of Mozart's Cosi Fan Tutti, Berlioz's Requiem, Mahler's Symphony No. 2 and Bernstein's Chichester Psalms. The Berkshire Music Center, the Orchestra's eight week summer academy founded in 1940, will have its Opening Exercises on June 28 with Leonard Bernstein delivering the principal address. Major faculty changes include the retirement of Assistant Director of the Center Louis Speyer, who continues to serve as an instructor, Conductor of the New England Conservatory Symphony Orchestra Leon Barzin, who is appointed Head of Orchestral Conducting and Playing for the Center, and John Oliver who is appointed Conductor of the Tanglewood Chorus. The Seventh Annual Festival of Contemporary Music ("The Festival within a Festival") will be presented by the Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago between Aug. 15 and Aug. 20.

Pierre Boulez, Principal Guest Conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, will become Artistic Director of the Blossom Music Festival under a two-year agreement beginning this summer when he will conduct five concerts during the festival, which is scheduled from July 9 through Aug. 23. The Festival, at Cuyahoga Falls, Ohio, will again comprise six weeks of Cleveland Orchestra concerts plus one week of performances by the New York City Ballet. . . . The 77th Annual Ann Arbor May Festival at the University of Michigan will be held from April 23 to 26 and will feature the Philadelphia Orchestra for the 33rd year. Of the five scheduled concerts Music Director Eugene Ormandy will conduct three while Guest Conductor Thor Johnson will conduct two, and soloists will include pianists Van Cliburn, Rudolf Serkin and Alicia de Larrocha, violinist Itzhak Perlman, contralto Birgit Finnila and soprano Evelyn Mandac.

The 1970 Festival of the Bethlehem Bach Choir (Bethlehem, Pa.) will take place on May 7, 8, 9, 15 and 16 under its new Director Dr. Alfred Mann, succeeding Dr. Ifor Jones, who retired last year after 30 years as Director. Soloists will be Helen Boatwright and Phyllis Bryn Julson, sopranos; Elaine Bonazzi, contralto; Charles Bressler, tenor; and Kenneth Smith, bass . . . According to Edward Gordon, General Manager, the 1970 Ravinia Festival will open on June 25 with Eugene Ormandy conducting the Chicago Orchestra and Chorus in a performance of Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony, inaugurating Ravinia's new Pavilion stage facility which is now under construction. The Festival's Principal Conductor is Istvan Kertesz who will conduct six concerts. Two other highlights of the season will be concert performances of Lucia di Lammermoor featuring soprano Beverly Sills of the New York City Opera and Othello with James McCracken of the Metropolitan Opera in the lead role.

The Eastern Music Festival, located on the Guilford College Campus in Greensboro, North Carolina, will inaugurate its ninth season on June 17, with 22 professional and student concerts to be presented during the program's six weeks . . . The National School Orchestra Association will hold its 12th annual National Convention at Elon College, North Carolina, from Aug. 9 to 14. Also on the Elon College campus the first Creative Arts Institute for high school students will be held from July 1 to 31 . . . The Ninth Annual Virginia Beach Music Festival, which features the Nation's high school bands, will take place at Virginia Beach on June 15, 16, 17 and 18. Applications for participation received until April 15, 1970. Write for questionnaires to the Festival, P.O. Box 308, Va. Beach, Va. 23458 . . . Mario Bernardi, Canadian-born conductor and pianist, has been named Music Director of the Stratford Festival (Stratford, Ontario) replacing Victor di Bello, who retired last fall. Andree Gingras will assist Mr. Bernardi as Music Administrator.

The 38th annual Tri-State Music Festival will be held on April 30, May 1 and 2 at Phillips University in Enid, Oklahoma . . . Music and dance will again be a part of the education program this summer at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center in Saratoga Springs, N.Y. The New York City Ballet and the Philadelphia Orchestra will again be in residence. For information write the Education Department at the Center (Zip 12866) . . . The oldest continuous summer musical festival in the U.S. will be part of the summer program at Chautauqua, N.Y., from the last week in June to the last week in August.

But maybe it is to Austria that one should go for Festivals this year, for in 1970 Austria celebrates the 200th birthday of Beethoven, the 100th birthday of Franz Lehar, the 50th anniversary of the Salzburg Festival and the 25th anniversary of the Bregenz Festival. Salzburg looks forward to the Easter Festival under Herbert von Karajan from March 21 to 30, the Beethoven Weeks from June 28 to July 4 and Sept. 13 to 19, and the Jubilee Salzburg Festival from July 26 to Aug. 30, which opens in the restored Felsenreitschule with Karl Boehm conducting Fidelio. Beethoven's one opera will also open the Vienna Festival on May 24 in a production at the Theater an der Wien with Leonard Bernstein conducting. This Festival runs till June 21 when the final concert will be the Missa solemnis by Beethoven to be performed by the Vienna Philharmonic under Joseph Krips and the Choir of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde. The Bregenz Festival will run from July 23 to Aug. 4 and will open with Beethoven's Violin Concerto with Nathan Milstein as soloist. Here too the emphasis throughout will be on the great Herr Ludwig.

MUSIC JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
MONTHLY

MAR

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 109,375

JAN 4 1970

New England Newsclip

Oracle

One of the clerks at the Community Savings Bank, writing up a 30-year mortgage the other day, noted something which should bring the fleet passage of time to the forefront. The due date on the mortgage was Jan. 6, 2000.

☼ ☼

Seems to go hand in hand with this time of the year when sales follow the Christmastide. For instance, a large Cleveland emporium is offering a new form of transportation in the U.S. It's old in Asiatic countries and is called the rickshaw and it costs $450. It insures speed, no parking problem, requires no fuel and comes from Hong Kong. But it has one problem which would be your problem, that of having someone to pull you.

☼ ☼

It comes as no surprise that next summer's Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood will include a series of Beethoven concerts to commemorate the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth.

There will be no conspicuous change in format over several past years now that Seiji Ozawa is artistic director at Tanglewood.

Five conductors have been announced—Ozawa, William Steinberg, regular conductor of the Boston Symphnoy; Leonard Bernstein, laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic and adviser to Tanglewood; Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra; and Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor.

In addition to the Beethoven cycle, other highlights are a concert staging Mozart's opera, 'Cosi fan Tutte," "Berlioz" Requiem, Mahler's Symphony No. 2, and Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms."

The Berkshire Festival will run for its customary eight weeks, from Friday night, July 3 through Sunday afternoon, Aug. 23.

Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory, will continue as artistic director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The Center will have a new assistant director. Louis Speyer, former English horn player with the Boston Symphony, has retired as assistant director of the Center but will continue as a faculty member.

Leon Barzin, conductor of the New England Conservatory Symphony Orchestra, is appointed head of orchestral conducting and playing. John Oliver is appointed conductor of the Tanglewood Chorus.

Tanglewood Concerts Include Beethoven Cycle

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

It comes as no surprise that next summer's Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood will include a series of Beethoven concerts to commemorate the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth.

There will be no conspicuous change in format over several past years now that Seiji Ozawa is artistic director at Tanglewood.

Five conductors have been announced — Ozawa, William Steinberg, regular conductor of the Boston Symphony; Leonard Bernstein, laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic and adviser to Tanglewood; Eugene Ormandy, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra; and Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor.

In addition to the Beethoven cycle, other highlights are a concert staging Mozart's opera, "Cosi fan Tutte," "Berlioz" Requiem, Mahler's Symphony No. 2, and Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms."

Runs 8 Weeks

The Berkshire Festival will run for its customary eight weeks, from Friday night, July 3 through Sunday afternoon, Aug. 23.

Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory, will continue as artistic director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The Center will have a new assistant director. Louis Speyer, former English horn player with the Boston Symphony, has retired as assistant director of the Center but will continue as a faculty member.

Leon Barzin, conductor of the New England Conservatory Symphony Orchestra, is appointed head of orchestral conducting and playing. John Oliver is appointed conductor of the Tanglewood Chorus.

The Center will open its activities June 28 with Bernstein delivering the principal address.

MUSIC

Raymond Morin

It will continue in operation to the end of the Berkshire Festival on Aug. 23.

Fromm Foundation of Chicago and the Center will co-sponsor the seventh annual Festival of Contemporary Music.

Four young composers have been commissioned to write works that will be premiered during the contemporary music sessions. They are Richard Feliciano (whose "Noosphere I for Flute and Tape Recorder,") was played by Albert Tipton about three weeks ago at Holy Cross), Barbara Kolb, Olly Wilson and Jurg Wyttenbach.

SOME SLIGHT recognition was taken of the fact that 1969 marked the 100th anniversary of Louis Moreau Gottschalk's death.

Gottschalk was the Van Cliburn of American pianists in the 19th century. In fact, Gottschalk was welcomed home from Europe with such frenzy as accorded Cliburn a century later.

It was in 1853 when Gottschalk was 23. He went on a triumphant tour of America and included Worcester. He played at the old city hall (corner of Main and Front Streets) and it could be that after listening to Louis play the piano the local citizenry decided to start a choral festival.

The Worcester Festival began five years later.

Having just returned from Europe, Louis serenaded his Worcester listeners with his "American Reminiscences." His other big piece was "Jerusalem."

It's never been verified exactly how Louis died in Rio di Janeiro in 1869.

One rumor was widely circulated that he was murdered by a jealous husband. Another claimed that he died of pneumonia after 13 days in a hospital.

In 1871, a Boston publication, "The Folio," reported that Louis had so agitated some college students at a recital in Sao Paulo that they hit him over the head with a sandbag as he was leaving the concert hall and that he died of an abscess.

Mentioned in Book

Harold C. Schonberg, music editor for the New York Times, gives a lot of space to Louis in his book, "The Great Pianists."

Says Schonberg, "Modern scholarship inclines toward peritonitis (as the cause of Louis' death) resulting from a ruptured appendix."

A paean about ill-fated Louis, titled "Gottschalk: Nationalist Composer, Native Virtuoso," appeared in last month's issue of Music Educators Journal.

Author John G. Doyle avoids any discussion of poor Louis' death.

Louis was hale and hardy when he left Worcester.

TODAY

Orchestra Sinfonia di Como, Art Museum, 3 p.m.

TUESDAY

Orchestra Sinfonia di Como, Montachusett Community Concert, Weston Auditorium, State College at Fitchburg, 8:15 p.m.

Cambridge Musician Enters Gottschalk Competition

By HARRY NEVILLE

HT Music Critc

COMPETITIONS — The Concours International Louis Moreau Gottschalk is a competition "pour pianistes et compositeurs" which is being held at Dillard University, New Orleans, June 3 to 7. Organized as a tribute to America's first internationally recognized piano virtuoso, the event is of interest locally because of the participation of Cantabrigian James Dashow, who is a composition studet and Ph. D. candidate at Brandeis.

Winner of the Naumburg Foundation's Young Artist Fellowship Award in Piano Performance will receive $5,000 in cash plus expenses for three N.Y. recitals. November 15 is the deadline for applicants, who may obtain information and entry forms from the Foundation at 144 W. 66th St., N.Y. 10023.

A choral composition contest sponsored by the E.C. Schirmer Music Co. and the Handel and Haydn Society offers an award of $500 plus publication and performance.

The deadline for this is September 1, and information is available from Schirmer's, 600 Washington St., Boston, 02111.

WORLD PREMIERE — 22-year-old Donald Deniston, a student at the Boston Conservatory, has written a cantata, "Sun Song," which will receive October performances by the Chicago Symphony under the direction of Carlo Maria Giulini, who is also something of a local cause celebre.

TANGLEWOOD — The Boston University Tanglewood Institute will sponsor soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janis in a series of master classes this summer at Tanglewood. Leonard Bernstein is principal speaker at the June 28 opening exercises. He will also conduct Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony Sunday, July 5. Seiji Ozawa directs the opening concerts July 3 and 4.

MUSICAL CHAIRS — Donald Johnos, Music Dirctor of the Dallas Symphony, becomes Associate Conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony next season, replacing Henry Mazer, who becomes Associate Conductor of the Chicago Symphony. William Steinberg will conduct 12 of Pittsburgh's 24 pairs of subscription concerts. The remainder will be split among Johanos and various guest conductors, including Maxim Shostakovich, son of the composer.

COMING EVENTS — Enlivening the musically lean weeks just ahead will be the May 31 dedicatory recital of Old South Church's new 37-bell carillon. Suggested listening spots for carillon buffs are the steps of the Boston Public Library or the new Copley Sq. park.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
JUN 4 1970
New England Newsclip

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
ALBANY TIMES UNION
Monday, May 25, 1970

Tanglewood Names Artists-in-Residence

BOSTON—Two distinguished American artists, soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janis, will each present a series of master classes at Tanglewood this summer under the joint sponsorship of the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center and Boston University's Tanglewood Institute. Each will have the title Artist-in-Residence, Tanglewood 1970.

Miss Curtin will give master classes 10 hours each week during the eight-week Tanglewood season. She will also offer a special Fourth of July Weekend session, three master classes on July 3, 4, and 5. All participants in her classes have the privilege of attending rehearsals and Berkshire Festivals concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center programs. For those attending the Fourth of July Weekend, there are two Festival concerts conducted by Seiji Ozawa and one by Leonard Bernstein.

MR. JANIS WILL BE in residence July 27 through August 21. During his four-week session, attention wil be given to his students' individual needs, although the main emphasis will be on the piano literature itself. Participants in Mr. Janis's classes are also invited to attend all Berkshire Festival rehearsals and concerts and Berkshire Music Center events.

The Tanglewood season begins Sunday June 28 with the Opening Exercises of the Berkshire Music Center's 30th Anniversary Sason, at which Leonard Bernstein delivers the principal address. Mr. Bernstein is Advisor to Tanglewood beginning this season. Tanglewood's artistic directors, beginning this year, are conductor Seiji Ozawa and composer Gunther Schuller. Leon Barzin heads the Tanglewood conducting program, which this season is offered in collaboration with the National Orchestral Association of New York City.

Miss Curtin, a native West Virginian who recently was named "West Virginia Woman of the Year," has sung leading operatic roles at the Metropolitan Opera, La Scala, Milan, the Vienna State Opera, New York City Opera, and the world's other leading opera houses. She is widely known for her work on behalf of contemporary music, including singing the title role in the world premiere of Carlisle Floyd's opera, "Susannah" and in the American premiere with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Benjamin Britten's "War Requiem."

SHE HAS APPEARED often with the Boston Symphony and recorded with it for RCA. This summer, she sings July 11 with the Boston Symphony in a concert performance of Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte," conducted by Seiji Ozawa, and gives a Weekend Prelude recital on uly 24. The Weekend Preludes are short programs by noted performers and are the initial musical events of each Festival Weekend.

Mr. Janis, one of the few students of Vladimir Horowitz, has ben sought after as a virtuoso performer and sensitive musician since his debut recital in Carnegie Hall in 1948. He has performed fifteen times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1949, playing concertos of Beethoven, Liszt, and Rachmaninov, and has won the Grand Prix du Disque for his recordings. Following his Tanglewood classes, he embarks on a coast-to-coast concert tour during the 1970-71 season.

New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 25,700
MAY 23 1970
New England Newsclip

Phyllis Curtin and Byron Janis To Be Tanglewood Resident Artists

BOSTON — Two distinguished American artists, soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianst Byron Janis, will each present a series of master classes at Tanglewood this summer under the joint sponsorship of the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center and Boston University's Tanglewood Institute. Each will have the title artist-in-residence, Tanglewood 1970.

Miss Curtin, who has a home in Great Barrington, will give master classes 10 hours each week during the eight-week Tanglewood season. She will also offer a special Fourth of July weekend session, three master classes on July 3, 4 and 5. All participants in her classes have the privilege of attending rehearsals and Berkshire Festival concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center programs. For those attending the July 4 weekend, there are two Festival concerts conducted by Seiji Ozawa and one by Leonard Bernstein.

Mr. Janis will be in residence July 27 through Aug. 21. During his four-week session, attention will be given to his students' individual needs, although the main emphasis will be on the piano literature itself. Participants in Mr. Janis's classes are also invited to attend all Berkshire Festival rehearsals and concerts and Berkshire Music Center events.

Opens June 28

The Tanglewood season begins Sunday, June 28, with the opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center's 30th anniversary season, at which Leonard Bernstein delivers the principal address. Mr. Bernstein is "adviser" to Tanglewood, beginning this season. Tanglewood's artistic directors, beginning this year, are conductor Seiji Ozawa and composer Gunther Schuller. Leon Barzin heads the Tanglewood conducting program, which this season is offered in collaboration with the National Orchestral Association of New York.

Prospective participants in the master classes of Miss Curtin and Mr. Janis may obtain additional information by writing to the Boston University Tanglewood Institute, 855 Commonwealth Ave., Boston, Mass. 02115.

Top Musicians At Tanglewood

Soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janies will give master classes at this summer's Tanglewood Institute, co-sponsored by the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center and Boston University.

Miss Curtin will teach 10 hours a week, June 29-Aug. 23, including a special session of master classes on the July 4 weekend (July 3-5). Janis will be in residence July 27-Aug. 21. The emphasis of his classes will be on the piano literature itself.

Students who enroll for the classes of either artist may attend free all Boston Symphony rehearsals

TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(S) 98,557
New England Newsclip

SUMMER ARTISTS

BOSTON (AP) — Soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janis will be artists in residence at Tanglewood this summer. Each will give master classes.

Miss Curtin will give master clases 10 hour a week during the eight-week season. Janis will be in residen 27-Aug. 21, with emphasis er-ature.

Miss Curtin will sing in a concert performance of Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" on July 11 and give a short recital on July 24.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500
JUL 6 1970
New England Newsclip

Young people to be visitors at Tanglewood

About 150 young persons from 93 countries will visit Tanglewood July 19 as part of a nationwide tour, according to John V. Geary, Berkshire Hills Conference executive director.

Mr. Geary said the visitors, who range from 18 to 24 years old, were selected for the trip in an international competition and are said to be "the future leaders of the world." Their trip to the U.S. is in conjunction with the 25th anniversary of the United Nations.

He said they will stay at the University of Massachusetts during their stay in Massachusetts. Berkshire Hills Conference made the arrangements for the visit to Tanglewood.

GAZETTE
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
1970
New England Newsclip

SUMMER ARTISTS IN RESIDENCE

BOSTON (AP) — Soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janis will be artists in residence at Tanglewood this summer. Each will give master classes.

Miss Curtin will give master classes 10 hours a week during the eight-week season. Janis will be in residence July 27-Aug. 21, with emphasis on piano literature.

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
(E) 38,000
JUL 8 1970
New England Newsclip

BOSTON — (AP) — Soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Jamis will be artists in residence at Tanglewood this summer. Each will give master classes.

Miss Curtin will give master classes 10 hours a week during the eight-week season. Janis will be in residence July 27-Aug. 21, with emphasis on piano literature.

Miss Curtin will sing in a concert performance of Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" on July 11 and give a short recital on July 24.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

MAY 10 1970 New England Newsclip

11 conductors engaged for BSO at Tanglewood

Eleven conductors, a record number, will lead the Boston Symphony this Summer at the orchestra's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood July 3-Aug. 23.

Five of the men have some official connection with the B.S.O. — William Steinberg, its music director, who will conduct two all-Beethoven weekends; associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, who will have two programs, Tanglewood artistic advisor Leonard Bernstein whose single program will be devoted to Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony; Seiji Ozawa, co-artistic director of Tanglewood (with Gunther Schuller), who will conduct eight concerts; and Schuller who has one program.

Guest conductors are Aaron Copland, Rafael Fruebeck de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard and Charles Mackerras.

Concerts in the 6000-seat Music Shed (furnished with new theater seats) are Fridays at 9 p.m., Saturdays at 8 and Sunday afternoons at 2:30. The Friday concerts will again be prefaced by the Weekend Preludes which begin at 7, last about an hour and are included in the price of the evening ticket.

Instrumental soloists during the season will include the pianists Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenback, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuji Takahashi, Andre Watts and Alexis Weissenberg; violinists Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky, cellist Jules Eskin, French hornist James Stagliano, and clarinetist Gervase de Peyer.

A brochure on the Tanglewood season and a ticket order blank is now availbale at Symphony Hall, Boston 02115.

Fort Worth Star-Telegram
FORT WORTH, TEXAS
D. 102,470 SUN. 218,306

JUN 7 1970

LEONARD EUREKA

* * *

HIGHLIGHTS OF THE COMING season for Mme. Kraus include a four-concert Hunter College series in New York entitled "Viennese Classics," during which she will speak as well as play, the second installment of the "Lili Kraus Mozart Festival" in Atlanta, on which she is performing 18 Mozart Concertos with the Atlanta Symphony over two seasons, plus appearances in Boston, New Orleans, Minneapolis, and, more locally, the Oklahoma City Symphony April 6.

On July 18 Mme. Kraus will debut at the Tanglewood Music Festival in Lennox, Mass., with the Boston Symphony under the direction of Seichi Ozawa, performing the Mozart D Minor Concerto K. 466, and in August she will perform in the Mozart Festival at Philharmonic Hall in New York.

Of special interest to Fort Worth music lovers, however, is the news that Mme. Kraus has signed for another year as artist-in-residence at TCU. As her recording schedule and concert bookings multiply each year, it becomes increasingly speculative as to whether the pianist will be able to find time for a school residency or not. So far we have been lucky, and can look forward again to a solo recital at TCU as well as the Dallas Symphony appearance next season.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

DEC 21 1969 New England Newsclip

5 conductors announced for Tanglewood Festival

Guest conductors and some of the repertory have been announced for the Boston Symphony's 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox. Artistic directors are Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller.

The eight-week festival will begin Friday evening, July 3, and close Sunday afternoon, Aug. 23.

William Steinberg, B.S.O. music director, will conduct a Beethoven series commemorating the bicentennial of the composer's birth.

Ozawa's programs will include a concert staging of Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte," the Berlioz Requiem and Leonard Bernstein's Chichester Psalms.

Bernstein, conductor laureate of the New York Philharmonic and an alumnus of the Berkshire Music Center, has been named adviser to Tanglewood. He will conduct the Mahler Symphony No. 2.

Other conductors appearing at Tanglewood will include the Philadelphia Orchestra's Eugene Ormandy and the B.S.O.'s assistant conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas. A complete schedule of programs and soloists will be available in February.

The orchestra's Berkshire Music Center will hold its opening exercises on Sunday, June 28. Bernstein will give the principal address. Faculty appointments include Leon Barzin of the New England Conservatory as head of orchestral conducting and playing at the B.M.C. and John Oliver as conductor of the Tanglewood Chorus. Louis Speyer, former English horn player of the B.S.O., will retire as assistant director of the B.M.C. but continue as an instructor.

The 7th annual Festival of Contemporary Music will be presented Aug. 15-20, again sponsored by the Music Center and the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

JUN 10 1970

Gunther Schuller Chosen For Modern Music Award

Gunther Schuller, composer, conductor and president of the New England Conservatory in Boston, has been named the 1970 winner of Columbia University's Alice M. Ditson Conductor's Award for noteworthy attention to the music of 20th-century American composers.

Jack Beeson, chairman of the Columbia University Music Department will present a citation and a prize of $1,000 to Mr. Schuller at a concert he is to conduct at the Berkshire Music Festival, at Tanglewood on Aug. 21. The citation will commend Mr. Schuller for "unselfish championship of fellow composers through the conducting of their orchestral works here and abroad."

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 28,100

DEC 18 1969

Bernstein, Ormandy Among Conductors Scheduled for 1970 Tanglewood Season

BOSTON — Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, artistic directors at Tanglewood, today announced preliminary plans for the Berkshire Festival and the Berkshire Music Center in 1970.

The Berkshire Festival, which consists of 24 concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on eight successive weekends, opens Friday evening, July 3, and closes Sunday afternoon, Aug. 23. Among those who will conduct the orchestra are: Leonard Bernstein, laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic and adviser to Tanglewood; Eugene Ormandy, music director of the Philadelphia Orchestra; Seiji Ozawa; Gunther Schuller; William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and Michael Tilson Thomas, the orchestra's assistant conductor.

Highlights of the festival include a series of Beethoven concerts, honoring the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth; a concert staging of Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutti," Berlioz's "Requiem," Mahler's Symphony No. 2 and Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms."

Bernstein To Speak

The Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's eight-week summer academy founded in 1940, will have its opening exercises on Sunday, June 28, with Bernstein delivering the principal address. Bernstein was a member of the first class at the center conducted by Serge Koussevitzky and subsequently was a member of the center's faculty.

Major center faculty changes include the retirement of the assistant director of the center, Louis Speyer, former Boston Symphony English horn player. Speyer has been a member of the center's faculty since its founding and will continue at the center as an instructor. Leon Barzin, conductor of the New England Conservatory Symphony Orchestra, has been appointed head of orchestral conducting and playing, and John Oliver will be conductor of the Tanglewood Chorus.

Leonard Bernstein

More Contemporary

The seventh annual Festival of Contemporary Music will be presented by the Berkshire Music Center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago between Aug. 15 and 20. "The Festival Within a Festival" presents orchestral, chamber music, vocal, choral and operatic works performed by members of the Berkshire Music Center and guests. The center, in cooperation with the Fromm Foundation, has invited four young composers to accept commissions for new works to be premiered this summer during the festival: Richard Feliciano of Mills College, Calif.; Barbara Kolb of the American Academy, Rome; Olly Wilson of Oberlin College, Ohio; and, Jurg Wyttenbach of Switzerland.

A complete listing of programs, conductors and soloists for the Berkshire Festival will be announced Feb. 1.

Bass on Vacation

Lively World columnist Milton R. Bass is on vacation. His column will be resumed on Tuesday, Dec. 23.

As I Hear It

A Baker's Dozen

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

THERE WILL BE 13 baton wielders addressing the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood this summer. Every chef d'orchestra has his favorites, a small nucleus of music with which he is most familiar. One of the advantages of this heterogeneous parade is to insure a wider variety in the programs than might have obtained if all the programs were entrusted to one man.

There is one less advantageous factor to such an arrangement, however. Rehearsal time is never really adequate. If a new man comes to conduct one of the old warhorses, something the orchestra has played countless times either with its permanent musical director or with guests, there is not too great a chance that the new man will sway the musicians from the routine which previous performances have established.

"Joe Doakes," guest conductor for one program, will probably find himself conducting Koussevitzky's, Munch's, or Leinsdorf's "Eroica" despite all his gymnastics and gyrations. This is not a total loss by any means. However, Doakes is certainly concerned about making a good impression and would like to demonstrate his individuality to the audience as well as to the musicians.

* * * *

MUSICAL HISTORIES show that in the 15th century it was already customary to beat time to the Sistine Choir in Rome with a roll of paper called a sol-fa manipulated by the chief singer.

In the early 18th century, opera performances were directed by the musician seated at the harpsichord. Rousseau mentions that the Paris opera was conducted by a director beating time audibly by striking a baton against a desk. Bach was in the habit of directing while he played the organ. Lully, while conducting a Te Deum in 1687 with a rather long baton, injured his foot so seriously when he struck it that an abscess formed. The quack in whose hands he placed himself proved incompetent and the composer died.

It was not until the 19th century that time-beaters became interpreters. Mendelssohn's Liepzig Gewandhaus orchestra became justly famous but Wagner, who came later in the century, made fun of the "elegant rigid school." He founded the modern "loose" school of romantic and liberated conducting. Mendelssohn and his generation wore fastidious white kidskin gloves and faced the audience. It was Wagner who first directed facing his musicians.

* * * *

CUSTOMS varied in European countries. In his memoirs, Berlioz testified to the very low ebb of orchestral playing. In the century preceding him the master of music at the Paris Opera had an "elboe" chair and desk placed on stage. He held the score in one hand and a stick in the other and beat time on a table so loud that he made greater noise than the whole band.

The London Philharmonic in 1820 was directed by the joint efforts of the leader of the first violins and a musician at a pianoforte, who struck a few notes if anything went amiss. Incidentally, the London Times reported that the season (1860) which Wagner conducted had been "one of the most disastrous on record."

* * * *

IT IS ONLY in this century that the cult of the virtuoso conductor has arrived and has become as fashionable as that of a prima donna. The stage deportment of a conductor is individual, of course, but it has become a moot question whether he concentrates on the eyes of the players and the ears of the audience or on the eyes of the audience as well. Some conductors waste energy by dispersing it where it cannot help anyone to do anything in particular. Notable is the habit of using both arms to make the identical movements.

Nikisch, one of the all-time greats and conductor in Boston from 1889 to 1893, never let his left hand reflect his right. His left either remained at his side or enacted a touch of expression beyond that shown by the stick. Nikisch and Bruno Walter were kindly, courteous men on stage, inviting the men to participate in the music. Toscanini was a martinet, demanding discipline as a drill sergeant.

In England one of the most prominent personalities on a podium for many years was Sir Henry Wood who conducted, it is said, most economically and with a minimum of effort. Indeed, there was a faction which protested that Wood was a non-conductor.

* * * *

WHEN HENRY HIGGINSON organized the Boston Symphony he chose George Henschel as the first conductor. It was an unusual choice. Although Henschel was able enough, he was one of the very few vocalists who ever stepped up to the conductor's desk. The background of conductors follows no foreseeable pattern. Koussevitzky was a double bass player, Munch, a violinist, Leinsdorf, a pianist. All things being equal, it is opined that string players have an advantage as conductors. They know intimately the potential limits of the predominant number of their executants. They gain valuable experience as they come up through the ranks, although that is not a determining factor.

Orchestras have been formed which played without a baton-wielder standing before them. Such an experiment was tried in Moscow in 1920 with good results, it is said. Great care was taken in the selection of the players and each one was required to have a knowledge of the work as a whole. Rehearsals were unlimited. The Moscow experiment came to an end, not because of unsatisfactory results, but because performances took too long to prepare.

Eagle 7-18

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901
DEC 9 1969 New England Newsclip

Kaleidoscope

By R. E. KRIEGER

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra, in cooperation with Boston University, is forming the Tanglewood Festival Chorus which will perform summers at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox. Area singers are invited to attend the first rehearsal, at 7:30 p.m. Jan. 13, at the School of Fine and Applied Arts, Commonwealth Avenue, Boston University. The chorus will rehearse in Boston throughout the year. More information may be had by calling Marilyn Wilt, Symphony Hall, 266-1492, extension 70. John Oliver, conductor of the Framingham Choral Society, will be director.

NEWS
BANGOR, MAINE
(D) 78,840
MAY 5 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood's Future Seasons In Question

LENOX, Mass. (UPI) — This summer's season of Tanglewood concerts will be held — but future seasons may be jeopardized by lack of finances, the sponsoring Boston Symphony Orchestra said Monday.

The orchestra made the announcement to clear up confusion over recent comments regarding the future of the summer program.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, NY
NEWSPAPER CLIPPING
COMPLETE COVERAGE
SCHENECTADY, N.Y.

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 208,349
MAY 17 1970 New England Newsclip

CODAS: The Community Chorus of Westerly, 165 voices strong, performs Brahms' A German Requiem with orchestra next Sunday in the former Immaculate Conception Church, High Street, Westerly. Under George Kent's direction, it will begin at 8:30 p.m., with Barbara Wallace and Francis Hester the soprano and bass soloists. The Brahms Requiem was sung in English by the chorus in 1964. This time it will be given in German. . . . THE BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra has stated unequivocally its summer season at Tanglewood will take place this year. Wire service reports incorrectly indicated earlier the series might not be held. The Tanglewood season does account for one-third of the orchestra's yearly deficit, but there is no prospect now of its being dropped, only that money will continue to be needed for support.

Clefs & Arpeggios

by NANCY CURRAN

Of course it's pure fantasy, but wouldn't it be wonderful to park your camper somewhere near Saratoga and submerge yourself for the summer in the music of the Saratoga Performing Arts Center?

* * *

You'd finish the summer with a really rounded musical education. SPAC is one festival that's made its peace with the idea that music just can't be contained. Just when the world decides that music, like antiques, has to be defnied by its age, along comes a new style that demands as much in skill to perform and delivers just as much feeling!

Popular Performers

So far SPAC has booked 23 Saratoga Specials, and more are in the works. Dionne Warwick and the Constellations will break open the package Saturday, June 13.

Just a week later, Liberace and the Trinidad Tripoli Steel Band will appear for two evenings.

The Steel Band produces an unbelievable variety of sounds. Flamboyantly costumed to match Liberace, they are under the direction of a very with-it Episcopal priest. In addition to the expected calypso and work songs, they do a version of the "Hallelujah Chorus" (!) that richly duplicates the sound of an organ.

"Fiddler on the Roof" plays to SRO crowds wherever it goes. Starting Thursday, June 25, three performances will be given. It's only the second musical to appear at the center. So far "Fiddler's" original producer Hal Prince has been paid more than $3.25 million in royalties. I wonder — did any potential backers turn it down?

Stage Mothers, Attention

Quite a troupe of Schenectady ballet students went up to Saratoga Thursday to audition for the New York City Ballet. They tried out for the opening week's performance of Tschaikovsky's "The Nutcracker." Una Kai, ballet mistress, will give them a strong taste of professionalism! July 1-5 will be the performance dates.

Philadelphia Symphony

In its original role as summer home of Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, SPAC starts their season July 30 with Beethoven's "Prometheus" and the Brahms double concerto for violin, cello and orchestra, featuring Isaac Stern, Leonard Rose, Eugene Istomin and Stanislaw Skrowaczewski.

What names do you recognize in music? Leonard Bernstein, Van Cliburn, Peter Nero, Henry Mancini, Marian Anderson, Daniel Barenboim? You'll find them all at Saratoga this summer.

The program proceeds through Aug. 23 with an overflowing helping of work by classic composers like Chopin, Mendelssohn, Rossini and Berlioz. Mixed in are more contemporary sounds like those of Gershwin and Ravel. Yes, "Porgy and Bess," and yes, "Bolero" and "Daphnis and Chloe."

The Tanglewood Tangle ..

A rumor raced around local music circles last week that Tanglewood, officially the Berkshire Festival, would be closing. Financial difficulties, as usual, were the purported disease.

The public relations office in Boston responded to my inquiry first with a blank expression rather difficult over the telephone) and then an admission that yes, they had heard about the rumor. Just a misunderstanding?

It seems that Talcott Banks, president of the Boston Symphony, gave a talk in Pittsfield. He said that without the support of the business community to cut the deficit, Tanglewood might have to close.

This is just a figure of speech, according to our friend. A figure of speech that could apply to any musical organization. Even the Metropolitan Opera.

I asked whether the Saratoga Performing Arts Center appeared to be siphoning off area concertgoers and he didn't admit any worry on that thought. In fact, attendance was up last year.

The season opens July 3 this year.

How long will Tanglewood hold out in its purist definition of worthwhile music? Last year's pop music nights were a financial success, but the rehearsals were so loud that they interfered with the work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center students. So last year's five pop performances will shrink to three.

Big Band Sound at Linton

When and if the big band sound comes back, a gentleman named Sammy Nestico will be a big part of the reason. He used to arrange for the Marine Corps Band, and the Linton Stage Band used his arrangements in their segment of Tuesday evening's program. That sound really moved the audience!

Mr. Nestico is a friend of Conrad Kuchay, Linton's bandmaster, who reports that Sammy is in Hollywood now doing movie backgrounds. So we can look for movie backgrounds to be right out of the Les Brown, Woody Herman Herd sound.

Support Music Education

Want to see where your school taxes go? Take 45 minutes Wednesday evening, July 3, at 7:30 to go to Zoller School and hear the elementary string pupils of six schools.

There's no way a performance can come out of those rehearsals, and yet it does. The stage bristles with music stands, as four dozen fourth-, fifth-, and six-graders pile in with cases and coats and books. Three patient instructors intently tune four dozen violins and cellos.

Ensemble playing is different from the practice sessions families hear. For one thing, once the note is missed, a lone player can't go back to try it again. Once it's gone, it's gone.

Precision playing demands great rapport with the conductor. Players must not only learn to make two hands and arms work independently, but also to handle the music without dropping it, to move the bow in unison with the other players, and most crucial of all, to watch the conductor and not the audience!

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,287
DEC 17 1969

For Local Aspirants

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in cooperation with Boston University announces the formation of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. John Oliver, Conductor of the Framingham Choral Society, is director.

The chorus is being formed to allow Boston area vocalists to participate in the world famous Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony. The chorus will rehearse in Boston throughout the year and perform major choral works at Tanglewood with the orchestra conducted by Seiji Ozawa, William Steinberg and others.

BSO Forming Tanglewood Festival Chorus

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in co-operation with Boston University announces the formation of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. John Oliver conductor of the Framingham Choral Society, is director.

The chorus will allow Boston area vocalists to participate in the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, summer home of the BSO. The chorus will rehearse in Boston throughout the year and perform major choral works at Tanglewood with the orchestra conducted by Seiji Ozawa, William Steinberg, and others.

All area vocalists are invited to attend the first rehearsal tonight at 7:30 at the School of Fine and Applied Arts, 855 Commonwealth Avenue, Rm. 154, Boston University.

Quartet auditions for final acceptance are scheduled for Wednesday Jan. 28 and Thurs. Jan. 29.

For further information contact Marilyn Wilt, Symphony Hall, 266-1492, Ext. 70.

MINUTEMAN
BEDFORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,100
DEC 11 1969

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,516
DEC 11 1969 New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
CONCORD, MASS.
WEEKLY 5,000
DEC 11 1969

BURLINGTON TIMES
UNION
BURLINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,200
DEC 11 1969 New England News

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200
DEC 11 1969 New England News

MINUTE MAN
LEXINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,975
DEC 11 1969 New England News

Area Vocalists Urged to Join Tanglewood Ch

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in cooperation with Boston University announces the formation of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. John Oliver, Conductor of the Framingham Choral Society, is Director.

The Tanglewood Festival Chorus is being formed to allow Boston area vocalists to participate in the world famous Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Festival Chorus will rehearse in Boston throughout the year and perform major choral works at Tanglewood with the Orchestra conducted by Seiji Ozawa, William Steinberg, and others.

All area rocalists are invited to attend the first rehearsal on Tuesday, Jan. 13, at 7:30 p.m. at the School of Fine and Applied Arts, Commonwealth ave., Boston University.

Quartet auditions for final acceptance are scheduled for Wednesday, Jan. 28, and Thursday, Jan. 29.

For further information please contact Marilyn Wilt, Symphony Hall, 266-1492, extension 70.

The Salvation Army was formed in 1878.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901
MAY 4 1970 New England Newsclip

Music at Tanglewood

BOSTON (AP)—The annual Tanglewood Music Festival at Lenox in the Berkshires will take place as scheduled this summer, the Boston Symphony Orchestra says.

An orchestra spokesman said the announcement was made Friday because of published reports that financial problems might force the festival to close.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Tuesday, June 9, 1970

AROUND THE TOWN

by Edgar S. Van Olinda

Tanglewood--So Near Yet . . .

It is amazing to me how many Albany music lovers have never attended any Tanglewood concerts, but will drive farther than the 30-odd miles to enjoy a good dinner. Not to have taken advantage of one of the great music festivals of the world in beautiful New England, surrounded by the Berkshire Mountains is akin to going to Buffalo without continuing on to Niagara Falls. To use a baseball term, it will "be a fielder's choice" between the festival with the Philadelphia Symphony in Saratoga and the Bostonians at Tanglewood.

Both complete programs will be carried by the Capitol Newspapers just prior to the performances, but especially in the Sunday Times-Union.

I CONFESS THAT some of the modern composers leave me cold when the Boston Symphony or any other major instrumental group sneaks in one of those dissonant works as a kind of guinea pig for the future generation. The youngsters eat these up, but the boxholders at Tanglewood, the "Proper Bostonians," are conspicuous by their absence. Brahms, Beethoven and Bach are a MUST for the Cabots and the Lodges.

The great music festival of the Berkshires was launched in 1934. At first, the orchestra was recruited from the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, a group of about 70 men, directed by the late Henry Hadley in the horse ring of the Hanna Farms: "Music Under the Stars," since the instrumentalists played in a moveable shell but the paying customers sat on rude benches, al fresco. On occasions, it was "Music Under Umbrellas."

Two years later, the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the late Serge Koussevitzky, played under a huge circus tent. I still remember, vividly, one concert under that tent and the storm which drowned out the players during the interrupted coast-to-coast hookup. Dr. Koussevitzky was furious. Throwing his baton to the rain-soaked turf, he declared that never agin would he conduct under canvas. And he never did.

THIS WAS, TRUY, "Wagner with sound effects by nature." Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, a New York dweller but a Lenox summer patron, got up one night and made a plea for money to build a music shed. She raised nearly $100.000 in a few minutes which resulted in the present shed which seats 6,000 in an-acoustically-perfect enclosed auditorium. On a perfect summer's Sunday afternoon, it is not unusual to fill the shed to capacity, but also to cater to some 8,000 music lovers on the immaculate lawn, truly an inspiring 14.000 symphony buffs.

A letter to Marvin Y. Schofer press representative of the festival, regarding a rumor that there might be financial difficulties for the coming season brought the encouraging refutal of the base libel:

"Tanglewood is alive and well, despite a little confusion on that score engendered by a slightly off-the-mark wire service report. The season opens Sunday afternoon, June 28 when Leonard Bernstein delivers the opening address of the Berkshire Music Center. During that week, he leads the B.S.O. in an open rehearsal. I should mention that the shed has entirely new seating this season, which is welcome news to all Tanglewood regulars. The seats are roomier, the aisles, wider and the visibility better."

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ITHACA JOURNAL
Saturday, May 9, 1970

Tanglewood Event Still On

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced that the annual Tanglewood Festival in the Berkshire Mountains would take place as scheduled this summer.

Reports had circulated indicating financial problems might force Tanglewood to close, according to the orchestra's press office.

Speculation Prompted By Tanglewood Programming

By RICHARD VINCENT

Although I was once asked to join one and did not, I often wonder just how effective a program committee is. Do the members really have any clout or are they merely tools of the music director?

It is proper, certainly, that the conductor should carry the heaviest stick because, ultimately, the season is his responsibility. If the season is well received, and ticket sales and subscriptions and donations are up, the music director will probably take the lion's share of the credit which, in fact, he deserves. But if there is too much Webern or Schoenberg or Bruna Moderna (how's that for a name of a serial composer?) then there will certainly be grousing and grumbling and sullen remarks to the effect that it would be nice to hear the real stuff again. The real stuff of course is Brahms, Tchaikowsky, maybe a little Wagner (orchestral transcriptions, no singers, thank you) Rachmaninoff, und so wieter, ad nauseam.

To be sure programming is a thankless and difficult task no matter who does it. Summer festival programming is even more frustrating but at least the committee and the music director can always cop out with that old baloney that in the summer audiences want the familiar. Why summertime audiences are supposed to be less venturesome or discriminating than those during the winter season has never been satisfactorily explained. Riots always seem to occur in the summer. It is a wonder in this age that they haven't started using computers or hired Herman Kahn and his think tank to nail down audience taste absolutely. They will, they will, and I throw caution to the winds and predict that if they do the results will shake a few ivory towers.

Continued from Page 1

The program committee members that I have known through the years serving several symphony orchestras have all been men of character and taste and genuinely knowledgeable in terms of music. They also were, generally, men of strong musical preferences and this is all to the good if at least one or two are real mavericks and irreconcilably on the side of experiment and change. It doesn't matter very much if the only contentions among them is whether to program the Mendelssohn or the Brahms. There must be, perforce, proponents tugging from each end of the musical spectrum.

In general, committee members advise but, in the case of a Szell or a Von Karajan or any other musical dictator, their consent is not necessary for, in the final analysis, the music director usually gets most of what he wants. It is meet that it should be thus, after all, there aren't many people in this world who can discuss music on the same level as the great conductors.

BUT IT MUST BE kept in mind that the conductors are also men of strong musical tastes. They have an affinity for this composer or that and, fallible as they must be, they will surely agitate for their favorite.

All in all, programming is a most inexact science, and, it is possible that if there were no committee at all, and the orchestra played whatever the librarian put on the music stands the results might not be too dissimilar from what we get anyhow.

This speculation is prompted by a study of the Tanglewood Berkshire Festival program for this summer. Although the programs generally are predictable, evidencing what might be termed the summer symphony syndrome, someone has managed to sneak in a few originals,. Lutoslawski, Xenakis, Krenek, Russo, Ligeti, Webern and Schuller. Do these names turn you on? Are the little old ladies in their navy blue prints, low heeled white shoes and real pearls going to charge out onto the green to be titillated by Lutoslowski? Probably not, but they will be there anyhow because many of their favorite goodies are also in the package.

AS ANYONE who does not live under a rock knows by now we are all wishing Ludwig a happy 200th birthday this year. The Boston Symphony is no exception. All the piano concerti, the Triple Concerto, symphonies 4, 5, 7, 8, and the Choral 9th, overtures, and the Choral Fantasy. Included is the Consecration of the House Overture, which is surely Beethoven at his worst, but I have a theory that it is played at all because the title is so impressive.

There are several performances of considerable interest besides the Beethoven orgy. A concert version of "Cosi fan Tutte" by Mozart will be given on July 11th with a cast that includes Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, (noted otherwise because she has her social security number tatooed on her abdomen) George Shirley, Tom Krause, and Ezio Flagello. This is a marvelous, happy opera with some of Mozart's best ensemble writing which means that it is the best ensemble writing in the literature. George Shirley should be particularly good as his voice is Mozartian (Mozartesque?) to a fault.

On July 22th a jolting juxtaposition to the Mozart, Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra by Russo will be played with the Corky Siegal Blues Band assisting the symphony orchestra. I can't honestly recommend it because I have never heard it, but if they are willing to take a flyer we all should trust them enough to go hear it.

IT MAY BE Beethoven's birthday but what explains six Stravinsky works? Of course Stravinsky needs no justification, the man is great, but one suspects that the programmers have decided that he is one modernist that the audiences have accepted and that they (the audiences) have elected him the token contemporary, proof that they are not fusty and conservative in musical taste. It doesn't matter what they think, Stravinsky will beat them at their own game anyhow becuase he is worth all the attention he gets. But one must remember that much of the popular Stravinsky works are not all that modern having been composed before and during World War I.

Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra is scheduled for August 9th, in case anyone is interested in a composer who took music up to the point where, to go beyond him, composers have had to invent new electronic instruments like the Moog Synthesizer. Webern, to these ears, is one of the authentic twentieth century geniuses but he takes some listening to. So listen, it is worth it if you stick with it.

THE FESTIVAL will end on August 23 with a performance of the Berlioz Requiem, conducted by Seiji Ozawa. There will be a massive chorus amalgamated from all over Massachusetts, and the tenor soloist will be Leopold Simoneau. One wonders what kind of living Simoneau would have made if Berlioz (pronounce the final Z and be the first one on your block to do it right) had not written his "Requiem." Simoneau has made a living from this work alone. He has sung it almost a million times (or less) all over the world. It seems that it is unethical or immoral or worse to schedule this Requiem without Simoneau singing the tenor solo.

This situation began when Columbia Records, sometime in the late forties released the complete work on 78 rpms, the first recording of it that had been made. Memory does not serve who the conductor or orchestra was, but they were French and of no great international note, something like the Nancy or Metz Symphony Orchestra and Chorus. Columbia Records never knew what hit them. They sold thousands of copies and, in the main, it was because of Simoneau and his beautiful rendition of the "Sanctus." Since then he has become a fixture in the part. I have no idea how old he is, but let us wish him a long life and a sure b flat whenever he does the "Sanctus."

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, May 31, 1970

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 3,221,849
JUL 26 1970

the Travel Bug
recommends..... TANGLEWOOD

In the heart of the beautiful Berkshires is Tanglewood (at Lenox, Mass.), the summer home of the world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra. It's only three hours' drive from Manhattan.

Founded in 1934, the Berkshire Festival is the country's oldest music festival. A veritable mecca for music lovers young and old, concerts are conducted in the famous Music Shed which together with the surrounding lawns accommodate over 15,000. Every musical sound is audible without amplification.

So, if you enjoy a concert under the stars, a picnic on the lawns, or a stroll through the 210 acres, then this place will appeal to you.

There are also chamber music concerts and choral and vocal programs. The festival-within-a-festival is a presentation of new works heard for the first time. This particular program is of five days' duration through August 20.

One of the highlights this season should be Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra performing in an all-Gershwin program on August 11. For the Fillmore East crowd programs of outstanding current artists are presented. Just south of Lenox is Jacob's Pillow, shrine of American dance for the ballet-minded.

There is a cafeteria on the premises which is open to ticket holders who may picnic. Also, there's ample free parking. For information contact the Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. (413) 637-1600. The season ends on August 23.

Kuhlsen

Tanglewood on, BSO announces

GLOBE
5/1/70

United Press International

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra says this Summer's season of Tanglewood concerts will be held — but future seasons may be jeopardized by lack of finances.

The orchestra made the announcement yesterday to clear up what it said was confusion over recent comments regarding the future of the Summer program.

At that time, a spokesman for the trustees said if the Summer program was to continue local businesses would have to help raise $27,000 to meet the expenses.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
MAY 13 1970

New England Newsclip

'Woodstock' at Tanglewood Is Deemed To Be Unlikely

Stockbridge

MRS. SALLY BERGMANS—Tel. 298-5543

STOCKBRIDGE — The possibility of another "Woodstock" at Tanglewood this summer has been discounted by Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In a May 7 letter to Selectmen Chairman Robert G. Williams, Perry wrote, "I am not apprehensive about the possibility of another 'Woodstock,' in the sense that that word means vast multitudes of people swamping our community. The occasions where this has happened have been pilgrimages for festivals of several days of continuous music-making, generally in out-of-the-way places ill-prepared to receive them. These conditions don't pertain to Tanglewood and the Berkshires, and while one cannot discount the possibility, it does seem to be unlikely.

Contrary to Tradition

He said the suggestion of trying to control the size of the crowd by ending the ticket sale at a particular time or by insisting on advance sales only would be contrary to Tanglewood's tradition.

"The entire tradition at Tanglewood has been that there is an unlimited capacity and that one can come to the grounds at any time," he wrote. "Generally, the unpleasant and ugly situations with the large rock concerts have resulted from disappointment, or thwarting, of large portions of the audience by some means or other, and it would seem to me that putting ourselves in the position of turning people away and stopping a ticket sale after they had come from distances to hear a concert would be to lay ourselves open for the very problems we are trying to avoid."

Perry said the Contemporary Trends concerts "represent an important part of the musical life of today" and also will help "to turn an honest dollar or two for the Boston Symphony which needs it urgently . . ."

Three Concerts Planned

Three such concerts are planned this season, he said. They include two presentations of Fillmore East and one by folksingers Peter, Paul and Mary. They will be on Tuesday evenings, July 7 and 21 and Aug. 18. Perry said efforts will be made to reduce amplification of the music, although "it is not always possible, when the performance is in full flow, to govern these matters."

He also said that the two Fillmore East concerts will start earlier than usual, at 6 p.m., and that with an intermission, they should end by 11.

Williams had written Perry in March expressing the town's concern about "a possible Woodstock" at Tanglewood.

Tanglewood Tickets

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BINGHAMTON PRESS
Saturday, June 27, 1970

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.—The box office at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony's summer home, Lenox, Mass., opened June 15. For the first time, a limited number of seats for the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Festival concerts will be available through TICKETRON, Inc., a computerized reservation service.

As in the past, tickets may also be ordered by mail and by phone at the Festival Ticket Office; Tanglewood; Lenox, Massachusetts 01240. The box office phone number is: (413) 637-1600.

The box office is open daily from 9 am to 6 pm, and through intermission on concert days.

A brochure listing complete programs, dates, and prices may be obtained by writing or phoning the Tanglewood box office.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Tuesday, June 9, 1970

AROUND THE TOWN

by Edgar S. Van Olinda

Tanglewood--So Near Yet . . .

It is amazing to me how many Albany music lovers have never attended any Tanglewood concerts, but will drive farther than the 30-odd miles to enjoy a good dinner. Not to have taken advantage of one of the great music festivals of the world in beautiful New England, surrounded by the Berkshire Mountains is akin to going to Buffalo without continuing on to Niagara Falls. To use a baseball term, it will "be a fielder's choice" between the festival with the Philadelphia Symphony in Saratoga and the Bostonians at Tanglewood.

Both complete programs will be carried by the Capitol Newspapers just prior to the performances, but especially in the Sunday Times-Union.

I CONFESS THAT some of the modern composers leave me cold when the Boston Symphony or any other major instrumental group sneaks in one of those dissonant works as a kind of guinea pig for the future generation. The youngsters eat these up, but the boxholders at Tangelwood, the "Proper Bostonians," are conspicuous by their absence. Brahms, Beethoven and Bach are a MUST for the Cabots and the Lodges.

The great music festival of the Berkshires was launched in 1934. At first, the orchestra was recruited from the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, a group of about 70 men, directed by the late Henry Hadley in the horse ring of the Hanna Farms; "Music Under the Stars," since the instrumentalists played in a moveable shell but the paying customers sat on rude benches, al fresco. On occasions, it was "Music Under Umbrellas."

Two years later, the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the late Serge Koussevitzky, played under a huge circus tent. I still remember, vividly, one concert under that tent and the storm which drowned out the players during the interrupted coast-to-coast hookup. Dr. Koussevitzky was furious. Throwing his baton to the rain-soaked turf, he declared that never again would he conduct under canvas. And he never did.

THIS WAS, TRUY, "Wagner with sound effects by nature." Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, a New York dweller but a Lenox summer patron, got up one night and made a plea for money to build a music shed. She raised nearly $100.000 in a few minutes which resulted in the present shed which seats 6,000 in an-acoustically-perfect enclosed auditorium. On a perfect summer's Sunday afternoon, it is not unusual to fill the shed to capacity, but also to cater to some 8,000 music lovers on the immaculate lawn, truly an inspiring 14.000 symphony buffs.

A letter to Marvin Y. Schofer press representative of the festival, regarding a rumor that there might be financial difficulties for the coming season brought the encouraging refutal of the base libel:

"Tanglewood is alive and well, despite a little confusion on that score engendered by a slightly off-the-mark wire service report. The season opens Sunday afternoon, June 28 when Leonard Bernstein delivers the opening address of the Berkshire Music Center. During that week, he leads the B.S.O. in an open rehearsal. I should mention that the shed has entirely new seating this season, which is welcome news to all Tanglewood regulars. The seats are roomier, the aisles, wider and the visibility better."

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ITHACA JOURNAL
Saturday, June 6, 1970

Tanglewood Event Still On

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced that the annual Tanglewood Festival in the Berkshire Mountains would take place as scheduled this summer.

Reports had circulated indicating financial problems might force Tanglewood to close, according to the orchestra's press office.

Tanglewood on, BSO announces

United Press International

LENOX — The Boston Symphony Orchestra says this Summer's season of Tanglewood concerts will be held — but future seasons may be jeopardized by lack of finances.

The orchestra made the announcement yesterday to clear up what it said was confusion over recent comments regarding the future of the Summer program.

At that time, a spokesman for the trustees said if the Summer program was to continue local businesses would have to help raise $27,000 to meet the expenses.

Speculation Prompted By Tanglewood Programming

By RICHARD VINCENT

Although I was once asked to join one and did not, I often wonder just how effective a program committee is. Do the members really have any clout or are they merely tools of the music director?

It is proper, certainly, that the conductor should carry the heaviest stick because, ultimately, the season is his responsibility. If the season is well received, and ticket sales and subscriptions and donations are up, the music director will probably take the lion's share of the credit which, in fact, he deserves. But if there is too much Webern or Schoenberg or Bruna Moderna (how's that for a name of a serial composer?' then there will certainly be grousing and grumbling and sullen remarks to the effect that it would be nice to hear the real stuff again. The real stuff of course is Brahms, Tchaikowsky, maybe a little Wagner (orchestral transcriptions, no singers, thank you) Rachmaninoff, und so wieter, ad nauseam.

To be sure programming is a thankless and difficult task no matter who does it. Summer festival programming is even more frustrating but at least the committee and the music director can always cop out with that old baloney that in the summer audiences want the familiar. Why summertime audiences are supposed to be less venturesome or discriminating than those during the winter season has never been satisfactorily explained. Riots always seem to occur in the summer. It is a wonder in this age that they haven't started using computers or hired Herman Kahn and his think tank to nail down audience taste absolutely. They will, they will, and I throw caution to the winds and predict that if they do the results will shake a few ivory towers.

Continued from Page 1

The program committee members that I have known through the years serving several symphony orchestras have all been men of character and taste and genuinely knowledgeable in terms of music. They also were, generally, men of strong musical preferences and this is all to the good if at least one or two are real mavericks and irreconcilably on the side of experiment and change. It doesn't matter very much if the only contentions among them is whether to program the Mendelssohn or the Brahms. There must be, perforce, proponents tugging from each end of the musical spectrum.

In general, committee members advise but, in the case of a Szell or a Von Karajan or any other musical dictator, their consent is not necessary for, in the final analysis, the music director usually gets most of what he wants. It is meet that it should be thus, after all, there aren't many people in this world who can discuss music on the same level as the great conductors.

BUT IT MUST BE kept in mind that the conductors are also men of strong musical tastes. They have an affinity for this composer or that and, fallible as they must be, they will surely agitate for their favorite.

All in all, programming is a most inexact science, and, it is possible that if there were no committee at all, and the orchestra played whatever the librarian put on the music stands the results might not be too dissimilar from what we get anyhow.

This speculation is prompted by a study of the Tanglewood Berkshire Festival program for this summer. Although the programs generally are predictable, evidencing what might be termed the summer symphony syndrome, someone has managed to sneak in a few originals,. Lutoslawski, Xenakis, Krenek, Russo, Ligeti, Webern and Schuller. Do these names turn you on? Are the little old ladies in their navy blue prints, low heeled white shoes and real pearls going to charge out onto the green to be titillated by Lutoslowski? Probably not, but they will be there anyhow because many of their favorite goodies are also in the package.

AS ANYONE who does not live under a rock knows by now we are all wishing Ludwig a happy 200th birthday this year. The Boston Symphony is no exception. All the piano concerti, the Triple Concerto, symphonies 4, 5, 7, 8, and the Choral 9th, overtures, and the Choral Fantasy. Included is the Consecration of the House Overture, which is surely Beethoven at his worst, but I have a theory that it is played at all because the title is so impressive.

There are several performances of considerable interest besides the Beethoven orgy. A concert version of "Cosi fan Tutte" by Mozart will be given on July 11th with a cast that includes Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, (noted otherwise because she has her social security number tatooed on her abdomen) George Shirley, Tom Krause, and Ezio Flagello. This is a marvelous, happy opera with some of Mozart's best ensemble writing which means that it is the best ensemble writing in the literature. George Shirley should be particularly good as his voice is Mozartian (Mozartesque?) to a fault.

On July 22th a jolting juxtaposition to the Mozart, Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra by Russo will be played with the Corky Siegal Blues Band assisting the symphony orchestra. I can't honestly recommend it because I have never heard it, but if they are willing to take a flyer we all should trust them enough to go hear it.

IT MAY BE Beethoven's birthday but what explains six Stravinsky works? Of course Stravinsky needs no justification, the man is great, but one suspects that the programmers have decided that he is one modernist that the audiences have accepted and that they (the audiences) have elected him the token contemporary, proof that they are not fusty and conservative in musical taste. It doesn't matter what they think, Stravinsky will beat them at their own game anyhow becuase he is worth all the attention he gets. But one must remember that much of the popular Stravinsky works are not all that modern having been composed before and during World War I.

Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra is scheduled for August 9th, in case anyone is interested in a composer who took music up to the point where, to go beyond him, composers have had to invent new electronic instruments like the Moog Synthesizer. Webern, to these ears, is one of the authentic twentieth century geniuses but he takes some listening to. So listen, it is worth it if you stick with it.

THE FESTIVAL will end on August 23 with a performance of the Berlioz Requiem, conducted by Seiji Ozawa. There will be a massive chorus amalgamated from all over Massachusetts, and the tenor soloist will be Leopold Simoneau. One wonders what kind of living Simoneau would have made if Berlioz (pronounce the final Z and be the first one on your block to do it right) had not written his "Requiem." Simoneau has made a living from this work alone. He has sung it almost a million times (or less) all over the world. It seems that it is unethical or immoral or worse to schedule this Requiem without Simoneau singing the tenor solo.

This situation began when Columbia Records, sometime in the late forties released the complete work on 78 rpms, the first recording of it that had been made. Memory does not serve who the conductor or orchestra was, but they were French and of no great international note, something like the Nancy or Metz Symphony Orchestra and Chorus. Columbia Records never knew what hit them. They sold thousands of copies and, in the main, it was because of Simoneau and his beautiful rendition of the "Sanctus." Since then he has become a fixture in the part. I have no idea how old he is, but let us wish him a long life and a sure b flat whenever he does the "Sanctus."

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, May 31, 1970

SUNDAY NEWS
NEW YORK'S PICTURE NEWSPAPER
SUN. 3,221,849
JUL 26 1970

the Travel Bug
recommends ..... TANGLEWOOD

In the heart of the beautiful Berkshires is Tanglewood (at Lenox, Mass.), the summer home of the world famous Boston Symphony Orchestra. It's only three hours' drive from Manhattan.

Founded in 1934, the Berkshire Festival is the country's oldest music festival. A veritable mecca for music lovers young and old, concerts are conducted in the famous Music Shed which together with the surrounding lawns accommodate over 15,000. Every musical sound is audible without amplification.

So, if you enjoy a concert under the stars, a picnic on the lawns, or a stroll through the 210 acres, then this place will appeal to you.

There are also chamber music concerts and choral and vocal programs. The festival-within-a-festival is a presentation of new works heard for the first time. This particular program is of five days' duration through August 20.

One of the highlights this season should be Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra performing in an all-Gershwin program on August 11. For the Fillmore East crowd programs of outstanding current artists are presented. Just south of Lenox is Jacob's Pillow, shrine of American dance for the ballet-minded.

There is a cafeteria on the premises which is open to ticket holders who may picnic. Also, there's ample free parking. For information contact the Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. (413) 637-1600. The season ends on August 23.

Krahksen

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
MAY 13 1970

'Woodstock' at Tanglewood Is Deemed To Be Unlikely

Stockbridge

MRS. SALLY BERGMANS—Tel. 298-5543

STOCKBRIDGE — The possibility of another "Woodstock" at Tanglewood this summer has been discounted by Thomas D. Perry Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In a May 7 letter to Selectmen Chairman Robert G. Williams, Perry wrote, "I am not apprehensive about the possibility of another 'Woodstock,' in the sense that that word means vast multitudes of people swamping our community. The occasions where this has happened have been pilgrimages for festivals of several days of continuous music-making, generally in out-of-the-way places ill-prepared to receive them. These conditions don't pertain to Tanglewood and the Berkshires, and while one cannot discount the possibility, it does seem to be unlikely.

Contrary to Tradition

He said the suggestion of trying to control the size of the crowd by ending the ticket sale at a particular time or by insisting on advance sales only would be contrary to Tanglewood's tradition.

"The entire tradition at Tanglewood has been that there is an unlimited capacity and that one can come to the grounds at any time," he wrote. "Generally, the unpleasant and ugly situations with the large rock concerts have resulted from disappointment, or thwarting, of large portions of the audience by some means or other, and it would seem to me that putting ourselves in the position of turning people away and stopping a ticket sale after they had come from distances to hear a concert would be to lay ourselves open for the very problems we are trying to avoid."

Perry said the Contemporary Trends concerts "represent an important part of the musical life of today" and also will help "to turn an honest dollar or two for the Boston Symphony which needs it urgently . . ."

Three Concerts Planned

Three such concerts are planned this season, he said. They include two presentations of Fillmore East and one by folksingers Peter, Paul and Mary. They will be on Tuesday evenings, July 7 and 21 and Aug. 18. Perry said efforts will be made to reduce amplification of the music, although "it is not always possible, when the performance is in full flow, to govern these matters."

He also said that the two Fillmore East concerts will start earlier than usual, at 6 p.m., and that with an intermission, they should end by 11.

Williams had written Perry in March expressing the town's concern about "a possible Woodstock" at Tanglewood.

Tanglewood Tickets

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

CORNING LEADER PRESS
Saturday, June 27, 1970

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.—The box office at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony's summer home, Lenox, Mass., opened June 15. For the first time, a limited number of seats for the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Festival concerts will be available through TICKETRON, Inc., a computerized reservation service.

As in the past, tickets may also be ordered by mail and by phone at the Festival Ticket Office; Tanglewood; Lenox, Massachusetts 01240. The box office phone number is: (413) 637-1600.

The box office is open daily from 9 am to 6 pm, and through intermission on concert days.

A brochure listing complete programs, dates, and prices may be obtained by writing or phoning the Tanglewood box office.

Keeper of Tanglewood's Splendor

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 27 1970 New England Newsclip

By C. L. Hallowell

When spring begins, James Kiley, the superintendent of buildings and grounds at Tanglewood, realizes that he will have very little rest until the snow flies. He is under constant pressure, not only to maintain the buildings and grounds, but also to coordinate much of the personnel which assures an efficient flow of activity and communications.

Most of those who go to Tanglewood cannot help but admire the immaculate lawns and the solemn, majestic pines which dominate the estate. Perhaps nature has been kind in giving the grounds the appearance of serenity and perfection, but James Kiley has certainly helped her. He is proud of the lawn and the trees and speaks of them with a modest, contented satisfaction, and then he explains the many hours of work which are devoted to their well-being.

According to Kiley, the essence of the durability of the lawns — which survive so well every year the millions of ruthless footsteps without developing brown or bear spots — is the growth of a deep, firm root system. To assure this growth, the 15 acres of lawns must be airified, fertilized and irrigated. For those not versed in the maintenance of lawns, the sight of the airifying machine causes mild panic as it seemingly chews and mauls the grass. Actually, due to the many prongs of the machine which penetrate the turf, the roots are permitted to breathe and are given access to water.

After this process, two or three tons of fertilizer are spread over the lawns and they are irrigated frequently, the water coming from an artificial pond created especially for this purpose. Also after every concert during the summer, the lawns are extensively sliced to alleviate the amount of compaction which occurs and to permit water to enter the soil. Again, this process produces anxiety for the uninitiated in lawn care.

In the autumn, the most extensive outdoor maintenance falls on Kiley's shoulders, for the lawns and the trees must be given great care to see them through the winter. Again the lawns are airified and fertilized, but to a much greater extent than in the spring. Also at this time of year, a vast amount of topsoil must be hauled and spread over the lawn surrounding the Music Shed.

James Kiley on the much-tended Tanglewood lawn.

Hallowell

Mr. Kiley's fuchsias are impressive.

As well as the lawns, the trees are also extensively cared for by supplying nutrients to their roots. Kiley says that if they had not been fed every year, probably they would have all died by this time; for when a tree grows to a certain size, its roots cannot get a sufficient amount of nutrient from the soil alone.

As well as building a reputation for himself as a perserver of lawns and trees, Kiley has also become a well-known horticulturist and takes pride in the numerous flowers planted throughout the grounds, especially the tuberous begonias and the 20 different varieties of hanging fuchsias. For many years, Kiley has had an interest in horticulture and experimented with different varieties of flowers. His success came to the attention of the Tanglewood administrators and consequently a greenhouse was constructed which serves as the starting point for the many flowers of the estate.

Maintenance of the grounds and the buildings is the designated scope of Kiley's position, but since 1959, when he took over the role, he has been given increased responsibility in other areas. Now he is in complete charge of all personnel not directly connected with the musical aspect of Tanglewood. He finds it a job in itself to coordinate and delegate responsibilities to the police, parking attendants, ushers, cafeteria staff and employes of the Tent Club. It remains a mystery to him how everything runs so smoothly during the summers, but he, obviously, is the one responsible for the efficiency.

As well as taking responsibility for this staff, Kiley must (with the exception of the Stockbridge and Lenox Police) hire them before the season starts. The problem is not in finding people but in selecting the few from the large numbers who apply for positions. A considerable amount of time is required by Kiley and Parking Superintendent William Leary, to select 40 parking attendants and to select with Manager of the Ushers, Harry Steadman, 200 ushers as well as staff for other positions.

In the 10 seasons that Kiley has been the superintendent, he has been amazed and gratified by the good behavior of the guests and the concertgoers. He was especially pleased by the politeness and friendliness which he observed during last summer's rock concerts. Kiley feels that his fine staff has been greatly responsible for the over-all atmosphere of efficiency and calmness, especially just before and after concerts.

Although the pace of Kiley's activities decreases from the end of autumn until the beginning of spring, the worklist never grows shorter. Interiors of buildings must be renovated and painted and furniture must be repaired. This past winter, Kiley and his full-time staff of four, with the help of an outside contractor, constructed an extensive addition to the Chamber Music Hall which will permit a greater number of concerts to take place in that building. Despite the fact that there is a never-ending amount of work to be done during the fall and winter, that time gives Kiley the necessary period of peace and quietude in which he can recoup his energies for the next season.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 9 1970 New England Newsclip

Bucketful of Relief

New Seats at Tanglewood

Whitestone

Tanglewood's new chairs offer the public deep-seated comfort and ample wiggle-room.

By ANNE-GERARD FLYNN

Tanglewood may bring melodious notes to mind, but a somewhat less harmonious afterglow has often been felt in one's seat. Remember being folded up in those metal buckets that passed for chairs in the Shed last year, and trying to maneuver into a position where one's own bucket would not pound like the kettledrum on stage? What a Tanglewood tango that was.

Padded Concerts

Such grand finale scenes are no more, however. Tanglewood, probably as the result of some musician's seating himself in the audience to get its viewpoint (and what a point that must have been), has decided to pad its concerts this season in the form of all-new elm chairs. The broad seats extend well up one's back, and are 22 inches wide, large enough to fit the contours of the Greenback Packers. You can even squeeze in your tuba, if you feel so inclined to bring it along.

The American Seating Co. has installed the furniture, and despite appearances to the contrary, the company does not sit down on the job. It installed the seats at Philharmonic Hall and in the Pittsburgh and Cincinnati baseball stadiums. Proof that America knows its business, for everyone knows that a bad seat at a baseball game is worse than a bad umpire.

The new furniture at Tanglewood is focused at the conductor, whereas the old radiated from a point at the back of the Shed. Now you can be certain that that "pole" down front really is the conductor.

Slippery Seats

The wood of the new chairs is coated with a polyurethane finish which allows you to slip quickly off the seat, insuring that you will not be closed inside its belly. These self-folding chairs, however, have one disadvantage. They no longer allow the music-goer the fun of skiing all over the cramped feet of the audience as he spelunks his way to the middle of the row. The chairs are numbered in black enamel so that you no longer have to breathe down a stranger's neck to discover he is not really sitting in your place, after all.

The metal arm rests of the chairs are painted white to match the white metal structures of the roof, whose natural wood also matches the furniture. Some people do not even have two similar chairs in their living rooms. At Tanglewood, the chairs match each other and the ceiling, too.

You will find the Tanglewood seats most comfortable, but there is no danger of finding them too comfortable. They are all soundly bolted to the floor on metal horseshoes.

With such delightful music and comfortable chairs, there is a great danger many of us will sleep through a few grand finales. That is fine by me. My grand finale still hasn't recouped from last season's "bucketfuls" of Tanglewood tangos.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 28 1970 New England Newsclip

the lively world

by Milton R. Bass

I WAS SITTING on one of the new seats at Tanglewood and musing on the various puns you could work up in describing their comfort quotient. You know, things like "Starting from the bottom up," or "end result," or "just guessing from the seat of my pants," or "hindsight," or "rear view," or "devil take the hindmost." You could have a lot of fun writing stuff like that, driving people into gales of laughter by tickling their funnybones.

But seats are a serious business to me, because so much of my professional life is spent sitting on them. Too often it is more to cry than to laugh. If you ask a critic how the show was the night before and he says "painful," it may have nothing to do with the event. He may have sat and suffered for his art more than any actor on the stage. They also serve who only sit and wait.

* * *

THE TANGLEWOOD management gave up 800 seats in order to make room for the roomier chairs and I thank them 800 times. I thank them 800 times 800 times. For now one can expand with the music, shift knees without jolting everyone in the row ahead and dash for the exit without 10-striking a whole row.

The chairs are constructed so that most of the weight rests on the back rather than the bottom, and the elm is like cushiony velvet compared to those iron maidens of the past. There was a hardness to the old metal seats at Tanglewood and those used at the old Music Barn that went beyond that attributed to diamonds. This was pain of the purest kind, a combination of needle numbness and hot and cold flashes that made you envision amputations and other small niceties.

* * *

THE CRUELEST endurance race of all was to attend Tanglewood on Sunday afternoon and follow it up with the Music Barn concert at night. Jazz musicians, if they show up at all, always show up late. They would always get lost somewhere between New York City and Lenox and would come dragging in about a half-hour after the concert was supposed to start.

Then, while the audience was beginning the dumb rumble that scares the growth out of promoters, the musicians would insist they had to have something to eat or drink or both. Finally, they would be dragged out on the stage and mumble about how glad they were to be there and spend 15 minutes describing their getting lost.

* * *

THEN, THEY would begin the concert. It would be hard to find more enthusiastic audiences than Music Barn used to draw in the old days and the musicians, delighted out of their skulls at finding such a receptive group in such bucolic surroundings, would start playing their hearts out and never want to quit. They would play encores until dawn if permitted, because they don't like to go to bed till it's getting light out anyway.

And there I would sit, battered from Tanglewood, torn from Music Barn, perched on top of a hunk of raw flesh screaming for mercy, and aware that I would have to sit on another chair for an hour after the concert to write the thing up. It was amazing that I was as objective as I was.

* * *

ANYWAY, ALL I wanted to say was that I really like the new seats at Tanglewood and the extra space in the aisle. It is now possible to enjoy the concert from many different angles and to leave at the end of it without the feeling of complete physical exhaustion. There are many other positive things I could say about the new setup, but I see that the concert is almost over now and I have to stop writing.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 20 1970

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Overture

Joel Librizzi

The partially installed new seats in the Shed at Tanglewood have inspired a number of images, mostly funereal. The musically inclined see a dance of skeletons; the more lugubrious, a cemetery. Nobody yet has called them chairs.

REGISTER
TORRINGTON, CONN.
(E) 11,496

JUL 18 1970

New England Newsclip

Other opinion

Seats in harmony

Berkshire Eagle

The average man, it is said, spends a third of his life in bed and if well regulated sleeps the same period. How much of the other two-thirds he sits does not lend itself to any precise computation, but most well adjusted people are inclined to the practice whenever courtesy allows, opportunity affords and comfort is anticipated. It is an important attitude, as the astronauts say.

Tanglewood patrons, of which there were cumulatively some 22,000 in the series of musical events over the weekend, were treated to a comforting attitude which, for all except a clutch of boxholders, had been denied them ever since the great Shed was constructed in 1938. There were new seats replacing the sheetsteel racks which had afflicted comfort for a generation. Although not upholstered, they proved to be artistically right and fundamentally sound — in a word, comfortable. The press release reported that they were the same type of seating installed in the new baseball stadiums in Pittsburgh and Cincinnati. This is unsettling. Their belated appearance at Tanglewood suggests that even in this important field priorities are out of order. With all understanding of the four-hour baseball marathon, where but in a concert hall is comfort so important, especially to the dutiful spouse, the indifferent listener and the tone deaf?

Not only has the affluent society been accommodated by a widening of the seat to a generous 22 inches, but even the elongated John Kenneth Galbraith's knees can find room for maneuver. The distance between rows has been increased to easily seat late-comers and to allow patrons an unobtrusive retreat to the bar-tent during a rough passage.

In short, Tanglewood has at long last found itself in harmony with the wise words of the late Lewis Perry. At the opening exercises of the Music Center at which he presided with such great humor and charm, he was wont to chide the participants to be brief with the admonition that the "mind cannot encompass what the seat cannot endure."

The Berkshire Eagle

Pittsfield, Massachusetts, Monday, July 27, 1970

Whitestone

KOUSSEVITZKY MEMORIAL service, held annually on the Sunday closest to his birthday, was held yesterday at the Church-on-the-Hill Cemetery in Lenox with more than 300 persons attending. By coincidence, yesterday happened to be the birthday of the former conductor of the Boston Symphony, who died in 1942.

Lenox Church Rite Commemorates Serge Koussevitzky

LENOX — Religious and musical services were conducted in the Church on the Hill Sunday morning to commemorate the birthday of the late revered conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, who died June 4, 1951, at the age of 77.

Members of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood presented a vocal and instrumental program at 10 a. m. under direction of Michael Tillson Thomas, associate conductor of the orchestra.

Following the musical program, the congregation assembled at the Koussevitzky grave site in Church on the Hill Cemetery for other services.

Included in the assemblage were Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky, widow of the conductor, famed Koussevitzky protege Leonard Bernstein, Aaron Copland, composer and conductor who rose to fame at Tanglewood, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and many music lovers.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

JUN 10 1970 New England Newsclip

Where to Listen This Summer

Music will be made this summer in most of the places to which New Englanders have become accustomed. The following is a collection of the announcements which have come our way:

To begin at the beginning, Tanglewood opens Friday evening July 3 for the 1970 Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first two concerts, Friday at 9 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. will be conducted by Seiji Ozawa, an artistic director of Tanglewood and newly named conductor of the San Francisco Symphony. On the Friday night program are works by Bernstein, Ligeti and Berlioz, and on Saturday night, Mozart and Stravinsky. Leonard Bernstein conducts the first Sunday afternoon program, July 5, a performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 2. with the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society.

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six all-Beethoven concerts in observance of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. The Beethoven concerts will be July 31, Aug. 1 and 2, and Aug. 14, 15, and 16.

July 28 will be the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade program, this year celebrating the 30th anniversary of the Berkshire Music Center and the approaching 70th birthday of composer Aaron Copland. The program will begin at 2 p.m. with demonstrations of the work of students at the Berkshire center and will conclude with an 8:30 p.m. concert by the Boston Symphony and Music Center Orchestras conducted by Aaron Copland.

Tanglewood concerts are every Friday and Saturday night and Sunday afternoon on the grounds of the Tanglewood estate in Lenox. Tickets and information are available at the Symphony Hall Box office, Boston, and after June 15 by mail or in person at the Box Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

Other conductors for the season will be Gunther Schuller, Michael Tilson Thomas, Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard and Charles Mackerras. Artists-in-residence and teachers of master classes will be soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janis.

The Tanglewood program continues through Aug. 23. The program for the following weekend will be published each Saturday on the Limelight Page. Until then, the Boston Pops season continues at Symphony Hall Boston, through June 27.

Elsewhere in the vicinity:

The Marlboro Music Festival, on a mountainside in Marlboro, Vt., will present its informal schedule of chamber orchestra and chamber music performances weekends from July 11 through Aug. 23 under the guidance of Rudolf Serkin, artistic director. Pablo Casals will conduct the festival orchestra on dates to be announced. Brochure and ticket information available from Marlboro Music Festival, Box 30 1430 Spruce St., Philadelphia, Pa.

More chamber music can be heard July 11 through Aug. 22 at the Red Fox Music Barn, New Marlboro, Mass.

George Balanchine's New York City Ballet and Eugene Ormandy's Philadelphia Orchestra will split the season at Saratoga's Performing Arts Center, Saratoga Springs, N.Y. The New York City Ballet begins its summer season Wednesday, July 1, with Ballet and Prologue in Two Acts, which will be offered through the July 4 weekend. Beginning July 7, the company will present three different programs of ballet each week performed in rotating repertory Tuesday through Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons. The programs will change each Tuesday for three weeks, ending July 26.

The Philadelphia Orchestra will begin its summer season July 30, with performances Thursday, Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for the following four weeks, ending Aug. 23.

Special popular programs at Saratoga, including performances by Dianne Warwick, Liberace, Blood Sweat & Tears and the Hee Haw gang, begin June 13 and continue through Sept. 6.

Program and ticket information available from the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, Saratoga Springs, N.Y. 12866.

The season begins at Newport July 10 through 12 with the Newport Jazz Festival. The Friday evening concert will be a salute to Louis Armstrong, who will be present, along with Mahalia Jackson. Pete Fountain, the Preservation Hall Jazz Band and the Bobby Hackett Quartet

At noon Saturday there will be workshops for trumpet, violin and drums, followed by a concert of contemporary jazz. the Saturday evening concert will feature Nina Simone, Miles Davis, Dizzy Gillespie, Herbie Mann and Sonny Rollins.

Ella Fitzgerald, Cannonball Adderley, the Buddy Rich orchestra, Les McCann and Eddie Harris, and Leon Thomas will perform at the Sunday night concert. Tickets and accommodation information is available from the Newport Jazz Festival, Newport, R.I. 02840.

The Newport Music Festival, formerly sponsored by the Metropolitan Opera and revived last year after a lapse of several seasons, will offer opera, chamber music and vocal and instrumental recitals in Newport's mansions and opera house from July 30 through Aug. 8. Highlights will include an opening night chamber music concert with music of Rheinberger and Wolf-Ferrari, recitals by pianists Raymond Lewenthal and Flavio Varani, and American premiere performances of Rossini's "Maria Dolcissima" and Prince Poniatowski's opera "Au Travers de Mur" with the Metropolitan Opera Studio Singers.

Tickets and information are available from the Newport Music Festival, 23 Bridge St., Newport, R.I. 02840. The Newport Music Festival dates coincide with the annual Newport Art Exhibition and the America's Cup trials.

Farther afield, a series of Saturday and Sunday concerts will be offered in conjunction with the Stratford Festival Canada beginning July 5 and continuing through Aug. 22. The Sunday concerts will include folk song, piano, guitar and vocal recitals, and the Saturday series will offer chamber music. Information available from Festival Theatre, Stratford, Ontario, Canada.

Chamber, symphonic and choral concerts will be offered at the Grand Teton Music Festival, Jackson Hole, Wyo., July 28 through Aug. 30, and at the Aspen Music Festival, Aspen, Colo., June 29 through Aug. 30. Opera will be heard in the west June 20 through July 25 at the Central City, Colo., Opera Festival, and July 3 through Aug. 22 at the Santa Fe., N.M., Opera.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,372 (E) 194,700

MAY 30 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood ho!

By Marjorie Sherman, Globe Staff

In that lush green corner of the Berkshire Hills where the word "Tanglewood" is music itself, the fiddle stands are up and the great hanging baskets of fuchsias are already in blossom.

Faces known the world round are heading for the peaceful villages of Lenox and Stockbridge. Joining one another across the great lawns where the late Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony watched his BSO dream come true just 30 years ago will be Bernstein and Ormandy, Schuller and Ozawa, Barzin, and scores more.

Boston Symphony's own star turn, the brilliant 25-year-old Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor with William Steinberg and a standing-ovation baton man in a few short months, will be a festival conductor.

A special date is June 28, and the opening of the Berkshire Music Center, the "Summer academy" where Leonard Bernstein was Koussevitzky's first pupil in 1940 and where Bernstein will do the opener.

Symphony's old guards—Cabots and Tafts and Gardiners and Hatches will be heading west for the July 3 week-end concert. Then will follow the seasonal fireworks, like the Beethoven Anniversary concert, Arthur Fiedler's special Pops session there (on Aug. 11), the Berlioz Requiem memorial concert for the late Charles Munch, and the Festival of Contemporary Music, (with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago taking half the honors) Aug. 15 through Aug. 20.

Boston's own Chorus Pro Musica, Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society will be joining Tanglewood's Festival Chorus for special sessions in the most famous Music Shed anywhere. Solo lights will shine down on Jules Eskin, Claude Frank, Rudolf Firkusny, Paul Zukofsky, Peter Serkin, Lili Kraus, Rosalind Elias, Phyllis Curtin and a galaxy more.

★

The SOS is out from the SIS for some home welcomes for students due here June 24 from Scandinavian countries. The Student International Service, at 191 Cambridge st., Boston (ask for Mrs. Arlan) is also hoping for housing for young lawyers, educators, journalists and doctors who'll arrive in July.

NEWS
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
(E) 5,742

JUN 25 1970 New England Newsclip

Many Live Music Concerts On Schedule In Area

By Irene Jarry
News Music Columnist

With music festivals mushrooming everywhere, music lovers, students, etc., are planning to hear again this summer live music concerts which their busy winter schedules have limited. Plan to sparkle many of your short summer trips around them. Although as a nation we have been accused of having a very low culture rating—you know that long-hair stuff, our cultural spectaculars are fast jux toposing those in Europe. Americans are learning to discriminate, and thousands of people travel to top-flight art festivals, many of them free, such as Levenson's summer POP concerts in Worcester, The Esplanade concerts in Boston with Arthur Fiedler.

The Tanglewood Berkshire Festival at Lenox, Mass. considered the best festival in America, will be held July 3 thru to August 23rd with William Steinberg music director. It features the Boston Symphony Orchestra, many top name artists and guest conductors again this year. One of the festivals that has the most glamorous settings, beautifully landscaped grounds. Close by are the Jazz and Folksong Concerts at the Bershire Music Barn. There is also chamber music at South Mountain.

Kenny Burrell, Dizzy Gillespie and many others.

An innovation on Saturday afternoon will be six hours of jazz starting at noon.

The Sunday afternoon concert will feature Bill Cosby with his new band. Making her Newport debut will be singer Roberta Flack. Rounding out the program will be a jam seession with blues guitarists Albert King, T-Bone Walker, and Shuggie Otis.

The program concludes Sunday evening with a program featuring jazz great Ella Fitzgerald, Buddy Rich and his Orchestra, the Les McCann Trio, the Eddie Harris Quartet, the Cannonball Adderley Quintet, and Leon Thomas, vocalist with his quartet.

More about festivals later. Happy listening!

The Berkshire Eagle

Pittsfield, Massachusetts, Monday, July 27, 1970

Whitestone

KOUSSEVITZKY MEMORIAL service, held annually on the Sunday closest to his birthday, was held yesterday at the Church-on-the-Hill Cemetery in Lenox with more than 300 persons attending. By coincidence, yesterday happened to be the birthday of the former conductor of the Boston Symphony, who died in 1942.

Lenox Church Rite Commemorates Serge Koussevitzky

LENOX — Religious and musical services were conducted in the Church on the Hill Sunday morning to commemorate the birthday of the late revered conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, who died June 4, 1951, at the age of 77.

Members of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood presented a vocal and instrumental program at 10 a. m. under direction of Michael Tillson Thomas, associate conductor of the orchestra.

Following the musical program, the congregation assembled at the Koussevitzky grave site in Church on the Hill Cemetery for other services.

Included in the assemblage were Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky, widow of the conductor, famed Koussevitzky protege Leonard Bernstein, Aaron Copland, composer and conductor who rose to fame at Tanglewood, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and many music lovers.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,222 (E) 194,709

MAY 30 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood ho!

By Marjorie Sherman, Globe Staff

In that lush green corner of the Berkshire Hills where the word "Tanglewood" is music itself, the fiddle stands are up and the great hanging baskets of fuchsias are already in blossom.

Faces known the world round are heading for the peaceful villages of Lenox and Stockbridge. Joining one another across the great lawns where the late Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony watched his BSO dream come true just 30 years ago will be Bernstein and Ormandy, Schuller and Ozawa, Barzin, and scores more.

Boston Symphony's own star turn, the brilliant 25-year-old Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor with William Steinberg and a standing-ovation baton man in a few short months, will be a festival conductor.

A special date is June 28, and the opening of the Berkshire Music Center, the "Summer academy" where Leonard Bernstein was Koussevitzky's first pupil in 1940 and where Bernstein will do the opener.

Symphony's old guards—Cabots and Tafts and Gardiners and Hatches will be heading west for the July 3 week-end concert. Then will follow the seasonal fireworks, like the Beethoven Anniversary concert, Arthur Fiedler's special Pops session there (on Aug. 11), the Berlioz Requiem memorial concert for the late Charles Munch, and the Festival of Contemporary Music, (with the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago taking half the honors) Aug. 15 through Aug. 20.

Boston's own Chorus Pro Musica, Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society will be joining Tanglewood's Festival Chorus for special sessions in the most famous Music Shed anywhere. Solo lights will shine down on Jules Eskin, Claude Frank, Rudolf Firkusny, Paul Zukofsky, Peter Serkin, Lili Kraus, Rosalind Elias, Phyllis Curtin and a galaxy more.

★

The SOS is out from the SIS for some home welcomes for students due here June 24 from Scandinavian countries. The Student International Service, at 191 Cambridge st., Boston (ask for Mrs. Arlan) is also hoping for housing for young lawyers, educators, journalists and doctors who'll arrive in July.

NEWS
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
(E) 5,742

JUN 25 1970 New England Newsclip

Many Live Music Concerts On Schedule In Area

By Irene Jarry
News Music Columnist

With music festivals mushrooming everywhere, music lovers, students, etc., are planning to hear again this summer live music concerts which their busy winter schedules have limited. Plan to sparkle many of your short summer trips around them. Although as a nation we have been accused of having a very low culture rating—you know that long-hair stuff, our cultural spectaculars are fast jux toposing those in Europe. Americans are learning to discriminate, and thousands of people travel to top-flight art festivals, many of them free, such as Levenson's summer POP concerts in Worcester, The Esplanade concerts in Boston with Arthur Fiedler.

The Tanglewood Berkshire Festival at Lenox, Mass. considered the best festival in America, will be held July 3 thru to August 23rd with William Steinberg music director. It features the Boston Symphony Orchestra, many top name artists and guest conductors again this year. One of the festivals that has the most glamorous settings, beautifully landscaped grounds. Close by are the Jazz and Folksong Concerts at the Bershire Music Barn. There is also chamber music at South Mountain.

Kenny Burrell, Dizzy Gillespie and many others.

An innovation on Saturday afternoon will be six hours of jazz starting at noon.

The Sunday afternoon concert will feature Bill Cosby with his new band. Making her Newport debut will be singer Roberta Flack. Rounding out the program will be a jam seession with blues guitarists Albert King, T-Bone Walker, and Shuggie Otis.

The program concludes Sunday evening with a program featuring jazz great Ella Fitzgerald, Buddy Rich and his Orchestra, the Les McCann Trio, the Eddie Harris Quartet, the Cannonball Adderley Quintet, and Leon Thomas, vocalist with his quartet.

More about festivals later. Happy listening!

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

JUN 10 1970 New England Newsclip

Where to Listen This Summer

Music will be made this summer in most of the places to which New Englanders have become accustomed. The following is a collection of the announcements which have come our way:

To begin at the beginning, Tanglewood opens Friday evening July 3 for the 1970 Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first two concerts, Friday at 9 p.m. and Saturday at 8:30 p.m. will be conducted by Seiji Ozawa, an artistic director of Tanglewood and newly named conductor of the San Francisco Symphony. On the Friday night program are works by Bernstein, Ligeti and Berlioz, and on Saturday night, Mozart and Stravinsky. Leonard Bernstein conducts the first Sunday afternoon program, July 5, a performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 2. with the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society.

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six all-Beethoven concerts in observance of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. The Beethoven concerts will be July 31, Aug. 1 and 2, and Aug. 14, 15, and 16.

July 28 will be the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade program, this year celebrating the 30th anniversary of the Berkshire Music Center and the approaching 70th birthday of composer Aaron Copland. The program will begin at 2 p.m. with demonstrations of the work of students at the Berkshire center and will conclude with an 8:30 p.m. concert by the Boston Symphony and Music Center Orchestras conducted by Aaron Copland.

Tanglewood concerts are every Friday and Saturday night and Sunday afternoon on the grounds of the Tanglewood estate in Lenox. Tickets and information are available at the Symphony Hall Box office, Boston, and after June 15 by mail or in person at the Box Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

Other conductors for the season will be Gunther Schuller, Michael Tilson Thomas, Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard and Charles Mackerras. Artists-in-residence and teachers of master classes will be soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janis.

The Tanglewood program continues through Aug. 23. The program for the following weekend will be published each Saturday on the Limelight Page. Until then, the Boston Pops season continues at Symphony Hall Boston, through June 27.

Elsewhere in the vicinity:

The Marlboro Music Festival, on a mountainside in Marlboro, Vt., will present its informal schedule of chamber orchestra and chamber music performances weekends from July 11 through Aug. 23 under the guidance of Rudolf Serkin, artistic director. Pablo Casals will conduct the festival orchestra on dates to be announced. Brochure and ticket information available from Marlboro Music Festival, Box 30 1430 Spruce St., Philadelphia, Pa.

More chamber music can be heard July 11 through Aug. 22 at the Red Fox Music Barn, New Marlboro, Mass.

George Balanchine's New York City Ballet and Eugene Ormandy's Philadelphia Orchestra will split the season at Saratoga's Performing Arts Center, Saratoga Springs, N.Y. The New York City Ballet begins its summer season Wednesday, July 1, with Ballet and Prologue in Two Acts, which will be offered through the July 4 weekend. Beginning July 7, the company will present three different programs of ballet each week performed in rotating repertory Tuesday through Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons. The programs will change each Tuesday for three weeks, ending July 26.

The Philadelphia Orchestra will begin its summer season July 30, with performances Thursday, Friday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons for the following four weeks, ending Aug. 23.

Special popular programs at Saratoga, including performances by Dianne Warwick, Liberace, Blood Sweat & Tears and the Hee Haw gang, begin June 13 and continue through Sept. 6.

Program and ticket information available from the Saratoga Performing Arts Center, Saratoga Springs, N.Y. 12866.

The season begins at Newport July 10 through 12 with the Newport Jazz Festival. The Friday evening concert will be a salute to Louis Armstrong, who will be present, along with Mahalia Jackson. Pete Fountain, the Preservation Hall Jazz Band and the Bobby Hackett Quartet.

At noon Saturday there will be workshops for trumpet, violin and drums, followed by a concert of contemporary jazz. the Saturday evening concert will feature Nina Simone, Miles Davis, Dizzy Gillespie, Herbie Mann and Sonny Rollins.

Ella Fitzgerald, Cannonball Adderley, the Buddy Rich orchestra, Les McCann and Eddie Harris, and Leon Thomas will perform at the Sunday night concert. Tickets and accommodation information is available from the Newport Jazz Festival, Newport, R.I. 02840.

The Newport Music Festival, formerly sponsored by the Metropolitan Opera and revived last year after a lapse of several seasons, will offer opera, chamber music and vocal and instrumental recitals in Newport's mansions and opera house from July 30 through Aug. 8. Highlights will include an opening night chamber music concert with music of Rheinberger and Wolf-Ferrari, recitals by pianists Raymond Lewenthal and Flavio Varani, and American premiere performances of Rossini's "Maria Dolcissima" and Prince Poniatowski's opera "Au Travers de Mur" with the Metropolitan Opera Studio Singers.

Tickets and information are available from the Newport Music Festival, 23 Bridge St., Newport, R.I. 02840. The Newport Music Festival dates coincide with the annual Newport Art Exhibition and the America's Cup trials.

Farther afield, a series of Saturday and Sunday concerts will be offered in conjunction with the Stratford Festival Canada beginning July 5 and continuing through Aug. 22. The Sunday concerts will include folk song, piano, guitar and vocal recitals, and the Saturday series will offer chamber music. Information available from Festival Theatre, Stratford, Ontario, Canada.

Chamber, symphonic and choral concerts will be offered at the Grand Teton Music Festival, Jackson Hole, Wyo., July 28 through Aug. 30, and at the Aspen Music Festival, Aspen, Colo., June 29 through Aug. 30. Opera will be heard in the west June 20 through July 25 at the Central City, Colo., Opera Festival, and July 3 through Aug. 22 at the Santa Fe., N.M., Opera.

TANGLEWOOD

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

By R. C. HAMMERICH

Tanglewood is still the great lady of the summer entertainment circuit — gentle and gracious in her dress and manner, spirited and elegant in her purpose—a genteel personage of quality.

BSO SUMMER HOME

Her 210 acres which overlap the borders of Lenox and Stockbridge have been the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1937 and the home of the Berkshire Music Center (BMC), a summer school for advanced study of music, since 1940.

Between them, the two organizations will offer 80 musical events for more than 200,000 listeners during an eight-week season beginning June 28.

On that afternoon, Leonard Bernstein, retired music director of the New York Philharmonic and a Tanglewood student during the first (1940) summer of the BMC, will give the address of greeting to up to 400 students at the opening ceremony.

The first BMC concert will be June 30, a faculty recital. The first festival concert will be July 3 with Seiji Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Tanglewood chorus.

The final BMC concert will be Aug. 23 (chamber music at 10 a. m.) The final festival concert will be the same afternoon (2.30) with Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, tenor Leopold Simoneau and three choruses in a performance of the Berlioz Requiem.

STEINBERG DIRECTOR

It will be Tanglewood's first summer since the retirement of Erich Leinsdorf, who left last year as music director of the orchestra and BMC. He was replaced by William Steinberg, who continues his affiliation as music director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra.

But Steinberg has been ordered by his doctor to curtail his work, so there are four musical guides at Tanglewood this summer: Steinberg, Ozawa, Gunther Schuller and Bernstein.

Steinberg will conduct four of the six all-Beethoven programs scheduled to honor the composer's 200th birthday, Dec. 16. He will conduct July 31, Aug. 1, 14 and 15. The other Beethoven programs will be Aug. 2 with Antal Dorati and Aug. 16 with Max Rudolph.

Ozawa, who is music director of the Toronto and San Francisco orchestras, is co-music director with Schuller. He has concerned himself primarily with organizing the 24 weekend performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he will conduct eight.

N. E. CONSERVATORY HEAD

Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music and a composer of international standing, will be involved primarily in the BMC and the four-concert Festival of Contemporary Music sponsored jointly Aug. 16-20 by the BMC and the Fromm Foundation. He will conduct one of the big, weekend programs, Aug. 21.

Bernstein, officially appointed advisor to Tanglewood, will conduct Mahler's Symphony No. 2, "Resurrection," July 5 with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, two vocal soloists and three choruses.

The season will be a busy one with 80 concerts in a half-dozen series. With the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the 24 weekend festival concerts and eight Saturday-morning, open rehearsals will be 14 conductors, 12 solo pianists, five solo instrumentalists, 15 vocal soloists and eight choruses. Also, on July 12, the Corky Siegel Blues Band will be featured.

Special events include three kock programs called Contemporary Trends. They will present The Who on July 7, Joe Cocker, July 21 and Santana Aug. 18.

POPS CONCERT AUG. 11

Arthur Feidler will conduct pops Aug. 11, and the several, overlapping programs demonstrating the skill of BMC students (Tanglewood-on-Parade) will start at 2 July 28 and end with a program honoring the BMC's 30th and Aaron Copland's 70th birthdays.

Copland, for many years director of the center, will conduct some of the evening performances at 8.30 of the combined Boston Symphony and BMC orchestras.

The 35 concerts scheduled by the BMC are less grand than the big, weekend festival events with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but are only slightly less professional, the artists being either members of Boston's orchestra or BMC students who, for the most part, are conservatory graduates in transit toward professional careers.

The schedule includes faculty recitals, chamber groups of all sizes and instrumentation, vocal and instrumental soloists, choirs and the BMC orchestra of 60 to 70 members.

All 35 of the BMC programs may be attended by those holding a $15 membership in the Friends society, probably the biggest musical bargain of the summer, or by nonmembers for $1.50 for each event.

UNCOMFORTABLE DAYS

There were a few uncomfortable days in May when one of the national wire services circulated a story that Tanglewood was in serious financial trouble and might not open this year.

While it is true that all large orchestras face a frightening financial future and that Berkshire County businessmen, for the first time, are being asked to give $27,000 to Tanglewood this year, there has been no danger threatening this year's festival.

The deficit very likely will be larger again this year. It has been growing every year, although exactly how much of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's annual losses may be directly attributed to Tanglewood is difficult to ferret out.

Some of the figures from last year's report may be of interest. The orchestra's fiscal year ends with the close of Tanglewood at the end of August.

The year's expenses of more than $5 million were $1,579,838 greater than earned income. Income from restricted investments, fund raising and the Ford Foundation reduced that to $557,441,

See TANGLEWOOD
Page 61

On a Sunday afternoon, crowds at Tanglewood overflow onto spacious lawns surrounding the huge Music Shed where the Boston Symphony Orchestra has its summer home.

About the Series

It probably is not quite true that there is more entertainment to be had during the summer than in the winter, but a survey of the straw hat circuit serving Western Massachusetts residents might lead someone to think so.

Starting today is a series outlining the schedule offered by seven of the largest summer projects in the area.

One of the traditional complaints people like to make about their home areas is that "There is nothing to do around here!" Anyone with enough interest to skim this series soon will see that there is a great deal to do around here...if he isn't too busy lying in the sunshine.

The series confines itself to the sort of entertainment requiring no effort on the part of the one being entertained. There is nothing in it about swimming or tennis or softball or mountain climbing or chasing gazelles.

There is a great deal in it about singing and dancing and painting and fiddling and the ancient game of make believe...all done by someone else for the edification and enlightenment of the lazy, or non-athletic, entertainee.

Today the opening article discusses Tanglewood, that elegantly manicured 210 acres of greenery on the northern slope of Stockbridge Bowl in Lenox which has been the setting of sublime sound in the summer since 1937.

Following articles will discuss the offerings of music and art and dance and drama in the Storrowton Theater in West Springfield, various halls at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst, the Berkshire Playhouse in Stockbridge, Adams Memorial Theater in Williamstown, the Ted Shawn Theater at Jacob's Pillow in Becket and the 5100-seat amphitheater at Saratoga Springs, N.Y.

There probably is not a man alive, or woman or child, who won't find something in the series to entice him...or her.

Pleasant moments at Tanglewood...summer, sun and the Boston Symphony.

Three world-famous conductors at Tanglewood this summer; Leonard Bernstein, Seiji Ozawa and William Steinberg, who succeeds Boston's retired Erich Leinsdorf.

The Birmingham News
BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
D. 179,129 SUN. 219,330

JUL 12 1970

Music festivals brighten scene during summer

BY OLIVER ROOSEVELT, News staff writer

More than ever this year summer is music festival time. Not only have the established festivals continued to develop interesting programs, but new ones have come along as a result of extended-season contracts among the major orchestras of the nation.

In the Southeast there are the Eastern Music Festival at at Greensboro, N. C., (through July 31); Brevard, N. C., (through Aug. 16), and Sewanee, Tenn., (through Aug. 16).

In case you're going elsewhere in the country this summer, you might try Chautauqua, N. Y. (ends Aug. 30); Temple U. Music Festival at Ambler, Pa., with the Pittsburgh Symphony (ends Aug. 9); Merriweather Post at Columbia, Md., with the National Symphony and New York City Ballet (through Sept. 13);

Also Ravinia in Chicago, with the Chicago Symphony (ends Sept. 27); Mississippi River Festival in Edwardsville, Ill. with the St. Louis Symphony (ends Aug. 11); Meadowbrook in Rochester, Mich., with the Detroit Symphony and American Ballet (ends Aug. 16); Muni Opera in St. Louis (ends Sept. 6); Blossom Center in Cleveland, with the Cleveland Orchestra and New York City Ballet (ends Sept. 5);

And the Summer Opera Festival in Cincinnati (ends Aug 2); Santa Fe Opera (New Mexico, ends Aug. 22); Hollywood Bowl, with the Los Angeles Philharmonic; Carmel Bach Festival (California, July 17-26; Aspen Music Festival (Colo., ends Aug. 30), and the Stratford (Canada) Festival (ends Aug. 23). These are just a few.

Festivals are fun

YOUR WRITER has chosen to visit three festivals in the northeast: The Berkshire Festival, at Tanglewood, oldest leading music festival in the nation; the Saratoga in New York, relatively young, and the Marlboro in Vermont, which attracts the leading chamber musicians of the nation.

The Berkshire, summer home of the Boston Symphony since the mid-1930s, concentrates its concerts on Friday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, through Aug. 23. Guest conductors between now and then include Ozawa, Copland, Steinberg, Dorati, Schuller, Rudolf, Thomas and Mackerras. Soloists include Kraus, Firkusny, Graffman, Ashkenazy, Watts and Weissenberg.

The Saratoga, home of the Philadelphia Orchestra, from July 29-Aug. 23, is hosting the New York City Ballet through the next two weeks. From Aug. 24 through Sept. 5, rock groups will predominate, and every night from now on there's a film festival showing. Soloists during the Philadelphia's stay include de Larrocha, Stern, Van Cliburn, Perlman, Ashkenazy, Serkin and Nero, with conductors Skrowaczewski, de Burgos, Kostelanetz, Abbado, Bernstein, Barenboim and Ormandy. Concerts are just about every night.

THE MARLBORO Festival has its own special excitements. Pablo Casals, for one. Rudolf Serkin, its director, for another. Saturday and Sunday concerts are unprogrammed until the last moment.

It's really a king-sized master class for master students, most of whom are concert soloists in their own rights, but who subordinate themselves to the cause of chamber music.

If you can get to any of the festivals on your vacation, you're in luck. If not, this column will try to bring you some of the atmosphere in reports from Tanglewood, Saratoga and Marlboro shortly after the first week in August, when we'll be shuttling among the three.

Gainey in hospital

A WEEK AGO Monday we interviewed Andy Gainey, and duly reported our conversation with him last Sunday. After the paper had gone to press, we found out that he had suffered a heart attack on Thursday.

Reports from the Baptist Princeton Hospital, where he was in intensive care for over a week, progressed from "serious" to "fair" to "improving," we're glad to report.

There's no word yet on when he'll be able to have visitors, nor how long he'll be hospitalized.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 5 1970 New England Newsclip

Many festivals of note

by Harry Neville
HT Music Editor

During the summer months New England fairly burgeons with music festivals, nearly all of which merit some degree of attention from music lovers. The most famous of these is of course Tanglewood (July 3-August 23), whose inducements are sufficiently well known not to require special mention. The following comments in no way represent a preferential listing; the events mentioned are merely those of which this writer has some first-hand experience.

The New Hampshire Festival opens July 9 with a concert in Inter-Lakes Auditorium, Meredith. This is a festival which centers geographically around the Lakes Region of New Hampshire, with most of the concerts taking place in Meredith and Wolfeboro. Orchestra members are drawn from symphonies and universities across the country, and Thomas Nee is the dynamic young conductor responsible for whipping them into shape.

On the basis of performances last year one may expect readings that are vital and authoritative from these players. Although concerts are generally well attended, seating is not a problem and tickets for all events are available at the door.

Last minute decisions to attend are not advisable in the case of the Marlboro (Vermont) Festival, where events are frequently sold out well in advance. Marlboro opens July 11, and Pablo Casals, 93-year-old cellist and conductor, will be in residence for the 10th summer since 1960. Programs are selected from works in progress and are not usually announced much in advance.

Even a non-music lover might enjoy the ambience provided by The Elms, The Breakers and Marble House, the 19th century showplaces which serve as concert halls for the Newport (Rhode Island) Festival (July 30-August 8). Billed as "A Romantic Revival in Newport's Fabled Mansions," the festival is devoted largely to 19th century salon music, art songs and short operas by lesser known composers, or lesser known works by well known composers.

German cellist Siegfried Palm, who appears July 24 with pianist Luise Vosgerchian as part of Dartmouth College's summer music series at Hopkins Center, Hanover, N. H.

In any event, "quaint" would seem a fair word to describe the appeal of many of the works to be heard: a trio, for example, by Balfe, composer of "Martha," or a woodwind quintet by Ponchielli, composer of "La Gioconda." The surroundings, however, are absolutely right for this kind of music, and such an intensive investigation of a forgotten literature is bound to turn up a few gems.

Most days are quite busy with events scheduled for 9:45 and 11:30 a.m., 5:30 and 9:30 p.m. For those who remain unconvinced there are such special events as a cruise concert on Narragansett Bay and a grand 19th century balloon ascent ("the elements permitting") with authentic 19th century balloon ascent music.

The Newport Festival coincides this year with the trials period of the America's Cup yacht races, and reservations should be secured well in advance.

Those who enjoy chamber music amid relaxed surroundings would do well to investigate the Berkshire Quartet concerts atop Music Mountain, the road to which begins just south of the junction of highways 63 and 126, east of Falls Village, Conn.

Held on Saturdays at 3 p.m., through September 5, the concerts this year will traverse the complete cycle of Beethoven quartets. Other composers are represented as well, and the concerts generally include the participation of a guest artist.

Music Mountain is an excellent side trip from Tanglewood, to which, with a small amount of judicious planning, the listener may easily return in time for dinner and the evening concert.

The Beethoven bicentennial is being commemorated also at Colby College, Waterville, Maine, where the Hungarian Quartet will present the entire cycle of the master's quartets on six consecutive Tuesday evenings beginning July 14. This is the group whose recording of the same pieces won the Grand Prix du Disque a few years ago. The concerts take place in Given Auditorium of the Bixler Art and Music Center at 8 p.m.

Not all the exciting summer events take place out of town. Across the Charles River in Cambridge the Loeb Drama Center is sponsoring a series of five consecutive Monday evening concerts in Sanders Theater. These begin tomorrow at 8:30 p.m.

The programs and artists of this series are exceptionally interesting, as can be seen from the initial event: pianist Peter Serkin playing Messiaen's "La Roussarole Effarvatte" ("The Reed Warbler") and Bach's Goldberg Variations.

On the following Monday Leonard Shure, a much revered but infrequently heard pia[illegible] performs a program which includes Schumann's C major Phantasie. Lukas Foss, the New Cleveland Quartet and the Summer Festival Orchestra conducted by Leon Kirchner are also included on this series.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUN 21 1970 New England

A Roundup Of Summer Stage Fare

By RICHARD C. HAMMERICH

Large changes and small appear yearly in the entertainment fare offered around the summer circuit, but the general patterns are comfortably predictable.

RELIABLE ELEGANCE

The curtailment of the appearances of the chief conductors at Tanglewood and Saratoga Springs because of ailments afflicting William Steinberg and Eugene Ormandy will not diminish the reliable elegance of their organizations, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra.

The Berkshire Music Barn in Lenox, dark last summer and filled with baroque chamber music the summer before, has grand plans for a return to a summer of jazz, folk music and rock.

A new tent theater is going up on the campus of Mount Holyoke College in South Hadley to present a season of eight plays each to run five nights. And the large University of Massachusetts summer arts program of music, art, poetry and theater will be augmented by a series of four experimental plays presented by a group calling itself The Masque.

Tanglewood in Lenox is still the dominant attraction of the area. It offers a schedule of about 80 public musical events during an eight - week season beginning Sunday.

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who replaced Erich Leinsdorf last year, has reduced his activities in recent months at the request of his physicians to conserve his strength and is scheduled to conduct only four concerts on two weekends.

ALL-BEETHOVEN PROGRAMS

He will conduct four of six all-Beethoven programs which will celebrate the master's 200th birthday on Dec. 16 with 16 of his compositions including all five piano concertos and six of the symphonies.

The other principal conductor at Tanglewood will be Seiji Ozawa (eight concerts) music director of the Toronto and San Francisco Symphonies, who is serving as one of two artistic directors.

Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston, is the other artistic director. His principal interest at Tanglewood will be in the educational projects conducted by the Berkshire Music Center, Boston University and his conservatory and in the Festival of Contemporary Music Aug. 16-20.

Leonard Bernstein, Tanglewood advisor, will conduct Mahler's "Resurrection" symphony July 5 with the orchestra, two vocal soloists and three choruses.

Ten other conductors for Boston's orchestra at Tanglewood, 12 solo pianists, five solo instrumentalists, 15 vocal soloists and eight choruses will also be on the summer program.

There will be a concert opera, Pops with Fiedler, three giant rock programs and lots of small-ensemble music.

TIMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
(E) 10,850

JUN 13 1970 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL—Every summer from July through August the Boston Symphony resides at Tanglewood in Lenox for a series of concerts that has become one of the greatest musical attractions in the world. Guest performers are artists of international fame, and the music ranges from Bach and Mozart to Bartok and Weill; there is also a popular "Trends" series featuring the best of jazz, rock and soul. Concerts are on Fridays at 9 p.m., Saturdays at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoons at 2:30. Open rehearsals are at 10:30 a.m. Saturdays. The Tanglewood grounds are open two hours before the concerts, and ticket holders are invited to picnic on the lawn. For ticket information, write the Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., 01240.

POST
WALLINGFORD, CONN.
WEEKLY 7,400

JUL 16 1970 New England Newsclip

THE ENORMOUS ROOM 211 Park St., New Haven. Kentucky Bluegrass Fridays, 8:30 p.m. to midnight. City-folk music Saturday evenings, 8:30 p.m. to 1 a.m.

NEW HAVEN POPS CONCERTS summer season will include Three Dog Night and the James Gang, July 18; Peter, Paul and Mary, July 25; Chicago and Delaney and Bonnie and Friends, Aug. 8; Led Zepplin, Aug. 15. Tickets on sale at box office, 152 Temple St., New Haven.

CHESTNUT HILL CONCERTS, Killingworth, July 16, selections by Mozart, Bartok and Debussy, 8 p.m.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL CONCERTS, Lenox, Mass., presents Yuji Takahashi July 17 at 7 p.m.; Seiji Ozawa July 17 at 9 p.m. July 18, open rehearsal at 10:30 a.m.; Seiji Ozawa and a Mozart program, 8:30 p.m. July 19, Michael Tilson Thomas at 2:30 p.m. July 21, Peter, Paul & Mary at 8 p.m. in the Shed. Tanglewood on Parade, July 28, 2 p.m. plus gala concert at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed.

CHOATE SUMMER CONCERT SERIES presents Calvin Hampton July 17, 8 p.m. in the Chapel. Marian Cate in concert July 19 at 8 p.m. in the Chapel.

The Birmingham News
BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
D. 179,129 SUN. 219,330

JUL 12 1970

Music festivals brighten scene during summer

BY OLIVER ROOSEVELT, News staff writer

More than ever this year summer is music festival time. Not only have the established festivals continued to develop interesting programs, but new ones have come along as a result of extended-season contracts among the major orchestras of the nation.

In the Southeast there are the Eastern Music Festival at at Greensboro, N. C., (through July 31); Brevard, N. C., (through Aug. 16), and Sewanee, Tenn., (through Aug. 16).

In case you're going elsewhere in the country this summer, you might try Chautauqua, N. Y. (ends Aug. 30); Temple U. Music Festival at Ambler, Pa., with the Pittsburgh Symphony (ends Aug. 9); Merriweather Post at Columbia, Md., with the National Symphony and New York City Ballet (through Sept. 13);

Also Ravinia in Chicago, with the Chicago Symphony (ends Sept. 27); Mississippi River Festival in Edwardsville, Ill. with the St. Louis Symphony (ends Aug. 11); Meadowbrook in Rochester, Mich., with the Detroit Symphony and American Ballet (ends Aug. 16); Muni Opera in St. Louis (ends Sept. 6); Blossom Center in Cleveland, with the Cleveland Orchestra and New York City Ballet (ends Sept. 5);

And the Summer Opera Festival in Cincinnati (ends Aug 2); Santa Fe Opera (New Mexico, ends Aug. 22); Hollywood Bowl, with the Los Angeles Philharmonic; Carmel Bach Festival (California, July 17-26; Aspen Music Festival (Colo., ends Aug. 30), and the Strafford (Canada) Festival (ends Aug. 23). These are just a few.

Festivals are fun

YOUR WRITER has chosen to visit three festivals in the northeast: The Berkshire Festival, at Tanglewood, oldest leading music festival in the nation; the Saratoga in New York, relatively young, and the Marlboro in Vermont, which attracts the leading chamber musicians of the nation.

The Berkshire, summer home of the Boston Symphony since the mid-1930s, concentrates its concerts on Friday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, through Aug. 23. Guest conductors between now and then include Ozawa, Copland, Steinberg, Dorati, Schuller, Rudolf, Thomas and Mackerras. Soloists include Kraus, Firkusny, Graffman, Ashkenazy, Watts and Weissenberg.

The Saratoga, home of the Philadelphia Orchestra, from July 29-Aug. 23, is hosting the New York City Ballet through the next two weeks. From Aug. 24 through Sept. 5, rock groups will predominate, and every night from now on there's a film festival showing. Soloists during the Philadelphia's stay include de Larrocha, Stern, Van Cliburn, Perlman, Ashkenazy, Serkin and Nero, with conductors Skrowaczewski, de Burgos, Kostelanetz, Abbado, Bernstein, Barenboim and Ormandy. Concerts are just about every night.

THE MARLBORO Festival has its own special excitements. Pablo Casals, for one. Rudolf Serkin, its director, for another. Saturday and Sunday concerts are unprogrammed until the last moment.

It's really a king-sized master class for master students, most of whom are concert soloists in their own rights, but who subordinate themselves to the cause of chamber music.

If you can get to any of the festivals on your vacation, you're in luck. If not, this column will try to bring you some of the atmosphere in reports from Tanglewood, Saratoga and Marlboro shortly after the first week in August, when we'll be shuttling among the three.

Gainey in hospital

A WEEK AGO Monday we interviewed Andy Gainey, and duly reported our conversation with him last Sunday. After the paper had gone to press, we found out that he had suffered a heart attack on Thursday.

Reports from the Baptist Princeton Hospital, where he was in intensive care for over a week, progressed from "serious" to "fair" to "improving," we're glad to report.

There's no word yet on when he'll be able to have visitors, nor how long he'll be hospitalized.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 5 1970 New England Newsclip

Many festivals of note

by Harry Neville
HT Music Editor

During the summer months New England fairly burgeons with music festivals, nearly all of which merit some degree of attention from music lovers. The most famous of these is of course Tanglewood (July 3-August 23), whose inducements are sufficiently well known not to require special mention. The following comments in no way represent a preferential listing; the events mentioned are merely those of which this writer has some first-hand experience.

The New Hampshire Festival opens July 9 with a concert in Inter-Lakes Auditorium, Meredith. This is a festival which centers geographically around the Lakes Region of New Hampshire, with most of the concerts taking place in Meredith and Wolfeboro. Orchestra members are drawn from symphonies and universities across the country, and Thomas Nee is the dynamic young conductor responsible for whipping them into shape.

On the basis of performances last year one may expect readings that are vital and authoritative from these players. Although concerts are generally well attended, seating is not a problem and tickets for all events are available at the door.

Last minute decisions to attend are not advisable in the case of the Marlboro (Vermont) Festival, where events are frequently sold out well in advance. Marlboro opens July 11, and Pablo Casals, 93-year-old cellist and conductor, will be in residence for the 10th summer since 1960. Programs are selected from works in progress and are not usually announced much in advance.

Even a non-music lover might enjoy the ambience provided by The Elms, The Breakers and Marble House, the 19th century showplaces which serve as concert halls for the Newport (Rhode Island) Festival (July 30-August 8). Billed as "A Romantic Revival in Newport's Fabled Mansions," the festival is devoted largely to 19th century salon music, art songs and short operas by lesser known composers, or lesser known works by well known composers.

German cellist Siegfried Palm, who appears July 24 with pianist Luise Vosgerchian as part of Dartmouth College's summer music series at Hopkins Center, Hanover, N. H.

In any event, "quaint" would seem a fair word to describe the appeal of many of the works to be heard: a trio, for example, by Balfe, composer of "Martha," or a woodwind quintet by Ponchielli, composer of "La Gioconda." The surroundings, however, are absolutely right for this kind of music, and such an intensive investigation of a forgotten literature is bound to turn up a few gems.

Most days are quite busy with events scheduled for 9:45 and 11:30 a.m., 5:30 and 9:30 p.m. For those who remain unconvinced there are such special events as a cruise concert on Narragansett Bay and a grand 19th century balloon ascent ("the elements permitting") with authentic 19th century balloon ascent music.

The Newport Festival coincides this year with the trials period of the America's Cup yacht races, and reservations should be secured well in advance.

Those who enjoy chamber music amid relaxed surroundings would do well to investigate the Berkshire Quartet concerts atop Music Mountain, the road to which begins just south of the junction of highways 63 and 126, east of Falls Village, Conn.

Held on Saturdays at 3 p.m., through September 5, the concerts this year will traverse the complete cycle of Beethoven quartets. Other composers are represented as well, and the concerts generally include the participation of a guest artist.

Music Mountain is an excellent side trip from Tanglewood, to which, with a small amount of judicious planning, the listener may easily return in time for dinner and the evening concert.

The Beethoven bicentennial is being commemorated also at Colby College, Waterville, Maine, where the Hungarian Quartet will present the entire cycle of the master's quartets on six consecutive Tuesday evenings beginning July 14. This is the group whose recording of the same pieces won the Grand Prix du Disque a few years ago. The concerts take place in Given Auditorium of the Bixler Art and Music Center at 8 p.m.

Not all the exciting summer events take place out of town. Across the Charles River in Cambridge the Loeb Drama Center is sponsoring a series of five consecutive Monday evening concerts in Sanders Theater. These begin tomorrow at 8:30 p.m.

The programs and artists of this series are exceptionally interesting, as can be seen from the initial event: pianist Peter Serkin playing Messiaen's "La Roussarole Effarvatte" ("The Reed Warbler") and Bach's Goldberg Variations.

On the following Monday Leonard Shure, a much revered but infrequently heard pia[illegible] performs a program which includes Schumann's C major Phantasie. Lukas Foss, the New Cleveland Quartet and the Summer Festival Orchestra conducted by Leon Kirchner are also included on this series.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUN 21 1970 New England Newsclip

A Roundup Of Summer Stage Fare

By RICHARD C. HAMMERICH

Large changes and small appear yearly in the entertainment fare offered around the summer circuit, but the general patterns are comfortably predictable.

RELIABLE ELEGANCE

The curtailment of the appearances of the chief conductors at Tanglewood and Saratoga Springs because of ailments afflicting William Steinberg and Eugene Ormandy will not diminish the reliable elegance of their organizations, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra.

The Berkshire Music Barn in Lenox, dark last summer and filled with baroque chamber music the summer before, has grand plans for a return to a summer of jazz, folk music and rock.

A new tent theater is going up on the campus of Mount Holyoke College in South Hadley to present a season of eight plays each to run five nights. And the large University of Massachusetts summer arts program of music, art, poetry and theater will be augmented by a series of four experimental plays presented by a group calling itself The Masque.

Tanglewood in Lenox is still the dominant attraction of the area. It offers a schedule of about 80 public musical events during an eight - week season beginning Sunday.

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who replaced Erich Leinsdorf last year, has reduced his activities in recent months at the request of his physicians to conserve his strength and is scheduled to conduct only four concerts on two weekends.

ALL-BEETHOVEN PROGRAMS

He will conduct four of six all-Beethoven programs which will celebrate the master's 200th birthday on Dec. 16 with 16 of his compositions including all five piano concertos and six of the symphonies.

The other principal conductor at Tanglewood will be Seiji Ozawa (eight concerts) music director of the Toronto and San Francisco Symphonies, who is serving as one of two artistic directors.

Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston, is the other artistic director. His principal interest at Tanglewood will be in the educational projects conducted by the Berkshire Music Center, Boston University and his conservatory and in the Festival of Contemporary Music Aug. 16-20.

Leonard Bernstein, Tanglewood advisor, will conduct Mahler's "Resurrection" symphony July 5 with the orchestra, two vocal soloists and three choruses.

Ten other conductors for Boston's orchestra at Tanglewood, 12 solo pianists, five solo instrumentalists, 15 vocal soloists and eight choruses will also be on the summer program.

There will be a concert opera, Pops with Fiedler, three giant rock programs and lots of small-ensemble music.

JAMES
GLOUCESTER, MASS.
(E) 10,5[illegible]

JUN 13 1970 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL—Every summer from July through August the Boston Symphony resides at Tanglewood in Lenox for a series of concerts that has become one of the greatest musical attractions in the world. Guest performers are artists of international fame, and the music ranges from Bach and Mozart to Bartok and Weill; there is also a popular "Trends" series featuring the best of jazz, rock and soul. Concerts are on Fridays at 9 p.m., Saturdays at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoons at 2:30. Open rehearsals are at 10:30 a.m. Saturdays. The Tanglewood grounds are open two hours before the concerts, and ticket holders are invited to picnic on the lawn. For ticket information, write the Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., 01240.

POST
WALLINGFORD, CONN.
WEEKLY 7,400

JUL 16 1970 New England Newsclip

THE ENORMOUS ROOM 211 Park St., New Haven. Kentucky Bluegrass Fridays, 8:30 p.m. to midnight. City-folk music Saturday evenings, 8:30 p.m. to 1 a.m.

NEW HAVEN POPS CONCERTS summer season will include Three Dog Night and the James Gang, July 18; Peter, Paul and Mary, July 25; Chicago and Delaney and Bonnie and Friends, Aug. 8; Led Zepplin, Aug. 15. Tickets on sale at box office, 152 Temple St., New Haven.

CHESTNUT HILL CONCERTS, Killingworth, July 16, selections by Mozart, Bartok and Debussy, 8 p.m.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL CONCERTS, Lenox, Mass., presents Yuji Takahashi July 17 at 7 p.m.; Seiji Ozawa July 17 at 9 p.m. July 18, open rehearsal at 10:30 a.m.; Seiji Ozawa and a Mozart program, 8:30 p.m. July 19, Michael Tilson Thomas at 2:30 p.m. July 21, Peter, Paul & Mary at 8 p.m. in the Shed. Tanglewood on Parade, July 28, 2 p.m. plus gala concert at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed.

CHOATE SUMMER CONCERT SERIES presents Calvin Hampton July 17, 8 p.m. in the Chapel. Marian Cate in concert July 19 at 8 p.m. in the Chapel.

Music Lovers From All Over World Listen to Boston Symphony in Green Tanglewood Setting

Music Heads for Great Outdoors

Symphony Orchestras Rev Their Motors

By BETTY DIETZ KREBS
Fine Arts Editor

THE BERSHIRE Festival at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony, will open Friday, July 3, with a concert under the baton of Seiji Ozawa. He'll conduct two concerts the first week end. The third will have Leonard Bernstein on the podium.

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six all-Beethoven concerts during the season. Other conductors include Gunther Schuller, Michael Tilson Thomas, Aaron Copland, Rafael Frubeck de Burgos, Jeoge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard and Charles Mackerras.

Soloists? How can you top Vladimir Ashkenazy, Furdolf Firkusny, Gary Graffman, Lili Krause, Peter Serkin, Andre Watts and Alexis Weissenberg, the pianists?

Oh, yes, along with the Radcliffe choral society and the Tanglewood chorus, there'll be the Corky Siegel Blues band.

The festival ends Aug. 23 with the Berlioz Requiem conducted by Ozawa in memory of Charles Munch.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

MAY 9 1970

New England Newsclip

As I Hear It

Tanglewood: Accent on Youth

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

TWENTY-FOUR programs. An easy task. Start with ample supplies of Tchaikovsky, add a little Mozart, sprinkle lightly with Copland and Bernstein, and as the stew starts to heat up, throw in a pinch of Stravinsky and Schoenberg and, voila, it's ready to serve.

It isn't really as easy as all that. It never has been determined whether an audience goes to hear the program or the performer, but those whose responsibility it is to make sure the hall is filled know pretty well which programs will draw and which won't. The obvious solution is to pick the works for which there is a ready public. But then there arises the objection of "always the same old thing" and so there has to be a mixture, partly of the old favorites and partly of new and unknown works.

* * * *

THIS YEAR the accent at Tanglewood is on youth—in soloists and in the music—if you will agree to consider the date of composition instead of the age of the composer. There are at least 20 compositions which will get their first Tanglewood performance this summer, and of the 10 piano soloists, nearly all of them are from the ascending and ambitious ranks.

This is the 200th anniversary of the birth of Beethoven and, all things considered, he is being honored with dignity and discretion. The fifth and seventh weekends, of the eight, will be devoted entirely to him and all six concerts are to be conducted by a tried-and-true master, the musical director of the Boston orchestra, William Steinberg (his only appearances, incidentally). All the other programs will be divided among 10 conductors, of which Seiji Ozawa will take eight, Michael Thomas two, and Bernstein, Burgos, Copland, Lombard, Mackerras, Mester, Schermerhorn and Schuller one each.

* * * *

THE FINAL CONCERT will be the Berlioz Requiem played in memory of the ante-penultimate conductor of the orchestra, Charles Munch, whose association with Berlioz' music was always stressed while he occupied the podium here. And the first concert will also include the Berlioz Fantastic Symphony which almost became Munch's theme song.

Good old Tchaikovsky and Strauss will be represented by but one work each while Stravinsky comes up strong with six entries. This may all be a matter of policy but it may well be the result of inviting so many guest conductors who always like to bring something fresh and unhackneyed to their programs. There is to be music by eight living composers. There is to be but one opera in concert form, Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte." In the last conductor's regime there was greater attention given to this form of music, although one might argue that the Beethoven 9th, the Mahler 2nd, the "Resurrection," and the Berlioz Requiem, each requiring a full program's limits, may be considered as operas in concert form.

* * * *

THE OVER-ALL perspective of the coming festival gives the impression of a take-over by the younger generation. And for that reason, there is a new vitality apparent which should prove stimulating and gratifying on all counts. The orchestral repertory is quite the opposite of the planned obsolescence applied by automobile manufacturers. Once a composition was accepted it became practically a permanent part of a season's schedule. In addition to this, today's composers are writing less and less for orchestral ensembles, preferring to employ instruments and sources of sound that are not the orthodox components of Beethoven's and Mozart's symphonies. Hence, there are those who are worrying how much longer the present young generations and those to come will want to listen to the things old-timers, and some not so old-timerish, consider imperishable and, looking further ahead, fretting about concerts and orchestras themselves.

* * * *

FINANCES BECOME greater and greater matters of concern each year and thus the conflict between the counting room and the artistic direction, we assume, must become more acute cumulatively. The desire to strike out into new territory is probably tempered by a cautionary damper not to alienate potential audiences, and yet the unsymmetical Stravinsky falls on youthful ears much more attuned to his manner than to the predictable idioms of composers of a century and more ago.

Thus, the coming Tanglewood prospectus reveals either a greater awareness of the temper of the day or the relegation of authority to an eager and vital command. In any case it is good news and will be awaited with keen anticipation.

DAYTON DAILY NEWS
DAYTON, OHIO
D. 161,249 SUN. 215,360

JUN 7 1970

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 11,500

JUN — 1970

New England Newsclip

MUSIC

Classical

Pastoral music-making by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood (Nathaniel Hawthorne's sobriquet for the orchestra's Berkshire home) commences on July 3 with three concerts every weekend through August 23.

July 3, Seiji Ozawa leads Chichester Psalms by Bernstein, Atmosphères by Ligeti, and Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique. July 4, Ozawa: two works of Mozart, The Marriage of Figaro overture and Symphony no. 36; and two of Stravinsky, the Violin Concerto with Joseph Silverstein and The Firebird Suite. July

Seiji Ozawa

5, Leonard Bernstein leads Mahler's Symphony no. 2, soloists Lorna Haywood and Christa Ludwig.

July 10, Rafael Frubeck de Burgos directs Falla's El Amor Brujo and two suites from The Three-Cornered Hat, and Stravinsky's Rite of Spring. July 11, Ozawa leads a concert performance of Cosi Fan Tutte with Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause and Ezio Flagello. July 12, Ozawa again: Romeo and Juliet by Prokofiev, Peter Serkin performing Schoenberg's Piano Concerto, and Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra with the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

July 17, Ozawa: Haydn Symphony 86, Eonta by Xenakis; Serenade for Tenor, Horn and Strings by Britten; and Ibert's Divertissement. July 18, Ozawa directs an all-Mozart program: Serenade no. 10 for 13 wind instruments and Piano Concerto in D minor with Lili Kraus. July 19, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting: Haydn's Symphony no. 98, Bach Cantata no. 51, Krenek's Die Nachtigall, and Stravinsky's Pulcinella Suite.

July 24, Aaron Copland directs: Busoni's Rondo Arlecchinesco, Schubert's Symphony no. 5, and two works by the conductor, Dance Panels and the Clarinet Concerto. July 25, Jorge Mester: C.P.E. Bach's Sinfonia in D, Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme Suite by Strauss, and Mozart's Symphony no. 41. July 26, Kenneth Schermerhorn directing: Symphony no. 83 by Haydn; Mozart's Piano Concerto in A, Christoph Eschenbach soloist; Concerto in D for Orchestra by Stravinsky; and Tchaikovsky's Suite no. 4, Mozartiana.

• Performances: 9:00 p.m. Friday, 8:30 p.m. Saturday, 2:30 p.m. Sunday. In addition there are weekend preludes (short recitals by orchestra members and guest artists) each Friday at 7:00 p.m. at no charge to Friday evening ticket holders. Open rehearsals are scheduled every Saturday at 10:30 a.m. Tickets: $3.50-$8.50; general admission to the lawns $3.00; open rehearsals $2.50. Reserved tickets and detailed schedules are available now from Symphony Hall (266-1492) and after June 15 from the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 02140 (413-637-1600).

Music Lovers From All Over World Listen to Boston Symphony in Green Tanglewood Setting

Music Heads for Great Outdoors

Symphony Orchestras Rev Their Motors

By BETTY DIETZ KREBS
Fine Arts Editor

THE BERSHIRE Festival at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony, will open Friday, July 3, with a concert under the baton of Seiji Ozawa. He'll conduct two concerts the first week end. The third will have Leonard Bernstein on the podium.

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six all-Beethoven concerts during the season. Other conductors include Gunther Schuller, Michael Tilson Thomas, Aaron Copland, Rafael Frubeck de Burgos, Jeoge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard and Charles Mackerras.

Soloists? How can you top Vladimir Ashkenazy, Furdolf Firkusny, Gary Graffman, Lili Krause, Peter Serkin, Andre Watts and Alexis Weissenberg, the pianists?

Oh, yes, along with the Radcliffe choral society and the Tanglewood chorus, there'll be the Corky Siegel Blues band.

The festival ends Aug. 23 with the Berlioz Requiem conducted by Ozawa in memory of Charles Munch.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

MAY 9 1970

New England Newsclip

As I Hear It

Tanglewood: Accent on Youth

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

TWENTY-FOUR programs. An easy task. Start with ample supplies of Tchaikovsky, add a little Mozart, sprinkle lightly with Copland and Bernstein, and as the stew starts to heat up, throw in a pinch of Stravinsky and Schoenberg and, voila, it's ready to serve.

It isn't really as easy as all that. It never has been determined whether an audience goes to hear the program or the performer, but those whose responsibility it is to make sure the hall is filled know pretty well which programs will draw and which won't. The obvious solution is to pick the works for which there is a ready public. But then there arises the objection of "always the same old thing" and so there has to be a mixture, partly of the old favorites and partly of new and unknown works.

* * * *

THIS YEAR the accent at Tanglewood is on youth—in soloists and in the music—if you will agree to consider the date of composition instead of the age of the composer. There are at least 20 compositions which will get their first Tanglewood performance this summer, and of the 10 piano soloists, nearly all of them are from the ascending and ambitious ranks.

This is the 200th anniversary of the birth of Beethoven and, all things considered, he is being honored with dignity and discretion. The fifth and seventh weekends, of the eight, will be devoted entirely to him and all six concerts are to be conducted by a tried-and-true master, the musical director of the Boston orchestra, William Steinberg (his only appearances, incidentally). All the other programs will be divided among 10 conductors, of which Seiji Ozawa will take eight, Michael Thomas two, and Bernstein, Burgos, Copland, Lombard, Mackerras, Mester, Schermerhorn and Schuller one each.

* * * *

THE FINAL CONCERT will be the Berlioz Requiem played in memory of the ante-penultimate conductor of the orchestra, Charles Munch, whose association with Berlioz' music was always stressed while he occupied the podium here. And the first concert will also include the Berlioz Fantastic Symphony which almost became Munch's theme song.

Good old Tchaikovsky and Strauss will be represented by but one work each while Stravinsky comes up strong with six entries. This may all be a matter of policy but it may well be the result of inviting so many guest conductors who always like to bring something fresh and unhackneyed to their programs. There is to be music by eight living composers. There is to be but one opera in concert form, Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte." In the last conductor's regime there was greater attention given to this form of music, although one might argue that the Beethoven 9th, the Mahler 2nd, the "Resurrection," and the Berlioz Requiem, each requiring a full program's limits, may be considered as operas in concert form.

* * * *

THE OVER-ALL perspective of the coming festival gives the impression of a take-over by the younger generation. And for that reason, there is a new vitality apparent which should prove stimulating and gratifying on all counts. The orchestral repertory is quite the opposite of the planned obsolescence applied by automobile manufacturers. Once a composition was accepted it became practically a permanent part of a season's schedule. In addition to this, today's composers are writing less and less for orchestral ensembles, preferring to employ instruments and sources of sound that are not the orthodox components of Beethoven's and Mozart's symphonies. Hence, there are those who are worrying how much longer the present young generations and those to come will want to listen to the things old-timers, and some not so old-timerish, consider imperishable and, looking further ahead, fretting about concerts and orchestras themselves.

* * * *

FINANCES BECOME greater and greater matters of concern each year and thus the conflict between the counting room and the artistic direction, we assume, must become more acute cumulatively. The desire to strike out into new territory is probably tempered by a cautionary damper not to alienate potential audiences, and yet the unsymmetical Stravinsky falls on youthful ears much more attuned to his manner than to the predictable idioms of composers of a century and more ago.

Thus, the coming Tanglewood prospectus reveals either a greater awareness of the temper of the day or the relegation of authority to an eager and vital command. In any case it is good news and will be awaited with keen anticipation.

DAYTON DAILY NEWS
DAYTON, OHIO
D. 161,43 SUN. 215,360

JUN 7 1970

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 11,500

JUN — 1970

New England Newsclip

MUSIC

Classical

Pastoral music-making by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood (Nathaniel Hawthorne's sobriquet for the orchestra's Berkshire home) commences on July 3 with three concerts every weekend through August 23.

July 3, Seiji Ozawa leads Chichester Psalms by Bernstein, Atmosphères by Ligeti, and Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique. July 4, Ozawa: two works of Mozart, The Marriage of Figaro overture and Symphony no. 36; and two of Stravinsky, the Violin Concerto with Joseph Silverstein and The Firebird Suite. July

Seiji Ozawa

5, Leonard Bernstein leads Mahler's Symphony no. 2, soloists Lorna Haywood and Christa Ludwig.

July 10, Rafael Frubeck de Burgos directs Falla's El Amor Brujo and two suites from The Three-Cornered Hat, and Stravinsky's Rite of Spring. July 11, Ozawa leads a concert performance of Cosi Fan Tutte with Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause and Ezio Flagello. July 12, Ozawa again: Romeo and Juliet by Prokofiev, Peter Serkin performing Schoenberg's Piano Concerto, and Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra with the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

July 17, Ozawa: Haydn Symphony 86, Eonta by Xenakis; Serenade for Tenor, Horn and Strings by Britten; and Ibert's Divertissement. July 18, Ozawa directs an all-Mozart program: Serenade no. 10 for 13 wind instruments and Piano Concerto in D minor with Lili Kraus. July 19, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting: Haydn's Symphony no. 98, Bach Cantata no. 51, Krenek's Die Nachtigall, and Stravinsky's Pulcinella Suite.

July 24, Aaron Copland directs: Busoni's Rondo Arlecchinesco, Schubert's Symphony no. 5, and two works by the conductor, Dance Panels and the Clarinet Concerto. July 25, Jorge Mester: C.P.E. Bach's Sinfonia in D, Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme Suite by Strauss, and Mozart's Symphony no. 41. July 26, Kenneth Schermerhorn directing: Symphony no. 83 by Haydn; Mozart's Piano Concerto in A, Christoph Eschenbach soloist; Concerto in D for Orchestra by Stravinsky; and Tchaikovsky's Suite no. 4, Mozartiana.

• Performances: 9:00 p.m. Friday, 8:30 p.m. Saturday, 2:30 p.m. Sunday. In addition there are weekend preludes (short recitals by orchestra members and guest artists) each Friday at 7:00 p.m. at no charge to Friday evening ticket holders. Open rehearsals are scheduled every Saturday at 10:30 a.m. Tickets: $3.50-$8.50; general admission to the lawns $3.00; open rehearsals $2.50. Reserved tickets and detailed schedules are available now from Symphony Hall (266-1492) and after June 15 from the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 02140 (413-637-1600).

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000

JUN 27 1970

July-August
1970
Tanglewood
24 Concerts by the
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
WILLIAM STEINBERG music director
TANGLEWOOD
Lenox, Mass. 01240 (413) 637-1600

TANGLEWOOD/BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL—(Near Lenox, Massachusetts. Phone info: 413 637-1600.) All concerts performed by Boston Symphony Orchestra. Weekend Preludes—Fridays at 7 p.m.; concerts, 9 p.m.; Saturdays, 8:30 p.m.; Sundays, 2:30 p.m. Tickets: $3.50-$8.50. July 3—Prelude; Program of Mahler Songs. Concert; Seiji Ozawa, cond., Works of Bernstein, Ligeti, Berlioz. July 4—Seiji Ozawa, cond.; Works of Mozart, Stravinsky. July 5—Leonard Bernstein, cond.; Mahler: Symphony No. 2. July 10—Prelude; St. John's College Choir—Concert, Rafael Fruhbeck De Burgos, cond.; works by Falla, Stravinsky. July 11—Seiji Ozawa, cond.; Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte," with Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause, Ezio Flagello. July 12—Seiji Ozawa, cond., Peter Serkin, pianist. Works of Prokofiev, Schoenberg, Russo. Corky Siegel Blues Band. July 17—Prelude; Yuji Takahashi, pianist. Concert; Seiji Ozawa, cond., Works of Haydn, Xenakis, Britten. July 18—Seiji Ozawa, cond., all Mozart program. Lili Kraus, pianist. July 19—Michael Tilson Thomas, cond.; works of Haydn, Bach, Krenek, Stravinsky. July 24—Prelude; Phyllis Curtin, soprano. Concert: Aaron Copland, cond.; works of Busoni, Copland, Schubert. Gervase de Peyer, flutist. July 25—Jorge Mester, cond.; works of C. P. E. Bach, Strauss, Mozart. July 26—Kenneth Schermerhorn, cond.; works of Haydn, Mozart, Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky. July 31—Prelude; Joseph Silverstein, violinist; Jules Eskin, cellist; Richard Goode, pianist. Concert: William Steinberg, cond., all Beethoven program with Claude Frank, pianist. Aug. 1—William Steinberg, cond., all-Beethoven program with Andre Watts, pianist. Aug. 2—Antal Dorati, cond., all-Beethoven program with Vladimir Ashkenazy, pianist. Aug. 7—Prelude; Berkshire Boy Choir. Concert: Alain Lombard, cond.; works of Haydn, Roussel, Stravinsky. Aug. 8—Michael Tilson Thomas, cond.; works of Rimsky-Korsakov, Prokofiev, Debussy, Satie, with Gary Graffman, pianist. Aug. 9—Charles Mackerras, cond., works of Webern, Dvorak, Shostakovich with Jules Eskin, cellist. Aug. 14—Prelude; Claude Frank, pianist. Concert; William Steinberg, cond.; all Beethoven program with Rudolf Firkusny, soloist. Aug. 15—William Steinberg, cond.; all-Beethoven program with soloists, Jerome Lowenthal, Gwendolin Sims, Eunice Alberts, William Cochran, Thomas Paul. Aug. 16—Max Rudolf, cond., all-Beethoven program with Jerome Lowenthal, pianist. Aug. 21—Prelude; Alexis Weissenberg, pianist. Concert; Gunther Schuller, cond.; works of Weber, Szymanowski, Schuller, Scriabin, with Paul Zukofsky, violinist. Aug. 22—Seiji Ozawa, cond., works of Lutoslawski, Rachmaninoff, Bartok, with Alexis Weissenberg, pianist. Aug. 23—Seiji Ozawa, cond.; Berlioz: Requiem. Concert in memory of Charles Munch.

July-August
1970
Tanglewood

24 Concerts by the

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

WILLIAM STEINBERG music director

TANGLEWOOD
Lenox, Mass. 01240 (413) 637-1600

TANGLEWOOD/BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL—(Near Lenox, Massachusetts. Phone info: 413 637-1600.) All concerts performed by Boston Symphony Orchestra. Weekend Preludes—Fridays at 7 p.m.; concerts, 9 p.m.; Saturdays, 8:30 p.m.; Sundays, 2:30 p.m. Tickets: $3.50-$8.50. July 3—Prelude; Program of Mahler Songs. Concert; Seiji Ozawa, cond., Works of Bernstein, Ligeti, Berlioz. July 4—Seiji Ozawa, cond.; Works of Mozart, Stravinsky. July 5—Leonard Bernstein, cond.; Mahler: Symphony No. 2. July 10—Prelude; St. John's College Choir—Concert, Rafael Fruhbeck De Burgos, cond.; works by Falla, Stravinsky. July 11—Seiji Ozawa, cond.; Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte," with Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause, Ezio Flagello. July 12—Seiji Ozawa, cond., Peter Serkin, pianist. Works of Prokofiev, Schoenberg, Russo. Corky Siegel Blues Band. July 17—Prelude; Yuji Takahashi, pianist. Concert; Seiji Ozawa, cond., Works of Haydn, Xenakis, Britten. July 18—Seiji Ozawa, cond., all Mozart program. Lili Kraus, pianist. July 19—Michael Tilson Thomas, cond.; works of Haydn, Bach, Krenek, Stravinsky. July 24—Prelude; Phyllis Curtin, soprano. Concert: Aaron Copland, cond.; works of Busoni, Copland, Schubert. Gervese de Peyer, flutist. July 25—Jorge Mester, cond., works of C. P. E. Bach, Strauss, Mozart. July 26—Kenneth Schermerhorn, cond.; works of Haydn, Mozart, Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky. July 31—Prelude; Joseph Silverstein, violinist; Jules Eskin, cellist; Richard Goode, pianist. Concert: William Steinberg, cond., all Beethoven program with Claude Frank, pianist. Aug. 1—William Steinberg, cond., all-Beethoven program with Andre Watts, pianist. Aug. 2—Antal Dorati, cond., all-Beethoven program with Vladimir Ashkenazy, pianist. Aug. 7—Prelude; Berkshire Boy Choir. Concert: Alain Lombard, cond.; works of Haydn, Roussel, Stravinsky. Aug. 8—Michael Tilson Thomas, cond.; works of Rimsky-Korsakov, Prokofiev, Debussy, Satie, with Gary Graffman, pianist. Aug. 9—Charles Mackerras, cond., works of Webern, Dvorak, Shostakovich with Jules Eskin, cellist. Aug. 14—Prelude; Claude Frank, pianist. Concert; William Steinberg, cond.; all Beethoven program with Rudolf Firkusny, soloist. Aug. 15—William Steinberg, cond.; all-Beethoven program with soloists, Jerome Lowenthal, Gwendolin Sims, Eunice Alberts, William Cochran, Thomas Paul. Aug. 16—Max Rudolf, cond., all-Beethoven program with Jerome Lowenthal, pianist. Aug. 21—Prelude; Alexis Weissenberg, pianist. Concert; Gunther Schuller, cond.; works of Weber, Szymanowski, Schuller, Scriabin, with Paul Zukofsky, violinist. Aug. 22—Seiji Ozawa, cond., works of Lutoslawski, Rachmaninoff, Bartok, with Alexis Weissenberg, pianist. Aug. 23—Seiji Ozawa, cond.; Berlioz: Requiem. Concert in memory of Charles Munch

Tanglewood summer plans

Programs have been announced for the eight weeks of the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., from July 3 through Aug. 23. Conductors Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller are artistic directors, and Leonard Bernstein is adviser to Tanglewood for the 1970 season.

Mr. Ozawa will conduct the opening concerts on July 3 and 4, the first of which will include Mr. Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms." Mr. Bernstein will be the conductor on Sunday afternoon, July 5, when Mahler's Symphony No. 2 ("Resurrection") will comprise the entire program.

Steinberg returning

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six all-Beethoven programs (July 31, Aug. 1-2, and Aug. 14-15-16), while other conductors will include Aaron Copland, Rafael Fruebeck de Burgos, Alain Lombard, Charles Mackerras, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Mr. Schuller, and Michael Tilson Thomas, now associate conductor of the BSO. The Boston Pops at Tanglewood (Aug. 11) will again be directed by Arthur Fiedler.

A concert version of Mozart's "Così Fan Tutte," the Berlioz Requiem, and William Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra are among the summer's novelties.

Berkshire Music Center concerts, the Festival of Contemporary Music (with the cooperation of the Fromm Music Foundation), Contemporary Trends concerts (of popular music), Weekend Preludes (Fridays at 7 p.m.) open rehearsals (Saturdays at 10:30 a.m.), and the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade (July 28) are continuing features in addition to the regular weekend programs.

Instrumentalists scheduled to appear during the summer include: Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenbach, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuji Takahashi, André Watts, and Alexis Weissenberg (pianists); Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky (violinists); Jules Eskin (cellist); James Stagliano (horn), and Gervase de Peyer (clarinetist).

Singers to be heard are Eunice Alberts, Bethany Beardslee, Phyllis Curtin, Rosalind Elias, Lorna Haywood, Christa Ludwig, Gwendolin Sims, Teresa Stratas, John Alexander, William Cochran, Ezio Flagello, Tom Krause, Thomas Paul, George Shirley, and Leopold Simoneau.

Ensembles participating include Berkshire Boy Choir, Chorus Pro Musica of Boston, Harvard Glee Club, Framingham Choral Society, MIT Chorus, Radcliffe Choral Society, St. John's College Choir, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. The Corky Siegel Blues Band will also perform.

Detailed information is obtainable from Festival Ticket Office, Symphony Hall, Boston, Ma. 02115.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
MAY 7 1970
New England Newsclip

It's a sure sign of summer. Arthur Catricala of Loudonville only had to get his cello out, set it up, begin rehearsing in the park, and he was surrounded by a bunch of kids. Outdoors and music seem to go together, as anyone can testify who has visited the Saratoga Performing Arts Center or Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. In addition, there are all kinds of other entertainment available in the summer in this area. Metroland residents find themselves in the heart of entertainment country. Take advantage of the opportunities.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
Albany Knickerbocker News
Tuesday, June 16, 1970

boston arts
July-august 75¢

To many classical music lovers, Fourth of July weekend is more than a patriotic celebration — it marks the opening of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, this country's oldest music festival. This year's 24-concert series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin on Friday evening, July 3; additional special concerts are also scheduled throughout the summer. Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller are sharing the post of Artistic Director this summer, with Leonard Bernstein as Special Advisor. Highlights of Tanglewood 1970 include six Beethoven concerts conducted by William Steinberg, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth; a performance of Mozart's "Così Fan Tutte" in concert form; and a performance of the Berlioz "Requiem" in memory of the late BSO conductor Charles Munch. A visit to Tanglewood is more than a wonderful opportunity to hear classical music at its best; it is a chance to see one of the most beautiful spots in all of New England.

boston arts
july-august 75

It's a sure sign of summer. Arthur Catricala of Loudonville only had to get his cello out, set it up, begin rehearsing in the park, and he was surrounded by a bunch of kids. Outdoors and music seem to go together, as anyone can testify who has visited the Saratoga Performing Arts Center or Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. In addition, there are all kinds of other entertainment available in the summer in this area. Metroland residents find themselves in the heart of entertainment country. Take advantage of the opportunities.

Tanglewood summer plans

Programs have been announced for the eight weeks of the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., from July 3 through Aug. 23. Conductors Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller are artistic directors, and Leonard Bernstein is adviser to Tanglewood for the 1970 season.

Mr. Ozawa will conduct the opening concerts on July 3 and 4, the first of which will include Mr. Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms." Mr. Bernstein will be the conductor on Sunday afternoon, July 5, when Mahler's Symphony No. 2 ("Resurrection") will comprise the entire program.

Steinberg returning

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six all-Beethoven programs (July 31, Aug. 1-2, and Aug. 14-15-16), while other conductors will include Aaron Copland, Rafael Fruebeck de Burgos, Alain Lombard, Charles Mackerras, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Mr. Schuller, and Michael Tilson Thomas, now associate conductor of the BSO. The Boston Pops at Tanglewood (Aug. 11) will again be directed by Arthur Fiedler.

A concert version of Mozart's "Così Fan Tutte," the Berlioz Requiem, and William Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra are among the summer's novelties.

Berkshire Music Center concerts, the Festival of Contemporary Music (with the cooperation of the Fromm Music Foundation), Contemporary Trends concerts (of popular music), Weekend Preludes (Fridays at 7 p.m.) open rehearsals (Saturdays at 10:30 a.m.), and the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade (July 28) are continuing features in addition to the regular weekend programs.

Instrumentalists scheduled to appear during the summer include: Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenbach, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuji Takahashi, André Watts, and Alexis Weissenberg (pianists); Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky (violinists); Jules Eskin (cellist); James Stagliano (horn), and Gervase de Peyer (clarinetist).

Singers to be heard are Eunice Alberts, Bethany Beardslee, Phyllis Curtin, Rosalind Elias, Lorna Haywood, Christa Ludwig, Gwendolin Sims, Teresa Stratas, John Alexander, William Cochran, Ezio Flagello, Tom Krause, Thomas Paul, George Shirley, and Leopold Simoneau.

Ensembles participating include Berkshire Boy Choir, Chorus Pro Musica of Boston, Harvard Glee Club, Framingham Choral Society, MIT Chorus, Radcliffe Choral Society, St. John's College Choir, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. The Corky Siegel Blues Band will also perform.

Detailed information is obtainable from Festival Ticket Office, Symphony Hall, Boston, Ma. 02115.

To many classical music lovers, Fourth of July weekend is more than a patriotic celebration — it marks the opening of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, this country's oldest music festival. This year's 24-concert series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin on Friday evening, July 3; additional special concerts are also scheduled throughout the summer. Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller are sharing the post of Artistic Director this summer, with Leonard Bernstein as Special Advisor. Highlights of Tanglewood 1970 include six Beethoven concerts conducted by William Steinberg, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth; a performance of Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte" in concert form; and a performance of the Berlioz "Requiem" in memory of the late BSO conductor Charles Munch. A visit to Tanglewood is more than a wonderful opportunity to hear classical music at its best; it is a chance to see one of the most beautiful spots in all of New England.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,550
7 1970
New England Newsclip

CAPITAL CITY PRESS BUREAU
ALBANY
NEWSPAPER CLIPPING
COMPLETE CLIPPING
Albany Knickerbocker News
Tuesday, June 16, 1970

It's a sure sign of summer. Arthur Catricala of Loudonville only had to get his cello out, set it up, begin rehearsing in the park, and he was surrounded by a bunch of kids. Outdoors and music seem to go together, as anyone can testify who has visited the Saratoga Performing Arts Center or Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. In addition, there are all kinds of other entertainment available in the summer in this area. Metroland residents find themselves in the heart of entertainment country. Take advantage of the opportunities.

Tanglewood summer plans

Programs have been announced for the eight weeks of the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., from July 3 through Aug. 23. Conductors Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller are artistic directors and Leonard Bernstein is advisor to Tanglewood for the 1970 season.

Mr. Ozawa will conduct the opening concerts on July 3 and 4, the first of which will include Mr. Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms." Mr. Bernstein will be the conductor on Sunday afternoon, July 5, when Mahler's Symphony No. 2 ("Resurrection") will comprise the entire program.

Steinberg returning

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six all-Beethoven programs (July 31, Aug. 1-2 and Aug. 14-15-16), while other conductors will include Aaron Copland, Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos, Alain Lombard, Charles Mackerras, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Mr. Schuller, and Michael Tilson Thomas, new associate conductor of the BSO. The Boston Pops at Tanglewood (Aug. 11) will again be directed by Arthur Fiedler.

A concert version of Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte," the Berlioz Requiem, and William Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra are among the summer's novelties.

Berkshire Music Center concerts, the Festival of Contemporary Music (with the cooperation of the Fromm Music Foundation), Contemporary Trends concerts (of popular music), Weekend Preludes (Fridays at 7 p.m.) open rehearsals (Saturdays at 10:30 a.m.), and the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade (July 28) are continuing features in addition to the regular weekend programs.

Instrumentalists scheduled to appear during the summer include Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenbach, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuji Takahashi, André Watts, and Alexis Weissenberg (pianists); Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky (violinists); Jules Eskin (cellist); James Stagliano (horn), and Gervase de Peyer (clarinetist).

Singers to be heard are Eunice Alberts, Bethany Beardslee, Phyllis Curtin, Rosalind Elias, Lorna Haywood, Christa Ludwig, Gwendolin Sims, Teresa Stratas, John Alexander, William Cochran, Ezio Flagello, Tom Krause, Thomas Paul, George Shirley, and Leopold Simoneau.

Ensembles participating include Berkshire Boy Choir, Chorus Pro Musica of Boston, Harvard Glee Club, Framingham Choral Society, MIT Chorus, Radcliffe Choral Society, St. John's College Choir, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. The Corky Siegel Blues Band will also perform.

Detailed information is obtainable from Festival Ticket Office, Symphony Hall, Boston, Ma. 02115.

To many classical music lovers, Fourth of July weekend is more than a patriotic celebration — it marks the opening of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, this country's oldest music festival. This year's 24-concert series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin on Friday evening, July 3; additional special concerts are also scheduled throughout the summer. Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller are sharing the post of Artistic Director this summer, with Leonard Bernstein as Special Advisor. Highlights of Tanglewood 1970 include six Beethoven concerts conducted by William Steinberg, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth; a performance of Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte" in concert form; and a performance of the Berlioz "Requiem" in memory of the late BSO conductor Charles Munch. A visit to Tanglewood is more than a wonderful opportunity to hear classical music at its best; it is a chance to see one of the most beautiful spots in all of New England.

Summer Music Festivals Span the U.S.

BY PAUL HUME
Times-Post Service

WASHINGTON — Every summer brings new places for music and new ideas about what music has to offer and how to present it.

Among the newer places this year is the Grand Canyon. Not to suggest that the Canyon is new, but if you have a visit to that part of the country in your plans this year, then you may want to take in some of the music Izler Solomon will be conducting at Flagstaff, Ariz., which is not far from the south edge of the canyon. The music there will run from July 23 to Aug. 9.

The Adirondack-Champlain Festival, a relative newcomer to the lists, is adding dance this year, and doing it with one of the great dancers of today, Jacques D'Ambroise. Pianist Gary Graffman and cellist Janos Starker also will perform.

Remember Waterloo Village, in northern New Jersey, one of the recent additions to the summer festival circuit. It shares with only one other series in this country, that at Marlboro, Vt., the greatness of Pablo Casals. It will frun from Saturday to Sept. 5, with Casals conducting on the opening program.

Two trends are of particular interest this year, trends that can be noted at every one of the famous summer music centers. One is the presence on every festival program of the big names in popular music: rock, jazz, and Broadway shows.

For instance, Hollywood Bowl is headlining the Nice, the British group that played on Zubin Mehta's TV "Switched-on Symphony" and the Bowl is offering evenings of Rodgers and Hammerstein, Lerner and Loewe, and Gershwin. Right along with these are Bowl nights of Mahler, Sibelius, Berlioz, and an all-Copland program. The Bowl runs from July 7 to Sept. 5.

Ravina, the northern suburban summer home of the Chicago Symphony, has what looks to be the most venturesome of the major summer programs.

Between today and Sept. 27, it will bring its audiences the U.S. debut of Okko Kamu, the young Finnish conductor who won not only the Karajan Conducting Competition last year but also the unqualified, admiring approval of the toughest board of judges in the world.

To Ravinia also will come concert performances of Verdi's "Otello," with McCracken, under Istvan Kertesz, and a "Lucia" with Sills; also music from Gesualdo to Messiaen. There is a series of chamber concerts, the New York City Ballet, the Birmingham Repertory Theater, and, for rock and blues fans, Procol Harum, The Illusion, Ramsey Lewis, Dionne Warwick, B. J. Thomas, Crow, and Frank Zappa. See what I mean?

Temple University's summer music at Ambler, Pa., will hear Honegger's "Judith," with Luise Rainer as narrator, Jessye Norman, singing under Dean Dixon's baton and the Pittsburgh Symphony in residence under William Steinberg. The full schedule includes the Pennsylvania Ballet, campus theater, and folk and rock concerts, from tomorrow to Aug. 9.

Would Gustav Mahler ever have believed that his second symphony was to become one of the big hits of the summer sheds as well as the winter halls? It will be heard at Hollywood Bowl and at Tanglewood, and was scheduled to open Ravinia until Eugene Ormandy's operation necessitated the cancellation of his appearance there. This kind of ultra-serious music is another of the major trends this summer.

VISITORS to Tanglewood, between July ~~3 and Aug. 23,~~ will want to remember the weekend preludes on Fridays at 7 p.m., preceding the regular concerts, which on Fridays are at 9. And the open rehearsals, held at 10:30 a.m. on Saturdays.

Younger conductors are moving into these big summer concerts in assuring numbers: Michael Tilson Thomas, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Okko Kamu, Alain Lombard, James De Priest, and of course Ozawa will be heard in various spots.

If you are going south, Greensboro, N.C., is housing the Eastern Music Festival through Aug. 1, with Czech conductor Otokar Trhlik as guest conductor.

If opera is your special bag, remember the Cincinnati Zoo, Colorado's Central City and in New York State, Caramoor and Lake George. Central City is giving "Boheme," and Carlisle Floyd's "Of Mice and Men." At Lake George, in addition to "Boheme" and other familiar operas, Stanley Silverman's new, experimental, but highly praised "Elephant Steps" will be seen. Santa Fe's novelty this summer will be Luciano Berio's opera called "Opera."

At Caramoor, Julius Rudel will conduct performances of Mozart's "Idomeneo," and the U.S. premiere of a new opera by Malcolm Williamson.

Don't overlook the Garden State Arts Center, right off the New Jersey Parkway of that name. It operates through Sept. 12.

And on the east bank of the Mississippi River, on the campus of Southern Illinois University, no less than the Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, and St. Louis orchestras all will play sometime between July 2 and Aug. 12. Cleveland's orchestra will be at home at the Blossom center for most of the summer.

The Shenandoah Valley Music Festival is at Orkney Springs, which runs between Aug. 5 and 15. The hope is that the National Symphony may emerge from its stepchild role to play at least seven concerts this summer at Columbia, Md.

These large-scale affairs are not, however, by any means the whole story of our summer music. From scattered beauty spots all over Maine to Carmel in California, via Fish Creek in Wisconsin's Door County, you are likely to find an array of concerts, dance programs, opera, chamber music, and recitals of all kinds. If you land in a community you do not know, call the local newspaper or Chamber of commerce. They will gladly give you the details on all that their region is offering.

From Aspen to Santa Fe, from Brevard to Vancouver, in the U.S. and Canada, you are not likely to put up for the night or a weekend without being within fairly easy reach of some music. Much of it will look and sound exactly the same as it does in your favorite winter concert spot. But some of it will have a special flavor obtainable only for a short time and only at that one place.

ASBURY PARK EVENING PRESS
ASBURY PARK, N. J.
D. 57,614 SUN. 63,640
JUN 26 1970

BOSTON NOW
BOSTON, MASS.
AUG 18 1970
New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD BSO

Highlight of the summer is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season at Tanglewood in the Berkshires. Twenty-four concerts are presented from July 3 - Aug. 23 Fridays at 9:00 p.m., Saturdays at 8 and Sundays at 2:30. Pops with Arthur Fiedler will appear August 11 at 8:30 p.m. Open rehearsals are held every Saturday morning at 10:30. Write to Festival Office, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. or call after June 15 at 413-637-1600.

This summer you'll have to face the music

By Frank Hruby

If it is music you are trying to get away from this summer, forget it. Judging by the lists of summer music festivals the country over, the muse of music will be everywhere at once parceling out its goodies.

Even the goodies seem to be everywhere — the same goodies, that is. The South American conductor Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos will conduct in Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony, at Blossom with the Cleveland Orchestra, in Ravinia with the Chicago Symphony, and at Saratoga with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Leonard Bernstein will conduct at all these places except Chicago, and he will conduct the same piece, the Mahler Symphony No. 2, with various choruses and soloists. At Blossom he will use the Blossom Festival Chorus with Christa Ludwig and Lorna Haywood in the July 9 special benefit.

By and large, the musical fare in the major leagues will adhere to principles laid down in summers past: familiar masterworks occasionally relieved by newer or rarer works, none of which will scare the summertime customer away.

CHICAGO'S PROGRAMMING seems the most adventurous, on that score, and Boston-at-Tanglewood the most conservative, probably because it is the only one that seems to be celebrating Beethoven's 200th birthday with any degree of enthusiasm.

ASPEN CONDUCTOR — James Levine, former assistant conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, is an artist-in-residence at the Aspen Music Festival.

But the major orchestras are not the only ones putting on festivals, by any means. The Santa Fe Opera is getting ready for its 14th season, as usual dividing its interest between sure successes and adventuresome exploits — such as the world premiere of Luciano Berio's "Opera." (That's its name.)

OBERLIN'S MUSIC THEATRE will enter the lists for the second season of opera, operettas and musical comedy, using faculty and students from its summer session.

In fact, the summer music school seems to be the sine qua non of all the festivals, small or large. Brevard College near the Smokey Mountains in North Carolina for example runs quite a large establishment and has made a surprisingly big name for itself, festivalwise.

The Eastern Music Festival in Greensboro, N.C., directed by former Clevelander Sheldon Morgenstern, has on its staff teachers and performers from all the major orchestras.

CLEVELANDERS, it seems, peppers the festival scene. Aspen Music Festival in Colorado, for instance, will have conductor James Levine of the Cleveland Orchestra and Institute of Music as one of its artists-in-residence.

These are but a very few of the many opportunities for vacationers who don't want to leave their music behind. From Stratford, Ontario, to New Mexico, from Maine to Los Angeles there will be a festival for your musical tastes — whether they be rock, pop, opera, symphony, chamber music or ballet.

Of course, if you aren't going anywhere, don't feel left out, musically. All of the above types of entertainment will be available at various times during the summer within easy driving time of Cleveland. The Press and Showtime will carry weekly listings of these events for your convenience.

The Cleveland Press
D. 393,191
JUN 26 1970

MASSACHUSETTS

CASTLE HILL — Ipswich. No season planned this year.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL — Tanglewood, Lenox, July ~~3–Aug.~~ 23. The Boston Symphony performs Fridays ~~at 9, Saturdays at~~ 8:30, Sundays at 2:30, in the 6000-seat Music Shed (an additional 10,000 can sit on the lawns), and its school, the Berkshire Music Center, concertizes during the week in the Shed and at other locations on the 287-acre estate. Leading the B.S.O., a record number (13) of conductors: Leonard Bernstein, July 5; Aaron Copland, July 24 (and Tanglewood on Parade), July 28; Antal Dorati, Aug. 2; Arthur Fiedler, Boston Pops, Aug. 11; Rafael Fruehbeck de Burgos, July 10; Alain Lombard, Aug. 7; Charles Mackerras, Aug. 9; Jorge Mester, July 25; Seiji Ozawa, July 3–4, 11–12, 17–18, Aug. 22–23; Max Rudolf, Aug. 16; Kenneth Schermerhorn, July 26; Gunther Schuller, Aug. 21; William Steinberg, all-Beethoven programs, July 31, Aug. 1, 14–15; and Michael Tilson Thomas, July 19, Aug. 8. Soloists include the pianists Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenback, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuzi Takahashi, Andre Watts, Alexis Weissenberg and Earl Wild; violinists Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukovsky, cellist Jules Eskin; hornist James Stagliano; clarinetist Gervase de Peyer; and singers Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratus, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause, Ezio Flagello ("Cosi fan tutte," July 11); Lorna Heywood, Christa Ludwig (Mahler "Resurrection" Symphony, July 5); John Alexander (Britten Serenade for tenor, horn and strings, July 17); Bethany Beardslee (Bach Cantata No. 51, Krenek "Die Nachtigall," July 19); Qwendolin Sims, Eunice Alberts, William Cochran, Thomas Paul (Beethoven Ninth, Aug. 15); Leopold Simoneau (Berlioz Requiem, Aug. 23). Friday's programs are prefaced at 7 p.m. by the Weekend Prelude series (included in the ticket price); Saturday open rehearsals at 10:30 a.m. are by general admission.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
JUN 28 1970
New England Newsclip

Wealth of culture in driving distance

WHILE SARATOGIANS and many in the Capital District consider the Saratoga Performing Arts Center the prime cultural center in the area, there also is a wealth of culture within a short drive of Saratoga Springs.

Perhaps the second most important cultural aspect for the area is the proximity of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass. NE

Tanglewood this season will offer 24 concerts ranging from Beethoven to Satie. The concerts are presented Friday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons.

The 24 concerts will feature 11 different conductors including the young Seiji Ozawa, Aaron Copland, William Steinberg and Leonard Bernstein.

TANGLEWOOD — The Boston Symphony Orchestra is featured during the eight-week summer season at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., in the Berkshire Mountains. Shown is a large audience gathering for one of the concerts and also the extensive grounds and formal gardens. Tanglewood is one of several cultural attractions available to area visitors in addition to the Saratoga Performing Arts Center.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
SARATOGA SARATOGIAN
Thursday, June 25, 1970

Summer Music Fes tivals Span the U.S.

BY PAUL HUME
Times-Post Service

WASHINGTON — Every summer brings new places for music and new ideas about what music has to offer and how to present it.

Among the newer places this year is the Grand Canyon. Not to suggest that the Canyon is new, but if you have a visit to that part of the country in your plans this year, then you may want to take in some of the music Mahler Solomon will be conducting at Flagstaff, Ariz., which is not far from the south edge of the canyon. The music there will run from July 23 to Aug. 9.

The Adirondack-Champlain Festival, a relative newcomer to the lists, is adding dance this year, and doing it with one of the great dancers of today, Jacques D'Ambroise. Pianist Gary Graffman and cellist Janos Starker also will perform.

Remember Waterloo Village, in northern New Jersey, one of the recent additions to the summer festival circuit. It shares with only one other series in this country, that at Marlboro, Vt., the greatness of Pablo Casals. It will frun from Saturday to Sept. 5, with Casals conducting on the opening program.

Two trends are of particular interest this year, trends that can be noted at every one of the famous summer music centers. One is the presence on every festival program of the big names in popular music: rock, jazz, and Broadway shows.

For instance, Hollywood Bowl is headlining the Nice, the British group that played on Zubin Mehta's TV "Switched-on Symphony" and the Bowl is offering evenings of Rodgers and Hammerstein, Lerner and Loewe, and Gershwin. Right along with these are Bowl nights of Mahler, Sibelius, Berlioz, and an all-Copland program. The Bowl runs from July 7 to Sept. 5.

Ravina, the northern suburban summer home of the Chicago Symphony, has what looks to be the most venturesome of the major summer programs.

Between today and Sept. 27, it will bring its audiences the U.S. debut of Okko Kamu, the young Finnish conductor who won not only the Karajan Conducting Competition last year but also the unqualified, admiring approval of the toughest board of judges in the world.

To Ravina also will come concert performances of Verdi's "Otello," with McCracken, under Istvan Kertesz, and a "Lucia" with Sills; also music from Gesualdo to Messiaen. There is a series of chamber concerts, the New York City Ballet, the Birmingham Repertory Theater, and, for rock and blues fans, Procol Harum, The Illusion, Ramsey Lewis, Dionne Warwick, B. J. Thomas, Crow, and Frank Zappa. See what I mean?

Temple University's summer music at Ambler, Pa., will hear Honegger's "Judith," with Luise Rainer as narrator, Jessye Norman, singing under Dean Dixon's baton and the Pittsburgh Symphony in residence under William Steinberg. The full schedule includes the Pennsylvania Ballet, campus theater, and folk and rock concerts, from tomorrow to Aug. 9.

Would Gustav Mahler ever have believed that his second symphony was to become one of the big hits of the summer sheds as well as the winter halls? It will be heard at Hollywood Bowl and at Tanglewood, and was scheduled to open Ravinia until Eugene Ormandy's operation necessitated the cancellation of his appearance there. This kind of ultra-serious music is another of the major trends this summer.

VISITORS to Tanglewood, between July ~~3 and Aug. 23~~, will want to remember the weekend preludes on Fridays at 7 p.m., preceding the regular concerts, which on Fridays are at 9. And the open rehearsals, held at 10:30 a.m. on Saturdays.

Younger conductors are moving into these big summer concerts in assuring numbers: Michael Tilson Thomas, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Okko Kamu, Alain Lombard, James De Priest, and of course Ozawa will be heard in various spots.

If you are going south, Greensboro, N.C., is housing the Eastern Music Festival through Aug. 1, with Czech conductor Otokar Trhlik as guest conductor.

If opera is your special bag, remember the Cincinnati Zoo, Colorado's Central City and in New York State, Caramoor and Lake George. Central City is giving "Boheme," and Carlisle Floyd's "Of Mice and Men." At Lake George, in addition to "Boheme" and other familiar operas, Stanley Silverman's new, experimental, but highly praised "Elephant Steps" will be seen. Santa Fe's novelty this summer will be Luciano Berio's opera called "Opera."

At Caramoor, Julius Rudel will conduct performances of Mozart's "Idomeneo," and the U.S. premiere of a new opera by Malcolm Williamson.

Don't overlook the Garden State Arts Center, right off the New Jersey Parkway of that name. It operates through Sept. 12.

And on the east bank of the Mississippi River, on the campus of Southern Illinois University, no less than the Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, and St. Louis orchestras all will play sometime between July 2 and Aug. 12. Cleveland's orchestra will be at home at the Blossom center for most of the summer.

The Shenandoah Valley Music Festival is at Orkney Springs, which runs between Aug. 5 and 15. The hope is that the National Symphony may emerge from its stepchild role to play at least seven concerts this summer at Columbia, Md.

These large-scale affairs are not, however, by any means the whole story of our summer music. From scattered beauty spots all over Maine to Carmel in California, via Fish Creek in Wisconsin's Door County, you are likely to find an array of concerts, dance programs, opera, chamber music, and recitals of all kinds. If you land in a community you do not know, call the local newspaper or Chamber of commerce. They will gladly give you the details on all that their region is offering.

From Aspen to Santa Fe, from Brevard to Vancouver, in the U.S. and Canada, you are not likely to put up for the night or a weekend without being within fairly easy reach of some music. Much of it will look and sound exactly the same as it does in your favorite winter concert spot. But some of it will have a special flavor obtainable only for a short time and only at that one place.

ASBURY PARK EVENING PRESS
ASBURY PARK, N. J.
D. 57,614 SUN. 63,640
JUN 26 1970

BOSTON NOW
BOSTON, MASS.
AUG 18 1970
New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD BSO

Highlight of the summer is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season at Tanglewood in the Berkshires. Twenty-four concerts are presented from July 3 - Aug. 23 Fridays at 9:00 p.m., Saturdays at 8 and Sundays at 2:30. Pops with Arthur Fiedler will appear August 11 at 8:30 p.m. Open rehearsals are held every Saturday morning at 10:30. Write to Festival Office, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. or call after June 15 at 413-637-1600.

This summer you'll have to face the music

By Frank Hruby

If it is music you are trying to get away from this summer, forget it. Judging by the lists of summer music festivals the country over, the muse of music will be everywhere at once parceling out its goodies.

Even the goodies seem to be everywhere — the same goodies, that is. The South American conductor Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos will conduct in Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony, at Blossom with the Cleveland Orchestra, in Ravinia with the Chicago Symphony, and at Saratoga with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Leonard Bernstein will conduct at all these places except Chicago, and he will conduct the same piece, the Mahler Symphony No. 2, with various choruses and soloists. At Blossom he will use the Blossom Festival Chorus with Christa Ludwig and Lorna Haywood in the July 9 special benefit.

By and large, the musical fare in the major leagues will adhere to principles laid down in summers past: familiar masterworks occasionally relieved by newer or rarer works, none of which will scare the summertime customer away.

CHICAGO'S PROGRAMMING seems the most adventurous, on that score, and Boston-at-Tanglewood the most conservative, probably because it is the only one that seems to be celebrating Beethoven's 200th birthday with any degree of enthusiasm.

But the major orchestras are not the only ones putting on festivals, by any means. The Santa Fe Opera is getting ready for its 14th season, as usual dividing its interest between sure successes and adventuresome exploits — such as the world premiere of Luciano Berio's "Opera." (That's its name.)

OBERLIN'S MUSIC THEATRE will enter the lists for the second season of opera, operettas and musical comedy, using faculty and students from its summer session.

In fact, the summer music school seems to be the sine qua non of all the festivals, small or large. Brevard College near the Smokey Mountains in North Carolina for example runs quite a large establishment and has made a surprisingly big name for itself, festivalwise.

The Eastern Music Festival in Greensboro, N.C., directed by former Clevelander Sheldon Morgenstern, has on its staff teachers and performers from all the major orchestras.

CLEVELANDERS, it seems, peppers the festival scene. Aspen Music Festival in Colorado, for instance, will have conductor James Levine of the Cleveland Orchestra and Institute of Music as one of its artists-in-residence.

These are but a very few of the many opportunities for vacationers who don't want to leave their music behind. From Stratford, Ontario, to New Mexico, from Maine to Los Angeles there will be a festival for your musical tastes — whether they be rock, pop, opera, symphony, chamber music or ballet.

Of course, if you aren't going anywhere, don't feel left out, musically. All of the above types of entertainment will be available at various times during the summer within easy driving time of Cleveland. The Press and Showtime will carry weekly listings of these events for your convenience.

The Cleveland Press
D. 393,191
JUN 26 1970

ASPEN CONDUCTOR — James Levine, former assistant conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra, is an artist-in-residence at the Aspen Music Festival.

MASSACHUSETTS

CASTLE HILL — Ipswich. No season planned this year.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL — Tanglewood, Lenox, July 3–Aug. 23. The Boston Symphony performs Fridays at 9, Saturdays at 8:30, Sundays at 2:30, in the 6000-seat Music Shed (an additional 10,000 can sit on the lawns), and its school, the Berkshire Music Center, concertizes during the week in the Shed and at other locations on the 237-acre estate. Leading the B.S.O., a record number (13) of conductors: Leonard Bernstein, July 5; Aaron Copland, July 24 (and Tanglewood on Parade), July 28; Antal Dorati, Aug. 2; Arthur Fiedler, Boston Pops, Aug. 11; Rafael Fruehbeck de Burgos, July 10; Alain Lombard, Aug. 7; Charles Mackerras, Aug. 9; Jorge Mester, July 25; Seiji Ozawa, July 3-4, 11-12, 17-18, Aug. 22-23; Max Rudolf, Aug. 16; Kenneth Schermerhorn, July 26; Gunther Schuller, Aug. 21; William Steinberg, all-Beethoven programs, July 31, Aug. 1, 14-15; and Michael Tilson Thomas, July 19, Aug. 8. Soloists include the pianists Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenback, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuzi Takahashi, Andre Watts, Alexis Weissenberg and Earl Wild; violinists Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukovsky, cellist Jules Eskin; hornist James Stagliano; clarinetist Gervase de Peyer; and singers Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratus, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause, Ezio Flagello ("Cosi fan tutte," July 11); Lorna Heywood, Christa Ludwig (Mahler "Resurrection" Symphony, July 5); John Alexander (Britten Serenade for tenor, horn and strings, July 17); Bethany Beardslee (Bach Cantata No. 51, Krenek "Die Nachtigall," July 19); Qwendolin Sims, Eunice Alberts, William Cochran, Thomas Paul (Beethoven Ninth, Aug. 15); Leopold Simoneau (Berlioz Requiem, Aug. 23). Friday's programs are prefaced at 7 p.m. by the Weekend Prelude series (included in the ticket price); Saturday open rehearsals at 10:30 a.m. are by general admission.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 568,277 (E) 194,700
JUN 28 1970
New England Newsclip

Wealth of culture in driving distance

WHILE SARATOGIANS and many in the Capital District consider the Saratoga Performing Arts Center the prime cultural center in the area, there also is a wealth of culture within a short drive of Saratoga Springs.

Perhaps the second most important cultural aspect for the area is the proximity of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass.

Tanglewood this season will offer 24 concerts ranging from Beethoven to Satie. The concerts are presented Friday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons.

The 24 concerts will feature 11 different conductors including the young Seiji Ozawa, Aaron Copland, William Steinberg and Leonard Bernstein.

TANGLEWOOD — The Boston Symphony Orchestra is featured during the eight-week summer season at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., in the Berkshire Mountains. Shown is a large audience gathering for one of the concerts and also the extensive grounds and formal gardens. Tanglewood is one of several cultural attractions available to area visitors in addition to the Saratoga Performing Arts Center.

16

Dallas Times Herald
D. 216,209 SUN. 256,250

JUN 28 1970

Music Festivals

Summer Programs Spreading Rapidly

By OLIN CHISM, Music Editor

The summer music festivals are spreading around the country at such a rate that it shouldn't be long before any vacation will take the tourist to within driving distance of at least one. One of the notable exceptions is Texas; if there's any music festival between Texarkana and El Paso and Dalhart and Brownsville, it's certainly keeping itself well hidden.

A few Sundays ago we discussed the festivals at Santa Fe (which probably shouldn't actually be classified as a festival) and Aspen. Now a word or two about some of the other big festivals around the country might be in order.

PROBABLY THE BEST KNOWN of them all is the one at Tanglewood in Massachusetts, where the Boston Symphony annually holds forth. This year the Tanglewood festival opens next Friday and closes Aug. 23. Programs are at 7 and 9 p.m. on Fridays, with open rehearsals on Saturdays at 10:30 a.m.

The Ravinia Festival in the northern suburb of Chicago has to be one of the biggest of them all. The Chicago Symphony under the principal direction of Istvan Kertesz is the big attraction, but there are also chamber music performances, ballet programs (featuring the New York City Ballet), opera, and art, film and theater presentations.

Finnish conductor Okka Kamu, who has received widespread praise around Europe, will be making his American debut at the Ravinia Festival this Tuesday. Other artists include such luminaries as Seija Ozawa, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Itzhak Perlman and Andre Watts.

The Ravinia Festival opened last Thursday and will continue through Sept. 27, with some sort of event almost every night of the week.

WITHOUT GOING INTO detail, here is some information about some other American festivals:

On the West Coast, the Hollywood Bowl performances open on July 7 and run through Sept. 5, featuring music from Sibelius to rock 'n' roll with a number of guest artists. The Nice, the rock group that played on Zubin Mehta's recent "Switched-On Symphony" television concert, is an example of the guests.

Skipping back across the continent, we come to another big one, Temple University's summer music performances at Ambler, Pa. The Pittsburgh Symphony under William Steinberg is the featured orchestra, with programs including ballet, theater, rock 'n' roll and folk music. Honegger's "Judith" will be one of the featured works. The Temple festival opened last week and will continue through Aug. 9.

Another one of the country's major orchestras is featured at the Blossom Center festival, where George Szell's Cleveland Orchestra holds forth for much of the summer. (Szell, incidentally, who has been bothered by sickness in recent months, suffered a mild heart attack in Cleveland a few days ago. At last report he was progressing satisfactorily.)

FOR A REAL ORCHESTRA feast, the music lover should go to Southern Illinois University at Carbondale between next Thursday and Aug. 12. During that period four major American orchestras will be playing there, including the Chicago, Cleveland, St. Louis and Detroit symphonies.

Those who are thinking about going to Aspen, which runs from next Friday through Aug. 30, might consider dropping in on Central City, Colo., as well. The Central City opera will be doing Puccini's "La Boheme" and Carlisle Floyd's "Of Mice and Men" this summer.

The aforegoing is just a sampling of what's available this summer. A list of every festival, large and small, and including Canada, would be a very long one indeed. They're spread from Maine to California, from Montana to the Grand Canyon.

Too bad about Texas.

FREE PRESS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,800

JUN 27 1970

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Opens June 28

The Tanglewood season opens June 28, the Sunday before the Berkshire Festival opening when Leonard Bernstein delivers the opening address (2:30 p.m.) on the 30th anniversary of the Berkshire Music Center.

On July 2 Bernstein will conduct the BMC Orchestra and vocal soloists performing the first act of Wagner's Die Walkyrie.

Concerts in the famous Shed at Tanglewood will be given July 3-Aug. 23. William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six all-Beethoven concerts in honor of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Final program Aug. 23 will be the Berlioz "Requiem" in memory of the late Charles Munch, Boston Symphony Orchestra director 1949-1962.

MAY 25 1970

The Leisure Scene

THE NATIONAL OBSERVER

Music and Dance

New York Philharmonic "Promenades" (Philharmonic Hall, New York City, May 27-June 20). Nineteen nonsubscription concerts make up the eighth season of the "pops" series conducted by Andre Kostelanetz. Among the works to be performed are a new ballet by Edward Villella, with Mr. Villella dancing, and the premiere of Hovhaness' And God Created Great Whales.

Martha Graham Center for Contemporary Dance (Kaufmann Concert Hall, New York City, May 28). Three new works by Bertram Ross, one of them to be danced by the choreographer, plus a revival of Miss Graham's El Penitente, last seen in New York 18 years ago, are presented by young dancers from the Graham Center augmented by members of the Graham Dance Company. The first in a series.

American Ballet Theater (Metropolitan Opera House, New York City, June 16-July 12). Three premieres, including original scores by Cole Porter and Duke Ellington, highlight the company's 30th anniversary season. New productions of Fokine's Petrouchka, Massine's Gaiete Parisienne, and Jose Limon's Traitor are also scheduled.

Santa Fe Opera (Santa Fe, N.M.; July 3-Aug. 22). The premiere of Luciano Berio's complexly scored but simply staged Opera, derived from the sinking of the Titanic in 1912, will be given in the famous troupe's 14th season. Three other operas, The Rake's Progress, The Marriage of Figaro, and Donizetti's Anna Bolena, will receive new productions.

Berkshire Festival (Lenox, Mass.; July 3-Aug. 23). Usually called simply "Tanglewood," after the area in which it's staged, the Boston Symphony's summer gathering will consist of 24 concerts under the overall direction of Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller. For the seventh year, a Festival of Contemporary Music will be staged in conjunction with the main festival and is scheduled for Aug. 15-20.

Hollywood Bowl (Hollywood, Calif.; July 7-Sept. 5). Improved physical facilities and an impressive roster of soloists, particularly pianists, are promised for the West Coast's best known series of "pops" concerts.

Regional Theater

BUFFALO. Studio Arena Theatre: Stop the World—I Want to Get Off, May 26-31.

CHICAGO. Goodman Theatre: Heartbreak House, May 29-June 28.

CINCINNATI. Playhouse in the Park: Ardele, May 26-June 13.

DALLAS. Dallas Theater Center: Little Murders, May 26-June 27.

HOUSTON. Alley Theatre, Arena Stage: The World of Carl Sandburg, May 26-June 7; Large Stage: Blithe Spirit, May 26-31.

LOS ANGELES. Center Theatre Group, New Theatre for Now: Paul Sills' Story Theatre, May 28-31.

MILWAUKEE. Milwaukee Repertory Theater Company: She Stoops to Conquer, May 25-28; The Lesson and The Chairs, May 29-31.

NEW ORLEANS. Repertory Theater: The Women, May 26-June 7.

SAN FRANCISCO. American Conservatory Theatre, in repertory, Geary Theater: The Rose Tattoo, Hadrian VII, St. Joan, and Oedipus Rex; Marines Memorial Theatre: Little Malcolm and His Struggle Against the Eunuchs, by David Halliwell, The Blood Knot, by Athol Fugard, and The Importance of Being Earnest.

SARASOTA. Asolo State Theater Company, in repertory: Misalliance, Oh Dad, Poor Dad, Mamma's Hung You in the Closet and I'm Feelin' So Sad, Doctor Faustus, and A Flea in Her Ear.

WASHINGTON, D.C. Arena Stage: No Place to Be Somebody, May 28-July 5.

Washington Theater Club: Continental Divide, by Oliver Hailey, May 25-26.

Television Highlights

Monday, May 25

Now: Women's Liberation. A documentary explores the movement's attitudes, goals, and operation (ABC: 10:30-11 p.m., EDT).

Tuesday, May 26

60 Minutes. Tricia Nixon takes viewers on a tour of the family living quarters on the second floor of the White House (CBS: 10-11 p.m., EDT).

Wednesday, May 27

Project 20: The Shining Mountains. The story of the Rocky Mountains is told through vintage still photography and new and old motion pictures (NBC: 10-11 p.m., EDT).

Sunday, May 31

The Glen Campbell Goodtime Hour. Singer Dionne Warwick, the 5th Dimension, comedienne Ruth Buzzi, and comic John Byner are guests (CBS: 9-10 p.m., EDT).

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 11,500

JUL - 1970

New England Newsclip

Pastoral music-making by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood (Nathaniel Hawthorne's sobriquet for the orchestra's Berkshire home) commences on July 3 with three concerts every weekend through August 23.

July 3, Seiji Ozawa conducts Chichester Psalms by Bernstein, Atmosphères by Ligeti, and Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique.

Aaron Copland

July 4, Ozawa: two works of Mozart, The Marriage of Figaro overture and Symphony no. 36; and two of Stravinsky, the Violin Concerto with Joseph Silverstein and The Firebird Suite. July 5, Leonard Bernstein, conductor: Mahler's Symphony no. 2, soloists Lorna Haywood and Christa Ludwig.

July 10, Rafael Frubeck de Burgos directs Falla's El Amor Brujo and two suites from The Three-Cornered Hat, and Stravinsky's Rite of Spring. July 11, Ozawa leads a concert performance of Così Fan Tutte with Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause and Ezio Flagello. July 12, Ozawa again: Romeo and Juliet by Prokofiev, Peter Serkin performing Schoenberg's Piano Concerto, and Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra with the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

July 17, Ozawa: Haydn Symphony 86, Eonta by Xenakis; Serenade for Tenor, Horn and Strings by Britten; and Ibert's Divertissement. July 18, Ozawa directs an all-Mozart program: Serenade no. 10 for 13 wind instruments and Piano Concerto in D minor with Lili Kraus. July 19, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting: Haydn's Symphony no. 98, Bach Cantata no. 51, Krenek's Die Nachtigall, and Stravinsky's Pulcinella Suite.

July 24, Aaron Copland directs: Busoni's Rondo Arlecchinesco, Schubert's Symphony no. 5, and two works by the conductor, Dance Panels and the Clarinet Sinfonia in D, Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme Suite by Strauss, and Mozart's Symphony no. 41. July 26, Kenneth Schermerhorn directing: Symphony no. 83 by Haydn; Mozart's Piano Concerto in A, Christoph Eschenbach soloist; Concerto in D for Orchestra by Stravinsky; and Tchaikovsky's Suite no. 4, Mozartiana.

July 31, August 1 and 2, an all-Beethoven weekend with William Steinberg conducting. Friday evening, Leonore Overture no. 3, Piano Concerto no. 2 with Claude Frank, another overture, King Stephen, and Symphony no. 8. Saturday, the Coriolan Overture, Piano Concerto no. 4 with André Watts soloist, and Symphony no. 4. Sunday, Egmont Overture, Vladimir Ashkenazy playing Piano Concerto no. 3, and Symphony no. 7.

August 7, Alain Lombard on the podium: Symphony no. 88 by Haydn, Bacchus et Ariane Suite no. 2 by Roussel, and Stravinsky's Petrushka. August 8, Michael Tilson Thomas: Russian Easter Overture by Rimsky-Korsakov, Prokofiev Piano Concerto no. 3 with Gary Graffman, Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun by Debussy, Trois Gymnopédies by Satie, and Debussy's La Mer. August 9, Charles Mackerras conducts: Six Pieces for Orchestra by Webern, the Dvorak Cello Concerto with Jules Eskin soloist, and Shostakovich's Symphony no. 5.

August 14, 15 and 16, three all-Beethoven programs with William Steinberg. Friday, Symphony no. 3, Eroica; and Piano Concerto no. 5, Emperor, with Rudolph Firkusny. Saturday, the Choral Fantasy, and Symphony no. 9 with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and soloists. Sunday, Consecration of the House Overture, Jerome Lowenthal in Piano Concerto no. 1, and Symphony no. 5.

August 21, Gunther Schuller: Weber's Der Freischütz Overture, Paul Zukofsky performing Violin Concerto no. 1 by Szmanowski, the conductor's work Spectra, and Poem of Ecstasy by Scriabin. August 22, Seiji Ozawa: Concerto for Orchestra by Lutoslawski, Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto no. 3 with Alexis Weissenberg, and Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra. August 23, Ozawa directs the Berlioz Requiem in memory of Charles Munch.

• Performances: 9:00 p.m. Friday, 8:30 p.m. Saturday, 2:30 p.m. Sunday. In addition there are weekend preludes (short recitals by orchestra members and guest artists) each Friday at 7:00 p.m. at no charge to Friday evening ticket holders. Open rehearsals are scheduled every Saturday at 10:30 a.m. Tickets: $3.50-$8.50; general admission to the lawns $3.00; open rehearsals $2.50. Reserved tickets and detailed schedules are available from the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 02140. 413-637-1600.

Dallas Times Herald
D. 216,209 SUN. 296,250

JUN 28 1970

Music Festivals

Summer Programs Spreading Rapidly

By OLIN CHISM, Music Editor

The summer music festivals are spreading around the country at such a rate that it shouldn't be long before any vacation will take the tourist to within driving distance of at least one. One of the notable exceptions is Texas; if there's any music festival between Texarkana and El Paso and Dalhart and Brownsville, it's certainly keeping itself well hidden.

A few Sundays ago we discussed the festivals at Santa Fe (which probably shouldn't actually be classified as a festival) and Aspen. Now a word or two about some of the other big festivals around the country might be in order.

PROBABLY THE BEST KNOWN of them all is the one at Tanglewood in Massachusetts, where the Boston Symphony annually holds forth. This year the Tanglewood festival opens next Friday and closes Aug. 23. Programs are at 7 and 9 p.m. on Fridays, with open rehearsals on Saturdays at 10:30 a.m.

The Ravinia Festival in the northern suburb of Chicago has to be one of the biggest of them all. The Chicago Symphony under the principal direction of Istvan Kertesz is the big attraction, but there are also chamber music performances, ballet programs (featuring the New York City Ballet), opera, and art, film and theater presentations.

Finnish conductor Okka Kamu, who has received widespread praise around Europe, will be making his American debut at the Ravinia Festival this Tuesday. Other artists include such luminaries as Seija Ozawa, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Itzhak Perlman and Andre Watts.

The Ravinia Festival opened last Thursday and will continue through Sept. 27, with some sort of event almost every night of the week.

WITHOUT GOING INTO detail, here is some information about some other American festivals:

On the West Coast, the Hollywood Bowl performances open on July 7 and run through Sept. 5, featuring music from Sibelius to rock 'n' roll with a number of guest artists. The Nice, the rock group that played on Zubin Mehta's recent "Switched-On Symphony" television concert, is an example of the guests.

Skipping back across the continent, we come to another big one, Temple University's summer music performances at Ambler, Pa. The Pittsburgh Symphony under William Steinberg is the featured orchestra, with programs including ballet, theater, rock 'n' roll and folk music. Honegger's "Judith" will be one of the featured works. The Temple festival opened last week and will continue through Aug. 9.

Another one of the country's major orchestras is featured at the Blossom Center festival, where George Szell's Cleveland Orchestra holds forth for much of the summer. (Szell, incidentally, who has been bothered by sickness in recent months, suffered a mild heart attack in Cleveland a few days ago. At last report he was progressing satisfactorily.)

FOR A REAL ORCHESTRA feast, the music lover should go to Southern Illinois University at Carbondale between next Thursday and Aug. 12. During that period four major American orchestras will be playing there, including the Chicago, Cleveland, St. Louis and Detroit symphonies.

Those who are thinking about going to Aspen, which runs from next Friday through Aug. 30, might consider dropping in on Central City, Colo., as well. The Central City opera will be doing Puccini's "La Boheme" and Carlisle Floyd's "Of Mice and Men" this summer.

The aforegoing is just a sampling of what's available this summer. A list of every festival, large and small, and including Canada, would be a very long one indeed. They're spread from Maine to California, from Montana to the Grand Canyon.

Too bad about Texas.

FREE PRESS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
WEEKLY 1,800

JUN 27 1970

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Opens June 28

The Tanglewood season opens June 28, the Sunday before the Berkshire Festival opening when Leonard Bernstein delivers the opening address (2:30 p.m.) on the 30th anniversary of the Berkshire Music Center.

On July 2 Bernstein will conduct the BMC Orchestra and vocal soloists performing the first act of Wagner's Die Walkyrie.

Concerts in the famous Shed at Tanglewood will be given July 3-Aug. 23. William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six all-Beethoven concerts in honor of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Final program Aug. 23 will be the Berlioz "Requiem" in memory of the late Charles Munch, Boston Symphony Orchestra director 1949-1962.

Pastoral music-making by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood (Nathaniel Hawthorne's sobriquet for the orchestra's Berkshire home) commences on July 3 with three concerts every weekend through August 23.

July 3, Seiji Ozawa conducts Chichester Psalms by Bernstein, Atmosphères by Ligeti, and Berlioz' Symphonie Fantas- tique. July 4, Ozawa: two works of Mozart, The Marriage of Figaro overture and Symphony no. 36; and two of Stravinsky, the Violin Concerto with Joseph Silverstein and The Firebird Suite. July 5, Leonard Bernstein, conductor: Mahler's Symphony no. 2, soloists Lorna Haywood and Christa Ludwig.

Aaron Copland

July 10, Rafael Frubeck de Burgos directs Falla's El Amor Brujo and two suites from The Three-Cornered Hat, and Stravinsky's Rite of Spring. July 11, Ozawa leads a concert performance of Così Fan Tutte with Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause and Ezio Flagello. July 12, Ozawa again: Romeo and Juliet by Prokofiev, Peter Serkin performing Schoenberg's Piano Concerto, and Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra with the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

July 17, Ozawa: Haydn Symphony 86, Eonta by Xenakis; Serenade for Tenor, Horn and Strings by Britten; and Ibert's Divertissement. July 18, Ozawa directs an all-Mozart program: Serenade no. 10 for 13 wind instruments and Piano Concerto in D minor with Lili Kraus. July 19, Michael Tilson Thomas conducting: Haydn's Symphony no. 98, Bach Cantata no. 51, Krenek's Die Nachtigall, and Stravinsky's Pulcinella Suite.

July 24, Aaron Copland directs: Busoni's Rondo Arlecchinesco, Schubert's Symphony no. 5, and two works by the conductor, Dance Panels and the Clarinet

BOSTON
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 11,500

JUL - 1970

New England Newsclip

., July 25, Jorge Mester: C.P.E. Sinfonia in D, Le Bourgeois Gen- me Suite by Strauss, and Mozart's mphony no. 41. July 26, Kenneth hermerhorn directing: Symphony no. 83 by Haydn; Mozart's Piano Concerto in A, Christoph Eschenbach soloist; Concerto in D for Orchestra by Stravinsky; and Tchaikovsky's Suite no. 4, Mozartiana.

July 31, August 1 and 2, an all-Beethoven weekend with William Steinberg conducting. Friday evening, Leonore Overture no. 3, Piano Concerto no. 2 with Claude Frank, another overture, King Stephen, and Symphony no. 8. Saturday, the Coriolan Overture, Piano Concerto no. 4 with André Watts soloist, and Symphony no. 4. Sunday, Egmont Overture, Vladimir Ashkenazy playing Piano Concerto no. 3, and Symphony no. 7.

August 7, Alain Lombard on the podium: Symphony no. 88 by Haydn, Bacchus et Ariane Suite no. 2 by Roussel, and Stravinsky's Petrushka. August 8, Michael Tilson Thomas: Russian Easter Overture by Rimsky-Korsakov, Prokofiev Piano Concerto no. 3 with Gary Graffman, Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun by Debussy, Trois Gymnopédies by Satie, and Debussy's La Mer. August 9, Charles Mackerras conducts: Six Pieces for Orchestra by Webern, the Dvorak Cello Concerto with Jules Eskin soloist, and Shostakovich's Symphony no. 5.

August 14, 15 and 16, three all-Beethoven programs with William Steinberg. Friday, Symphony no. 3, Eroica; and Piano Concerto no. 5, Emperor, with Rudolph Firkusny. Saturday, the Choral Fantasy, and Symphony no. 9 with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and soloists. Sunday, Consecration of the House Overture, Jerome Lowenthal in Piano Concerto no. 1, and Symphony no. 5.

August 21, Gunther Schuller: Weber's Der Freischütz Overture, Paul Zukofsky performing Violin Concerto no. 1 by Szmanowski, the conductor's work Spectra, and Poem of Ecstasy by Scriabin. August 22, Seiji Ozawa: Concerto for Orchestra by Lutoslawski, Rachmaninov's Piano Concerto no. 3 with Alexis Weissenberg, and Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra. August 23, Ozawa directs the Berlioz Requiem in memory of Charles Munch.

• Performances: 9:00 p.m. Friday, 8:30 p.m. Saturday, 2:30 p.m. Sunday. In addition there are weekend preludes (short recitals by orchestra members and guest artists) each Friday at 7:00 p.m. at no charge to Friday evening ticket holders. Open rehearsals are scheduled every Saturday at 10:30 a.m. Tickets: $3.50-$8.50; general admission to the lawns $3.00; open rehearsals $2.50. Reserved tickets and detailed schedules are available from the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 02140. 413-637-1600.

The Leisure Scene

THE NATIONAL OBSERVER

Music and Dance

New York Philharmonic "Promenades" (Philharmonic Hall, New York City, May 27-June 20). Nineteen nonsubscription concerts make up the eighth season of the "pops" series conducted by Andre Kostelanetz. Among the works to be performed are a new ballet by Edward Villella, with Mr. Villella dancing, and the premiere of Hovhaness' And God Created Great Whales.

Martha Graham Center for Contemporary Dance (Kaufmann Concert Hall, New York City, May 28). Three new works by Bertram Ross, one of them to be danced by the choreographer, plus a revival of Miss Graham's El Penitente, last seen in New York 18 years ago, are presented by young dancers from the Graham Center augmented by members of the Graham Dance Company. The first in a series.

American Ballet Theater (Metropolitan Opera House, New York City, June 16-July 12). Three premieres, including original scores by Cole Porter and Duke Ellington, highlight the company's 30th anniversary season. New productions of Fokine's Petrouchka, Massine's Gaiete Parisienne, and Jose Limon's Traitor are also scheduled.

Santa Fe Opera (Santa Fe, N.M.; July 3-Aug. 22). The premiere of Luciano Berio's complexly scored but simply staged Opera, derived from the sinking of the Titanic in 1912, will be given in the famous troupe's 14th season. Three other operas, The Rake's Progress, The Marriage of Figaro, and Donizetti's Anna Bolena, will receive new productions.

Berkshire Festival (Lenox, Mass.; July 3-Aug. 23). Usually called simply "Tanglewood," after the area in which it's staged, the Boston Symphony's summer gathering will consist of 24 concerts under the overall direction of Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller. For the seventh year, a Festival of Contemporary Music will be staged in conjunction with the main festival and is scheduled for Aug. 15-20.

Hollywood Bowl (Hollywood, Calif.; July 7-Sept. 5). Improved physical facilities and an impressive roster of soloists, particularly pianists, are promised for the West Coast's best known series of "pops" concerts.

Regional Theater

BUFFALO. Studio Arena Theatre: Stop the World—I Want to Get Off, May 26-31.

CHICAGO. Goodman Theatre: Heartbreak House, May 29-June 28.

CINCINNATI. Playhouse in the Park: Ardele, May 26-June 13.

DALLAS. Dallas Theater Center: Little Murders, May 26-June 27.

HOUSTON. Alley Theatre, Arena Stage: The World of Carl Sandburg, May 26-June 7; Large Stage: Blithe Spirit, May 26-31.

LOS ANGELES. Center Theatre Group, New Theatre for Now: Paul Sills' Story Theatre, May 28-31.

MILWAUKEE. Milwaukee Repertory Theater Company: She Stoops to Conquer, May 25-28; The Lesson and The Chairs, May 29-31.

NEW ORLEANS. Repertory Theater: The Women, May 26-June 7.

SAN FRANCISCO. American Conservatory Theatre, in repertory, Geary Theater: The Rose Tattoo, Hadrian VII, St. Joan, and Oedipus Rex; Marines Memorial Theatre: Little Malcolm and His Struggle Against the Eunuchs, by David Halliwell, The Blood Knot, by Athol Fugard, and The Importance of Being Earnest.

SARASOTA. Asolo State Theater Company, in repertory: Misalliance, Oh Dad, Poor Dad, Mamma's Hung You in the Closet and I'm Feelin' So Sad, Doctor Faustus, and A Flea in Her Ear.

WASHINGTON, D.C. Arena Stage: No Place to Be Somebody, May 28-July 5.

Washington Theater Club: Continental Divide, by Oliver Hailey, May 25-26.

Television Highlights

Monday, May 25

Now: Women's Liberation. A documentary explores the movement's attitudes, goals, and operation (ABC: 10:30-11 p.m., EDT).

Tuesday, May 26

60 Minutes. Tricia Nixon takes viewers on a tour of the family living quarters on the second floor of the White House (CBS: 10-11 p.m., EDT).

Wednesday, May 27

Project 20: The Shining Mountains. The story of the Rocky Mountains is told through vintage still photography and new and old motion pictures (NBC: 10-11 p.m., EDT).

Sunday, May 31

The Glen Campbell Goodtime Hour. Singer Dionne Warwick, the 5th Dimension, comedienne Ruth Buzzi, and comic John Byner are guests (CBS: 9-10 p.m., EDT).

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000

AUG 15 1970

The Summer Circuit

COCO—At the Mark Hellinger—Following Katharine Hepburn in a role is like marching down Main Street on the Fifth of July. The unnerving position has been courageously assumed by Danielle Darrieux, and it's a pleasure to report that she is a delight. Miss Darrieux acts with authority, carries off her singing assignments with sweet aplomb, and communicates a personal charm that creates a good deal of sympathy for the dramatically unlikely character of Parisian couturiere Gabrielle "Coco" Chanel. Ironically, it is the French star's inherent womanly grace and graciousness which inhibits her in the role; one can never quite believe that this radiant creature is capable of the ambition, drive and altogether formidable personality traits of the legendary grande dame of the fashion world. The rest of the original cast still prevails—Rene Auberjonois, with a vengeance—and among them, George Rose ascends an actor's Mont St. Michel with his superb characterization of a sage boulevardier. —MARILYN STASIO

MOSTLY MOZART FESTIVAL—At Philharmonic Hall—Anything that is mostly Mozart must be mostly good, and when what makes up the remaining portions of gala programs continuing through Aug. 29 is by Haydn and Schubert, things are likely to be all to the good. Much of the good was to be heard in the midweek repeat of the premiere, which I attended. With relaxed confidence and a nice sense of balances, Werner Torkanowsky conducted an assemblage called—for this occasion—the New York Chamber Orchestra. The soloists in the Mozart pieces were Peter Serkin with the Piano Concerto No. 18 and violinist Gerald Tarack and violist David Schwartz with the K. 364 Sinfonia Concertante. The latter and great work has been offered by others with more conviction and personality; the soloists rarely asserted themselves although the orchestral texture was, if anything, too deferential to their dual song. Mr. Serkin, for his part, displayed his typical abstract verve in a reading of the concerto that was cool in the old and "now" sense of the word. Although the Andante movement seemed rather detached from its inherent lyricism, the first and third movements had sinew and sparkled with flair and agility. Mr. Torkanowsky and his musicians acquitted themselves more than honorably with a Schubert Overture in D and with a somewhat too reverent rendition of Haydn's grandly expansive "London" Symphony No. 104. Some of Haydn's color and crispness and splendor was dissipated, but enough remained to rouse patrons to delirious applause. —GREER JOHNSON

IVAN REBROFF—At Philharmonic Hall—This basso's voice sinks deeper than Fafner's in the cavern, but it's musically no deeper than a saucer. He scoops outrageously; his phrasing is primitive; his resonance, when perceptible, is nasal. In classical arias, he flounders like a beached whale. In Russian folk songs, his technique is European music-hall. His touted three-octave range is a broken triad consisting of a spooky crooned falsetto, a secure mid-baritone, and a gruff, burpy bass like falsetto with stripped gears. He also favors smugly protracted spoken "comedy." His highly publicized concert drew hordes of the curious and the already-addicted. —G. J.

MOVIES IN THE PARK—At Damrosch Park—The only way to improve on this unusually fine summer's-night outdoor film presentation would be to air-condition the parks. The program, a series of nine short subjects, is breezy enough, however, to keep perspiring New Yorkers delighted and cool. The suburbs may have their Drive-ins, but we now have a Stroll-in theatre, thanks to the New York City Department of Cultural Affairs and The Film Society of Lincoln Center. The films, ranging in time from five to 20 minutes, cover a wide variety of subjects from a documentary on belly-dancers in Manhattan to the sex act with street signs (DETOUR — NO ENTRY — STOP). Many of the films have been seen elsewhere. I caught Dan Rosenwein's hilariously campy "Mean to Me" at the New York Film Festival last year and "Expressway to Our Heart," Marc Stone's ingenious road map to lovemaking, was shown at the N.Y.U. Students Film Festival. Walter Reade has donated a whimsical tale about a Jewish genie, "Shut Up, I'm Crying," which should be shown commercially. And this happy outdoor event should become an annual one. —DONALD J. MAYERSON

TANGLEWOOD/BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL—At Lenox, Mass.—Ludwig van Beethoven, who was born in the year 1770, may possibly have been the greatest composer who ever lived, but he certainly was not the most prolific, especially when it comes to orchestral works. But since Beethoven and Box Office are virtually synonymous, the two dozen symphonies, concertos, and overtures are being worked near to death in this bicentennial year. Tanglewood is paying its obeisances with two three-day-weekend series of all-Beethoven programs. The Sunday afternoon concert on the first of these weekends was a typical example of the Tanglewood pattern. One overture, the Egmont. One piano concerto, the Third. One symphony, the Seventh. One veteran conductor, Antal Dorati. And one brilliant pianist, Vladimir Ashkenazy. Blend and stir lightly, and you have a lovely afternoon of fine performances of acknowledged masterworks. But one cannot help wondering if Dorati's dynamic Egmont or Ashkenazy's lyric, introspective playing of the concerto's middle movement would not have been more stirring in less echoing surroundings. —STANLEY NEWMAN

PHOENIX
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
WEEKLY 15,000

JUN 20 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood's Summer

By Laura Shapiro

It's almost Tanglewood time, and much as I hate to let any reference to the patriarch of music festivals slip by without accusing it of going commercial, I must say this season looks awfully good. For once the BSO is taking advantage of the fact that thousands of people are going to turn up at Tanglewood no matter what is programmed by programming a lot of different and exciting material. There's no dearth of crowd-pleasers, to be sure — two solid weekends of Beethoven, lots of Mozart including the complete "Cosi fan tutte," most of the "safe" Stravinsky — but almost every weekend is sprinkled with the esoteric: Ligeti, Schoenberg, Xenakis, Krenek.

Credit for the festival's new look goes mainly to Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, artistic directors for Tanglewood, and to Leonard Bernstein who acted as advisor. It's an incredible trio of musical minds. Ozawa will be conducting eight programs, Bernstein and Schuller will each take one, William Steinberg will conduct the Beethoven events, and Michael Tilson Thomas will have two concerts. Guest conductors for the remaining programs include Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, Aaron Copland, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard and Charles Mackerras.

A few of the high points this summer, I think, will come with Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms" (July 3), the Schoenberg piano concerto with Peter Serkin (July 12), Yuji Takahashi playing Xenakis' "Eonta" (July 17), Bethany Beardslee singing Krenek's "Die Nachtigall" (July 19), Michael Tilson Thomas's "La Mer" (August 8), Szymanowski's violin concerto no. 1 with Paul Zukofsky (August 21), and the final concert, conducted by Ozawa in memory of Charles Munch, which will be the Berlioz Requiem. Oh, there's other good stuff, too: Jules Eskin is playing the Dvorak cello concerto on August 9, but then you have to sit through the Shostakovich Fifth, and it's a hot Sunday afternoon. Britten's Serenade for tenor, horn and strings will be performed by John Alexander and James Stagliano on July 17; and Beethoven days are the weekends of July 31 and August 14.

Elsewhere in the summer we find the Contemporary Trends series, five concerts of what Dan Gustin, Assistant Administrator for the Berkshire Music Center, calls "Non-Classical Events — You Know What I Mean." Labels, he explained to me, are terribly offensive to most concert managers. You can't call jazz or rock "non-serious," you can't even call jazz Jazz. Contemporary Trends is the Center's not-too-catchy phrase but it means what it says. At Tanglewood the emphasis will be on significant music of all kinds, by people who are, you should pardon the expression, really into something heavy. They're not grinding our entertainment as a commercial product — what Stravinsky called "silence pollution" — they're doing something meaningful and setting the highest standards with it. Dan mentioned that Arthur Fiedler used to say there was no such thing, ultimately, as classical and popular music, there was just good music and bad music.

So Tanglewood will never turn into an outdoor night club, unlike some of the other festivals, which have been featuring such fare as Dinah Shore, Tony Bennett, and Rowan and Martin's Laugh-In. The Trends concerts this season will be in two parts, referred to in the BMC office as mini and maxi. The maxis will consist of three big concerts in the Shed, all presentations from the Fillmore, on Tuesday nights July 7 and 21 and August 18. The minis will take place in the Theatre on two Tuesdays, July 14 and August 4. These will be slightly more avant-garde in terms of this type of music, with artists somewhat lesser known or with less popular appeal. The programs will be primarily of jazz in all forms, from Ornette Coleman to gospel singing.

The Festival of Contemporary Music is another Tanglewood spectacular, this year running from August 16 to 21. Four pieces have been commissioned by the BMC in cooperation with the Fromm Foundation, three by American composers Barbara Kolb, Richard Feliciano and Olly Wilson, and one by the Swiss composer Jurg Wyttenbach.

The Berkshire Music Center will enjoy a much enlarged instrumental conducting program, underwritten by the National Orchestra Association. Enough instrumentalists will be around to form a full orchestra, a separate chamber orchestra, and still seperate chamber ensembles, so the students will rotate from one group to another all summer. This makes possible a much more flexible repertoire. One of the BMC's major events will be the American premiere of Luigi Nono's "Il Canto Sospeso," for soloists, orchestra and chorus, which Gunther Schuller will conduct and the BMC orchestra will play.

The students will take part in another new plan this summer: open BMC rehearsals — actually sightreadings — with the current Festival conductor, who will lead the orchestra through the pieces he is preparing with the BSO, pausing to comment to the audience as well as the orchestra. These will take place on Thursday nights. The first is July 2, with Leonard Bernstein. Still one more treat: Lukas Foss will give a special concert of contemporary music, his own and other people's, on July 30.

Opening Excercises for Tanglewood will be held on Sunday afternoon, June 28. This is a fairly genteel event but not bad fun. Bernstein will speak and then Ralph Gomberg, Sherman Walt and Gilbert Kalish will play the Poulenc Piano Concerto. ■

PRESS
BRISTOL, CONN.
(E) 17,055

JUN 27 1970 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Festival Concerts

The 1970 Tanglewood Season opens on Sunday, at 2:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall with the 30th anniversary Opening Excercises of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy at Tanglewood. Leonard Bernstein, an alumnus of the Berkshire Music Center and newly appointed Advisor to Tanglewood, will deliver the principle address.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its first Berkshire Festival concert on Friday, July 3 at 9 p.m., under the direction of Seiji Ozawa. Ozawa and Gunther Schuller Artistic Directors of Tanglewood. The program opens with Bernstein's Chichester Psalms, with boy soprano Robert Puleo, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Ligeti's Atmospheres follows, and the program closes with Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique.

Saturday, July 4 at 8:30 p.m., Mr. Ozawa conducts Mozart's Overture to The Marriage of Figaro and Symphony no. 36 Linz, and Stravinsky's Violin concerto and The Firebird Suite. Joseph Silverstein, the Orchestra's Concertmaster, will be soloist in the Stravinsky concerto.

On Sunday, July 5 at 2:30 p.m., Leonard Bernstein will conduct. The program consists of a single work, Mahler's Symphony no. 2, Resurrection. Sopranos Lorna Haywood and Christa Ludwig will be soloists along with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

The weekend programs begin on Friday, July 3 at 7 p.m. in the Tanglewood Music Shed when Richard and Rose Taylor perform a program of Mahler Songs. These concerts, 7 p.m. each Friday, two hours before the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, present guest artists and members of the Orchestra in short recitals, at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

The first of the Open Rehearsals, for the benefit of the BSO's Pension Fund, will take place Saturday morning, July 4 at 10:30 a.m. in the Music Shed. Seats for the Open Rehearsals are unreserved and go on sale the morning of the rehearsal.

During the week of June 28, the Berkshire Music Centr will present a Faculty Recital, (Tuesday June 30 at 8:30 p.m.), an Open Rehearsal of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra conducted by Leonard Bernstein (Thursday evening July 2 at 8:30 p.m.) and a program of Chamber Music (Sunday July 5 at 10 a.m.).

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,516

JUN 25 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Season Opens On Sunday

The 1970 Tanglewood Season opens on Sunday, June 28 at 2:30 pm in the Theatre Concert Hall with the 30th anniversary Opening Exercises of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy at Tanglewood.

Leonard Bernstein, an alumnus of the Berkshire Music Center and newly appointed Advisor to Tanglewood, will deliver the principle address.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its first Berkshire Festival concert on Friday, July 3 at 9 pm, under the direction of Seiji Ozawa. Ozawa and Gunther Schuller are Artistic Directors of Tanglewood.

On Sunday, July 5 a

On Sunday, July 5 at 2:30 pm. Leonard Bernstein will conduct. The program consists of a single work, Mahler's Symphony no. 2,- Ressurection. Sopranos Lorna Haywood and Christa Ludwig will be soloists along with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

Nathan C. Hubley Jr.

he received his degree in Business Administration. Following graduation, Hubley joined Carter's as a clerk in the Accounting Department. He was successively appointed Auditor, General Accountant, Assistant Treasurer, Clerk, Vice President and General Manager, and President. Hubley is a resident of Lexington where he is active in both church and civic affairs.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUL 15 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Is Tops

Tanglewood perfectly blends the beauty of music with that of the New England countryside.

The venerable music festival, located at Lenox in the Berkshires, has many headaches — rain, rising deficits and ever-changing competition. But, as John F. Kyes pointed out in The Evening Gazette, Tanglewood keeps trying. It has not been made inflexible with tradition.

The basic fare is classical music by members of the Boston Symphony (thereby providing year-around employment). But Arthur Fiedler and The Boston Pops perform in a lighter vein and the new "Contemporary Trends" concerts have been big draws with the younger crowd.

The 1970 repertory features six Beethoven commemorative concerts and a host of guest conductors. Variety is the keyword.

Anyone with a yen for fine music should plan to spend a summer day at the great music shed and the broad rolling lawns of Tanglewood. It is an institution that deserves support for the pleasure it has brought to countless thousands.

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000

AUG 15 1970

The Summer Circuit

COCO—At the Mark Hellinger—Following Katharine Hepburn in a role is like marching down Main Street on the Fifth of July. The unnerving position has been courageously assumed by Danielle Darrieux, and it's a pleasure to report that she is a delight. Miss Darrieux acts with authority, carries off her singing assignments with sweet aplomb, and communicates a personal charm that creates a good deal of sympathy for the dramatically unlikely character of Parisian couturiere Gabrielle "Coco" Chanel. Ironically, it is the French star's inherent womanly grace and graciousness which inhibits her in the role; one can never quite believe that this radiant creature is capable of the ambition, drive and altogether formidable personality traits of the legendary grande dame of the fashion world. The rest of the original cast still prevails—Rene Auberjonois, with a vengeance—and among them, George Rose ascends an actor's Mont St. Michel with his superb characterization of a sage boulevardier. —MARILYN STASIO

MOSTLY MOZART FESTIVAL—At Philharmonic Hall—Anything that is mostly Mozart must be mostly good, and when what makes up the remaining portions of gala programs continuing through Aug. 29 is by Haydn and Schubert, things are likely to be all to the good. Much of the good was to be heard in the midweek repeat of the premiere, which I attended. With relaxed confidence and a nice sense of balances, Werner Torkanowsky conducted an assemblage called—for this occasion—the New York Chamber Orchestra. The soloists in the Mozart pieces were Peter Serkin with the Piano Concerto No. 18 and violinist Gerald Tarack and violist David Schwartz with the K. 364 Sinfonia Concertante. The latter and great work has been offered by others with more conviction and personality; the soloists rarely asserted themselves although the orchestral texture was, if anything, too deferential to their dual song. Mr. Serkin, for his part, displayed his typical abstract verve in a reading of the concerto that was cool in the old and "now" sense of the word. Although the Andante movement seemed rather detached from its inherent lyricism, the first and third movements had sinew and sparkled with flair and agility. Mr. Torkanowsky and his musicians acquitted themselves more than honorably with a Schubert Overture in D and with a somewhat too reverent rendition of Haydn's grandly expansive "London" Symphony No. 104. Some of Haydn's color and crispness and splendor was dissipated, but enough remained to rouse patrons to delirious applause. —GREER JOHNSON

IVAN REBROFF—At Philharmonic Hall—This basso's voice sinks deeper than Fafner's in the cavern, but it's musically no deeper than a saucer. He scoops outrageously; his phrasing is primitive; his resonance, when perceptible, is nasal. In classical arias, he flounders like a beached whale. In Russian folk songs, his technique is European music-hall. His touted three-octave range is a broken triad consisting of a spooky crooned falsetto, a secure mid-baritone, and a gruff, burpy bass like falsetto with stripped gears. He also favors smugly protracted spoken "comedy." His highly publicized concert drew hordes of the curious and the already-addicted. —G. J.

MOVIES IN THE PARK—At Damrosch Park—The only way to improve on this unusually fine summer's-night outdoor film presentation would be to air-condition the parks. The program, a series of nine short subjects, is breezy enough, however, to keep perspiring New Yorkers delighted and cool. The suburbs may have their Drive-ins, but we now have a Stroll-in theatre, thanks to the New York City Department of Cultural Affairs and The Film Society of Lincoln Center. The films, ranging in time from five to 20 minutes, cover a wide variety of subjects from a documentary on belly-dancers in Manhattan to the sex act with street signs (DETOUR — NO ENTRY — STOP). Many of the films have been seen elsewhere. I caught Dan Rosenwein's hilariously campy "Mean to Me" at the New York Film Festival last year and "Expressway to Our Heart," Marc Stone's ingenious road map to lovemaking, was shown at the N.Y.U. Students Film Festival. Walter Reade has donated a whimsical tale about a Jewish genie, "Shut Up, I'm Crying," which should be shown commercially. And this happy outdoor event should become an annual one. —DONALD J. MAYERSON

TANGLEWOOD/BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL—At Lenox, Mass.—Ludwig van Beethoven, who was born in the year 1770, may possibly have been the greatest composer who ever lived, but he certainly was not the most prolific, especially when it comes to orchestral works. But since Beethoven and Box Office are virtually synonymous, the two dozen symphonies, concertos, and overtures are being worked near to death in this bicentennial year. Tanglewood is paying its obeisances with two three-day-weekend series of all-Beethoven programs. The Sunday afternoon concert on the first of these weekends was a typical example of the Tanglewood pattern. One overture, the Egmont. One piano concerto, the Third. One symphony, the Seventh. One veteran conductor, Antal Dorati. And one brilliant pianist, Vladimir Ashkenazy. Blend and stir lightly, and you have a lovely afternoon of fine performances of acknowledged masterworks. But one cannot help wondering if Dorati's dynamic Egmont or Ashkenazy's lyric, introspective playing of the concerto's middle movement would not have been more stirring in less echoing surroundings. —STANLEY NEWMAN

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUL 15 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Is Tops

Tanglewood perfectly blends the beauty of music with that of the New England countryside.

The venerable music festival, located at Lenox in the Berkshires, has many headaches — rain, rising deficits and ever-changing competition. But, as John F. Kyes pointed out in The Evening Gazette, Tanglewood keeps trying. It has not been made inflexible with tradition.

The basic fare is classical music by members of the Boston Symphony (thereby providing year-around employment). But Arthur Fiedler and The Boston Pops perform in a lighter vein and the new "Contemporary Trends" concerts have been big draws with the younger crowd.

The 1970 repertory features six Beethoven commemorative concerts and a host of guest conductors. Variety is the keyword.

Anyone with a yen for fine music should plan to spend a summer day at the great music shed and the broad rolling lawns of Tanglewood. It is an institution that deserves support for the pleasure it has brought to countless thousands.

PHOENIX
CAMBRIDGE, MASS.
WEEKLY

JUN 20 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood's Summer

By Laura Shapiro

It's almost Tanglewood time, and much as I hate to let any reference to the patriarch of music festivals slip by without accusing it of going commercial, I must say this season looks awfully good. For once the BSO is taking advantage of the fact that thousands of people are going to turn up at Tanglewood no matter what is programmed by programming a lot of different and exciting material. There's no dearth of crowd-pleasers, to be sure — two solid weekends of Beethoven, lots of Mozart including the complete "Cosi fan tutte," most of the "safe" Stravinsky — but almost every weekend is sprinkled with the esoteric: Ligeti, Schoenberg, Xenakis, Krenek.

Credit for the festival's new look goes mainly to Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, artistic directors for Tanglewood, and to Leonard Bernstein who acted as advisor. It's an incredible trio of musical minds. Ozawa will be conducting eight programs, Bernstein and Schuller will each take one, William Steinberg will conduct the Beethoven events, and Michael Tilson Thomas will have two concerts. Guest conductors for the remaining programs include Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, Aaron Copland, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard and Charles Mackerras.

A few of the high points this summer, I think, will come with Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms" (July 3), the Schoenberg piano concerto with Peter Serkin (July 12), Yuji Takahashi playing Xenakis' "Eonta" (July 17), Bethany Beardslee singing Krenek's "Die Nachtigall" (July 19), Michael Tilson Thomas's "La Mer" (August 8), Szymanowski's violin concerto no. 1 with Paul Zukofsky (August 21), and the final concert, conducted by Ozawa in memory of Charles Munch, which will be the Berlioz Requiem. Oh, there's other good stuff, too: Jules Eskin is playing the Dvorak cello concerto on August 9, but then you have to sit through the Shostakovich Fifth, and it's a hot Sunday afternoon. Britten's Serenade for tenor, horn and strings will be performed by John Alexander and James Stagliano on July 17; and Beethoven days are the weekends of July 31 and August 14.

Elsewhere in the summer we find the Contemporary Trends series, five concerts of what Dan Gustin, Assistant Administrator for the Berkshire Music Center, calls "Non-Classical Events — You Know What I Mean." Labels, he explained to me, are terribly offensive to most concert managers. You can't call jazz or rock "non-serious," you can't even call jazz Jazz. Contemporary Trends is the Center's not-too-catchy phrase but it means what it says. At Tanglewood the emphasis will be on significant music of all kinds, by people who are, you should pardon the expression, really into something heavy. They're not grinding our entertainment as a commercial product — what Stravinsky called "silence pollution" — they're doing something meaningful and setting the highest standards with it. Dan mentioned that Arthur Fiedler used to say there was no such thing, ultimately, as classical and popular music, there was just good music and bad music.

So Tanglewood will never turn into an outdoor night club, unlike some of the other festivals, which have been featuring such fare as Dinah Shore, Tony Bennett, and Rowan and Martin's Laugh-In. The Trends concerts this season will be in two parts, referred to in the BMC office as mini and maxi. The maxis will consist of three big concerts in the Shed, all presentations from the Fillmore, on Tuesday nights July 7 and 21 and August 18. The minis will take place in the Theatre on two Tuesdays, July 14 and August 4. These will be slightly more avant-garde in terms of this type of music, with artists somewhat lesser known or with less popular appeal. The programs will be primarily of jazz in all forms, from Ornette Coleman to gospel singing.

The Festival of Contemporary Music is another Tanglewood spectacular, this year running from August 16 to 21. Four pieces have been commissioned by the BMC in cooperation with the Fromm Foundation, three by American composers Barbara Kolb, Richard Feliciano and Olly Wilson, and one by the Swiss composer Jurg Wyttenbach.

The Berkshire Music Center will enjoy a much enlarged instrumental conducting program, underwritten by the National Orchestra Association. Enough instrumentalists will be around to form a full orchestra, a separate chamber orchestra, and still seperate chamber ensembles, so the students will rotate from one group to another all summer. This makes possible a much more flexible repertoire. One of the BMC's major events will be the American premiere of Luigi Nono's "Il Canto Sospeso," for soloists, orchestra and chorus, which Gunther Schuller will conduct and the BMC orchestra will play.

The students will take part in another new plan this summer: open BMC rehearsals — actually sightreadings — with the current Festival conductor, who will lead the orchestra through the pieces he is preparing with the BSO, pausing to comment to the audience as well as the orchestra. These will take place on Thursday nights. The first is July 2, with Leonard Bernstein. Still one more treat: Lukas Foss will give a special concert of contemporary music, his own and other people's, on July 30.

Opening Excercises for Tanglewood will be held on Sunday afternoon, June 28. This is a fairly genteel event but not bad fun. Bernstein will speak and then Ralph Gomberg, Sherman Walt and Gilbert Kalish will play the Poulenc Piano Concerto. ■

FENCE VIEWER
SUDBURY, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,516

JUN 25 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Season Opens On Sunday

The 1970 Tanglewood Season opens on Sunday, June 28 at 2:30 pm in the Theatre Concert Hall with the 30th anniversary Opening Exercises of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy at Tanglewood.

Leonard Bernstein, an alumnus of the Berkshire Music Center and newly appointed Advisor to Tanglewood, will deliver the principle address.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its first Berkshire Festival concert on Friday, July 3 at 9 pm, under the direction of Seiji Ozawa. Ozawa and Gunther Schuller are Artistic Directors of Tanglewood.

On Sunday, July 5 a

On Sunday, July 5 at 2:30 pm. Leonard Bernstein will conduct. The program consists of a single work, Mahler's Symphony no. 2,- Ressurection. Sopranos Lorna Haywood and Christa Ludwig will be soloists along with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

Nathan C. Hubley Jr.

he received his degree in Business Administration. Following graduation, Hubley joined Carter's as a clerk in the Accounting Department. He was successively appointed Auditor, General Accountant, Assistant Treasurer, Clerk, Vice President and General Manager, and President. Hubley is a resident of Lexington where he is active in both church and civic affairs.

PRESS
BRISTOL, CONN.
(E) 17,055

JUN 27 1970 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Festival Concerts

The 1970 Tanglewood Season opens on Sunday, at 2:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall with the 30th anniversary Opening Excercises of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy at Tanglewood. Leonard Bernstein, an alumnus of the Berkshire Music Center and newly appointed Advisor to Tanglewood, will deliver the principle address.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its first Berkshire Festival concert on Friday, July 3 at 9 p.m., under the direction of Seiji Ozawa. Ozawa and Gunther Schuller Artistic Directors of Tanglewood. The program opens with Bernstein's Chichester Psalms, with boy soprano Robert Puleo, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Ligeti's Atmospheres follows, and the program closes with Berlioz' Symphonie Fantastique.

Saturday, July 4 at 8:30 p.m., Mr. Ozawa conducts Mozart's Overture to The Marriage of Figaro and Symphony no. 36 Linz, and Stravinsky's Violin concerto and The Firebird Suite. Joseph Silverstein, the Orchestra's Concertmaster, will be soloist in the Stravinsky concerto.

On Sunday, July 5 at 2:30 p.m., Leonard Bernstein will conduct. The program consists of a single work, Mahler's Symphony no. 2, Resurrection. Sopranos Lorna Haywood and Christa Ludwig will be soloists along with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

The weekend programs begin on Friday, July 3 at 7 p.m. in the Tanglewood Music Shed when Richard and Rose Taylor perform a program of Mahler Songs. These concerts, 7 p.m. each Friday, two hours before the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, present guest artists and members of the Orchestra in short recitals, at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

The first of the Open Rehearsals, for the benefit of the BSO's Pension Fund, will take place Saturday morning, July 4 at 10:30 a.m. in the Music Shed. Seats for the Open Rehearsals are unreserved and go on sale the morning of the rehearsal.

During the week of June 28, the Berkshire Music Centr will present a Faculty Recital, (Tuesday June 30 at 8:30 p.m.), an Open Rehearsal of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra conducted by Leonard Bernstein (Thursday evening July 2 at 8:30 p.m.) and a program of Chamber Music (Sunday July 5 at 10 a.m.).

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450

JUN 25 1970

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood opens June 28

The 1970 Tanglewood Season opens on Sunday, June 28 at 2:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall with the 30th anniversary Opening Excercises of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy at Tanglewood. Leonard Bernstein, an alumnus of the Berkshire Music Center and newly appointed Advisor to Tanglewood, will deliver the principle address.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its first Berkshire Festival concert on Friday, July 3 at 9 p.m., under the direction of Seiji Ozawa. Ozawa and Gunther Schuller are Artistic Directors of Tanglewood. The program opens th Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms," with boy soprano Robert Puleo, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Ligeti's "Atmospheres" follows, and the program closes with Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique."

Saturday, July 4 at 8:30 p.m., Mr. Ozawa conducts Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and Symphony No. 36 "Lin," AND Stravinsky's Violin concerto and "The Firebird Suite." Joseph Silverstein, the Orchestra's Concertmaster, will be soloist in the Stravinsky concerto.

On Sunday, July 5 at 2:30 p.m., Leonard Bernstein will conduct. The program consists of a single work, Mahler's Symphony No. 2, "Resurrection." Sopranos Lorna Haywood and Christa Ludwig will be soloists along with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

The weekend programs begin on Friday, July 3 at 7 p.m. in the Tanglewood Music Shed when Richard and Rose Taylor perform a program of Mahler Songs. These concerts, 7 p.m. each Friday, two hours before the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, present guest artists and members of the Orchestra in short recitals, at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

The first of the Open Rehearsals, for the Benefit of the BSO's Pension Fund, will take place Saturday morning, July 4 at 10:30 a.m. in the Music Shed. Seats for the Open Rehearsals are unreserved and go on sale the morning of the rehearsal.

During the week of June 28, the Berkshire Music Center will present a Faculty Recital, (Tuesday June 30 at 8:30 p.m.), an Open Rehearsal of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra conducted by Leonard Bernstein (Thursday evening July 2 at 8:30 P.M.(AND A PROGRAM OF AChamber Music (Sunday July 5 at 10 a.m.).

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Albany Knickerbocker News
Tuesday, June 16, 1970

TALKING IT OVER—Gunther Schuller, left, discusses with Erich Leinsdorf his duties as director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, which Schuller inherited upon Leinsdorf's retirement.

At Tanglewood

It's Conductors' Season

LENOX, Mass.—Seiji Ozawa will conduct the performance of Leonard Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms" as the Boston Symphony opens its 36th season at Tanglewood on July 3.

Also serving as guest conductor the opening weekend will be Bernstein himself.

Williams Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six all-Beethoven concerts that will mark the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth.

ALSO SCHEDULED TO serve as guest conductors are Gunther Schuller, who will assume Erich Leinsdorf's job of director of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood's offic al title, Michael Tilson Thomas, Aaron Copland, Rafael Fruebeck de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard and Charles Mackerras.

The schedule is as follows: (performances begin 9 a.m. on Friday, 8:30 on Saturdays and 2:30 p.m. on Sundays):

Soloists scheduled to perform with the orchestra this summer include:

Pianists—Andre Watts, Rudolk Firkusny, Christoph Eschenbach, Claude Franck, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Peter Serkin, Yuji Takahasi, Alexis Weissenberg, Gary Graffman, Richard Goode.

Singers—Phyllis Curtin, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, Tom Krause, Christa Ludwig, Thomas Paul, George Shirley, Bethany Beardslee, William Cochran, Roslind Elias, Ezio Flagello, Lorna Haywood, Leopold Simoneau, Gwendolin Sims and Teresa Stratas.

Choruses—Chorus Pro Musica, Harvard Glee Club, Framingham Choral Society, MIT horus, Radcliffe horal Society, St. John's ollege hoir, the Berkshire Boy hoir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Bernstein will conduct on Sunday, July 5, Mahler's "Symphony No. 2." Among other highlights of the season:

JULY 11—Seiji Ozawa, conductor, Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte" with Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Strata, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause and Ezio Flagello.

JULY 12—Seiji Ozawa, conductor. Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet" Schoenberg's "Piano Concerto" featuring Peter Serkin, and Russo's "Three pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra" featuring the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

JULY 17—Seiji Ozawa, conductor. Haydn "Symphony No. 86,' Xenakis "Eonta" with pianist Yuji Takasashi, Britten's "Seranade for tenor, horn and strings" with tenor John Alexander and James Stagliano, horn, Ibert "Divertissement."

JULY 31—William Steinberg, conductor. An all-Beethoven program including the "Leonore Overture No. 3." "Piano Concerto No. 2" with Claude Frank and Symphony No. 8.

AUG. 1—William Steinberg, conductor. An all-Beethoven program with the Egmont Overture, the Piano Concerto No. 3 wioth Vladimir Ashkenazy and the Symphny No. 7.

AUG. 15—William Steinberg, conductor. An all-Beethoven program with Choral Fantasy featuring Jerome Lowenthal and Symphony No. 9 (Choral) with Gwendolin Sims, Eunice Alberts, William Cochran, Thomas Paul, the Chorus Pro Musica and the Tanglewood Festival horus.

AUG. 16—William Steinberg, conductor. An all-Beethoven program with Consecration of the House overture, Piano Concerto No. 1 with Jerome Lowenthal and the Symphony No. 5.

AUG. 21—Gunther Schuller, conductor. Weber's "Der Freischutz overture, Szymanowski's "Violin Concerto No. 1" featuring Paul Zukofsky, Schuller's "Spectra," and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

AUG. 22—Seiji Ozawa, conductor. Lutoslawski's "Concerto for Orchestra," Rachmaninoff's "Piano Concerto No. 3" with Alex Weissenberg and Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra."

AUG. 23—Seiji Ozawa, conductor. Berlioz 'requiem" featuring Leopold Simoneau, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Framingham Choral Society, MIT Chorus.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUN 25 1970

New England Newsclip

SEIJI OZAWA . . . one of Tanglewood's Artistic Directors, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two concerts on the first weekend of the Festival, July 3 and 4. Mr. Ozawa will conduct a program of Mozart and Stravinsky. Joseph Sil- Psalms" Friday evening at 9 p.m. On Saturday at 8:30 p.m. he will conduct o program of Mozart and Stravinsky. Joseph Silverstein is soloist for Stravinsky's "Violin Concerto."

Tanglewood Concerts Begin July 3; Ozawa to Conduct

The 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens Friday evening July 3 with a program conducted by Seiji Ozawa, one of Tanglewood's Artistic Directors. Mr. Ozawa conducts two concerts on the first weekend of the Festival. The third is conducted by Leonard Bernstein, Advisor to Tanglewood and Laureate Conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Mr. Bernstein's concert is devoted entirely to Mahler's Symphony no. 2, "Resurrection."

William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony, conducts six all-Beethoven concerts this summer, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Mr. Steinberg will conduct all three concerts of the fifth and seventh weekends, July 31, Aug. 1 and 2, and Aug. 14, 15, 16.

The season's conductors include Gunther Schuller, also an Artistic Director of Tanglewood, Michael Tilson Thomas, whose appointment as Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony takes effect at Tanglewood this summer, as well as Aaron Copland, Rafael Fruebeck de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard, and Charles Mackerras. The Tanglewood season opens this Sunday, June 28, the Sunday before the Berkshire Festival opening, when Leonard Bernstein, an alumnus of the first class of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940, delivers the opening address on the 30th anniversary of the BMC's first Opening Exercises. The public is invited to the ceremony at 2:30 p.m. in the Theater/Concert Hall at Tanglewood. During that week, Mr. Bernstein will work with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. On Thursday evening, July 2, he will conduct the BMC Orchestra and vocal soloists in a concert performance of the first act of Wagner's "Die Walkuere."

Pianists appearing with the Boston Symphony this summer are Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenbach, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuji Takahashi, Andre Watts, and Alexis Weissenberg.

Violinists are Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky.

Other soloists include Jules Eskin, cello; James Stagliano, horn; and Gervase de Peyer, clarinet.

Singers at this summer's Berkshire Festival concerts are Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, Bethany Beardslee, William Cochran, Phyllis Curtin, Rosalind Elias, Ezio Flagello, Lorna Haywood, Tom Krause, Christa Ludwig, Thomas Paul, George Shirley, Leopold Simoneau, Gwendolin Sims, and Teresa Stratas.

Choruses to be heard include Berkshire Boy Choir, Chorus Pro Musica, Harvard Glee Club, Framingham Choral Society, M.I.T. Chorus, Radcliffe Choral Society, St. John's College Choir, Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Also performing will be the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

The 1970 Berkshire Festival ends on Sunday afternoon Aug. 23 with a performance of the Berlioz "Requiem" conducted by Seiji Ozawa in memory of Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony from 1949 until 1962.

FREE PRESS
MELROSE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,000

M 28 1970

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Announces Plans For Tanglewood Festival

The 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens Friday evening July 3 with a program conducted by Seiji Ozawa, one of Tanglewood's artistic directors. Mr. Ozawa conducts two concerts on the first weekend of the Festival. The third is conducted by Leonard Bernstein, Advisor to Tanglewood and Laureate Conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Mr. Bernstein's concert is devoted entirely to Mahler's Symphony no. 2, 'Resurrection.'

William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony, conducts six all-Beethoven concerts this summer, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Mr. Steinberg will conduct all three concerts of the fifth and seventh weekends, July 31, Aug. 1 and 2, and Aug. 14, 15 16.

The Tanglewood season opens Sunday June 28, the Sunday before the Berkshire Festival opening, when Leonard Bernstein, an alumnus of the first class of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940, delivers the opening address on the 30th anniversary of the BMC's first Opening Exercises. The public is invited to the ceremony at 2:30 p.m. in the Theater Concert Hall at Tanglewood. During that week, Mr. Bernstein will work with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. On Thursday evening, July 2, he will conduct the BMC Orchestra and vocal soloists in a concert performance of the first act of Wagner's "Die Walkuere."

The usual distinguished roster of guest artists will appear at concerts throughout the summer.

The 1970 Berkshire Festival ends on Sunday afternoon Aug. 23 with a performance of the Berlioz "Requiem" conducted by Seiji Ozawa in memory of Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony from 1949 until 1962.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

JUN 26 1970

New England Newsclip

Opens July 3

Ozawa to conduct at Tanglewood

LENOX—The 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens Friday evening July 3 with a program conducted by Seiji Ozawa, one of Tanglewood's artistic directors.

Mr. Ozawa conducts two concerts on the first weekend of the Festival. The third is conducted by Leonard Bernstein, advisor to Tanglewood and Laureate Conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Mr. Bernstein's concert is devoted entirely to Mahler's Symphony no. 2, 'Resurrection.'

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, conducts six all-Beethoven concerts this summer, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Mr. Steinberg will conduct all three concerts of the fifth and seventh weekends, July 31, Aug. 1 and 2, and Aug. 14, 15, 16.

The Tanglewood season opens Sunday June 28, the Sunday before the Berkshire Festival opening, when Leonard Bernstein, an alumnus of the first class of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940, delivers the opening address on the 30th anniversary of the BMC's first Opening Exercises. The public is invited to the ceremony at 2.30 p.m. in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood. During that week, Mr. Bernstein will work with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. On Thursday evening, July 2, he will conduct the BMC Orchestra and vocal soloists in a concert performance of the first act of Wagner's Die Walkuere.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450

JUN 25 1970

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood opens June 28

The 1970 Tanglewood Season opens on Sunday, June 28 at 2:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall with the 30th anniversary Opening Excercises of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy at Tanglewood. Leonard Bernstein, an alumnus of the Berkshire Music Center and newly appointed Advisor to Tanglewood, will deliver the principle address.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its first Berkshire Festival concert on Friday, July 3 at 9 p.m., under the direction of Seiji Ozawa. Ozawa and Gunther Schuller are Artistic Directors of Tanglewood. The program opens th Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms," with boy soprano Robert Puleo, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Ligeti's "Atmospheres" follows, and the program closes with Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique."

Saturday, July 4 at 8:30 p.m., Mr. Ozawa conducts Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and Symphony No. 36 "Lin," AND Stravinsky's Violin concerto and "The Firebird Suite." Joseph Silverstein, the Orchestra's Concertmaster, will be soloist in the Stravinsky concerto.

On Sunday, July 5 at 2:30 p.m., Leonard Bernstein will conduct. The program consists of a single work, Mahler's Symphony No. 2, "Resurrection." Sopranos Lorna Haywood and Christa Ludwig will be soloists along with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

The weekend programs begin on Friday, July 3 at 7 p.m. in the Tanglewood Music Shed when Richard and Rose Taylor perform a program of Mahler Songs. These concerts, 7 p.m. each Friday, two hours before the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, present guest artists and members of the Orchestra in short recitals, at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

The first of the Open Rehearsals, for the Benefit of the BSO's Pension Fund, will take place Saturday morning, July 4 at 10:30 a.m. in the Music Shed. Seats for the Open Rehearsals are unreserved and go on sale the morning of the rehearsal.

During the week of June 28, the Berkshire Music Center will present a Faculty Recital, (Tuesday June 30 at 8:30 p.m.), an Open Rehearsal of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra conducted by Leonard Bernstein (Thursday evening July 2 at 8:30 P.M.(AND A PROGRAM OF AChamber Music (Sunday July 5 at 10 a.m.).

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPING
COMPLETE ... RN

The Knickerbocker News
Friday, June 16, 1970

TALKING IT OVER—Gunther Schuller, left, discusses with Erich Leinsdorf his duties as director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, which Schuller inherited upon Leinsdorf's retirement.

At Tanglewood

It's Conductors' Season

LENOX, Mass.—Seiji Ozawa will conduct the performance of Leonard Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms" as the Boston Symphony opens its 36th season at Tanglewood on July 3.

Also serving as guest conductor the opening weekend will be Bernstein himself.

Williams Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six all-Beethoven concerts that will mark the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth.

ALSO SCHEDULED TO serve as guest conductors are Gunther Schuller, who will assume Erich Leinsdorf's job of director of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood's official title, Michael Tilson Thomas, Aaron Copland, Rafael Fruebeck de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard and Charles Mackerras.

The schedule is as follows: (performances begin 9 a.m. on Friday, 8:30 on Saturdays and 2:30 p.m. on Sundays):

Soloists scheduled to perform with the orchestra this summer include:

Pianists—Andre Watts, Rudolk Firkusny, Christoph Eschenbach, Claude Franck, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Peter Serkin, Yuji Takahasi, Alexis Weissenberg, Gary Graffman, Richard Goode.

Singers—Phyllis Curtin, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, Tom Krause, Christa Ludwig, Thomas Paul, George Shirley, Bethany Beardslee, William Cochran, Roslind Elias, Ezio Flagello, Lorna Haywood, Leopold Simoneau, Gwendolin Sims and Teresa Stratas.

Choruses—Chorus Pro Musica, Harvard Glee Club, Framingham Choral Society, MIT horus, Radcliffe horal Society, St. John's ollege hoir, the Berkshire Boy hoir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Bernstein will conduct on Sunday, July 5, Mahler's "Symphony No. 2." Among other highlights of the season:

JULY 11—Seiji Ozawa, conductor, Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte" with Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Strata, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause and Ezio Flagello.

JULY 12—Seiji Ozawa, conductor, Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet" Schoenberg's "Piano Concerto" featuring Peter Serkin, and Russo's "Three pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra" featuring the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

JULY 17—Seiji Ozawa, conductor. Haydn "Symphony No. 86,' Xenakis "Eonta" with pianist Yuji Takasashi, Britten's "Seranade for tenor, horn and strings" with tenor John Alexander and James Stagliano, horn, Ibert "Divertissement."

JULY 31—William Steinberg, conductor. An all-Beethoven program including the "Leonore Overture No. 3." "Piano Concerto No. 2" with Claude Frank and Symphony No. 8.

AUG. 1—William Steinberg, conductor. An all-Beethoven program with the Egmont Overture, the Piano Concerto No. 3 wioth Vladimir Ashkenazy and the Symphny No. 7.

AUG. 15—William Steinberg, conductor. An all-Beethoven program with Choral Fantasy featuring Jerome Lowenthal and Symphony No. 9 (Choral) with Gwendolin Sims, Eunice Alberts, William Cochran, Thomas Paul, the Chorus Pro Musica and the Tanglewood Festival horus.

AUG. 16—William Steinberg, conductor. An all-Beethoven program with Consecration of the House overture, Piano Concerto No. 1 with Jerome Lowenthal and the Symphony No. 5.

AUG. 21—Gunther Schuller, conductor. Weber's "Der Freischutz overture, Szymanowski's "Violin Concerto No. 1" featuring Paul Zukofsky, Schuller's "Spectra," and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

AUG. 22—Seiji Ozawa, conductor. Lutoslawski's "Concerto for Orchestra," Rachmaninoff's "Piano Concerto No. 3" with Alex Weissenberg and Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra."

AUG. 23—Seiji Ozawa, conductor. Berlioz 'requiem" featuring Leopold Simoneau, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Framingham Choral Society, MIT Chorus.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUN 25 1970

New England Newsclip

SEIJI OZAWA . . . one of Tanglewood's Artistic Directors, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two concerts on the first weekend of the Festival, July 3 and 4. Mr. Ozawa will conduct a program of Mozart and Stravinsky. Joseph Sil-Psalms" Friday evening at 9 p.m. On Saturday at 8:30 p.m. he will conduct o program of Mozart and Stravinsky. Joseph Silverstein is soloist for Stravinsky's "Violin Concerto."

Tanglewood Concerts Begin July 3; Ozawa to Conduct

The 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens Friday evening July 3 with a program conducted by Seiji Ozawa, one of Tanglewood's Artistic Directors. Mr. Ozawa conducts two concerts on the first weekend of the Festival. The third is conducted by Leonard Bernstein, Advisor to Tanglewood and Laureate Conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Mr. Bernstein's concert is devoted entirely to Mahler's Symphony no. 2, "Resurrection."

William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony, conducts six all-Beethoven concerts this summer, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Mr. Steinberg will conduct all three concerts of the fifth and seventh weekends, July 31, Aug. 1 and 2, and Aug. 14, 15, 16.

The season's conductors include Gunther Schuller, also an Artistic Director of Tanglewood, Michael Tilson Thomas, whose appointment as Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony takes effect at Tanglewood this summer, as well as Aaron Copland, Rafael Fruebeck de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard, and Charles Mackerras. The Tanglewood season opens this Sunday, June 28, the Sunday before the Berkshire Festival opening, when Leonard Bernstein, an alumnus of the first class of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940, delivers the opening address on the 30th anniversary of the BMC's first Opening Exercises. The public is invited to the ceremony at 2:30 p.m. in the Theater/Concert Hall at Tanglewood. During that week, Mr. Bernstein will work with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. On Thursday evening, July 2, he will conduct the BMC Orchestra and vocal soloists in a concert performance of the first act of Wagner's "Die Walkuere."

Pianists appearing with the Boston Symphony this summer are Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenbach, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuji Takahashi, Andre Watts, and Alexis Weissenberg.

Violinists are Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky.

Other soloists include Jules Eskin, cello; James Stagliano, horn; and Gervase de Peyer, clarinet.

Singers at this summer's Berkshire Festival concerts are Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, Bethany Beardslee, William Cochran, Phyllis Curtin, Rosalind Elias, Ezio Flagello, Lorna Haywood, Tom Krause, Christa Ludwig, Thomas Paul, George Shirley, Leopold Simoneau, Gwendolin Sims, and Teresa Stratas.

Choruses to be heard include Berkshire Boy Choir, Chorus Pro Musica, Harvard Glee Club, Framingham Choral Society, M.I.T. Chorus, Radcliffe Choral Society, St. John's College Choir, Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Also performing will be the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

The 1970 Berkshire Festival ends on Sunday afternoon Aug. 23 with a performance of the Berlioz "Requiem" conducted by Seiji Ozawa in memory of Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony from 1949 until 1962.

PRESS
ROSE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,000

1970

New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Announces Plans For Tanglewood Festival

The 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens Friday evening July 3 with a program conducted by Seiji Ozawa, one of Tanglewood's artistic directors. Mr. Ozawa conducts two concerts on the first weekend of the Festival. The third is conducted by Leonard Bernstein, Advisor to Tanglewood and Laureate Conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Mr. Bernstein's concert is devoted entirely to Mahler's Symphony no. 2, 'Resurrection.'

William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony, conducts six all-Beethoven concerts this summer, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Mr. Steinberg will conduct all three concerts of the fifth and seventh weekends July 31, Aug. 1 and 2, and Aug. 14, 15 16.

The Tanglewood season opens Sunday June 28, the Sunday before the Berkshire Festival opening, when Leonard Bernstein, an alumnus of the first class of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940, delivers the opening address on the 30th anniversary of the BMC's first Opening Exercises. The public is invited to the ceremony at 2:30 p.m. in the Theater Concert Hall at Tanglewood. During that week, Mr. Bernstein will work with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. On Thursday evening, July 2, he will conduct the BMC Orchestra and vocal soloists in a concert performance of the first act of Wagner's "Die Walkuere."

The usual distinguished roster of guest artists will appear at concerts throughout the summer.

The 1970 Berkshire Festival ends on Sunday afternoon Aug. 23 with a performance of the Berlioz "Requiem" conducted by Seiji Ozawa in memory of Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony from 1949 until 1962.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

JUN 26 1970

New England Newsclip

Opens July 3

Ozawa to conduct at Tanglewood

LENOX—The 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens Friday evening July 3 with a program conducted by Seiji Ozawa, one of Tanglewood's artistic directors.

Mr. Ozawa conducts two concerts on the first weekend of the Festival. The third is conducted by Leonard Bernstein, advisor to Tanglewood and Laureate Conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Mr. Bernstein's concert is devoted entirely to Mahler's Symphony no. 2, 'Resurrection.'

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, conducts six all-Beethoven concerts this summer, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Mr. Steinberg will conduct all three concerts of the fifth and seventh weekends, July 31, Aug. 1 and 2, and Aug. 14, 15, 16.

The Tanglewood season opens Sunday June 28, the Sunday before the Berkshire Festival opening, when Leonard Bernstein, an alumnus of the first class of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940, delivers the opening address on the 30th anniversary of the BMC's first Opening Exercises. The public is invited to the ceremony at 2.30 p.m. in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood. During that week, Mr. Bernstein will work with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. On Thursday evening, July 2, he will conduct the BMC Orchestra and vocal soloists in a concert performance of the first act of Wagner's Die Walkuere.

Schedule to Run From July 3 to Aug. 23

Busy Summer Ahead for Tanglewood

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS
(E) 94,901

1970 New England Newsclip

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — Tanglewood is very much alive this summer, with a full eight-week schedule of 24 major weekend concerts, from July 3 to Aug. 23, plus five special Tuesday events, and a Festival of Contemporary Music extending from Aug. 16 to Aug. 20.

The list of conductors and soloists seems the longest ever. William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six Beethoven programs. Seiji Ozawa, one of the artistic directors of the 1970 Berkshire Festival, will conduct eight times, and his codirector, Gunther Schuller, and advisor, Leonard Bernstein, will each conduct once, as will Aaron Copland, Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, Alain Lombard, Charles Mackerras, Jorge Mester, and Kenneth Schermerhorn. The BSO's young associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, will direct two concerts.

William Steinberg

All-Gershwin Program

Arthur Fiedler and Boston Pops Orchestra will offer an all-Gershwin program Aug. 11, with Earl Wild, pianist.

Tanglewood-on-Parade, July 28, will climax a day of student presentations with a gala orchestral concert celebrating the 30th anniversary of the Berkshire Music Center and honoring Copland's approaching 70th birthday.

"Contemporary Trends" concerts will bring "Fillmore at Tanglewood" on July 7 and Aug. 18 and Peter, Paul and Mary July 21.

The Tanglewood music shed has been renovated, with entirely new seats, continental seating arrangements, better visibility, increased leg room and wider aisles.

Ticket prices remain in the same range as before, only a few seats in the shed having been revalued slightly.

Bonus Weekend

The Music Center opens Sunday, June 28, and the Festival begins Friday, July 3 with the bonus Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. (a program of Mahler songs) and a concert at 9. Other concerts are at 8:30 Saturday and 2:30 on Sunday.

The first open rehearsal is Saturday morning, July 4 at 10:30, admission $3.

This format of concerts, preludes and rehearsals continues for eight weeks, the final concert on Aug. 23 being a performance of the Berlioz "Requiem" conducted by Ozawa in memory of Charles Munch.

Reserved seats for major concerts range from $3.50 to $8.00 (box seats $8.50) and general gate admission to the lawns for picnicking and outdoor listening may be had for $3.

List of Pianists

In addition to many vocalists and miscellaneous instrumental soloists, the outstanding list of pianists includes: Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenbach, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Richard Goode, Gary Chaffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuji Talahashi, Andre Watts and Alexis Weissenberg.

Choral groups to be heard are: Berkshire Boy Choir, Chorus Pro Musica, Harvard Glee Club, Framingham Choral Society, MIT Chorus, Radcliffe Choral Society, St. John's College Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

A few sampling of unusual programs: Sunday, July 5, Bernstein conducts the Mahler ("Resurrection") Symphony No. 2, with three assisting choruses and two soloists.

Sunday, July 12, Ozawa (in addition to other works) conducts the Boston Symphony and the Corky Siegel Blues Band in three pieces by Russo, and Peter Serkin solos in the Schoenberg Piano Concerto.

Beethoven Programs

Steinberg's Beethoven commemorative programs, replete with symphonies, concertos and overtures, are on July 31, Aug. 1 and 2, Aug. 14, 15 and 16.

Saturday, July 11 Ozawa conducts a concert version of Mozart's opera "Cosi fan tutte," with Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Roselind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause and Ezio Flagello.

Each week several programs presented by the Music Center are open to the Friends of Music at Tanglewood, membership in which is available to the public at a modest fee.

Festival tickets and information may be secured by mail up to June 15 from the ticket office at Symphony Hall, Boston. After June 15, from the ticket office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

TRAVELER
MASS.
305 (S) 298,557

1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood opens July 3

The 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood will open July 3 with a program conducted by Seiji Ozawa, one of Tanglewood's Artistic Directors. Ozawa will also be in charge of the second program Saturday, July 4. The following Sunday will be devoted entirely to a performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 2 ("Resurrection"), under the direction of Leonard Bernstein.

William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony, will direct six all-Beethoven concerts in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. These will take place during the fifth and seventh weekends of the festival.

The season's conductors include Gunther Schuller, also an Artistic Director of the festival, Michael Tilson Thomas, Aaron Copland, Rafael Fruebeck de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard and Charles Mackerras.

Pianists appearing with the Boston Symphony this summer are Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenbach, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuji Takahashi, Andre Watts and Alexis Weissenberg.

Violinists are Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky, and other soloists include cellist Jules Eskin, hornist James Stagliano and clarinetist Gervase de Peyer.

The festival will end Sunday, August 23, with a performance of the Berlioz Requiem, conducted by Seiji Ozawa, in memory of Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony from 1949 until 1962.

TAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Friday, July 3, 1970

The BSO's Berkshire Festival Concerts, at Tanglewood (near Lenox, Mass.) open July 3 and run through August 23. This year the festival is under the artistic direction of Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller. Leonard Bernstein will serve in an advisory capacity.

The format for the festival will be the same as in previous summers. Concerts begin at 9 on Fridays, 8:30 on Saturdays and 2:30 on Sundays. There will be a "weekend prelude" every Friday evening at 7.

Indoor tickets range from four to eight dollars. For three dollars you can sit outside the shed on the grass and dig the fresh air as well as the music. Bring along a blanket, some insect repellant, and an ear trumpet.

Highlights of the festival: Ozawa's opening night program July 3 will include Leonard Bernstein's Chichester Psalms, Ligeti's Atmospheres (of Space Odyssey fame) and the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique. The July 5 concert will be devoted entirely to the "Resurrection" Symphony of Mahler. Leonard Bernstein will conduct, with Lorna Haywood and Christa Ludwig as soloists. On July 11, Ozawa will conduct Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause and Ezio Flagello in what could turn out to be an exceptionally strong concert version of Mozart's Cosi Fan Tutte. On July 24, Aaron Copland, former director of the Berkshire Music Center, will conduct a program including two of his own works (including the Clarinet Concerto), plus Busoni's Rondo Arlecchinesco and the Fifth Symphony of Schubert. Gunther Schuller will conduct his Spectra August 21, on a program with Weber's Freischuetz Overture, Szymanovski's Violin Concerto No. 1 (played by Paul Zukofsky), and the Poem of Ecstasy by Scriabin. Last, but hardly least, Mr. Ozawa will conduct the monumental Berlioz Requiem on August 23. That performance will be dedicated to the memory of the BSO's former conductor, Charles Munch.

The weekends of July 31-August 2 and August 14-16 will be devoted to Beethoven, in honor of the Composer's 200th birthday anniversary. William Steinberg, who is at the moment under medical house arrest, is scheduled to conduct four of the six programs. The Symphony's press office appears confident that Mr. Steinberg will be up and about by the middle of the summer.

Once again this summer there will be three so-called Contemporary Trends concerts in the Tanglewood Shed: on July 7, July 21 and August 18. These concerts are offered in collaboration with Bill Graham's Fillmore East. The performers have not yet been announced.

On the other side of the Tanglewood Estate, on weekday evenings, there will be a great deal more music going on, presented by fellows of the Berkshire Music Center. The BMC, which this year is under the artistic direction of Gunther Schuller, is the Boston Symphony's summer training center for advanced performers. Their concerts have traditionally been more adventurous (and sometimes more "professional") than the main festival events. The highlights of the summer at the BMC is the Fromm Festival in August — a week devoted entirely to modern music, including some new works commissioned by the Fromm Foundation.

San Francisco Chronicle
THE VOICE OF THE WEST
D. 480,233 SAT. 450,227

MAY 20 1970

Ozawa To Open Festival

Boston

Seiji Ozawa will open the 1970 Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony on Friday, July 3 for his first concert as co-artistic director of the Festival. Ozawa will also close the Festival on August 23 with a performance of Berlioz' "Requiem," given as a memorial to the late Charles Munch.

Other conductors on the Festival will include Boston's conductor William Steinberg, leading a six-concert Beethoven cycle, and his young Californian assistant Michael Tilson Thomas, who will lead the July 19 and August 8 concerts.

Aisle Seat: What's Going on in Metroland for Entertainment

Tanglewood opens tonight at 9, Seiji Ozawa conducting. He will conduct again tomorrow night at 8:30, and Leonard Bernstein will be on the podium for an all-Mahler program Sunday at 2:30.

★ ★ ★

SWITCHING musical hits, it will be jazz, jazz, jazz again Sunday night at Cissy's Route 9, Clifton Park. Nick Brignola will be back on sax and flutes, bringing with him Don York on piano, George Ley on drums and Eddie Annias on guitar. Nick says it will be an interesting evening. It starts at 7:30.

★ ★ ★

The Grand Music Hall of Israel will being its brand of music to the Colonie Coliseum Summer Theater Monday night at 8:30. It is one of the Coliseum's special specials.

★ ★ ★

STILL ON the musical kick, Tanglewood has a smash show set for Tuesday night. The Who will make its last appearance in this country, and on the same bill is Jethro Tull.

★ ★ ★

AND DON'T FORGET the chamber music series of the Saratoga Performing Arts Series. It will open Monday night in the Canfield Casino at 8:30 with St. John's College Choir.

★ ★ ★

THE NEW YORK City Ballet will present George Balanchine's new ballet, "Who Cares?", for the first time at SPAC Tuesday night. It is danced to the music of a number of George Gershwin tunes.

Tanglewood's Berkshire Season Opens June 28

LENOX, Mass. — The Tanglewood season opens here Sunday, June 28, with Leonard Bernstein delivering the principal address at the opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center's 30th anniversary season. The famed conductor and composer performed in BMC's first season in 1940. During the week, he will lead the BMC orchestra in an open rehearsal. Bernstein is conductor laureate of the New York Philharmonic.

The Berkshire Festival opens on Friday, July 3, at 9 p.m. with Seiji Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony in Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms," Ligeti's "Atmospheres," and the "Symphonie Fastastique" of Berlioz. Ozawa and Gunther Schuller are artistic directors of Tanglewood and Bernstein is adviser, beginning this season.

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct Beethoven concerts, and Michael Tilson Thomas, whose appointment as associate conductor of the BSO begins at Tanglewood this summer, conducts two concerts.

The Berkshire Festival is this country's oldest leading music festival. Each summer, the Boston Symphony plays 24 concerts in Tanglewood's Music Shed.

The concerts for the eight weeks are listed: Friday, July 3, 7 p.m., Weekend Prelude, program of Mahler songs; 9 p.m., Seiji Ozawa, "Chichester Psalms," Bernstein; Tanglewood Festival Chorus, "Atmospheres," Ligeti; "Symphonie Fantastique," Berlioz.

Saturday, July 4, 10:30 a.m., open rehearsal; 8:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa, "The Marriage of Figaro" overture, Mozart; Symphony No. 36 "Linz," Mozart; Violin concerto, Stravinsky; Joseph Silverstein, "The Firebird Suite," Stravinsky.

Sunday, July 5, 2:30 p.m., Leonard Bernstein, Symphony No. 2 "Resurrection," Mahler, Lrona Haywood, Christa Ludwig; Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

July 10, 7 p.m., weekend prelude, St. John's College Choir; 9 p.m., Rafael Fruhbeck De Burgos; Falla: El amor brujo; Falla: Two suites from "The Three-Cornered Hat;" "The Rite of Spring," Stravinsky.

July 11, 10:30 a.m., open rehearsal; 8:30 p.m. Seiji Ozawa, "Cosi Fan Tutte," Mozart, Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tm Krause, Ezio Flagello.

July 12, 2:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa, "Romeo and Juliet," Prokofiev; Piano concerto, Schoenberg, Peter Serkin; Three pieces for Blues Band and orchestra, Corky Siegel Blues Band.

July 17, 7 p.m., weekend prelude, Yuji Takahashi; 9 p.m. Seiji Ozawa, Symphony No. 86, Hayden; "Eonta," Xenakis, Yuji Takahashi, Serenade for tenor, horn and strings, John Alexander, James Stagliano, "Divertissement," Ibert.

July 18, 10:30 a.m., open rehearsal; 8:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa, Mozart program, "Serenade" No. 10 for 13 wind instruments; Piano concerto in D minor K.466, Lili Kraus.

July 19, 2:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas, Symphony No. 98, Hayden; Cantata No. 51 "Jauchzet Gott," "Die Nachtigall," Krenek; Bethany Beardslee, "Pulcinella Suite," Stravinsky.

Aug. 2, 2:30 p.m., William Steinberg, Beethoven program, Egmont overture, Piano concerto No. 3, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Symphony No. 7.

Aug. 7, 7 p.m., weekend prelude, Berkshire Boy Choir; 9 p.m., Alain Lombard, Symphony No. 88, Haydn; Bacchus et Ariane Suite No. 2, Roussel; "Petrushka," Stravinsky.

Aug. 8, 10:30 a.m., open rehearsal; 8:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas, Russian Easter Overture, Rimsky-Korsakov; Piano concerto No. 3, Prokofiev, Gary Graffman, "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy; "Trois Gymnopedies," Satie; "La Mer," Debussy.

Aug. 9, 2:30 p.m., Charles Mackerras, Six pieces for orchestra, Webern; Cello concerto, Dvorak; Jules Eskin, Symphony No. 5, Jules Eskin.

Aug. 14, 7 p.m., weekend prelude, Claude Frank; 9 p.m., William Steinberg, Beethoven program, Symphony No. 3 "Eroica," piano concerto No. 5 "Emperor," Rudolf Firkusny.

Aug. 15, 10:30 a.m., open rehearsal; 8:30 p.m., William Steinberg, Beethoven program, Choral Fantasy, Jerome Lowenthal, Symphony No. 9 "Choral," Gwendolin Sims, Eunice Alberts, William Cochran, Thomas Paul, Chorus Pro Musica, Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Aug. 16, 2:30 p.m., William Steinberg, Beethoven program, "The Consecration of the House" overture, piano concerto No. 1, Jerome Lowenthal, Symphony No. 5.

Aug. 21, 7 p.m., weekend prelude, Alexis Weissenberg; 9 p.m., Gunther Schuller, "Der Freischutz" overture, Weber; Violin Concerto No. 1, Szymanowski, Paul Zukofsky, "Spectra," Schuller; "Poem of Ecstasy," Scriabin.

Aug. 22, 10:30 a.m., open rehearsal; 8:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa, Concerto for orchestra, Lutoslawski; Piano concerto No. 3, Rachmaninov; Alex Weissenberg, Concerto for Orchestra, Bartok.

Aug. 23, 2:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa, "Requiem," Berlioz, Leopold Simoneau, Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Framingham Choral Society, M.I.T. Chorus, concert in memory of Charles Much.

Open rehearsals are held in the Shed Saturday morning at 10:30 to benefit the orchestra's pension fund.

Program is subject to change.

On Aug. 11, Arthur Fiedler will conduct Pops Night. Earl Wild will join Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra in an all-Gershwin concert at 8:30 p.m. On July 18, at 8:30 p.m., is another highlight, Tanglewood-on-Parade, a day-long demonstration of the work of the Berkshire Music Center closing with the gala concert in celebration of the 30th anniversary of the BMC and the 70th year of Aaron Copland.

On July 7 and Aug. 18 beginning at 7 p.m., Bill Graham's Fillmore East collaborates with Tanglewood in presenting a program with outstanding contemporary artists; Peter, Paul and Mary, will appear July 21 at 8 p.m.

TOR, VERMONT
3 1970 New England Newsclip

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.
) 38,000
JUN 3 1970 New England Newsclip

Seiji Ozawa to Conduct Opener At Berkshire Festival July 3

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,457
MAY 30 1970 New England Newsclip

LENOX — The 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens July 3 with a program conduted by Seiji Ozawa one of Tanglewood's artistic directors.

Ozawa will conduct two concerts on the first weekend of the festival. The third will concerts on the first weekend of the festival. The third will be conductdd by Leonard Bernstein, advisor to Tanglewood and laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Bernstein's concert will be devoted entirely to Mahler's Symphony No. 2, "Resurrection."

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six all-Beethoven concerts this summer, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Steinberg will conduct all three concerts of the fifth and seventh weekends, July 31, Aug. 1 and 2, and Aug. 14, 15, 16.

The season's conductors will include Gunther Schuller, also an artistic director of Tanglewood, Michael Tilson Thomas, whose appointment as associate conductor of the Boston Symphony takes effect at Tanglewood this summer, as well as Aaron Copland, Rafael Fruebeck de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard and Charles Mackerras.

The Tanglewood season will open Sunday June 28, the Sunday before the Berkshire Festival opening, when Bernstein, delivers the opening address on the 30th anniversary of the BMC's first opening exercises. The public is invited.

Pianists to Appear

Pianists who will appear this summer are Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenbach, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuji Takahashi, Andre Watts and Alexis Weissenberg.

Violinists will be Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky.

Other soloists will include Jules Eskin, cello; James Stagliano, horn, and Gervase de Peyer, clarinet.

Choruses to be heard include Berkshire Boy Choir, Chorus Pro Musica, Harvard Glee Club, Framingham Choral Society, M.I.T. Chorus, Radcliffe Choral Society, St. John's College Choir and Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450
MAY 28 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood season opens with Bernstein

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens Friday evening, July 3 with a program conducted by Seiji Ozawa, one of Tanglewood's Artistic Directors. Mr. Ozawa conducts two concerts on the first weekend of the Festival. The third is conducted by Leonard Bernstein, Advisor to Tanglewood and Laureate Conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Mr. Bernstein's concert is devoted entirely to Mahler's Symphony No. 2, 'Resurrection.'

William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony, conducts six all-Beethoven concerts this summer, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Mr. Steinberg will conduct all three concerts of the fifth and seventh weekends, July 31, August 1 and 2, and August 14, 15, 16.

The season's conductors include Gunther Schuller, also an Artistic Director of Tanglewood, Michael Tilson Thomas, whose appointment as Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony takes effect at Tanglewood this summer, as well as Aaron Copland, Rafael Fruebeck de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lonbard and Charles Mackerras.

The Tanglewood season opens Sunday June 28 the Sunday before the Berkshire Festival opening, when Bernstein, alumnus of the first class of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940, delivers the opening address on the 30th anniversary of the BMC's first Opening Exercises. (The public is invited to the ceremony at 2:30 p.m. in the Theater/Concert Hall at Tanglewood. During that week, Mr. Bernstein will work with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. On Thursday evening, July 2 he will conduct the BMC Orchestra and vocal soloists in a concert performance of the first act of Wagner's Die Walkuere.

Pianists appearing with the Boston Symphony this summer are Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenbach, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuji Takahashi, Andre Watts and Alexis Weissenberg.

The PERFORMING ARTS

German, Austrian and Dutch arts and crafts of the erotic, abstract Jugendstil movement of the early 1900s is on display at the Busch-Reisinger Museum of Harvard University, 29 Kirkland St., Cambridge, through June 13.

On display will be "The Kiss," a woodcut by Peter Behren, a Franz von Stuck poster and a costume study by Eduard Wimmer. The exhibit, sponsored by the Charles L. Kuhn Fund, is running with a survey of French "Art Nouveau" printing and book design.

* * *

The 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, the summer home of Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens Friday evening, July 3, with a program conducted by Seiji Ozawa. The program will feature the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, "Symphonie Fantastique" by Berlioz, "Chichester Psalms" by Bernstein, and Ligeti's "Atmospheres."

On Saturday, July 4, Ozawa will conduct Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" overture, Symphony No. 36 "Linz" by Mozart; "Violin Concerto" and "The Firebird Suite" by Stravinsky.

The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will appear with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus Sunday, July 5, in Mahler's Symphony No. 2, "Resurrection," with Leonard Bernstein conducting. Soloists will be Miss Lorna Haywood and Miss Christa Ludwig.

Concerts at the Tanglewood Music Shed will be held Friday evenings at 9, Saturdays at 8:30 p.m. with Sunday matinees at 2:30 p.m. for the eight-week festival.

* * *

Exponent for "black equality", lecturer and comedian Dick Gregory will appear tomorrow night at 8:30 at Jordan Hall of the New England Conservatory of Music, 290 Huntington Ave., Boston.

Termed a soldier in the war against hate and bigotry, Gregory delivers church sermons, plays benefits and lobbies in Washington in the name of "freedom and equality not only for blacks but the entire human race."

The author of his autobiography, "Nigger" and "Sermons", Gregory is also starred in the movie "Sweet Love, Bitter." His appearance is sponsored by the Community Services Department of the New England Conservatory.

Tickets are available at the Jordan Hall Box Office.

* * *

Over 250 exhibiting craftsmen will be on hand this year for the Craft Fair 5 at Bennington, Vt., sponsored by the American Crafts Council, Northeast Region, the fair will be open to the public from Wednesday, July 8, through Sunday, July 12, on the grounds of Mt. Anthony Union High.

* * *

St. John's Preparatory School, Danvers, will hold an art workshop this summer beginning Monday, July 6.

Drawing, painting, sculpture and cinematics will be offered for a four evening a week course, Monday through Thursdays, 6:30 to 9 p.m.

For information contact Harry Martin at St. John's School.

Tanglewood's Berkshire Season Opens June 28

LENOX, Mass. — The Tanglewood season opens here Sunday, June 28, with Leonard Bernstein delivering the principal address at the opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center's 30th anniversary season. The famed conductor and composer performed in BMC's first season in 1940. During the week, he will lead the BMC orchestra in an open rehearsal. Bernstein is conductor laureate of the New York Philharmonic.

The Berkshire Festival opens on Friday, July 3, at 9 p.m. with Seiji Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony in Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms," Ligeti's "Atmospheres," and the "Symphonie Fastastique" of Berlioz. Ozawa and Gunther Schuller are artistic directors of Tanglewood and Bernstein is adviser, beginning this season.

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct Beethoven concerts, and Michael Tilson Thomas, whose appointment as associate conductor of the BSO begins at Tanglewood this summer, conducts two concerts.

The Berkshire Festival is this country's oldest leading music festival. Each summer, the Boston Symphony plays 24 concerts in Tanglewood's Music Shed.

The concerts for the eight weeks are listed: Friday, July 3, 7 p.m., Weekend Prelude, program of Mahler songs; 9 p.m., Seiji Ozawa, "Chichester Psalms," Bernstein; Tanglewood Festival Chorus, "Atmospheres," Ligeti; "Symphonie Fantastique," Berlioz.

Saturday, July 4, 10:30 a.m., open rehearsal; 8:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa, "The Marriage of Figaro" overture, Mozart; Symphony No. 36 "Linz," Mozart; Violin concerto, Stravinsky; Joseph Silverstein, "The Firebird Suite," Stravinsky.

Sunday, July 5, 2:30 p.m., Leonard Bernstein, Symphony No. 2 "Resurrection," Mahler, Lrona Haywood, Christa Ludwig; Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

July 10, 7 p.m., weekend prelude, St. John's College Choir; 9 p.m., Rafael Fruhbeck De Burgos; Falla: El amor brujo; Falla: Two suites from "The Three-Cornered Hat;" "The Rite of Spring," Stravinsky.

July 11, 10:30 a.m., open rehearsal; 8:30 p.m. Seiji Ozawa, "Cosi Fan Tutte," Mozart, Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tm Krause, Ezio Flagello.

July 12, 2:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa, "Romeo and Juliet," Prokofiev; Piano concerto, Schoenberg, Peter Serkin; Three pieces for Blues Band and orchestra, Corky Siegel Blues Band.

July 17, 7 p.m., weekend prelude, Yuji Takahashi; 9 p.m. Seiji Ozawa, Symphony No. 86, Hayden; "Eonta," Xenakis, Yuji Takahashi, Serenade for tenor, horn and strings, John Alexander, James Stagliano, "Divertissement," Ibert.

July 18, 10:30 a.m., open rehearsal; 8:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa, Mozart program, "Serenade" No. 10 for 13 wind instruments; Piano concerto in D minor K.466, Lili Kraus.

July 19, 2:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas, Symphony No. 98, Hayden; Cantata No. 51 "Jauchzet Gott," "Die Nachtigall," Krenek; Bethany Beardslee, "Pulcinella Suite," Stravinsky.

Aug. 2, 2:30 p.m., William Steinberg, Beethoven program, Egmont overture, Piano concerto No. 3, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Symphony No. 7.

Aug. 7, 7 p.m., weekend prelude, Berkshire Boy Choir; 9 p.m., Alain Lombard, Symphony No. 88, Haydn; Bacchus et Ariane Suite No. 2, Roussel; "Petrushka," Stravinsky.

Aug. 8, 10:30 a.m., open rehearsal; 8:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas, Russian Easter Overture, Rimsky-Korsakov; Piano concerto No. 3, Prokofiev, Gary Graffman, "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy; "Trois Gymnopedies," Satie; "La Mer," Debussy.

Aug. 9, 2:30 p.m., Charles Mackerras, Six pieces for orchestra, Webern; Cello concerto, Dvorak; Jules Eskin, Symphony No. 5, Jules Eskin.

Aug. 14, 7 p.m., weekend prelude, Claude Frank; 9 p.m., William Steinberg, Beethoven program, Symphony No. 3 "Eroica," piano concerto No. 5 "Emperor," Rudolf Firkusny.

Aug. 15, 10:30 a.m., open rehearsal; 8:30 p.m., William Steinberg, Beethoven program, Choral Fantasy, Jerome Lowenthal, Symphony No. 9 "Choral," Gwendolin Sims, Eunice Alberts, William Cochran, Thomas Paul, Chorus Pro Musica, Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Aug. 16, 2:30 p.m., William Steinberg, Beethoven program, "The Consecration of the House" overture, piano concerto No. 1, Jerome Lowenthal, Symphony No. 5.

Aug. 21, 7 p.m., weekend prelude, Alexis Weissenberg; 9 p.m., Gunther Schuller, "Der Freischutz" overture, Weber; Violin Concerto No. 1, Szymanowski, Paul Zukofsky, "Spectra," Schuller; "Poem of Ecstasy," Scriabin.

Aug. 22, 10:30 a.m., open rehearsal; 8:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa, Concerto for orchestra, Lutoslawski; Piano concerto No. 3, Rachmaninov; Alex Weissenberg, Concerto for Orchestra, Bartok.

Aug. 23, 2:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa, "Requiem," Berlioz, Leopold Simoneau, Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Framingham Choral Society, M.I.T. Chorus, concert in memory of Charles Much.

Open rehearsals are held in the Shed Saturday morning at 10:30 to benefit the orchestra's pension fund.

Program is subject to change.

On Aug. 11, Arthur Fiedler will conduct Pops Night. Earl Wild will join Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra in an all-Gershwin concert at 8:30 p.m. On July 18, at 8:30 p.m., is another highlight, Tanglewood-on-Parade, a day-long demonstration of the work of the Berkshire Music Center closing with the gala concert in celebration of the 30th anniversary of the BMC and the 70th year of Aaron Copland.

On July 7 and Aug. 18 beginning at 7 p.m., Bill Graham's Fillmore East collaborates with Tanglewood in presenting a program with outstanding contemporary artists; Peter, Paul and Mary, will appear July 21 at 8 p.m.

New England Newsclip

ITEM
LYNN, MASS.

JUN 3 1970

New England Newsclip

Seiji Ozawa to Conduct Opener At Berkshire Festival July 3

LENOX — The 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens July 3 with a program conduted by Seiji Ozawa one of Tanglewood's artistic directors.

Ozawa will conduct two concerts on the first weekend of the festival. The third will concerts on the first weekend of the festival. The third will be conductdd by Leonard Bernstein, advisor to Tanglewood and laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Bernstein's concert will be devoted entirely to Mahler's Symphony No. 2, "Resurrection."

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six all-Beethoven concerts this summer, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Steinberg will conduct all three concerts of the fifth and seventh weekends, July 31, Aug. 1 and 2, and Aug. 14, 15, 16.

The season's conductors will include Gunther Schuller, also an artistic director of Tanglewood, Michael Tilson Thomas, whose appointment as associate conductor of the Boston Symphony takes effect at Tanglewood this summer, as well as Aaron Copland, Rafael Fruebeck de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard and Charles Mackerras.

The Tanglewood season will open Sunday June 28, the Sunday before the Berkshire Festival opening, when Bernstein, delivers the opening address on the 30th anniversary of the BMC's first opening exercises. The public is invited.

Pianists to Appear

Pianists who will appear this summer are Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenbach, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuji Takahashi, Andre Watts and Alexis Weissenberg.

Violinists will be Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky.

Other soloists will include Jules Eskin, cello; James Stagliano, horn, and Gervase de Peyer, clarinet.

Choruses to be heard include Berkshire Boy Choir, Chorus Pro Musica, Harvard Glee Club, Framingham Choral Society, M.I.T. Chorus, Radcliffe Choral Society, St. John's College Choir and Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

July 24, 7 p.m., weekend prelude, Phyllis Curtin; 9 p.m., Aaron Copland, "Rondo Arlecchinesco," Busoni; Dance Panels, Copland; Clarinet concerto, Copland, Gervase de Peyer, Symphony No. 5, Schubert.

July 25, 10:30 a.m., open rehearsal; 8:30 p.m., Jorge Mester, "Sinfonia in D," C.P.E. Bach; "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" suite, Strauss, Symphony No. 41 "Jupiter," Mozart.

July 26, 2:30 p.m., Kenneth Schermerhorn, Symphony No. 83, Haydn; Piano concerto in A K. 414, Mozart, Christoph Eschenbach, Concerto in D for orchestra, Stravinsky; Suite No. 4 "Mozartiana," Tchaikovsky.

July 31, 7 p.m., weekend prelude, Joseph Silverstein, Jule Eskin, Richard Goode; 9 p.m., William Steinberg, Beethoven program, Leonore overture No. 3, Piano concerto No. 2, Clude Frank, King Stephen overture, Symphony No. 8.

Aug. 1, 10:30 a.m., open rehearsal; 8:30 p.m., William Steinberg, Beethoven program, Coriolan overture, piano concerto No. 4, Andre Watts, Symphony No. 4.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 8,450

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood season opens with Bernstein

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens Friday evening, July 3 with a program conducted by Seiji Ozawa, one of Tanglewood's Artistic Directors. Mr. Ozawa conducts two concerts on the first weekend of the Festival. The third is conducted by Leonard Bernstein, Advisor to Tanglewood and Laureate Conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Mr. Bernstein's concert is devoted entirely to Mahler's Symphony No. 2, 'Resurrection.'

William Steinberg, Music Director of the Boston Symphony, conducts six all-Beethoven concerts this summer, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Mr. Steinberg will conduct all three concerts of the fifth and seventh weekends, July 31, August 1 and 2, and August 14, 15, 16.

The season's conductors include Gunther Schuller, also an Artistic Director of Tanglewood, Michael Tilson Thomas, whose appointment as Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony takes effect at Tanglewood this summer, as well as Aaron Copland, Rafael Fruebeck de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lonbard and Charles Mackerras.

The Tanglewood season opens Sunday June 28 the Sunday before the Berkshire Festival opening, when Bernstein, alumnus of the first class of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940, delivers the opening address on the 30th anniversary of the BMC's first Opening Exercises. (The public is invited to the ceremony at 2:30 p.m. in the Theater/Concert Hall at Tanglewood. During that week, Mr. Bernstein will work with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. On Thursday evening, July 2 he will conduct the BMC Orchestra and vocal soloists in a concert performance of the first act of Wagner's Die Walkuere.

Pianists appearing with the Boston Symphony this summer are Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenbach, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuji Takahashi, Andre Watts and Alexis Weissenberg.

New England Newsclip

The PERFORMING ARTS

German, Austrian and Dutch arts and crafts of the erotic, abstract Jugendstil movement of the early 1900s is on display at the Busch-Reisinger Museum of Harvard University, 29 Kirkland St., Cambridge, through June 13.

On display will be "The Kiss," a woodcut by Peter Behren, a Franz von Stuck poster and a costume study by Eduard Wimmer. The exhibit, sponsored by the Charles L. Kuhn Fund, is running with a survey of French "Art Nouveau" printing and book design.

* * *

The 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, the summer home of Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens Friday evening, July 3, with a program conducted by Seiji Ozawa. The program will feature the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, "Symphonie Fantastique" by Berlioz, "Chichester Psalms" by Bernstein, and Ligeti's "Atmospheres."

On Saturday, July 4, Ozawa will conduct Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" overture, Symphony No. 36 "Linz" by Mozart; "Violin Concerto" and "The Firebird Suite" by Stravinsky.

The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society will appear with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus Sunday, July 5, in Mahler's Symphony No. 2, "Resurrection," with Leonard Bernstein conducting. Soloists will be Miss Lorna Haywood and Miss Christa Ludwig.

Concerts at the Tanglewood Music Shed will be held Friday evenings at 9, Saturdays at 8:30 p.m. with Sunday matinees at 2:30 p.m. for the eight-week festival.

* * *

Exponent for "black equality", lecturer and comedian Dick Gregory will appear tomorrow night at 8:30 at Jordan Hall of the New England Conservatory of Music, 290 Huntington Ave., Boston.

Termed a soldier in the war against hate and bigotry, Gregory delivers church sermons, plays benefits and lobbies in Washington in the name of "freedom and equality not only for blacks but the entire human race."

The author of his autobiography, "Nigger" and "Sermons", Gregory is also starred in the movie "Sweet Love, Bitter." His appearance is sponsored by the Community Services Department of the New England Conservatory.

Tickets are available at the Jordan Hall Box Office.

* * *

Over 250 exhibiting craftsmen will be on hand this year for the Craft Fair 5 at Bennington, Vt., sponsored by the American Crafts Council, Northeast Region, the fair will be open to the public from Wednesday, July 8, through Sunday, July 12, on the grounds of Mt. Anthony Union High.

* * *

St. John's Preparatory School, Danvers, will hold an art workshop this summer beginning Monday, July 6.

Drawing, painting, sculpture and cinematics will be offered for a four evening a week course, Monday through Thursdays, 6:30 to 9 p.m.

For information contact Harry Martin at St. John's School.

Syracuse Herald American

Boston Symphony will open Berkshire Festival July 3

BOSTON, MASS—The 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens Friday evening, July 3 with a program conducted by Seiji Ozawa, one of Tanglewood's artistic directors. Ozawa conducts two concerts on the first weekend of the festival. The third is conducted by Leonard Bernstein, advisor to Tanglewood and laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Bernstein's concert is devoted entirely to Mahler's Symphony No. 2 "Resurrection.'

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, conducts six all-Beethoven concerts this summer, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Steinberg will conduct all three concerts of the fifth and seventh weekends, July 31, Aug. 1 and 2, and Aug. 14, 15, 16.

The season's conductors include Gunther Schuller, also an artistic director of Tanglewood, Michael Tilson Thomas, whose appointment as associate conductor of the Boston Symphony takes effect at Tanglewood this summer, as well as Aaron Coplan, Rafael Fruebeck de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard, and Charles Mackerras.

Tanglewood season opens June 28, the Sunday before the Berkshire Festival opening, when Leonard Bernstein, an alumnus of the first class of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940, delivers the opening address on the 30th anniversary of the BMC's first opening excerises. The ceremony will be at 2:30 p.m., in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood. During that week, Bernstein will work with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra. On Thursday evening, July 2, he will conduct the BMC Orchestra and vocal soloists in a concert performance of the first act of Wagner's "Die Walkuere."

Pianists appearing with the Boston Symphony this summer are Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenbach, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuji Takahashi, Andre Watts, and Alexis Weissenberg.

Violinists are Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky.

Other soloists include Jules Eskin, cello; James Stagliano, horn; and Gervase de Peyer, clarinet.

Singers at this summer's Berkshire Festival concerts are Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, Bethany Bearkslee, William Cochran, Phyllis Curtin, Rosalind Elias, Ezio Flagello, Lorna Haywood, Tom Krause, Christa Ludwig, Thomas Paul, George Shirley, Leopold Simoneau, Gwendolin Sims, and Teresa Stratas.

Choruses to be heard include Berkshire Boy Choir, Chorus Pro Musica, Harvard Glee Club, Framingham Choral Society, M.I.T. Chorus, Radcliffe Choral Society, St. John's College Choir, Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Also performing will be the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

The 1970 Berkshire Festival ends on Sunday afternoon Aug. 23 with a performance of the Berlioz "Requiem" conducted by Seiji Ozawa in memory of Charles Munch,

LEONARD BERNSTEIN

music director of the Boston Symphony from 1949 until 1962.

Berkshire Music To Begin July 3

BOSTON, Mass.—The 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open July 3 with a Friday night program conducted by Seiji Ozawa, one of Tanglewood's artistic directors. Ozawa will conduct two concerts on the first weekend of the festival. The third will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein, adviser to Tanglewood and laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic. The Bernstein concert will be devoted entirely to Mahler's Symphony No. 2, "Resurrection."

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six Beethoven concerts this summer in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Steinberg will conduct all three concerts of the fifth and seventh weekends, July 31, Aug. 1 and 2, and Aug. 14, 15 and 16.

Other Conductors

The season's conductors also will include Gunther Schuller, Michael Tilson Thomas, Aaron Copland, Rafael Frueback de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard and Charles Mackerras.

The Tanglewood season will open June 28, the Sunday before the Berkshire Festival opening. Bernstein, an alumnus of the first class of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940, will deliver the opening address on the 30th anniversary of the BMC's first opening exercises. On July 2 Bernstein will conduct the BMC Orchestra in a performance of the first act of Wagner's "Die Walkuere."

Pianists to Appear

Pianists appearing with the Boston Symphony this summer will be Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenbach, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuji Takahashi, Andre Watts and Alexis Weissenberg.

Violinists will be Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky Other soloists will include Jules Eskin, cello; James Stagliano, horn, and Gervase de Peyer, clarinet.

Singers at this summer's Berkshire Festival concerts will include Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, Bethany Beardslee, William Cochran, Phyllis Curtin, Rosalind Elias, Ezio Flagello, Lorna Haywood, Tom Krause, Christa Ludwig, Thomas Paul, George Shirley, Leopold Simoneau, Gwendolin Sims and Teresa Stratas.

Choruses to be heard include Berkshire Boy Choir, Chorus Pro Musica, Harvard Glee Club, Framingham Choral Society, MIT Chorus, Radcliffe Choral Society, St. John's College Choir and Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Also performing will be the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

The 1970 Berkshire Festival will end Aug. 23 with a performance of the Berlioz "Requiem" conducted by Seiji Ozawa in memory of Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony from 1949 until 1962.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

BUFFALO COURIER EXPRESS
Sunday, May 24, 1970

Tanglewood Lists Festival Programs

By R. E. KRIEGER
Executive Arts Editor

LENOX, Mass.—Seiji Ozawa and Leonard Bernstein will be guest conductors during the opening weekend of Tanglewood this summer with Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms" as the beginning work of the season at 9 p.m. July 3.

Ozawa will also conduct the July 4 program beginning at 8:30 p.m. and featuring concertmaster Joseph Silverstein in the Stravinsky Violin Concerto.

On July 5 at 2:30 p.m. Bernstein will be conducting the Mahler Second Symphony with the Boston Symphony and Christa Ludwig, Lorna Haywood, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

It's a work that he will also be conducting at the Saratoga Performing Arts Center in August.

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will be conducting six all-Beethoven concerts this summer in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth.

OTHER CONDUCTORS for the summer are Gunther Schuller, Michael Tilson Thomas, Aaron Copland, Rafael Fruebeck de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard, and Charles Mackerras.

Pianists appearing with the Boston Symphony this summer are Peter Serkin, Vladimir Ashkenazy, Rudolf Firkusny, Christoph Eschenbach, Claude Franck, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Andre Watts, Alexis Weissenberg, Richard Goode, Jerome Lowenthal, and Yuji Takahashi.

Violinists will be Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky.

It looks as if singers will be in the majority this summer with the schedule including Phyllis Curtin, Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, Tom Krause, Christa Ludwig, Thomas Paul, George Shirley, Bethany Beardslee, William Cochran, Rosalind Elias, Ezio Flagello, Lorna Haywood, Leopold Simoneau, Gwendolin Sims and Teresa Stratas.

Choruses to be heard will be the Chorus Pro Musica, Harvard Glee Club, Framingham Choral Society, MIT Chorus, Radcliffe Choral Society, St. John's College Choir, the Berkshire Boy Choir and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

The only pop group signed so far is the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

The season will end on Aug. 23 with Ozawa coming back to guest conduct the Berlioz "Requiem" in memory of Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony from 1949-1962.

The complete schedule:

JULY 3- 9 P.M.: Seiji Ozawa, conductor. Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms" with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Legeti's "Atmospheres" and Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique."

JULY 4 — 8:30 P.M.: Seiji Owawa, conductor, Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart's "Symphony No. 36 (Linz)" Stravinsky's Violin Conceto featuring Joseph Silverstein and Stravinsky's "The Firebord Suite."

JULY 5 — 2:30 P.M.: Leonard Bernstein, conductor. Mahler's "Symphony No. 2 (Resurrection)" with Lorna

LEONARD BERNSTEIN, SEIJI OZWA, AND WILLIAM STEINBERG ARE SCHEDULED TO CONDUCT AT TANGLEWOOD

Tanglewood Announces Summer Schedule

Continued from Page 1

Haywood, Christa Ludwig, Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

JULY 10 — 9 P.M.: Rafael Frubeck de Burgos, conductor. Falla's "El Amor Brujo" and two suites from "The Three-Cornered Hat;" and Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

JULY 11 — 8:30 P.M.: Seiji Ozawa, conductor. Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte" with Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Strata, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause and Ezio Flagello.

JULY 12 — 2:30 P.M.: Seiji Ozawa, conductor. Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet," Schoenberg's "Piano Concerto" featuring Peter Serkin, and Russo's "Three pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra" featuring the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

JULY 17 — 9 P.M.: Seiji Ozawa, conductor. Haydn "Symphony No. 86," Xenakis "Eonta" with pianist Yuji Takahashi, Britten's "Serenade for tenor, horn and strings with tenor John Alexander and James Stagliano, horn, Iberv "Divertissement."

JULY 18 — 8:30 P.M.: Seiji Ozawa, conductor. An all-Mozart program with "Serenade No. 10 for 13 wind instruments and the "Piano Concerto in D Minor" featuring Lili Kraus.

JULY 19 — 2:30 P.M.: Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor. Haydn's "Symphony No. 98," Bach's "Cantata No. 51," Krenek's "Die Nachtigall" featuring Bethany Beardslee and Stravinsky's "Pucinella Suite."

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, May 24, 1970

JULY 24 — 9 P.M.: Aaron Copland, conductor. Busoni's "Rondo Arlecchinesco," Copland's "Dance Panels" and Clarinet Concerto" featuring clarinetist Gervese de Peyer, Schubert's "Symphony No. 5."

JULY 25 — 8:30 P.M.: Jorge Mester, conductor. C.P.E. Bach's "Sinfonia in D," Strauss' "Le bourgeois gentilhomme" suite, Mozart's "Symphony No. 41."

JULY 26 — 2:30 P.M.: Kenneth Schermerhorn, conductor. Haydn's "Symphony No. 83," Mozart "Piano Concerto in A" featuring pianist Christian Eschenbach, Stravinsky's "Concerto in D for Orchestra" and the Tchaikovsky "Suite No. 4."

JULY 31 — 9 P.M.: William Steinberg, conductor. An all-Betthoven program including the "Leonore Overture No. 3." "Piano Concerto No. 2" with Cluade Frank and Symphony No. 8.

AUG. 1 — 8:30 P.M.: William Steinberg, conducter. An all-Beethoven program with the Egmont Overture, the Piano Concerto No. 3 with Vladimir Ashkenazy and the Symphony No. 7.

AUG. 7 — 9 P.M.: Alain Lombard, conductor. Haydn "Symphony No. 88," Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane, Suite No. 2" and Stravinsky's "Petrushka."

AUG. 8 — 8:30 P.M.: Michael Tilson Thomas, conductor. Rimsky - Korsakov's "Russian Easter" overture, Prokofiev's "Piano Concerto No. 3" with Gary Graffman, "Debussy's Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun, Satie's "Trois gymnopedies" and Debussy's "La Mer."

AUG. 9 — 2:30 P.M.: Charles Mackerras, conductor. Webern's "Six Pieces for Orchestra," Dvorak's "Cello Concerto" feature Jules Eskin, and the Shostakovich "Symphony No. 5."

AUG. 14 — 9 P.M.: William Steinberg, conductor. An all-Beethoven program with Symphony No. 3 (Eroica) and the Piano Concerto No. 5 (Emperor) with Rudolph Firkusny.

AUG. 15 — 8:30 P.M.: William Steinberg, conductor. Al all-Beethoven program with Choral Fantasy featuring Jerome Lowenthal and Symphony No. 9 (Choral) with Gwendolin Sims, Eunice Alberts, William Cochran, Thomas Paul, the Chorus Pro Musica and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

AUG. 16 — 2:30 P.M.: William Steinberg, conductor. An all-Beethoven program with Consecration of the House overture, Piano Concerto No. 1 with Jerome Lowenthal and the Symphony No. 5.

AUG. 21 — 9 P.M.: Gunther Schuller, conductor. Weber's "Der Freischutz overture, Szymanowski's "Violin Concerto No. 1" featuring Paul Zukofsky, Schuller's "Spectra," and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

AUG. 22 — 8:30 P.M.: Seiji Ozawa, conductor. Lutoslawski's "Concerto for Orchestra," Rachmaninoff's "Piano Concerto No. 3" with Alex Weissenberg and Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra."

AUG. 23 — 2:30 P.M.: Seiji Ozawa, conductor. Berlioz "Requiem" featuring Leopold Simoneau, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Framingham Choral Society, MIT Chorus.

22

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600

JUL 5 1970 New England Newsclip

Drawing by Robert Patterson

TANGLEWOOD TUNE-UP—Seiji Ozawa, artistic co-director of the Berkshire Music Festival's 18th season, leads the Boston Symphony in an open rehearsal in the music shed at Lenox, Mass. Mr. Ozawa, who will take over as maestro of the San Francisco Symphony in the fall, will conduct a concert version of Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" Saturday. On the podium today—conducting Mahler's Symphony No. 2—Leonard Bernstein.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

MAY 30 1970 New England Newsclip

Summer program

Tanglewood will open July 3

The 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens July 3 with a program conducted by Seiji Ozawa one of Tanglewood's artistic directors.

Ozawa will conduct two concerts on the first weekend of the festival. The third will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein, advisor to Tanglewood and laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Bernstein's concert will be devoted entirely to Mahler's Symphony No. 2, "Resurrection."

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six all-Beethoven concerts this summer, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Steinberg will conduct all three concerts of the fifth and seventh weekends, July 31, Aug. 1 and 2, and Aug. 14, 15, 16.

The season's conductors will include Gunther Schuller, also an artistic director of Tanglewood, Michael Tilson Thomas, whose appointment as associate conductor of the Boston Symphony takes effect at Tanglewood this summer, as well as Aaron Copland, Rafael Freubeck de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard and Charles Mackerras.

The Tanglewood season will open Sunday, June 28, the Sunday before the Berkshire Festival opening, when Bernstein, delivers the opening address on the 30th anniversary of the BMC's first opening exercises. The public is invited.

Pianists to Appear

Pianists who will appear this summer are Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenbach, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuji Takahashi, Andre Watts and Alexis Weissenberg.

Violinists will be Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky.

Other soloists will include Jules Eskin, cello; James Staliano, horn, and Gervase de Peyer, clarinet.

Choruses to be heard include Berkshire Boy Choir, Chorus Pro Musica, Harvard Glee Club, Framingham Choral Society, M.I.T. Chorus, Radcliffe Choral Society, St. John's College Choir and Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN.
(M)152,525 (S) 122,103

MAY 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Guest Conductors Named For Berkshire Festival

BOSTON — The 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orhcestra will open July 3 with a program conducted by Seiji Ozawa one of Tanglewood's artistic directors.

Ozawa will conduct two concerts on the first weekend of the Festival. The third will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein, advisor to Tanglewood and Laureate Conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Bernstein's concert is devoted entirely to Mahler's Symphony No. 2 "Resurrection."

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six all-Beethoven concerts this summer in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Steinberg will conduct all three concerts of the fifth and seventh weekends July 31 August 1 and 2 and August 14 15 16.

The season's conductors include Gunther Schuller also an artistic director of Tanglewood Michael Tilson Thomas whose appointment as associate conductor of the Boston Symphony takes effect at Tanglewood this summer as well as Aaron Copland, Rafael Fruebeck de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard and Charles Mackerras.

Pianists appearing with the Boston Sympony this summer are Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenbach, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuju Takahashi, Andre Watts, and Alexis Weissenberg.

Violinists will be Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky. Other soloists include Jules Eskin, cello; James Stagliano, horn; and Gervase de Peyer, clarinet.

Singers at this summer's Berkshire Festival concerts will be Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, Bethany Beardslee, William Cochran, Phyllis Curtin, Rosalind Elias, Ezio Flagello, Lorna Haywood, Tom Krause, Christa Ludwig, Thomas Paul, George Shirley, Leopold Simoneau, Gwendolin Sims, and Teresa Stratas.

SEIJI OZAWA

Choruses to be heard include Berkshire Boy Choir, Chorus Pro Musica, Harvard Glee Club, Framingham Choral Society, M.I.T. Chorus, Radcliffe Choral Society, St. John's College Choir, Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Also performing will be the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

The 1970 Berkshire Festival ends on Sunday afternoon August 23 with a performance of the "Requiem" conducted by Seiji Ozaya in memory of Charles Munch Music Director of the Boston Symphony from 1949 until 1962.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

JUL 5 1970 New England Newsclip

Ludwig's Birthday Hit at Tanglewood

Ludwig's Birthday at Tanglewood. Highlighting this year's Tanglewood Festival at Lenox, Mass., are six Beethoven concerts conducted by William Steinberg, Music Director of the resident Boston Symphony Orchestra. The 200th birthday celebrations will have all the classicist's symphonies, overtures and piano concerti performed by top artists—check pianists Rudolf Firkusny, Vladimir Ashkenazy, and Jerome Lowenthal for sparklers! The Festival opened its 24-concert season Friday and today Leonard Bernstein conducts his beloved Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony. Concerts continue on weekends through Aug. 23 and tickets or program schedules are available from the Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 02140 (phone 413-637-1600). Hartford's AAA recommends this as one route from here to Lenox: Rte. 44 West through Winsted to Canaan, Ct., then north on 7 to Stockbridge; west on 102 to junction 183, and north on 183 to Tanglewood.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600

JUL 5 1970 New England Newsclip

Drawing by Robert Patterson

TANGLEWOOD TUNE-UP—Seiji Ozawa, artistic co-director of the Berkshire Music Festival's 18th season, leads the Boston Symphony in an open rehearsal in the music shed at Lenox, Mass. Mr. Ozawa, who will take over as maestro of the San Francisco Symphony in the fall, will conduct a concert version of Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" Saturday. On the podium today—conducting Mahler's Symphony No. 2—Leonard Bernstein.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS
(E) 12,000

Summer program

Tanglewood will open July 3

The 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens July 3 with a program conducted by Seiji Ozawa one of Tanglewood's artistic directors.

Ozawa will conduct two concerts on the first weekend of the festival. The third will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein, advisor to Tanglewood and laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Bernstein's concert will be devoted entirely to Mahler's Symphony No. 2, "Resurrection."

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six all-Beethoven concerts this summer, in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Steinberg will conduct all three concerts of the fifth and seventh weekends, July 31, Aug. 1 and 2, and Aug. 14, 15, 16.

The season's conductors will include Gunther Schuller, also an artistic director of Tanglewood, Michael Tilson Thomas, whose appointment as associate conductor of the Boston Symphony takes effect at Tanglewood this summer, as well as Aaron Copland, Rafael Freubeck de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard and Charles Mackerras.

The Tanglewood season will open Sunday, June 28, the Sunday before the Berkshire Festival opening, when Bernstein, delivers the opening address on the 30th anniversary of the BMC's first opening exercises. The public is invited.

Pianists to Appear

Pianists who will appear this summer are Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenbach, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuji Takahashi, Andre Watts and Alexis Weissenberg.

Violinists will be Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky.

Other soloists will include Jules Eskin, cello; James Staliano, horn, and Gervase de Peyer, clarinet.

Choruses to be heard include Berkshire Boy Choir, Chorus Pro Musica, Harvard Glee Club, Framingham Choral Society, M.I.T. Chorus, Radcliffe Choral Society, St. John's College Choir and Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

COURANT
HARTFORD, CONN
(M) 152,525 (S) 175,123

MAY 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Guest Conductors Named For Berkshire Festival

BOSTON — The 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orhcestra will open July 3 with a program conducted by Seiji Ozawa one of Tanglewood's artistic directors.

Ozawa will conduct two concerts on the first weekend of the Festival. The third will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein, advisor to Tanglewood and Laureate Conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Bernstein's concert is devoted entirely to Mahler's Symphony No. 2 "Resurrection."

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six all-Beethoven concerts this summer in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Steinberg will conduct all three concerts of the fifth and seventh weekends July 31 August 1 and 2 and August 14 15 16.

The season's conductors include Gunther Schuller also an artistic director of Tanglewood Michael Tilson Thomas whose appointment as associate conductor of the Boston Symphony takes effect at Tanglewood this summer as well as Aaron Copland, Rafael Fruebeck de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard and Charles Mackerras.

Pianists appearing with the Boston Sympony this summer are Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenbach, Rudolf Firkusny, Claude Frank, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuju Takahashi, Andre Watts, and Alexis Weissenberg.

Violinists will be Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky. Other soloists include Jules Eskin, cello; James Stagliano, horn; and Gervase de Peyer, clarinet.

Singers at this summer's Berkshire Festival concerts will be Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, Bethany Beardslee, William Cochran, Phyllis Curtin, Rosalind Elias, Ezio Flagello, Lorna Haywood, Tom Krause, Christa Ludwig, Thomas Paul, George Shirley, Leopold Simoneau, Gwendolin Sims, and Teresa Stratas.

SEIJI OZAWA

Choruses to be heard include Berkshire Boy Choir, Chorus Pro Musica, Harvard Glee Club, Framingham Choral Society, M.I.T. Chorus, Radcliffe Choral Society, St. John's College Choir, Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Also performing will be the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

The 1970 Berkshire Festival ends on Sunday afternoon August 23 with a performance of the "Requiem" conducted by Seiji Ozaya in memory of Charles Munch Music Director of the Boston Symphony from 1949 until 1962.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

JUL 5 1970 New England Newsclip

Ludwig's Birthday Hit at Tanglewood

Ludwig's Birthday at Tanglewood. Highlighting this year's Tanglewood Festival at Lenox, Mass., are six Beethoven concerts conducted by William Steinberg, Music Director of the resident Boston Symphony Orchestra. The 200th birthday celebrations will have all the classicist's symphonies, overtures and piano concerti performed by top artists—check pianists Rudolf Firkusny, Vladimir Ashkenazy, and Jerome Lowenthal for sparklers! The Festival opened its 24-concert season Friday and today Leonard Bernstein conducts his beloved Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony. Concerts continue on weekends through Aug. 23 and tickets or program schedules are available from the Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 02140 (phone 413-637-1600). Hartford's AAA recommends this as one route from here to Lenox: Rte. 44 West through Winsted to Canaan, Ct., then north on 7 to Stockbridge; west on 102 to junction 183, and north on 183 to Tanglewood.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

MAY 31 1970

New England Newsclip

A Look at the Arts by Earl J. Dias

Tanglewood Festival to Mark Beethoven's 200th Birthday

The 1970 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open on Friday night, July 3, with a program conducted by Seiji Ozawa, one of Tanglewood's artistic directors. Mr. Ozawa will conduct two concerts during the first weekend of the Festival; the third will be led by Leonard Bernstein, adviser to Tanglewood and Laureate Conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Mr. Bernstein's concert will be devoted entirely to Mahler's "Symphony No. 2," he "Resurrection."

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, who is now recovered from a long illness, will conduct six all-Beethoven concerts this summer in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Mr. Steinberg will conduct all three concerts of the fifth and seventh weekends, July 31-August 2, and August 14-16.

Other conductors at the Berkshire Festival will include Gunther Schuller, also an artistic director at Tanglewood; Michael Tilson Thomas, whose appointment as associate conductor of the Boston Symphony takes effect at Tanglewood this summer, as well as Aaron Copland, Rafael Fruebeck de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard, and Charles Mackerras.

Among the pianists who will perform with the orchestra at Tanglewood are Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenbach, Rudolf Firuksny, Claude Franl, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuji Takahashi, Andre Watts, and Alexis Weissenberg.

Violin soloists will be Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky. And among the vocalists will be Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, Bethany Beardslee, William Cochran, Phyllis Curtin, Rosaland Elias, Ezio Flagello, Lorna Haywood, Tom Krause, Christa Ludwig, Thomas Paul, George Shirley, Leopold Simoneau, Gwendolyn Sims, and Teresa Stratas.

The Festival ends on Sunday afternoon, August 23, with a performance of the Berlioz "Requiem," conducted by Mr. Ozawa in memory of Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony from 1949-1962.

A Backward Glance at the TV Season

Now that the TV season has settled down to ho-hum reruns even in its commercials, one has an opportunity to look back over he last year on the channels and to assess the goodies that have been sent his way.

I agree with Cleveland Amory that the most notable development of the season just ended has been the emergence of the National Educational TV Network as the most imaginative and rewarding factor of the year. NET has given us the first-rate Forsyte Saga, unquestionably the most tastefully produced series of the season; a provocative new show, The Advocates (even though its courtroom format sometimes borders on the ludicrous, and two excellent programs for children — the widely acclaimed and increasingly influential Sesame Street and the worthy Misterrogers Neighborhood. NET also presented the best dramatic program of the year — the taut and intelligent adaptation of "The Andersonville Trial."

As for the big three — NBC, CBS, and ABC, they have hardly distinguished themselves either for a high caliber of programming or much imagination. Among the new shows given by these networks to a long-suffering public, I would say that only three managed to achieve much distinction — the Bill Cosby Show, Marcus Welby, M.D., and Room 222. Most of the other series seemed to have been written by badly-oiled computers.

As always, however, TV shone in its covering of topical events — the space flights, the World Series, the pro-football championships, the Cambodian emergency, and the like. Among the older programs, many were showing symptoms of tired blood — notably Dean Martin, the Ed Sullivan Show (which has become more and more a hodge-podge), Bonanza (which is running out of believable stories,) the Jackie Gleason Show (except in its Honeymooners sequences, which still provide some of the best farcial comedy on the channels), the Red Skelton Show, in which Red is repeating himself more and more.

Perhaps the most distasteful development of the season has been the phenomenal increase of commercials — an increase, according to TV Guide, of 33 per cent during the last four years, The reason for this increase has been explained by Edward H. Meyer, the head of a large advertising agency. Meyer notes that because of high costs, advertisers have been experimenting with 30-second instead of 60-second commercials and have found that hese have been generally effective. Consequently, 80 per cent of commercials in prime time now run 30 seconds or less.

High costs have also caused advertisers to turn to "participations," during which they can scatter their commercials over several programs. Because programs were being interrupted so frequently for commercials, the TV code was changed to allow the clustering of commercials and fewer interruptions. What this change has done can be illustrated by what happens in the seven minutes between the end of Daniel Boone and the beginning of Ironside. Including station identification, promotions, and commercials, 37 different messages are directed toward the unhappy viewer — who must have reached a state of satiation or nausea.

True, the commercials are often better produced and more imaginative than the programs — but I still hold to the ancient Greek principle of "moderation in all things."

A Note on "Airport"

I made a mistake last week in Boston by dropping in to see the film version of Arthur Hailey's novel, "Airport," at the Paramount Theater. Mr. Hailey is, of course, not much of a novelist, but he researches so well the backgrounds for his fiction that reading his novel often can be instructional. I felt, for example, after reading "Hotel," that I could probably manage the Ritz-Carlton successfully. And from "Airport," I really obtained some inside stuff about the operation and management of a metropolitan airport — so much, in fact, that I almost resolved never to fly again.

The film version of the novel is good in its re-creation of what makes a gigantic airport tick. But the characters in the movie are about as substantial as cardboard. One never learns much about them or their motivations. They include Dean Martin as a drawling pilot, Jean Seberg as a blond public relations expert, Helen Hayes in a patented role as a little old lady stowaway, Burt Lancaster as the stiff-upper-lip airport manager; Jacqueline Bisset as a sexy stewardess, Van Heflin as a phycho who carries a bomb aboard a plane in his hand luggage, and Maureen Stapleton in a performance as his wife — a hammy one surprising in an actress of Miss Stapleton's talent.

What the film concentrates on is the burning question: will pilots Martin and Barry Nelson be able to land their plane safely before the bomb explodes? The suspense engendered by this question is artificially and too theatrically directed by George Seaton so that it becomes a compendium of cinematic cliches.

NEWS
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
(E) 5,742

JUL 3 1970

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood to Celebrate Birthdays

BOSTON — The annual day-long Tanglewood - on - Parade program July 28 at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer home, is a double celebration this year: It celebrates the thirtieth anniversary of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school for advanced music study, and it honors composer Aaron Copland, long associated with the center, as he approaches his seventieth birthday.

Gala Concert

Tanglewood - on - Parade begins each year at 2 p.m. with demonstrations of the work of the Berkshire Music Center's students. It culminates at 8:30 p.m. in the Gala Concert in the Music Shed.

This year, Aaron Copland conducts the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras, and Lukas Foss is pianist and conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Berkshire Music Center was founded in 1940 by the Boston Symphony's then music director, Serge Koussevitzky, as the fulfillment of a long-cherished dream. Talented young musicians from this country and abroad gather for an intensive eight-week session of study and performance.

Copland, widely recognized as one of America's great composers, headed the composition department for twenty-five years from the time of the Berkshire Music Center's founding.

Pianist - conductor Lukas Foss, also widely renowned as a composer, was a member of the center's first class in 1940, as was Leonard Bernstein, now advisor to Tanglewood.

Seiji Ozawa, now an artistic director at Tanglewood, came to study at the Berkshire Music Center in 1960 at the invitation of Charles Munch, Serge Koussevitzky's successor as music director of the Boston Symphony. While there as a student, Ozawa won the Koussevitzky prize, given annually to the year's outstanding young conductor at Tanglewood.

"Candide" Opener

The Gala Concert features music associated with Tanglewood and Berkshire Music Center alumni over the years. Leonard Bernstein's "Candide" overture opens the program, played by the Boston Symphony conducted by Aaron Copland.

Lukas Foss plays and conducts Bach's "Piano Concerto in D Minor," a work he has performed often with the Boston Symphony. Aaron Copland then conducts the Berkshire Music Center in Hindemith's "Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber." Hindemith taught composition and chamber music at Tanglewood in 1940 and

The balance of the program is played by the combned Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras. Aaron Copland conducts his suite from "The Tender Land," and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," a work closely associated with Koussevitzky.

Following the Gala Concert is the traditional display of fireworks over Stockbridge Bowl.

Tickets for Tanglewood - on - Parade are priced at $3, $4.50, $5 and $6, with box seats at $6.50, available by mail from Box Office Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. 02115, and after June 15 by mail or in person at Box Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 012401.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 7,597

JUN 11 1970

New England Newsclip

Music In The Mountains Begins This Evening

Are you planning to hear the Tangleweed Concerts at the Berkshire Festival in Lenox this year? It is a good chance to hear a top symphony orchestra, one of the three top orchestras in the United States, and also to enjoy the beautiful Massachusetts countryside. It is really glamourous with its 200 acres of lawns, gardens, great trees, and lake shore. Tanglewood is the summer home of the Boston Symphony.

The Tanglewood Berkshire Festival is still considered the best festival in America. This year it opens July 3, at 9 p.m. under the direction of Seiji Ozawa. Mr. Ozawa will conduct Bernstein's Chichester Psalms, with boy soprano Robert Pulce the Harvard Glee Club the Radcliffee Choral Society, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Ligeti's Atmospheres is next on the program which closes with Berli's Symphonie Fantastique.

Saturday, July 4 at 8:30 p.m., Mr. Ozawa conducts Mozart' Overature to The Marriage of Figaro, Symphony no. 36, Linz Stravinsky's Violin Concerto, and 'The Firebird Suite" Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, will be soloist in the Stravinski concerto.

On Sunday, July 5, at 2:30 p.m., Leonard Bernstein will take up the baton. The program consists of a single work Mahler's Symphony no. 2, "Resurrection." Saturday morning there will be a free open rehearsal of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, conducted by Leonard Bernstein in the Music Shed at 10:30 a.m.

Many guest conductors and artists are listed for this year's concerts. The weekends of July 31 and August 14 are devoted entirely to Beethoven's music in honor of this year's 200th Centennial. William Steinberg will conduct most of these concerts.

July 31, Claude Frank will play Beethoven's Concerto no. 3. Also on that program will be the Leonore Overture no. 3 and the 8th Symphony.

August 1, Andre Watts will play the Piano Concerto no. 4, the Coriolan Overture and Symphony no. 4.

August 2, Vladimir Ashkencky will play the Piano Concerto no. 3. Also scheduled is the Egmont Overture and the 7th Symphony.

The weekend of August 14, Friday at 9 p.m., the orchestra will play the Eroica Symphony no. 3, and Rudolf Firkusny will be soloist on the Piano Concerton no. 5, the "Emperor."

August 15 at 8:30 p.m. the orchestra and chorus will do the tremendous Beethoven 9th Symphony. Soloist are Gwendolin Sims, Eunice Alverts, William Cochran, Thomas Paul and the Chorus Pro Musica.

August 16, "The Concescration of the House" overature, and Symphony no. 5, the "Fate" Symphony are scheduled. Jerome Lowenthal will play Concerto no. 1.

This is a choice of Beethoven's five piano concertos, and his biggest symphonies—3, 4, 5, 7, and 9. Quite a selection.

Full programs may be obtained from the Festival Ticket Office, Symphony Hall, Boston, or Tanglewood in Lenox, Massachusetts.

Friday evenings at 7 p.m., two hours before the symphony orchestra concert, there will be free recitals for Friday evening ticket holders in the music shed. Guest artists and members of the orchestra will perform.

Other Tanglewood Concerts are: Tanglewood on Parade, July 28 at 8:30 p.m.; Boston Pops at Tanglewood, August 11 at 8:30; and the Contemporary Trends Concerts July 7, July 21, andAugust 18.

Happy Listening!

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000

MAY 31 1970

New England Newsclip

A Look at the Arts by Earl J. Dias

Tanglewood Festival to Mark Beethoven's 200th Birthday

The 1970 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open on Friday night, July 3, with a program conducted by Seiji Ozawa, one of Tanglewood's artistic directors. Mr. Ozawa will conduct two concerts during the first weekend of the Festival; the third will be led by Leonard Bernstein, adviser to Tanglewood and Laureate Conductor of the New York Philharmonic. Mr. Bernstein's concert will be devoted entirely to Mahler's "Symphony No. 2," he "Resurrection."

William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, who is now recovered from a long illness, will conduct six all-Beethoven concerts this summer in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Mr. Steinberg will conduct all three concerts of the fifth and seventh weekends, July 31-August 2, and August 14-16.

Other conductors at the Berkshire Festival will include Gunther Schuller, also an artistic director at Tanglewood; Michael Tilson Thomas, whose appointment as associate conductor of the Boston Symphony takes effect at Tanglewood this summer, as well as Aaron Copland, Rafael Fruebeck de Burgos, Jorge Mester, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Alain Lombard, and Charles Mackerras.

Among the pianists who will perform with the orchestra at Tanglewood are Vladimir Ashkenazy, Christoph Eschenbach, Rudolf Firuksny, Claude Franl, Richard Goode, Gary Graffman, Lili Kraus, Jerome Lowenthal, Peter Serkin, Yuji Takahashi, Andre Watts, and Alexis Weissenberg.

Violin soloists will be Joseph Silverstein and Paul Zukofsky. And among the vocalists will be Eunice Alberts, John Alexander, Bethany Beardslee, William Cochran, Phyllis Curtin, Rosaland Elias, Ezio Flagello, Lorna Haywood, Tom Krause, Christa Ludwig, Thomas Paul, George Shirley, Leopold Simoneau, Gwendolyn Sims, and Teresa Stratas.

The Festival ends on Sunday afternoon, August 23, with a performance of the Berlioz "Requiem," conducted by Mr. Ozawa in memory of Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony from 1949-1962.

A Backward Glance at the TV Season

Now that the TV season has settled down to ho-hum reruns even in its commercials, one has an opportunity to look back over he last year on the channels and to assess the goodies that have been sent his way.

I agree with Cleveland Amory that the most notable development of the season just ended has been the emergence of the National Educational TV Network as the most imaginative and rewarding factor of the year. NET has given us the first-rate Forsyte Saga, unquestionably the most tastefully produced series of the season; a provocative new show, The Advocates (even though its courtroom format sometimes borders on the ludicrous, and two excellent programs for children — the widely acclaimed and increasingly influential Sesame Street and the worthy Misterrogers Neighborhood. NET also presented the best dramatic program of the year — the taut and intelligent adaptation of "The Andersonville Trial."

As for the big three — NBC, CBS, and ABC, they have hardly distinguished themselves either for a high caliber of programming or much imagination. Among the new shows given by these networks to a long-suffering public, I would say that only three managed to achieve much distinction — the Bill Cosby Show, Marcus Welby, M.D., and Room 222. Most of the other series seemed to have been written by badly-oiled computers.

As always, however, TV shone in its covering of topical events — the space flights, the World Series, the pro-football championships, the Cambodian emergency, and the like. Among the older programs, many were showing symptoms of tired blood — notably Dean Martin, the Ed Sullivan Show (which has become more and more a hodge-podge), Bonanza (which is running out of believable stories,) the Jackie Gleason Show (except in its Honeymooners sequences, which still provide some of the best farcial comedy on the channels), the Red Skelton Show, in which Red is repeating himself more and more.

Perhaps the most distasteful development of the season has been the phenomenal increase of commercials — an increase, according to TV Guide, of 33 per cent during the last four years. The reason for this increase has been explained by Edward H. Meyer, the head of a large advertising agency. Meyer notes that because of high costs, advertisers have been experimenting with 30-second instead of 60-second commercials and have found that hese have been generally effective. Consequently, 80 per cent of commercials in prime time now run 30 seconds or less.

High costs have also caused advertisers to turn to "participations," during which they can scatter their commercials over several programs. Because programs were being interrupted so frequently for commercials, the TV code was changed to allow the clustering of commercials and fewer interruptions. What this change has done can be illustrated by what happens in the seven minutes between the end of Daniel Boone and the beginning of Ironside. Including station identification, promotions, and commercials, 37 different messages are directed toward the unhappy viewer — who must have reached a state of satiation or nausea.

True, the commercials are often better produced and more imaginative than the programs — but I still hold to the ancient Greek principle of "moderation in all things."

A Note on "Airport"

I made a mistake last week in Boston by dropping in to see the film version of Arthur Hailey's novel, "Airport," at the Paramount Theater. Mr. Hailey is, of course, not much of a novelist, but he researches so well the backgrounds for his fiction that reading his novel often can be instructional. I felt, for example, after reading "Hotel," that I could probably manage the Ritz-Carlton successfully. And from "Airport," I really obtained some inside stuff about the operation and management of a metropolitan airport — so much, in fact, that I almost resolved never to fly again.

The film version of the novel is good in its re-creation of what makes a gigantic airport tick. But the characters in the movie are about as substantial as cardboard. One never learns much about them or their motivations. They include Dean Martin as a drawling pilot, Jean Seberg as a blond public relations expert, Helen Hayes in a patented role as a little old lady stowaway, Burt Lancaster as the stiff-upper-lip airport manager; Jacqueline Bisset as a sexy stewardess, Van Heflin as a phycho who carries a bomb aboard a plane in his hand luggage, and Maureen Stapleton in a performance as his wife — a hammy one surprising in an actress of Miss Stapleton's talent.

What the film concentrates on is the burning question: will pilots Martin and Barry Nelson be able to land their plane safely before the bomb explodes? The suspense engendered by this question is artificially and too theatrically directed by George Seaton so that it becomes a compendium of cinematic cliches.

NEWS
SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
(E) 5,742

JUL 3 1970

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood to Celebrate Birthdays

BOSTON — The annual day-long Tanglewood - on - Parade program July 28 at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer home, is a double celebration this year: It celebrates the thirtieth anniversary of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school for advanced music study, and it honors composer Aaron Copland, long associated with the center, as he approaches his seventieth birthday.

Gala Concert

Tanglewood - on - Parade begins each year at 2 p.m. with demonstrations of the work of the Berkshire Music Center's students. It culminates at 8:30 p.m. in the Gala Concert in the Music Shed.

This year, Aaron Copland conducts the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras, and Lukas Foss is pianist and conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Berkshire Music Center was founded in 1940 by the Boston Symphony's then music director, Serge Koussevitzky, as the fulfillment of a long-cherished dream. Talented young musicians from this country and abroad gather for an intensive eight-week session of study and performance.

Copland, widely recognized as one of America's great composers, headed the composition department for twenty-five years from the time of the Berkshire Music Center's founding.

Pianist - conductor Lukas Foss, also widely renowned as a composer, was a member of the center's first class in 1940, as was Leonard Bernstein, now advisor to Tanglewood.

Seiji Ozawa, now an artistic director at Tanglewood, came to study at the Berkshire Music Center in 1960 at the invitation of Charles Munch, Serge Koussevitzky's successor as music director of the Boston Symphony. While there as a student, Ozawa won the Koussevitzky prize, given annually to the year's outstanding young conductor at Tanglewood.

"Candide" Opener

The Gala Concert features music associated with Tanglewood and Berkshire Music Center alumni over the years. Leonard Bernstein's "Candide" overture opens the program, played by the Boston Symphony conducted by Aaron Copland.

Lukas Foss plays and conducts Bach's "Piano Concerto in D Minor," a work he has performed often with the Boston Symphony. Aaron Copland then conducts the Berkshire Music Center in Hindemith's "Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber." Hindemith taught composition and chamber music at Tanglewood in 1940 and

The balance of the program is played by the combned Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestras. Aaron Copland conducts his suite from "The Tender Land," and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet," a work closely associated with Koussevitzky.

Following the Gala Concert is the traditional display of fireworks over Stockbridge Bowl.

Tickets for Tanglewood - on - Parade are priced at $3, $4.50, $5 and $6, with box seats at $6.50, available by mail from Box Office Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass. 02115, and after June 15 by mail or in person at Box Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. 012401.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

JUL 1 1970

New England Newsclip

Music In The Mountains Begins This Evening

Are you planning to hear the Tangleweed Concerts at the Berkshire Festival in Lenox this year? It is a good chance to hear a top symphony orchestra, one of the three top orchestras in the United States, and also to enjoy the beautiful Massachusetts countryside. It is really glamourous with its 200 acres of lawns, gardens, great trees, and lake shore. Tanglewood is the summer home of the Boston Symphony.

The Tanglewood Berkshire Festival is still considered the best festival in America. This year it opens July 3, at 9 p.m. under the direction of Seiji Ozawa. Mr. Ozawa will conduct Bernstein's Chichester Psalms, with boy soprano Robert Pulce the Harvard Glee Club the Radcliffee Choral Society, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Ligeti's Atmospheres is next on the program which closes with Berli's Symphonie Fantastique.

Saturday, July 4 at 8:30 p.m., Mr. Ozawa conducts Mozart' Overature to The Marriage of Figaro, Symphony no. 36, Linz Stravinsky's Violin Concerto, and 'The Firebird Suite" Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, will be soloist in the Stravinski concerto.

On Sunday, July 5, at 2:30 p.m., Leonard Bernstein will take up the baton. The program consists of a single work Mahler's Symphony no. 2, "Resurrection." Saturday morning there will be a free open rehearsal of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, conducted by Leonard Bernstein in the Music Shed at 10:30 a.m.

Many guest conductors and artists are listed for this year's concerts. The weekends of July 31 and August 14 are devoted entirely to Beethoven's music in honor of this year's 200th Centennial. William Steinberg will conduct most of these concerts.

July 31, Claude Frank will play Beethoven's Concerto no. 3. Also on that program will be the Leonore Overture no. 3 and the 8th Symphony.

August 1, Andre Watts will play the Piano Concerto no. 4, the Coriolan Overture and Symphony no. 4.

August 2, Vladimir Ashkencky will play the Piano Concerto no. 3. Also scheduled is the Egmont Overture and the 7th Symphony.

The weekend of August 14, Friday at 9 p.m., the orchestra will play the Eroica Symphony no. 3, and Rudolf Firkusny will be soloist on the Piano Concerton no. 5, the "Emperor."

August 15 at 8:30 p.m. the orchestra and chorus will do the tremendous Beethoven 9th Symphony. Soloist are Gwendolin Sims, Eunice Alverts, William Cochran, Thomas Paul and the Chorus Pro Musica.

August 16, "The Concescration of the House" overature, and Symphony no. 5, the "Fate" Symphony are scheduled. Jerome Lowenthal will play Concerto no. 1.

This is a choice of Beethoven's five piano concertos, and his biggest symphonies—3, 4, 5, 7, and 9. Quite a selection.

Full programs may be obtained from the Festival Ticket Office, Symphony Hall, Boston, or Tanglewood in Lenox, Massachusetts.

Friday evenings at 7 p.m., two hours before the symphony orchestra concert, there will be free recitals for Friday evening ticket holders in the music shed. Guest artists and members of the orchestra will perform.

Other Tanglewood Concerts are: Tanglewood on Parade, July 28 at 8:30 p.m.; Boston Pops at Tanglewood, August 11 at 8:30; and the Contemporary Trends Concerts July 7, July 21, andAugust 18.

Happy Listening!

REFORMER
BRATTLEBORO, VERMONT
(E) 8,700

JUN 26 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Concerts To Be on Air

AMHERST, Mass. — All concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the 1970 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood will be broadcast live and uninterrupted over WFCR (88.5 FM), beginning Friday, July 3.

The Boston Symphony will appear at the Tanglewood festival from July 3 until Aug. 23 under the baton of several guest conductors.

The opening performance on July 3, at 9 p.m., will include "Chichester Psalms" by Leonard Bernstein, "Atmospheres" by Gyorgy Ligeti, and "Symphonie Fantastique" by Hector Berlioz. Seiji Ozawa will be guest conductor.

Ozawa will appear six times before the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood. He will conduct the final concert on Aug. 23 at 2:30 p.m., "Requiem" by Hector Berlioz, as a memorial to Charles Munch.

Leonard Bernstein will conduct Symphony No. 2 "Resurrection" by Gustav Mahler on July 5 at 2:30 p.m. On July 24 at 9 p.m. Aaron Copland will direct "Rondo Arlecchinesco" by Ferruccio Busoni, as well as his own "Dance Panels" and "Clarinet Concerto."

The Tanglewood concerts, a regular annual feature of WFCR, will be broadcast for New England on Friday evenings at 9, Saturday evenings at 8:30, and Sunday afternoons at 2:30.

WFCR, a non-commercial public radio station in Amherst, is sponsored by Amherst, Hampshire, Mount Holyoke, Smith and the University of Massachusetts.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JUN 18 1970 New England Newsclip

BSO Live from Tanglewood on WGBH

In July and August WGBH Radio (89.7 FM) broadcasts three Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts each week, live and in stereo, from the orchestra's summer home at Tanglewood.

Opening concert of the season is Friday, July 3 at 9 p.m. when Ozawa conducts the BSO and Tanglewood Chorus in Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms," Ligeti's "Atmospheres" and the "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz.

On Saturday, July 4, at 8:30 p.m., Ozawa conducts Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Symphony No. 36" ("Linz"). Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein is soloist in Stravinsky's "Violin Concerto" and program concludes with Stravinsky's "Firebird" "Suite".

Weekend series concludes Sunday, July 6, at 2:30 p.m., with a program conducted by Leonard Bernstein.

FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
NEWS
D. 21,000

JUN 27 1970

symphony on radio

MUSIC LOVERS all over New England are looking forward to July and August when WGBH Radio (89.7 FM) broadcasts three Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts each weekend, live and in stereo, from the Orchestra's summer home at Tanglewood.

The opening concert of the season is Friday, July 3 at 9 p.m. when the young Japanese conducts the BSO and the Tanglewood Chorus in Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms," Ligeti's "Atmospheres," and the "Fantastic symphony" of Berlioz.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JUL 9 1970 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Live From Lenox On WGBH-FM

Seiji Ozawa directs the Boston Symphony in three full-length concerts on WGBH-FM live and in stereo the week of July 12 broadcast directly from the Music Shed at the orchestra's summer home in Lenox.

On Sunday, July 12 at 2:30 pm., Ozawa conducts "Romeo and Juliet" by Prokofiev; Schoenberg's "Piano Concerto" with Peter Serkin as soloist and "Three Pieces foer Blues Band and Orchestra" by Russo, with the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

Soloists on Friday, July 17 at 9 p.m. are Japanese string player Yuji Takahashi, tenor John Alexander and Boston Symphony first horn player James Stagliano, in a program which includes "Symphony No. 86" by Haydn, "Eonta" by Xenakis, "Serenade for Tenor, Horn and Strings" by Britten and "Divertissement" by Ibert.

On Saturday, July 18 at 8:30 p.m., Ozawa's program includes "Serenade No. 10 for 13 Wind Instruments" and "Piano Concerto in D Minor, K. 466" both by Mozart, with Lili Kraus as soloist in the concerto.

RECORDER-GAZETTE
GREENFIELD, MASS.
(E) 13,822

JUN 27 1970 New England Newsclip

WFCR To Air Concerts At Tanglewood

All concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the 1970 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood will be broadcast live and uninterrupted over WFCR beginning next Friday.

The Boston Symphony will appear at the Tanglewood festival from July 3 until Aug. 23 under the baton of several guest conductors.

The opening performance on July 3, at 9 p.m., will include "Chichester Psalms" by Leonard Bernstein, "Atmospheres" by Gyorgy Ligeti, and "Symphonie Fantastique" by Hector Berlioz. Seiji Ozawa will be guest conductor.

Ozawa will appear six times before the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood. He will conduct the final concert on Aug. 23 at 2:30 p.m., "Requiem" by Hector Berlioz, as a memorial to Charles Munch.

Bernstein will conduct Symphony No. 2 "Resurrection" by Gustav Mahler on July 5 at 2:30 p.m. On July 24 at 9 p.m. Aaron Copland will direct "Rondo Arlecchinesco" by Ferruccio Busoni, as well as his own "Dance Panels" and "Clarinet Concerto."

The Tanglewood concerts, a regular annual feature of WFCR, will be broadcast for New England on Friday evenings at 9:00, Saturday evenings at 8:30, and Sunday afternoons at 2:30. WFCR is a non-commercial public radio station in Amherst, Massachusetts.

Tanglewood Opens

BSO OFF TO BRILLIANT START

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Against a background of mountains darkly looming through rainy mist, the 1970 programs of the Boston Symphony got off to a brilliant start. Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, artistic directors, with Leonard Bernstein, advisor, are all also conducting, William Steinberg leading only All-Beethoven concerts later on. The young directors have shelved the tradition of Bach-Mozart chamber orchestra for openers and set out with the BSO in full cry, Ozawa conducting Bernstein, Ligeti and Berlioz, and then Mozart and Stravinsky; Bernstein, the Mahler Second Symphony (Resurrection). The conductors are two of a kind, theatrical in gesture but always addressing the performers and rarely imaginative in concentration on expressive musical detail and continuity.

The Bernstein "Psalms" (six of them) for choir, boy soprano and orchestra, commissioned for the festival at Chichester Cathedral in 1965 (an ecumenical work, surely, sung in Hebrew), is a clean, direct use of modern idiom to say particular things without confusion (a rarity since Mozart). Ozawa elicited the lyricism and drama of the old texts with subtle justice. Elliot Forbes' Harvard-Radcliffe chorus plus John Oliver's Tanglewood group added well-trained humanity to the ensemble, topped occasionally by the assured purity of Robert Puleo's boy-soprano (R.P. is a seasoned veteran at 14 and his soaring voice a proof of heaven).

Liget's "Atmospheres" was worth hearing again for its color - impressionism of tone, complex but hearable, and always developing in a mesmeric way, sometimes with overt counterpoint of masses. (The nearest thing visually would be the color-organ of the twenties, but the mixtures of tone, as handled by Ozawa, were more magical).

Finally Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique" lost its status as a symphonic war-horse and resumed the freshness of the composer's fevered dream. The first three movements can sound banal, but Ozawa redeemed them by attention to details of counterpoint and orchestration that figured in Berlioz's conception. The "March to the Scaffold" and the "Dream of Witches' Sabbath" took on the intensity of nightmare with thrilling orchestral virtuosity.

In routine performance, the idee fixe—that yearning love-theme that crops up in each movement seems only like variation on a foolish obsession—oh, that old harridan again!—but in this version was convincing. The orchestra's delicate rubatos created seduction in all its lovely disguises.

Saturday night's program gave the "Overture" to Figaro and brilliant spit-and-polish, the Symphony no. 36 (Linz) unassuming but fresh clarity of infectious form. Hastily composed in a few days for a concert at Linz, much of it is predictable Mozart (though never dull) but with moments of inspired originality that are still startling.

Stravinsky thought of Mozart developments as technical stretching-out of good themes (nothing could be further from the unleashed fantasy of Mozart's or Beethoven's development sections). At any rate, Stravinsky constrained his "Violin concerto in D" to primary ideas—"Toccata" (which he dignified as "carved in stone") played with incisive drive by Joseph Silverstein in friendly battle with the orchestra, two "Arias"—the second giving the violin a chance from singing warmth and "Capriccio" in which the fight is resumed, alleviated by rhythmical passages of shifting meter that recall the ballets. Going back from 1931 to 1919, Ozawa treated us to a refreshening of the Suite from the "Firebird" (Stravinsky's second version of three) that was a technicolored dream of loveliness and demonic evil. The solo melodies were alluringly phrased, the "Infernal Dance" and "Finale" hair-raising — even the over-extended climax effective with Ozawa's control of power. And one realizes what a fine work, beautifully contaminated by the art of the dance.

On Sunday a fitful sun brought out the grass-crowd and the picnic hampers, but on-stage all was musical dedication. Bernstein re-created the inordinate glory of Mahler's "Second" with complete success. Lorna Haywood, soprano, and especially Christa Ludwig, contralto; the Harvard and the Tanglewood choruses, and a responsive orchestra coalesced into great Mahler. The Allegro was theatrically tragic, the Andante nostalgic Vienneses lyricism, the third movement enlarged without any loss of wry humor from Mahler's song about St. Anthony's sermon to the fish, the fourth derived from his song, "Primal Light" (sung by Ludwig with deep beauty), the chorale music, lifting chromatically out of Bach—vocal chorale or richly toned by the brass—ineffable—and then the eruption of the Finale with all forces contributing to the grand inspiration that came to Mahler from Klopstock's poem ("the seed you have sown with bloom again—"). A triumphal march evolves—a tremendous affirmation of hopeful faith. It is impossible to verbalize the complex detail of this music, but Bernstein knows it well.

Applause grew into a demonstration in which the audience seemed to find release in its own extravagant participation. And that's good, too.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JUL 9 1970 New England Newsclip

Music Review

First Tanglewood Weekend

By JAY ROSENFELD

THERE WERE fireworks in the concerts at Tanglewood over the Fourth. Personalities, programs and performances were detonated for the three events of the first weekend of the 1970 Berkshire Festival with rare discrimination.

The conductors, Seiji Ozawa and Leonard Bernstein, lit the fuses and the displays were of extraordinary brilliance. Ozawa divided his two programs into equal halves of contemporary music and works from the established repertory. Bernstein devoted his sole program yesterday afternoon to the one long symphony, the second, of Gustav Mahler.

An enthusiastic audience of 22,489 listeners paid to attend the opening weekend, about 1,650 more than last season. Leonard Bernstein and the Boston Symphony were given an 11-minute ovation following the Sunday performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 2 ("Resurrection). The Bernstein concert was attended by some 9,122 listeners, 300 of whom swarmed the conductor blocking him from his dressing room for 15 minutes. The Friday evening concert featuring Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique" drew 4,373 listeners. Some 2,640 patrons attended the open rehearsal on Saturday morning, with 6,354 gathering in the evening for a Mozart program directed by Seiji Ozawa.

* * *

THE OPENING music of the first concert Friday evening was the "Chichester Psalms" of Bernstein, a commission five years ago from the dean of the English Cathedral where annually there are special musical conventions of the three neighboring cathedral cities of Chichester, Salisbury and Winchester. It is novel and effective music. Bernstein uses the Hebrew versions of a half-dozen psalms as his text and they are sung in the vernacular, following the pattern he had employed with his "Kaddish" symphony two years ago. The opening statement is vigorously syncopated, making a surprising impact on ears expectant of more solemn measures.

A mixed choir consisting of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society with Elliot Forbes, conductor, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus with John Oliver, director, performed with forthright tonal splendor, as they did yesterday afternoon for Bernstein in his Mahler symphony.

The second part of the Bernstein cantata calls for a boy soprano soloist and Robert Puleo sang the 23rd psalm with aplomb, clear tone and appropriate involvement. It starts with only harps accompanying the soloist but when the psalm 2vv. 1-4 arrives with its message of "Why do the heathen rage?," there is an explosive interruption, sharp and incisive, which recedes into a a capella chorale of deep impact.

Leonard Bernstein

Ozawa beckoned Bernstein from the audience to acknowledge the applause his music had evoked. His leap onto the stage followed by successive leaps off-stage of the composer, conductor and soloist was an hilarious demonstration of youthful zest, physical stamina and artistic fraternity.

* * *

GYORGY LIGETI'S "Atmospheres" is reminiscent of some old Varese. Strings activated practically inaudibly and strange employment of the wind instruments conveyed realistic impressions of the elements. One "heard a stream of light" and saw two performers brushing the innards of the piano strings with whisk brooms. It sounds more strange in the telling than in the listening, but still when a sneeze emanated from among the audience, it was not apparent whether it was part of the act or not.

The string players have aleatory assignments, each one doing his thing at his pleasure. Some of the musicians lost their place but it didn't matter. Ozawa seemed to be outside the action. The music had no rhythmic goal but did have a not unpleasant sense as of fog or mist. It was not clear why and what the conductor was beating. The sounds were not harsh, only aimless and indecisive, but Ozawa seemed to be removed from his detached retinue.

Ozawa's "Fantastique" left a few things to be desired. The final witches' sabbath stirred the audience to a near frenzy, but a virtuoso orchestra playing Berlioz' pages loud and fast is a combination hard to beat. The ball scene was superficial and the ritards were stilted and ungraceful. The march to the scaffold is one of the greatest rhythmic inspirations in all music. It ranks with the opening steps of the Brahms 3rd Symphony. No one can exhaust the last grain of rhythmic elan from its few notes. Ozawa was not far off but he needs still further distillation of its potent resiliency.

* * *

SATURDAY EVENING was Mozart's overature to "Le Nozze di Figaro," and Symphony no. 36 in C (K425) familiarly designated as "The Linz." After intermission the concert-master of the Boston Symphony, Joseph Silverstein, gave a violinistically masterful rendition of the Stravinsky concerto in D. It was near perfection, but almost too polite for the brash, unhewn phrases of Stravinsky. The violinist for whom it was written, Samuel Dushkin, was not such a smooth performer as Silverstein. Polish and refinement do not look too well on Stravinsky.

The same composer's Suite from his ballet "The Firebird" won the conductor an ovation. There has never been a conductor at Tanglewood who, by his appearance, his manner and art, has endeared himself to his audience more than Ozawa. His short fast steps, almost a run, both entering and exiting, his hands pressed to his chest as in prayer, his humble pleasing smile and his apparently genuine wish to indicate that the appreciation belongs to the musicians and not to the man with the baton all combine to captivate his audiences.

* * *

THERE WAS an aura of heroic magnificence to yesterday's Mahler. There was pressure and dramatic ebullience from the initial tremolo of the violins to the sharp breakoff of the final chord an hour and a half later. It was written to order for a man of Bernstein's gifts, and yesterday the conductor endowed every bar with overwhelming passion. Yet, there were many instances of tenderness. It would be a moot question if any music has ever been played with more graphic grace and rhythmic taste than the terly charming and simple andante, the second movement of the symphony.

Mahler loved to build up climaxes and Bernstein gave his all to execute every last detail. The peaks of tension and then the sudden halts to antipodal quiet at the precipitous edges were executed with breath-taking effect. The controlled ritards, the tonal splendor of the huge orchestra Mahler demands, the piquancy of the strings and, in one conspicuous instance, of the piccolo, were feats not so unusual for the Boston orchestra as was their appropriate insertion.

In the fourth movement, contralto Christa Ludwig sang the "Urlicht," (Primal Dawn). Mahler inserted this poem of Gottlieb Klopstock, the German poet of a deeply religious mind, because he found its noble and epic character suitable for his purposes. It would be impossible to magnify the vocal majesty and regal significance with which Miss Ludwig delivered her short verse. There is one line "I would rather be in heaven" for which, in the original German, Mahler devised a rising pianissimo octave of the word "Himmel." It is a masterpiece of vocal congruity and musical significance. Miss Ludwig made it a phrase of sublime art.

* * *

IN THE FIFTH movement, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus combined their voices with the orchestra. Soprano soloist, Lorna Haywood, also contributed her too short assignment to the accumulating nobility of the finale.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 6 1970 New England Newsclip

B.S.O.

CONCERTS

1st week

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 9 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Reviews

Friday, July 3
By A.C.S.

Seiji Ozawa put together a most interesting program for his first concert as an artistic director and principal conductor at Tanglewood this summer. Leonard Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms" was given a splendid performance. It is a winning work, anyway, with its infectious rhythms and lyrical melodies. But the combined efforts of the BSO, Festival Chorus, Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, and the beautiful singing of the boy alto Robert Puleo made it memorable. The composer was on hand for a standing ovation.

"Atmospheres," a complex bit of writing by the Hungarian-born composer Gyorgy Ligeti, suffered somewhat from the acoustical properties of the Tanglewood Shed. The extremely quiet portions of the work were inaudible. Only the activity of the conductor's hands made it apparent that something was going on.

Ozawa's reading of the Berlioz "Fantastic Symphony" was brilliant. If one occasionally wished for more elasticity in phrasing, there was nevertheless, a sense of inevitability which was pervasive. The final movement, taken at breakneck speed but marvelously controlled, was spine-tingling. It was a suitable climax for the first in what appears to be an imaginative series of concerts.

Saturday, July 4
By D.D.

Soggy, damp weather cast somewhat of an acoustic pall over the grounds at Tanglewood for the second concert of this summer's series. Leading the B.S.O. was the young Japanese conductor Seiji Ozawa, who is also artistic director to the orchestra. The program included two Mozart works, the Overture to the Marriage of Figaro and the Symphony no. 36. Two Stravinsky works, the Violin Concerto and the Firebird occupied the second half. It is unlikely Mr. Ozawa will earn any particular laurels as a Mozart interpreter. Dynamic markings dutifully observed, each note in the proper place, with an occasional felicity in phrasing, were not quite enough to transmit the exuberance of this music. Even the ensemble sound, especially the high strings, was lack-lustre and flat. The excessive dampness could have been at fault.

Mr. Silverstein's usually brilliant tone came over muted and inaudible at times. Mr. Ozawa, obviously more in his element than in the Mozart, worked closely with the soloist. The aria No. 2 with its plaintive oriental cast, was projected with intense feeling and sensitivity to style. The Firebird Suite seemed to be the work most suited to the young conductor's temperament. The strings managed to shake their lethargy, perhaps so as not to be outdone by a ferocious percussion section. Here was genuine excitement, however, in the framework of a competent, if not superior reading.

Sunday, July 5
By D.D.

Leonard Bernstein, directing the forces of the BSO, the Harvard-Radcliffe Choral Society, and soloists Christa Ludwig and Lorna Haywood, turned in a memorable performance of Mahler's large-scale Symphony no. 2, "The Resurrection." Based on Klopstick's Ode bearing the same name, this remarkable score, deeply religious in its conception and complex in structure, makes enormous interpretative demands on conductor and musicians.

Leonard Bernstein, in many critics' opinion the most competent Mahler exponent today, turned in a performance which more than justifies this view. Maneuvering with consummate skill and dramatic intensity an unwieldy aggregate of mixed chorus, soloists and out-size orchestra, molded a multitude of disparate and contrasting elements into a coherent whole, beautifully articulate in detail. If one can conceive of a mystical experience translated into sound, this was a very close approximation.

From the first powerful chords in the basses, suggestive of death, through the tender, flowing, sprightly rhythmic folk-like melodies, to the spine-chilling finale, the listener was ever aware of forward movement, of progression towards the ineffable, which was indeed Mahler's intent. A long standing ovation testified to a marvelous musical experience given and shared.

Tanglewood Opens

BSO OFF TO BRILLIANT START

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Against a background of mountains darkly looming through rainy mist, the 1970 programs of the Boston Symphony got off to a brilliant start. Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, artistic directors, with Leonard Bernstein, advisor, are all also conducting, William Steinberg leading only All-Beethoven concerts later on. The young directors have shelved the tradition of Bach-Mozart chamber orchestra for openers and set out with the BSO in full cry, Ozawa conducting Bernstein, Ligeti and Berlioz, and then Mozart and Stravinsky; Bernstein, the Mahler Second Symphony (Resurrection). The conductors are two of a kind, theatrical in gesture but always addressing the performers and rarely imaginative in concentration on expressive musical detail and continuity.

The Bernstein "Psalms" (six of them) for choir, boy soprano and orchestra, commissioned for the festival at Chichester Cathedral in 1965 (an ecumenical work, surely, sung in Hebrew), is a clean, direct use of modern idiom to say particular things without confusion (a rarity since Mozart). Ozawa elicited the lyricism and drama of the old texts with subtle justice. Elliot Forbes' Harvard-Radcliffe chorus plus John Oliver's Tanglewood group added well-trained humanity to the ensemble, topped occasionally by the assured purity of Robert Puleo's boy-soprano (R.P. is a seasoned veteran at 14 and his soaring voice a proof of heaven).

Liget's "Atmospheres" was worth hearing again for its color - impressionism of tone, complex but hearable, and always developing in a mesmeric way, sometimes with overt counterpoint of masses. (The nearest thing visually would be the color-organ of the twenties, but the mixtures of tone, as handled by Ozawa, were more magical).

Finally Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique" lost its status as a symphonic war-horse and resumed the freshness of the composer's fevered dream. The first three movements can sound banal, but Ozawa redeemed them by attention to details of counterpoint and orchestration that figured in Berlioz's conception. The "March to the Scaffold" and the "Dream of Witches' Sabbath" took on the intensity of nightmare with thrilling orchestral virtuosity.

In routine performance, the idee fixe—that yearning love-theme that crops up in each movement seems only like variation on a foolish obsession—oh, that old harridan again!—but in this version was convincing. The orchestra's delicate rubatos created seduction in all its lovely disguises.

Saturday night's program gave the "Overture" to Figaro and brilliant spit-and-polish, the Symphony no. 36 (Linz) unassuming but fresh clarity of infectious form. Hastliy composed in a few days for a concert at Linz, much of it is predictable Mozart (though never dull) but with moments of inspired originality that are still startling.

Stravinsky thought of Mozart developments as technical stretching-out of good themes (nothing could be further from the unleashed fantasy of Mozart's or Beethoven's development sections). At any rate, Stravinsky constrained his "Violin concerto in D" to primary ideas—"Toccata" (which he dignified as "carved in stone") played with incisive drive by Joseph Silverstein in friendly battle with the orchestra, two "Arias"—the second giving the violin a chance from singing warmth and "Capriccio" in which the fight is resumed, alleviated by rhythmical passages of shifting meter that recall the ballets. Going back from 1931 to 1919, Ozawa treated us to a refreshening of the Suite from the "Firebird" (Stravinsky's second version of three) that was a technicolored dream of loveliness and demonic evil. The solo melodies were alluringly phrased, the "Infernal Dance" and "Finale" hair-raising — even the over-extended climax effective with Ozawa's control of power. And one realizes what a fine work, beautifully contaminated by the art of the dance.

On Sunday a fitful sun brought out the grass-crowd and the picnic hampers, but on-stage all was musical dedication. Bernstein re-created the inordinate glory of Mahler's "Second" with complete success. Lorna Haywood, soprano, and especially Christa Ludwig, contralto; the Harvard and the Tanglewood choruses, and a responsive orchestra coalesced into great Mahler. The Allegro was theatrically tragic, the Andante nostalgic Vienneses lyricism, the third movement enlarged without any loss of wry humor from Mahler's song about St. Anthony's sermon to the fish, the fourth derived from his song, "Primal Light" (sung by Ludwig with deep beauty), the chorale music, lifting chromatically out of Bach—vocal chorale or richly toned by the brass—ineffable—and then the eruption of the Finale with all forces contributing to the grand inspiration that came to Mahler from Klopstock's poem ("the seed you have sown with bloom again—"). A triumphal march evolves—a tremendous affirmation of hopeful faith. It is impossible to verbalize the complex detail of this music, but Bernstein knows it well.

Applause grew into a demonstration in which the audience seemed to find release in its own extravagant participation. And that's good, too.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JUL 9 1970 New England Newsclip

Music Review

First Tanglewood Weekend

By JAY ROSENFELD

THERE WERE fireworks in the concerts at Tanglewood over the Fourth. Personalities, programs and performances were detonated for the three events of the first weekend of the 1970 Berkshire Festival with rare discrimination.

The conductors, Seiji Ozawa and Leonard Bernstein, lit the fuses and the displays were of extraordinary brilliance. Ozawa divided his two programs into equal halves of contemporary music and works from the established repertory. Bernstein devoted his sole program yesterday afternoon to the one long symphony, the second, of Gustav Mahler.

An enthusiastic audience of 22,489 listeners paid to attend the opening weekend, about 1,650 more than last season. Leonard Bernstein and the Boston Symphony were given an 11-minute ovation following the Sunday performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 2 ("Resurrection). The Bernstein concert was attended by some 9,122 listeners, 300 of whom swarmed the conductor blocking him from his dressing room for 15 minutes. The Friday evening concert featuring Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique" drew 4,373 listeners. Some 2,640 patrons attended the open rehearsal on Saturday morning, with 6,354 gathering in the evening for a Mozart program directed by Seiji Ozawa.

* * *

THE OPENING music of the first concert Friday evening was the "Chichester Psalms" of Bernstein, a commission five years ago from the dean of the English Cathedral where annually there are special musical conventions of the three neighboring cathedral cities of Chichester, Salisbury and Winchester. It is novel and effective music. Bernstein uses the Hebrew versions of a half-dozen psalms as his text and they are sung in the vernacular, following the pattern he had employed with his "Kaddish" symphony two years ago. The opening statement is vigorously syncopated, making a surprising impact on ears expectant of more solemn measures.

A mixed choir consisting of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society with Elliot Forbes, conductor, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus with John Oliver, director, performed with forthright tonal splendor, as they did yesterday afternoon for Bernstein in his Mahler symphony.

The second part of the Bernstein cantata calls for a boy soprano soloist and Robert Puleo sang the 23rd psalm with aplomb, clear tone and appropriate involvement. It starts with only harps accompanying the soloist but when the psalm 2vv. 1-4 arrives with its message of "Why do the heathen rage?," there is an explosive interruption, sharp and incisive, which recedes into a a capella chorale of deep impact.

Leonard Bernstein

Ozawa beckoned Bernstein from the audience to acknowledge the applause his music had evoked. His leap onto the stage followed by successive leaps off-stage of the composer, conductor and soloist was an hilarious demonstration of youthful zest, physical stamina and artistic fraternity.

* * *

GYORGY LIGETI'S "Atmospheres" is reminiscent of some old Varese. Strings activated practically inaudibly and strange employment of the wind instruments conveyed realistic impressions of the elements. One "heard a stream of light" and saw two performers brushing the innards of the piano strings with whisk brooms. It sounds more strange in the telling than in the listening, but still when a sneeze emanated from among the audience, it was not apparent whether it was part of the act or not.

The string players have aleatory assignments, each one doing his thing at his pleasure. Some of the musicians lost their place but it didn't matter. Ozawa seemed to be outside the action. The music had no rhythmic goal but did have a not unpleasant sense as of fog or mist. It was not clear why and what the conductor was beating. The sounds were not harsh, only aimless and indecisive, but Ozawa seemed to be removed from his detached retinue.

Ozawa's "Fantastique" left a few things to be desired. The final witches' sabbath stirred the audience to a near frenzy, but a virtuoso orchestra playing Berlioz' pages loud and fast is a combination hard to beat. The ball scene was superficial and the ritards were stilted and ungraceful. The march to the scaffold is one of the greatest rhythmic inspirations in all music. It ranks with the opening steps of the Brahms 3rd Symphony. No one can exhaust the last grain of rhythmic elan from its few notes. Ozawa was not far off but he needs still further distillation of its potent resilency.

* * *

SATURDAY EVENING was Mozart's overature to "Le Nozze di Figaro," and Symphony no. 36 in C (K425) familiarly designated as "The Linz." After intermission the concert-master of the Boston Symphony, Joseph Silverstein, gave a violinistically masterful rendition of the Stravinsky concerto in D. It was near perfection, but almost too polite for the brash, unhewn phrases of Stravinsky. The violinist for whom it was written, Samuel Dushkin, was not such a smooth performer as Silverstein. Polish and refinement do not look too well on Stravinsky.

The same composer's Suite from his ballet "The Firebird" won the conductor an ovation. There has never been a conductor at Tanglewood who, by his appearance, his manner and art, has endeared himself to his audience more than Ozawa. His short fast steps, almost a run, both entering and exiting, his hands pressed to his chest as in prayer, his humble pleasing smile and his apparently genuine wish to indicate that the appreciation belongs to the musicians and not to the man with the baton all combine to captivate his audiences.

* * *

THERE WAS an aura of heroic magnificence to yesterday's Mahler. There was pressure and dramatic ebullience from the initial tremolo of the violins to the sharp breakoff of the final chord an hour and a half later. It was written to order for a man of Bernstein's gifts, and yesterday the conductor endowed every bar with overwhelming passion. Yet, there were many instances of tenderness. It would be a moot question if any music has ever been played with more graphic grace and rhythmic taste than the utterly charming and simple andante, the second movement of the symphony.

Mahler loved to build up climaxes and Bernstein gave his all to execute every last detail. The peaks of tension and then the sudden halts to antipodal quiet at the precipitous edges were executed with breath-taking effect. The controlled ritards, the tonal splendor of the huge orchestra Mahler demands, the piquancy of the strings and, in one conspicuous instance, of the piccolo, were feats not so unusual for the Boston orchestra as was their appropriate insertion.

In the fourth movement, contralto Christa Ludwig sang the "Urlicht," (Primal Dawn). Mahler inserted this poem of Gottlieb Klopstock, the German poet of a deeply religious mind, because he found its noble and epic character suitable for his purposes. It would be impossible to magnify the vocal majesty and regal significance with which Miss Ludwig delivered her short verse. There is one line "I would rather be in heaven" for which, in the original German, Mahler devised a rising pianissimo octave of the word "Himmel." It is a masterpiece of vocal congruity and musical significance. Miss Ludwig made it a phrase of sublime art.

* * *

IN THE FIFTH movement, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus combined their voices with the orchestra. Soprano soloist, Lorna Haywood, also contributed her too short assignment to the accumulating nobility of the finale.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 6 1970 New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 9 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Reviews

Friday, July 3
By A.C.S.

Seiji Ozawa put together a most interesting program for his first concert as an artistic director and principal conductor at Tanglewood this summer. Leonard Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms" was given a splendid performance. It is a winning work, anyway, with its infectious rhythms and lyrical melodies. But the combined efforts of the BSO, Festival Chorus, Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, and the beautiful singing of the boy alto Robert Puleo made it memorable. The composer was on hand for a standing ovation.

"Atmospheres," a complex bit of writing by the Hungarian-born composer Gyorgy Ligeti, suffered somewhat from the acoustical properties of the Tanglewood Shed. The extremely quiet portions of the work were inaudible. Only the activity of the conductor's hands made it apparent that something was going on.

Ozawa's reading of the Berlioz "Fantastic Symphony" was brilliant. If one occasionally wished for more elasticity in phrasing, there was nevertheless, a sense of inevitability which was pervasive. The final movement, taken at breakneck speed but marvelously controlled, was spine-tingling. It was a suitable climax for the first in what appears to be an imaginative series of concerts.

Saturday, July 4
By D.D.

Soggy, damp weather cast somewhat of an acoustic pall over the grounds at Tanglewood for the second concert of this summer's series. Leading the B.S.O. was the young Japanese conductor Seiji Ozawa, who is also artistic director to the orchestra. The program included two Mozart works, the Overture to the Marriage of Figaro and the Symphony no. 36. Two Stravinsky works, the Violin Concerto and the Firebird occupied the second half. It is unlikely Mr. Ozawa will earn any particular laurels as a Mozart interpreter. Dynamic markings dutifully observed, each note in the proper place, with an occasional felicity in phrasing, were not quite enough to transmit the exuberance of this music. Even the ensemble sound, especially the high strings, was lack-lustre and flat. The excessive dampness could have been at fault.

Mr. Silverstein's usually brilliant tone came over muted and inaudible at times. Mr. Ozawa, obviously more in his element than in the Mozart, worked closely with the soloist. The aria No. 2 with its plaintive oriental cast, was projected with intense feeling and sensitivity to style. The Firebird Suite seemed to be the work most suited to the young conductor's temperament. The strings managed to shake their lethargy, perhaps so as not to be outdone by a ferocious percussion section. Here was genuine excitement, however, in the framework of a competent, if not superior reading.

Sunday, July 5
By D.D.

Leonard Bernstein, directing the forces of the BSO, the Harvard-Radcliffe Choral Society, and soloists Christa Ludwig and Lorna Haywood, turned in a memorable performance of Mahler's large-scale Symphony no. 2, "The Resurrection." Based on Klopstick's Ode bearing the same name, this remarkable score, deeply religious in its conception and complex in structure, makes enormous interpretative demands on conductor and musicians.

Leonard Bernstein, in many critics' opinion the most competent Mahler exponent today, turned in a performance which more than justifies this view. Maneuvering with consummate skill and dramatic intensity an unwieldy aggregate of mixed chorus, soloists and out-size orchestra, molded a multitude of disparate and contrasting elements into a coherent whole, beautifully articulate in detail. If one can conceive of a mystical experience translated into sound, this was a very close approximation.

From the first powerful chords in the basses, suggestive of death, through the tender, flowing, sprightly rhythmic folk-like melodies, to the spine-chilling finale, the listener was ever aware of forward movement, of progression towards the ineffable, which was indeed Mahler's intent. A long standing ovation testified to a marvelous musical experience given and shared.

One commanding presence dominated the Berkshire Festival scene this week-end, as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer season at Tanglewood, got under way. A new artistic directorship has taken over this summer - in the form of Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, who share those responsibilties. But it was Tanglewood's newly-appointed Advisor - Leonard Bernstein - who towered over everything. On Thursday evening, with the student orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center, Mr. Bernstein conducted an Open Rehearsal of Bruckner's Ninth Symphony that was unbelievable - an inspired revelation of that monumental score. I'll have more to say about that evening in a separate piece later in the week.

On Friday evening, Ozawa began the formal aspects of the 1970 Berkshire Festival season conducting the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of one of Bernstein's most recent compositions - his Chichester Psalms, dating from 1965. The Ozawa performance, enlisting choral support from the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and Tanglewood Festival Chorus - and a remarkable performance of the boy alto part by Robert Puleo, was serviceable, if hardly of the passionately committed sort that I have heard Bernstein himself conduct. Atmospheres by the contemporary Hungarian composer, Gyorgy Ligeti, and Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique completed the Friday program, and last evening Ozawa conducted music by Mozart and Stravinsky, with the orchestra's brilliant concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, as soloist in the Stravinsky Violin Concerto. Throughout both concerts, I found myself increasingly puzzled and ultimately irritated by an underlying problem that I had not felt before in Ozawa's conducting - a rhythmic flabbiness that robbed much of the music of its spring and vitality. In the Fantastique, worst of all, he fell victim to an old student affliction: equating excitement and tension with faster and louder, so that whenever he had to convey the qualities of tension and excitement, he whipped up the music until it all became self-defeating.

And so to this afternoon's concert, which brought Bernstein back to the Music Shed podium at Tanglewood for the first time in five years. He brought with

This is Martin Bernheim

ROUND-UP OF OPENENING WEEK-END'S BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL CONCERTS

WNAC-TV 11 PM NEWS SUNDAY, JULY 5, 1970

Rousing Ovation for Bernstein

By GEORGE W. STOWE

Looking over the almost 10,000 people who gathered at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon, I would be the last one to say that Leonard Bernstein had lost his charisma.

Certainly the combination of Mahler's Second ("Resurrection") Symphony and probably the finest Mahler interpreter of this ... was unbeat... massive ... stirring i... spired a ... ovation fro...

Back in ... heard Berns... symphony a... Both perfo... strong emotio... but Bernstein ... tremendously in... Certainly the fin... with chorus and ... never been perfo... more searing effe... was on Sunday.

The mighty di... opens the symphony ... somewhat from an im... that resulted from too ... percussion in the cli...

done it with comparable feel... ing.

The scherzo had ... sive bite and ... lation ...

'Super-Star' Leonard Bernstein Conducts Stunning Performance

By RICHARD CONWAY

If there is a "Super-Star" of the concert music world, it is surely Leonard Bernstein.

With the exception of the general lawn area, it was standing room only at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon. One doubts that it was only the work being performed that brought the large crowd.

Not that the work itself is not great. Gustav Mahler's Second Symphony, called the "Resurrection," is a remarkable piece of music. It is probably the best known and most often performed of the composer's works. It is a ... ting an hour and a ... erform; and it is ... an intermission. ... typical of ... is massive ... There are ... of which by the way was ex... cellently prepared. They ... sang the kopstock ... "Resurrection" chorale ... ich Mahler incorporated ... the final movement of ... k, with beautiful tone ... and deep un... Haywo... na ... udwig ...

But we wonder how many caught Mahler's life and death message. At least in the last two movements, that is what the music is all about.

assurance of life again after death. Mahler worked on it for seven years.

It is also a puzzling work. The second and third movements, which are dancelike in nature, seem to have little or nothing to do with the first, fourth, and fifth movements.

composer, who gave programatic meaning to most of his work, says that it is much easier to hear the three movements.

The performance of the work Sunday afternoon was stunning. Under Bernstein's conducting, the theatrical Symphony weaved through the many changes of mood and atmosphere — now tender, now solemn, now anguished, now assured.

Bernstein got it all out of the orchestra and chorus, and the kopstock ... chorale ... movement of ... tone ... deep ... Haywo... ...

physically demanding style of conducting have surely won converts to the world of serious music. That is no small achievement in this day.

The chorus, consisting of the Boston Glee Club, Harvard Society, Radcliffe Chorus (unproved more than the large chorus, it's here in the other assembled ... ent, in... was's off... worked ... enal who ... weaved ... of ... now the ... solemn ... assured. ... out of ... chorus, ... was ex... They ... incorporated ... of ... tone ... deep ... Haywo... ...

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 65,055
JUL 6 1970
New England Newsclip

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260
JUL 6 1970
New England Newsclip

Bernstein easily dominates Tanglewo...

Micahel J. Steinberg
...e Staff

...OX — It was Leon... ...nstein, officially as... with Tanglewood ...rst time in 15 ... dominated the ... activity here. ... principal ... pening ex... Berkshire ... led the ... Center ... per... mer ... the ... en ... y

Second Symphony, enlist... ing the services of the Har... vard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, conductor, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, of contralto Christa Ludwig and of soprano Lorna Haywood.

Bernstein conducted the Mahler with flair, with a highly developed sense for dramatic musical gesture, he chose Gustave Mahler's and with too little concern for integrating a series of effectively articulated details into a coherent whole. The long first and last movements of the second symphony are dangerous to a conductor who, whether because of sheer intensity feeling or for any other ...on, becomes lost in de... and who, in the passion moment, loses sight of the larger context. That happened often on Sunday, and it was most often a tempo problem.

Mahler unified these movements, which are so huge and so rich in material of the most diverse sorts, by establishing a main tempo which functions as a point of reference, something to depart from, but also something to return to. But when the main tempo turns out to be, in fact, four or five different speeds, the scaffolding wobbles, and the music seems to take on a tacky theatricality that is not really characteristic of it.

Bernstein the Mahler conductor might pay heed to Bernstein the adviser to Tanglewood who spoke so eloquently the Sunday before about the perils of impatience and of instant gratification.

The orchestral playing was lively, but also mildly disorderly. The vocal contributions, solo and choral, were very good.

As a composer, Bernstein was represented Friday night by his Chichester Psalms of 1965. Bernstein has little originality as a composer, and it is hard to escape his affectionate recollection of Stravinsky, Mahler, Copland, and, strikingly in this instance, Honegger's "King David" and its own Faurean antecedents. Even so, the Chichester Psalms, which consist of Hebrew settings in three movements of three psalms and fragments of three others, is a convincing and pleasing piece, lively, tuneful, colorfully scored lightly sentimental.

I'm not sure that its music is consistently better than that of "kaddish," which it immediately follows in Bernstein's catalogue and to which it is something like a serene counterpart.

It has, however, a cert... advantage of bei... work only of Bern... musician, not Bernstein the ... heavy thinker, of partak... ing, therefore of a simpl... ity and unpreten... that makes it ... ing.

The conductor for the Chichester Psalms was Seiji Ozawa, Tanglewood's new Artistic Director (together with Gunther Schuller). The choruses were the same as those ... Sunday's Mahler. ... Puleo was the impressive ... boy alto. The performance ... as a whole was viva... and fairly messy.

Ozawa followed Bernstein's Psalms with Gyorgy ... Ligeti's "Atmospheres." It ... is now a venerable nine ... years old and known to lots ... of people because of ... use of some of it ... It is an essa... ters an...

It ... I refer ... to tey...

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377
(E) 194,700
JUL 7 1970
New England Newsclip

One commanding

him an old specialty of the Bernstein house: Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony. Over the years, this colossal score has become very much Bernstein's own, and I remember extraordinary performances of it that he conducted in the past. This afternoon, it took the better part of the first two movements before the performance really,jelled, but once it did jell, it was little short of sensational. It had a power and a thrust, an exaltation and exultation that were the product of conductorial genius.

Bernstein is now obviously at the very peak of his conducting powers. Now that he has come back to where it all began, 30 years ago, one hopes that the management and adminsitration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make it impossible for Bernstein not to be intimately involved in the entire future development of the orchestra and its activities. He is needed desperately.

This is Martin Bookspan for Boston 7 News.

ROUND-UP OF OPENENING WEEK-END'S BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL CONCERTS

WNAC-TV 11 PM NEWS SUNDAY, JULY 5, 1970

Rousing Ovation for Bernstein

By GEORGE W. STOWE

Looking over the almost 10,000 people who gathered at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon, I would be the last one to say that Leonard Bernstein had lost his charisma.

Certainly the combination of Mahler's Second ("Resurrection") Symphony and probably the finest Mah[illegible] interpreter of this [illegible] was unbe[illegible] massive [illegible] stirring i[illegible] spired a [illegible] ovation fro[illegible]

Back in [illegible] heard Berns[illegible] symphony a[illegible] Both perfo[illegible] strong emotio[illegible] but Bernstein [illegible] tremendously in [illegible] Certainly the fin[illegible] with chorus and [illegible] never been perfo[illegible] more searing effe[illegible] was on Sunday.

The mighty d[illegible] opens the symphony [illegible] somewhat from an im[illegible] that resulted from too [illegible] percussion in the clim[illegible] done it with comparable feel[illegible] ing.

The scherzo had [illegible] sive bite and [illegible] lation [illegible]

'Super-Star' Leonard Bernstein Conducts Stunning Performance

By RICHARD CONWAY

If there is a "Super - Star" in the concert music world, it is surely Leonard Bernstein.

With the exception of the general lawn area, it was standing room only at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon. One doubts that it was only the work being performed that brought the large crowd.

Not that the work itself is not great. Gustav Mahler's Second Symphony, called the "Resurrection," is a remarkable piece of music. It is probably the best known and most often performed of the composer's works. It is a mighty an hour and a [illegible] ing an hour and a [illegible] form; and it is [illegible] an intermission. [illegible] typical of [illegible] is massive [illegible] There are [illegible] of which by the way [illegible] cellently prepared. They [illegible] sang the kopstock [illegible] "Resurrection" chorale [illegible] which Mahler incorporated [illegible] the final movement of [illegible] with beautiful tone [illegible] and deep un[illegible] assurance of life again after death. Mahler worked on it for seven years.

It is also a puzzling work. The second and third movements, which are dancelike in nature, seem to have little or nothing to do with the first, fourth, and fifth movements.

The composer, who meaning to proved more programatic most of his work, says that Bernstein's they do. To the listener, it is much easier to hear the relation among the three movements.

The performance of the work Sunday afternoon was stunning. Under Bernstein's theatrical conducting, the through the many changes of mood and atmosphere — now tender, now solemn, now anguished, now assured.

Bernstein got it all out of the orchestra and chorus, and the way was ex[illegible] kopstock [illegible] chorale [illegible] incorporated [illegible] movement of [illegible] tone [illegible] deep [illegible]

physically demanding style of conducting have surely won converts to the world of serious music. That is no small achievement in this day.

But we wonder how many caught Mahler's life and death message. At least in the last two movements, that is what the music is all about.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055
JUL 6 1970
New England Newsclip

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260
JUL 6 1970
New England Newsclip

Bernstein easily dominates Tanglewo[illegible]

Micahel J. Steinberg
[illegible]e Staff

[illegible]OX — It was Leon[illegible]nstein, officially as[illegible] with Tanglewood [illegible]rst time in 15 [illegible] dominated the [illegible] activity here. [illegible] principal [illegible]pening ex[illegible] Berkshire [illegible] led the [illegible] Center [illegible] per[illegible]mer [illegible] the [illegible]en [illegible]

Second Symphony, enlisting the services of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, conductor, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, of contralto Christa Ludwig and of soprano Lorna Haywood.

Bernstein conducted the Mahler with flair, with a highly developed sense for dramatic musical gesture, he chose Gustave Mahler's and with too little concern for integrating a series of effectively articulated details into a coherent whole. The long first and last movements of the second symphony are dangerous to a conductor who, whether because of sheer intensity feeling or for any other con, becomes lost in de- and who, in the passion moment, loses sight of the larger context. That happened often on Sunday, and it was most often a tempo problem.

Mahler unified these movements, which are so huge and so rich in material of the most diverse sorts, by establishing a main tempo which functions as a point of reference, something to depart from, but also something to return to. But when the main tempo turns out to be, in fact, four or five different speeds, the scaffolding wobbles, and the music seems to take on a tacky theatricality that is not really characteristic of it.

Bernstein the Mahler conductor might pay heed to Bernstein the adviser to Tanglewood who spoke so eloquently the Sunday before about the perils of impatience and of instant gratification.

The orchestral playing was lively, but also mildly disorderly. The vocal contributions, solo and choral, were very good.

As a composer, Bernstein was represented Friday night by his Chichester Psalms of 1965. Bernstein has little originality as a composer, and it is hard to escape his affectionate recollection of Stravinsky, Mahler, Copland, and, strikingly in this instance, Honegger's "King David" and its own Faurean antecedents. Even so, the Chichester Psalms, which consist of Hebrew settings in three movements of three psalms and fragments of three others, is a convincing and pleasing piece, lively, tuneful, colorfully scored lightly sentimental.

I'm not sure that its music is consistently better than that of "kaddish," which it immediately follows in Bernstein's catalogue and to which it is something like a serene counterpart.

It has, however, a cer[illegible] advantage of ber[illegible] work only of Be[illegible] musician, not Bernstein the heavy thinker, of partak[illegible]ing, therefore of a simp[illegible]ity and unprefer[illegible] that makes it [illegible]ing.

The conductor for the Chichester Psalms was Seiji Ozawa, Tanglewood's new Artistic Director (together with Gunther Schuller). The choruses were the same as those Sunday's Mahler. Puleo was the impressive boy alto. The performance as a whole was viva[illegible] and fairly messy.

Ozawa followed Bernstein's Psalms with Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmospheres." It is now a venerable nine years old and known to lots of people because of [illegible] use of some of it [illegible] It is an esse[illegible] ters an[illegible]

It [illegible] — I refer to tex[illegible] on[illegible]

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 566,377
(E) 194,700
JUL 7 1970
New England Newsclip

One commanding presence dominated the Berkshire Festival scene this weekend, as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer season at Tanglewood got under way. A new artistic directorship has taken over this summer - in the form of Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, who share those responsibilties. But it was Tanglewood's newly-appointed Advisor - Leonard Bernstein - who towered over everything. On Thursday evening, with the student orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center, Mr. Bernstein conducted an Open Rehearsal of Bruckner's Ninth Symphony that was unbelievable - an inspired revelation of that monumental score. I'll have more to say about that evening in a separate piece later in the week.

On Friday evening, Ozawa began the formal aspects of the 1970 Berkshire Festival season conducting the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of one of Bernstein's most recent compositions - his Chichester Psalms, dating from 1965. The Ozawa performance, enlisting choral support from the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and Tanglewood Festival Chorus - and a remarkable performance of the boy alto part by Robert Puleo, was serviceable, if hardly of the passionately committed sort that I have heard Bernstein himself conduct. Atmospheres by the contemporary Hungarian composer, Gyorgy Ligeti, and Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique completed the Friday program, and last evening Ozawa conducted music by Mozart and Stravinsky, with the orchestra's brilliant concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, as soloist in the Stravinsky Violin Concerto. Throughout both concerts, I found myself increasingly puzzled and ultimately irritated by an underlying problem that I had not felt before in Ozawa's conducting - a rhythmic flabbiness that robbed much of the music of its spring and vitality. In the Fantastique, worst of all, he fell victim to an old student affliction: equating excitement and tension with faster and louder, so that whenever he had to convey the qualities of tension and excitement, he whipped up the music until it all became self-defeating.

And so to this afternoon's concert, which brought Bernstein back to the Music Shed podium at Tanglewood for the first time in five years. He brought with

This is Martin Bookspan ...

ROUND-UP OF OPENENING WEEK-END'S BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL CONCERTS

WNAC-TV 11 PM NEWS SUNDAY, JULY 5, 1970

Rousing Ovation for Bernstein

By GEORGE W. STOWE

Looking over the almost 10,000 people who gathered at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon, I would be the last one to say that Leonard Bernstein had lost his charisma.

Certainly the combination of Mahler's Second ("Resurrection") Symphony and probably the finest Ma[illegible] interpreter of this [illegible] was unbea[illegible] massive [illegible] stirring i[illegible] spired a [illegible] ovation fro[illegible]

Back in [illegible] heard Berns[illegible] symphony a[illegible] Both perfo[illegible] strong emotio[illegible] but Bernstein [illegible] tremendously in [illegible] Certainly the fin[illegible] with chorus and [illegible] never been perf[illegible] more searing effe[illegible] was on Sunday.

The mighty di[illegible] opens the symphony [illegible] somewhat from an im[illegible] that resulted from too [illegible] percussion in the clim[illegible] done it with comparable feel- [illegible] ing.

The scherzo had [illegible] sive bite and [illegible] lation [illegible]

'Super-Star' Leonard Bernstein Conducts Stunning Performance

By RICHARD CONWAY

If there is a "Super-Star" of the concert music world, it is surely Leonard Bernstein.

With the exception of the general lawn area, it was standing room only at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon. One doubts that it was only the work being performed that brought the large crowd.

Not that the work itself is not great. Gustav Mahler's Second Symphony, called the "Resurrection," is a remarkable piece of music. It is probably the best known and most often performed of the composer's works. It is a [illegible] king an hour and a [illegible] rform; and it is [illegible] an intermission. [illegible] typical of [illegible] is massive [illegible] There are [illegible] of [illegible] sang the "Resurrection" chorale, [illegible] which Mahler incorporated [illegible] the final movement of [illegible] k, with beautiful tone [illegible] and deep un-assurance of life again after death. Mahler worked on it for seven years.

It is also a puzzling work. The second and third movements, which are to seem to have little or nothing to do with the first, fourth, and fifth movements.

At with the composer, who gave meaning to proved more programatic work, says that Bernstein's most of his work, it of the large they do. To the listener, it is much easier to hear the relation among the other three movements. assem-

The performance of the ent, in-work Sunday afternoon was's off-stunning. Under Bernstein's worked theatrical conducting, the nenal through Boston Symphony weaved who the many changes of of mood and atmosphere — now the now solemn, now — tender, now assured.

anguished, now assured. Bernstein got it all out of the orchestra and chorus, which by the way was ex-cellently prepared. They kopstock, chorale, "Resurrection" incorporated movement of beautiful tone deep un-

[illegible] na Haywo[illegible] [illegible] dwig [illegible] [illegible] heir

NEWS SPRINGFIELD, MASS. (E) 85,055 JUL 6 1970 New England Newsclip

TIMES HARTFORD, CONN. (E) 136,232 (E) 8,260 JUL 6 1970 New England Newsclip

GLOBE BOSTON, MASS. (M) 237,967 (S) 566,377 (E) 194,700 JUL 7 1970 New England Newsclip

Bernstein easily dominates Tanglewo[illegible]

Micahel J. Steinberg
[illegible] e Staff

[illegible] OX — It was Leon-[illegible] nstein, officially as-[illegible] with Tanglewood [illegible] rst time in 15 [illegible] dominated the [illegible] activity here. [illegible] principal [illegible] pening ex-[illegible] Berkshire [illegible] led the [illegible] Center [illegible] per-[illegible] mer [illegible] the [illegible] en [illegible] v

Second Symphony, enlisting the services of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, Elliot Forbes, conductor, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, John Oliver, director, of contralto Christa Ludwig and of soprano Lorna Haywood.

Bernstein conducted the Mahler with flair, with a highly developed sense for dramatic musical gesture, he chose Gustave Mahler's and with too little concern for integrating a series of effectively articulated details into a coherent whole.

The long first and last movements of the second symphony are dangerous to a conductor who, whether because of sheer intensity feeling or for any other on, becomes lost in de- nd who, in the passion moment, loses sight of the larger context. That happened often on Sunday, and it was most often a tempo problem.

Mahler unified these movements, which are so huge and so rich in material of the most diverse sorts, by establishing a main tempo which functions as a point of reference, something to depart from, but also something to return to. But when the main tempo turns out to be, in fact, four or five different speeds, the scaffolding wobbles, and the music seems to take on a tacky theatricality that is not really characteristic of it.

Bernstein the Mahler conductor might pay heed to Bernstein the adviser to Tanglewood who spoke so eloquently the Sunday before about the perils of impatience and of instant gratification.

The orchestral playing was lively, but also mildly disorderly. The vocal contributions, solo and choral, were very good.

As a composer, Bernstein was represented Friday night by his Chichester Psalms of 1965. Bernstien has little originality as a composer, and it is hard to escape his affectionate recollection of Stravinsky, Mahler, Copland, and strikingly in this instance, Honegger's "King David" and its own Faurean antecedents. Even so, the Chichester Psalms, which consist of Hebrew settings in three movements of three psalms and fragments of three others, is a convincing and pleasing piece, lively, tuneful, colorfully scored lightly sentimental.

I'm not sure that its music is consistently better than that of "kaddish," which it immediately follows in Bernstein's catalogue and to which it is something like a serene counterpart.

It has, however, a cer[illegible] advantage of be[illegible] work only of Be[illegible] musician, not Bernstein the heavy thinker, of partak-ing, therefore of a simpl[illegible] ity and unpreten[illegible] that makes it [illegible] ing.

The conductor for the Chichester Psalms was Seiji Ozawa, Tanglewood's new Artistic Director (together with Gunther Schuller). The choruses were the same as those [illegible] Sunday's Mahler. [illegible] Puleo was the impressive boy alto. The performance [illegible] as a whole was viva[illegible] and fairly messy.

Ozawa followed Bernstein's Pslams with Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmospheres." It is now a venerable nine years old and known to lots of people because of [illegible] use of some of it [illegible] It is an essa[illegible] ters an[illegible]

It [illegible] — I refer to "ex[illegible] [illegible] tra [illegible] Ligeti [illegible] of break nose-blow[illegible] applause [illegible]

Bernstein Not at His Best

By GEORGE GELLES
Star Staff Writer

LENOX, Mass. — In the troika ruling Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony, Leonard Bernstein is most removed from the day-to-day operations of the festival, for while Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller both are artistic directors, he is adviser.

But Bernstein's connection with the Berkshire festival is far more intimate than those of his colleagues. In the summers of 1940 and 1941, he studied conducting here under Koussevitzky and, from 1951 to 1955, he was successor to his mentor and led the orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center, the school run in conjunction with the festival.

Appearances here have been less frequent, the one closest to this season having been made five years ago, when Bernstein led a sizzling performance of the last act of Carmen. Yesterday, however, returning in his new advisory role with the Mahler Second Symphony, the results were less clear.

Mahler is a composer with whom Bernstein has easily identified. The combination of theatricality and true-felt feeling is one of the most obvious features of Bernstein's personal portrait linking him with the Viennese master.

But, for all the real or imagined similarities, Bernstein's readings of Mahler — whether heard in concert or returned to on disc—are wildly variable. Whereas his Third, say, is profoundly thoughtful and affecting interpretation, the Fifth, for example, is most always overly fussy and unconvincing. And somewhere between these two extremes was yesterday's performance of the Second.

"When I conceive a great musical picture I always arrive at the point where I must employ the words as the bearer of my musical idea," so wrote Mahler in reference to this symphony. And, indeed, the piece reaches its loftiest peaks in the last two movements, the settings of folk poetry from Knaben Wunderhorn and of Klopstock. And it was in these two movements as well where the conducting yesterday was at its most persuasive.

Bernstein always has seemed to have a keen feel for words, approaching them with sympathy and respecting them. Whether as composer or conductor, he usually has managed to find their essence. And, in his performance of the Second, the two texted movements were led with strength, restraint and nobility. There was nothing flashy about Bernstein's work here and nothing extraneous. It was to the point and convincing.

But, earlier in the piece, in the purely instrumental movements, things were less happy. With its extremely impacted and explosive gestures, its quick juxtapositions, the initial movement doesn't offer Bernstein the sort of broad musical field on which he operates best. Lacking spaciousness and graciousness, the score got a reading that was jagged. It didn't all hold together somehow.

While the two dance movements, innocent-seeming though they are, brought out a cuteness and wilfulness that worked against the music. So much so that the meter was completely lost at the very end of the second movement.

Lorna Haywood, soprano; Christa Ludwig, contralto; the Harvard Glee Club; Radcliffe Choral Society, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus all did fine work.

The orchestra played extremely well for Bernstein, and Bernstein himself played on the orchestra masterfully. And, even if his interpretation wasn't all one might have wanted, it was a good deal better than what one usually hears.

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 318,026 SUN. 362,408

JUL 6 1970

Newsday

L. Bernstein: Tanglewood conductor

MUSIC

The more it changes . . .

By Al Cohn

The scene changes at Tanglewood, with reports of impending financial failure, the absence of the familiar, neat balding dome of Erich Leinsdorf, the noticeable infiltration of hippie types on the sprawling lawn behind the music shed. And of course, happily, the more it changes, the more it stays the same.

The opening of the 33rd Berkshire Festival this weekend on the Tanglewood Estate at Lenox, Mass., established above all else that all is well and likely to remain so. Boston Symphony officials brushed off the wire report of several months back that if this year's festival deficit of $27,500 was not met, there would be no festival in 1971. "The overall symphony deficit comes to about $1,000,000 a year, which is the way it is with most major orchestras," a symphony spokesman shrugged. "The rumor about next year must have come from a statement we made to the effect that if something isn't done, ultimately there will be no festival.

While Leinsdorf was gone, having resigned after eight years as the symphony's music director, there were four formidable music men listed in his place, headed by the new music director, William Steinberg. Two of of the others were on hand to conduct over the weekend. Seiji Ozawa, co-artistic director with Gunther Schulelr, led the varied programs of Friday and Saturday nights. Leonard Bernstein, returning to the Boston Symphony as adviser after a 15-year absence, presided over the lengthy and powerful "Resurrection" symphony of Mahler yesterday afternoon before the weekend's biggest crowd of 9,122.

As for the hippie types they couldn't have been more peaceful and attentive if they had worn crew cuts and short sideburns.

The big attraction, of course, was Bernstein, who took part in the first conducting class of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940 under Serge Koussevitzky and had been head of the conducting class as late as 1955. But the smaller crowds of the first two nights were clearly pleased by Ozawa's firm hand, equally sure with Mozart and Stravinsky, and by his presence on the podium, which is almost as vigorous as Bernstein's. In fact, Ozawa was an assistant under Bernstein at one time, and he opened his Friday night program with Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms."

The weekend's mixed program was a departure from the all-Mozart weekends of recent years, but lovers of the popular classic works needn't fear a change in tradition in that area, either. The weekends ahead are filled with the familiar works of deFalla, Haydn and Mozart (spiced with a touch of Stravinsky and Copland). Two entire weekends at the end of July and in mid-August, honor Beethoven's 200th birthday, featuring performances by Andre Watts and Vladimir Ashkenazy. "Tanglewood," as the symphony official noted with almost aristocratic assurance, "will go on." /II

ne Photo

Berkshire briefing

Leonard Bernstein has a few rehearsal suggestions for mezzo-soprano Christa Ludwig (left), and soprano Lorna Haywood, who made their Boston Symphony debuts as soloists in Mahler's Second Symphony under Mr. Bernstein's direction at the closing concert of Tanglewood's first week.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

JUL 6 1970

Mahler, Bernstein and Ozawa Attract 22,489 to Tanglewood

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., July 5—Brooding skies that threatened rain but did not deliver it did little to discourage attendance at the opening weekend of the annual music festival at Tanglewood in the Berkshire Hills. The paid admissions were 22,489, about 1,650 over last year's total.

High spirits were not dampened either. An 11-minute ovation followed this afternoon's performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 2 ("Resurrection") by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Leonard Bernstein.

With great difficulty, Mr. Bernstein sought to get off stage as 300 spectators swarmed around him, making it 15 minutes' work for him to move about 20 feet to the sanctuary of his dressing room. The audience of 9,122 filled the shed and dotted the lawn behind it.

The festival's first performances on Friday evening drew 4,373 listeners for a program of Mahler songs, followed by Seiji Ozawa directing the Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique" and other selections.

An open rehearsal on Saturday morning attracted 2,640 patrons, and 6,354 came for a mostly Mozart program conducted by Mr. Ozawa at night.

This year there are 5,000 new seats in the shed, made of elm and white-painted steel to match the natural wood-and-white-metal shed. They are wider than the old seats, which go back to 1938, and they afford more leg room. The festival runs through Aug. 23.

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,040 (S) 56,127

JUL 7 1970 New England Newsclip

Bernstein, Ozawa Excel At Tanglewood

The 33rd Berkshire Music Festival, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their summer residence at Tanglewood, proved to be a most auspicious opening weekend of exciting and brilliant performances with Seiji Ozawa conducting Friday and Saturday evening concerts and Leonard Bernstein conducting Sunday afternoon's performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 2 ("Resurrection").

The opening weekend departed from the traditional format of presenting Mozart and Bach for the first two weekends of the festival.

Despite the inclement and threatening weather all weekend, the paid admission totaled 22,489, an increase of 1,650 over last year's attendance with Bernstein the main attraction.

Ozawa conducted the "Chichester Psalms" by Bernstein as the first work Friday evening, which featured a chorus of 120 and a boy soprano to voice excerpts from Psalms 2, 23, 208, 131, and 133. A notable orchestral work, despite its brevity, 20 minutes in all, the three movements are sung in Hebrew.

Mr. Bernstein was seated in the boxes and and was summoned by Ozawa upon its completion and the composer received a well-deserved accolade by the enthusiastic audience.

Robert Puleo, the 14-year-old soloist had an excellent voice and the chorale group, the soloist and composer were given a standing ovation.

Osawa conducted Ligeti's "Atmospheres", which most people may remember was used as background music for the spectacular film, "2001": A Space Odyssey. This is a fascinating serialistic and experimental excursion into sound, achieved with the strumming of the piano by whisk brooms or by hands on the piano strings. It proved to be a most interesting experience in sound, very much like the electronic music composer Ligeti is famous for.

Friday night's concert ended with a brilliant performance of Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique". Ozawa is fascinating to watch, as he has the lithe grace of a ballet dancer and dances all over the podium, yet successfully draws out every dramatic tone and phrase from the orchestra with controlled discipline and brilliant showmanship.

It was indeed a most melodramatic rendition of Berlioz' romantic symphony and the Japanese conductor achieved great effects. The audience gave him a most enthusiastic ovation.

Slow First Half

Saturday evening's concert started off the first half in a rather dull and disappointing performance of Mozart's Overture to "Le nozze di Figaro" and Mozart's Linz Symphony No. 36 in C. It was not the usual sparkling and scintillating Mozart one comes to expect.

However, the second half of the program, devoted to Stravinsky, was most exciting Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concert master was the soloist in Stravinsky's Violin Concerto in D, a first performance at the Festival Concerts. As always, Mr. Silverstein's pure tone and great technical mastery of his instrument played this difficult work brilliantly.

Ozawa concluded the program with the Ballet Suite from the "Firebird", composed in 1919 and it was an especially colorful and dramatic rendition, which more than made up for the dull first half. Ozawa was accorded a standing ovation for his colorful and dynamic performance, which he insisted upon sharing with the orchestra. He is quite shy and modest in his manner, and flies on and off the stage practically dancing his way through.

The highlight of the weekend was Berstein's Sunday afternoon's performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 2. This was one of the most moving muscial experiences one can remember, and the audience shared in the emotional and spectacular performance.

Mr. Bernstein and the orchestra were drained after this performance, and the audience kept up an ovation lasting 11 minutes, with the conductor dripping from head to his feet. It was truly spectacular.

The roar which resounded in the shed upon the completion of this work shall be remembered by the audience of 9,122. This year there are 5,000 new seats in the shed, made of elm and white-painted steel to match the natural wood and white metal shed. They are wider than the old seats and afford more leg room.

Next weekend activities, for the second weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will feature Ozawa and Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, and a concert version of Mozart's Cosi fan tutte. The weekend begins this coming Friday with the St. John's College Choir featured in the weekend prelude at 7 p.m. which are free to ticket-holder of the regular 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Concert.

Fruhbeck de Burgos conducts the Boston Symphony in two works by alla, El amor brujo, and the Suite from the Three-Cornered Hat. The second half of the program will feature Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

On Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Ozawa devotes the entire evening to Mozart's Cosi fan tutte with soloists Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tome Krasue and Ezio Flagello.

Ozawa conducts next Sunday at 2:30 p.m. with soloists Peter Serkin and the Corky Siegel Blues Band. Each Saturday at 10:30 a.m. there is an open rehearsal in the shed which benefits the orchestra's pension fund. Seats are unreserved and are on sale the morning of the rehearsal.

Tanglewood, in collaboration with Bill Graham's Fillmore East, presents the first three Contemporary Trends Concerts on Tuesday evenings at 6 p.m. in the Theatre Concert Hall.

S.S.M.

28

Ozawa, Bernstein Open Tanglewood 1970 Season

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

Three concerts this past weekend marked the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1970 season at Tanglewood. The programs were diversified and interesting, but eschewed the traditional orientation toward baroque and classical symphonists. Lip service was paid to Mozart Saturday, and more Mozart plus some Haydn and Bach will be forthcoming during the next eight weeks, but it is not the same kind of festival established sor to Tanglewood and Bernstein the composer, the performance was just splendid.

A similar level of excellence pervaded the reading of Atmospheres, familiar to some as the light-show scene of the film, "2001." Ozawa played the piece five years ago at Tanglewood, but then it received only lukewarm audience response. At least Friday a little more enthusiasm was shown for this fascinating piece, which consists of the full orchestra playing dense

"Aufersteh'n" chorus, which was remarkably intense and affecting. I would not for a moment condemn Bernstein's merely theatrical treatment of the work, but at the same time, it would be nice to hear some of the music's form as well as its content. Bernstein's Mahler readings are establishing a whole new Mahler tradition in this country; let us hope the composer is not always done such a great disservice.

Ozawa Provides Exciting Berlioz

By GEORGE W. STOWE

Will Seiji Ozawa provide the shot in the arm that Tanglewood needs to keep the customers coming?

The young Japanese conductor with the tremendous mop of hair and the flamboyant manner opened the Berkshire Music Festival Friday night and aroused a wild ovation when he conducted Berlioz' "Symphonie Fontastique."

Despite his showmanship (which is reminiscent of the younger Leopold Stokowski), he knows how to extract an exciting performance from the sometimes rather staid Boston Symphony. Certainly this was true of everything he chose on the opening program in Tanglewood Shed.

Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms" was an astute choice to open the festivities, for it is both dramatic and lyrically appealing. Using excerpts from several Biblical psalms, it employs a Hebrew text (as does the composer's "Kaddisch" Symphony) and is ingeniously contrived.

With the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the young choristers from Harvard and Radcliffe, Ozawa was able to keep everything under tight rein. And he had an unusually sensitive and musicianly boy alto in 14-year old Robert Puleo, who was the soloist in the choral setting of the 23d Psalm.

Bernstein was in the box seats and raced down to embrace conductor and concertmaster. The audience gave everyone a standing ovation and momentarily stopped the show.

Finally the lights went down and Ozawa was allowed to proceed with Ligeti's "Atmospheres," which probably everyone knows was used as background music for the cinema spectacular, "2001: A Space Odyssey."

The Ligeti piece is a fascinating excursion into sound experimentalism and it is twice as fascinating to discover how the composer achieved all those weird sounds. The piano, for instance, is strummed by whisk brooms and by hand at several points. The Bostonians seemed to have everything pretty well in hand, handling its complexities with ease.

In the Berlioz, which brought the evening to a resounding conclusion, Ozawa was at his choreographic best, outdoing even Bernstein in his athletic prowess. Needless to say, his interpretation milked every ounce of melodrama from this romantic score.

Berlioz, who was himself the arch-romanticist, would probably have enjoyed this supercharged reading. Certainly the March to the Scaffold and the Witches' Sabbath have never been set forth with more clangorous effect.

For the comfort of the customers, the Tanglewood Shed has new, roomier seats that are permanently fixed in place. And I understand all are sold out for this afternoon's performance of the Mahler Second Symphony under Bernstein. Weather permitting, you can still sit on the lawn.

Ozawa and Bernstein Open Berkshire Fete

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX ... Two dramatic

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUL 6 1970

New England Newsclip

Music

Ozawa and Bernstein Open Season at Tanglewood

By RICHARD VINCENT

"Chichester Psalms" by Leonard Bernstein opened the Tanglewood Festival last Friday night. The director was Seiji Ozawa. When the work was over, Ozawa motioned Bernstein onstage and all the principals, Ozawa, Bernstein, Joseph Silverstein, the concert master, and the soloist, 14 years old boy alto Robert Puleo went through several fervid rounds of felicitations, embraces and laying on of the hands to the delight and delectation of the audience. They were delected at this intimate glimpse of some of the beautiful people in emotional disarray and at this moment the keynote of Tanglewood 1970 was struck and the overtones are laden with the mod and the now.

We will have to wait to see if this is all to the good, but from this seat it has one Vote.

The work is scored for strings, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones, 2 harps and a percussion section that includes glockenspiel, xyyphone, chime in B flat, a pair of symbals, suspended symbol, tabourine, triangle, rasps, whip, wood block, 3 temple blocks, timpani, snare drum, bass drum and 3 bongo drums.

HE PUTS these noisemakers to work in tempo that include 7-4, 10-4, and 7-8. On paper these ingredients might lead one to believe that some jagged, fragmented piece of serial music is about to assault the senses but this is not at all the case.

Bernstein, mod. and jet set though he may be, is really a doctrinaire romantic. The work is melodic, dramatic, and, yes, romantic. The text, was sung in Hebrew by young Mr. Puelo and a great mass of choristers who appeared, in the main, to be white anglo-saxon protestants. It was a genial exhibition of ecumenicism and the performance was on all counts first rate. Ozawa likes this music and under the gaze of the devisor, he did a first rate job.

Tad Puleo who, at 14, is surely singing alto on borrowed time, was one of the best boy singers I have ever heard both in terms of the voice and the musical quality of his signing. His solo, for some reason was reminiscent of the mezzo solo in "alexander Nevsky," the mood and approach seem similar.

OZAWA and the orchesera rate. Ozawa likes this music lous reading of Gyorgy Ligetti's "atmosphere". The title is bang on, that is exactly what it was. If I had the space, I would quote from the fine program notes that the festival provides, but, inadequately, I amy only say that the nothing quite like it in its form of formlessness has been done before. It is highly original and makes unbelievable demands on the players but remember with which orchestra we are dealing.

The program closed with Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique", which was just about as original in concept in 1830 (not so long ago) as "Atmospheres" is now.

In my opinion, music of this highly descriptive sort is right in Ozawa's wheelhouse. He directed this with great elan and verve and this fine orchestra went right along with him.

was at the helm and, again it was descriptive music that gave the evening its good flavor.

HE OPENED with two works by Mozart, the Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," and the Symphony no. 36. in C K. 425, (The Linz). They were performed correctly, but without spirit. Mozart is a state of mind and, to these ears, neither Ozawa nor the orchestra was in this particular state this evening. The tempi were proper enough but lacking was that ineffable but palpable X quantity that is Mozart's due. George Sezll has the idea to perfection.

Next Saturday Ozawa is conducting "Cosi Fan Tutte" by Mozart and I sincerely hope that these readings were a temporary aberration.

Joseph Silverstein, the cocertmaster, then played the Stravinsky Violin Concerto in D, composed in 1931, and there is no way to fault his performance. It was concise in execution and intonation and concept. This is a mighty good fiddle player sitting in the first chair but that is no secret.

Ozawa started to swing again as he led the troops through "the Firebird" by Stravinsky. It was an exciting, evocative performance and is a genuine achievement by the composer. It never fails to awe and amaze me when one considers that this work and other great works of musical art are sprung full blown out of one man's head with only a pencil and paper as his tools. Marvelous indeed and of course that is the whole point.

On Sunday afternoon, Bernstein continued his one man campaign to push Gustave Mahler ito the pantheon of musical immortals when he conducted the Symphony No. 2. He might even make it, but not on the strength of Sunday's performance.

BERNSTEIN'S Battalions were out a full strength and he did not disappoint them; accolades, alarums and huzzahs from a standing audience saluted the final choir.

This Symphony No. 2 by Mahler has moments of real achievement; there is also much genuine excitement, but there are also some dull melodic cliches, some shoddy theatrics and some doenright tedium.

But this type of music to many people, Bernstein included, is what classical music is, to wit; bombast, singing strings, great blasts from the percussion, players running in and out to perform off stage, massive choruses and added soloists. This Mahler has all the apurtenances and trappings of a great work of Art, nothing is missing except it has no real depth.

The conductor gave it his all and then some but it is difficult to forget Danny Kaye's parody of a symphony conductor, and Bernstein's physical approach to conducting is virtually a caricature and in some cases actually detracts from the music.

THE ORCHESTRA had some unusual lapses, certainly rare for this ensemble. In the opening cello lines the section played two top notes quite out of tune. The trombone in a short phrase, was not only out of tune but out of meter and one of the off stage horns had some pitch trouble. He blooped a bit too, but this is an occupational hazard with this bit of plumbing. And two final pizzicati, scored in unison, were not. Strange indeed.

The soloists were Cristina Ludwig and Lorna Haywood, contralto and soprano. Miss Ludwig was just fine in all respects particularly her rendition of Number 4, "Urlicht". Miss Haywood had some trouble providing the painaissimi that Bernstein quite evidently wanted, but otherwise did a solid and musical job.

[illegible] machine-like rhythms with precision while preserving flexibility, melodic donation, and individual invement. Even the gibberish passages were made ingiuing with expertise.

Fire and Sublety

Ozawa injected fire and subtlety into Stravinsky's Firebird" (1919 version), to which the orchestra contributed superlative playing.

The young Japanese conductor had a gesture for every detail of the Mozart scores, providing visual aid for those that needed it.

He now sports shoulder-length, gleaming black hair that serves as a picturesque prop during his more agitated maneuvers.

He directed the orchestra to prance through the Figaro" Overture. It looked dashing enough but fell somewhat short of Boston Symphony standard.

Opening of the "Linz" Symphony was sloppy in attacks, but adjusted as the work progressed. The slow movement was pliant, expressive and richly voiced in strings. The minuet was made to crawl and the concluding rondo raced to the goal post.

sion and outstanding intonation. The orchestral brass and strings provided a glowing sheen at all times, save for the harp, which had drastic pitch problems. The timpani had these problems also (no doubt both were due to the merciless high humidity), but of a much graver nature was the percussion's inability to read the opening movement's rhythms correctly.

Ozawa led what can only be called a brilliant performance, throwing into high relief the snappy 7-4 rhythm of the dance-like first movement, coaxing relaxed and pliant harmonies in the second, and finally culminating in an ecstatic, rarefied vision of the opening brass recitative at the work's conclusion. As a tribute to Bernstein the advi- throughout was a wonder to behold.

It was with the final movements the real impact was registered, however. The march was formidable beyond all belief, with waves of brass and percussion that all but drowned the audience in a sea of decibals. A shame Ozawa couldn't hold the opening tempo, but needlessly accelerated halfway through, thereby losing solidity and impact, not to mention consistency.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
Tuesday, July 7, 1970

AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
RECORDER & DEMOCRAT
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
D. 14,000

JUL 7 1970

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
Monday, July 6, 1970

SEIJI OZAWA

At the Concer

'Moving' Mahler Sy

By EDWARD FRENCH

LENOX, MASS. — The frst weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood with not too much co-operation from the weather managed to draw some 21,000 people for the three concerts.

Tanglewood is still as beautiful as ever and the new seats which have replaced the former uncomfortable narrow ones add greatly to the physical comfort of the audience.

However the really important thing at a music festival is the quality and performance of the music and Friday's concert was splendid on both counts.

TWO DISTINGUISHED ALUMNI of the Berkshire Music Center were the stars of the concert, Leonard Bernstein for his "Chichester Psalms" for mixed choir, boy solo and orchestra and Seiji Ozawa, the dynamic young conductor.

The "Weekend Prelude" was a real musical treat, featuring Rose Taylor, mezzo-soprano, Richard Taylor, baritone and Dennis Helmerich, pianist, in a most sensitive and expressive performance of Gustave Mahler's Songs from "Des Knaben Wunderhorn".

Unlike former opneing weekends which briught either baroque or classic programs with a reduced orchestra, this concert began with the full Boston Symphony Orchestra plus the Tanglewood Mixed Chorus and Robert Puleo, boy alto.

The "Chichester Psalms" was commissioned for the 1965 Chichester England Festival and like Bernstein's "Kaddish" Symphony uses a Hebraic text. The music has the Bernstein characteristics of sharp incisive syncopated rhythm, a clever use of dissonance and broad expressive melodic sections.

IT WOULD BE DIFFICULT to imagine a better choral performance than that given by the Tanglewood Chorus. The voices were of superb quality, the balance and blend were all that could be asked for and the preparation by John Oliver was most thorough.

Robert Puleo, boy alto, sang with a richness and warmth unusual in a treble voice.

An interesting exhibition of new kinds of sonorities "Atmosphere Gyorgy Liget all, there wa know it but apparently ence.

AN EXCIT was given th tique, Opus orchestra. T orchestral and the dynamic contrasts were sharply drawn. This young conductor should be a great asset to the musical life of San Francisco when he takes over the reins of the orchestra there this fall.

Sunday afternoon's concert with Leonard Bernstein conductingt he Mahler Symphony No. 2"TheResurrection"was one of the most moving musical experiences this reviewer has ever enjoyed, a feeling apparently shared by practically the entire audience judging from the response.

This massive five movement work enlisted the services of the Boston Symphony, a chorus composed of the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus with Lorna Haywood, soprano and Christa Ludwig, mezzo-soprano as soloists.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN has achieved a world wide reputation as an interpreter of Mahler's works. Sunday afternoon he proved beyond any possible doubt that this reputation was richly deserved.

We have long admired the vocal artistry of Christa Ludwig, one of the great mezzo-sopranos of this era. Her singing of the "Unlicht" (Primal light in the fourth movement was distinguished by beautiful tonal quality and appropriate simplicity of style. Lorna Haywood was equally effective in her contribution.

THE ORCHESTRAL PLAYING was inspired. The off stage brass in the last movement was most effective, the pianissimo portions had an ethereal quality and the climaxes were miracles of sonority.

As on Friday evening the choral work was of the highest quality. All in all this was one of those once in a lifetime performances!

The Chorus on both Friday and Sunday was the amalgamated Tanglewood Festival Chorus, The Harvard Glee Club, and the Radcliffe Choral Society and the merger proved most successful. This is one of the best choruses I have heard in a long time and the various conductors are to be felicitated.

It should be noted that Dennis Helmrich, on the music faculty at SUNYA, is the vocal coach at The Berkshire Music School this summer. He performed at the opening Prelude in Mahler's "Des Knaben Wunderhorn". Helmrich is a pianist and a good one and we are proud of him.

28

Ozawa, Bernstein Open Tanglewood 1970 Season

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

Three concerts this past weekend marked the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1970 season at Tanglewood. The programs were diversified and interesting, but eschewed the traditional orientation toward baroque and classical symphonists. Lip service was paid to Mozart Saturday, and more Mozart plus some Haydn and Bach will be forthcoming during the next eight weeks, but it is not the same kind of festival established 30 years ago by Koussevitsky and maintained with diligence by his successors.

Of course, neither of the weekend's maestri have been considered strong Mozart conductors to begin with, which seems ironic in that they are the policymakers of the Tanglewood School, which should be teaching just such fading interpretive techniques to the budding musicians that will one day be playing and conducting the old masters before the needy public. But to consider the music that was played:

Seiji Ozawa led Friday evening's opening concert. Three works comprised the program: Bernstein's Chichester Psalms, Ligeti's Atmospheres, and Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony. The five-year old Bernstein work continued to sound fresh, lyrical, interesting, and sublime. Hearing it again, one is impressed anew with its unashamed tunefullness, colorful orchestration and sonorities (somewhat difficult to achieve since the work calls for no winds or horns), the fascinating use of percussion, and most of all the tight structure that makes the piece all the more meaningful.

Chorus Assists

Ozawa and the orchestra were assisted by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, augmented with the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and boy alto Robert Puleo. The huge choir was excellent throughout, and Puleo achieved a kind of blissful purity in the slow movement that was all the more touching for his dynamic precision and outstanding intonation. The orchestral brass and strings provided a glowing sheen at all times, save for the harp, which had drastic pitch problems. The timpani had these problems also (no doubt both were due to the merciless high humidity), but of a much graver nature was the percussion's inability to read the opening movement's rhythms correctly.

Ozawa led what can only be called a brilliant performance, throwing into high relief the snappy 7-4 rhythm of the dance-like first movement, coaxing relaxed and pliant harmonies in the second, and finally culminating in an ecstatic, rarefied vision of the opening brass recitative at the work's conclusion. As a tribute to Bernstein the advisor to Tanglewood and Bernstein the composer, the performance was just splendid.

A similar level of excellence pervaded the reading of Atmospheres, familiar to some as the light-show scene of the film, "2001." Ozawa played the piece five years ago at Tanglewood, but then it received only lukewarm audience response. At least Friday a little more enthusiasm was shown for this fascinating piece, which consists of the full orchestra playing dense clusters of fractional tones that simulate a synthesized electronic music. The orchestra was marvelous, responding with an aura of tone that was by turns hypnotic and adventurous, never uninteresting or colorless.

Single Work

The second half featured a single work, and an Ozawa specialty at that, Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony. One was easily impressed by the stature of Ozawa's reading — for the most part it was fluid, graceful, impassioned. And even if it did lack that elegant classicism of form, Ozawa managed to impart an extra vividness to the story-line. The shifting hues of the first movement have rarely sounded so effortless or dizzying, particularly in that spot midway through when high first violins and low doublebasses play a staccato series of paired eighth notes against each other, or that brooding, fabulously "trippy" and virtually atonal oboe solo (accompanied by unusual harmonies indeed!) just before the first big tutti outburst.

The ball scene offered similar rewards: lovely shadings in the antiphonal strings, a sense of rapt expectancy with the introduction of the idee fixe during the waltz theme, and a whirling termination that brought the movement decisively to a close. With the pastoral third movement, the conductor's spell waxed more eloquently than ever. The lovely violin tune a few minutes in was completely disarming in its naivete, and the spritely wind playing throughout was a wonder to behold.

It was with the final movements the real impact was registered, however. The march was formidable beyond all belief, with waves of brass and percussion that all but drowned the audience in a sea of decibals. A shame Ozawa couldn't hold the opening tempo, but needlessly accelerated halfway through, thereby losing solidity and impact, not to mention consistency.

"Aufersteh'n" chorus, which was remarkably intense and affecting. I would not for a moment condemn Bernstein's merely theatrical treatment of the work, but at the same time, it would be nice to hear some of the music's form as well as its content. Bernstein's Mahler readings are establishing a whole new Mahler tradition in this country; let us hope the composer is not always done such a great disservice.

AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
RECORDER &
DEMOCRAT
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
D. 14.000

JUL 7 1970

Ozawa Provides Exciting Berlioz

By GEORGE W. STOWE

Will Seiji Ozawa provide the shot in the arm that Tanglewood needs to keep the customers coming?

The young Japanese conductor with the tremendous mop of hair and the flamboyant manner opened the Berkshire Music Festival Friday night and aroused a wild ovation when he conducted Berlioz' "Symphonie Fontastique."

Despite his showmanship (which is reminiscent of the younger Leopold Stokowski), he knows how to extract an exciting performance from the sometimes rather staid Boston Symphony. Certainly this was true of everything he chose on the opening program in Tanglewood Shed.

Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms" was an astute choice to open the festivities, for it is both dramatic and lyrically appealing. Using excerpts from several Biblical psalms, it employes a Hebrew text (as does the composer's "Kaddisch" Symphony) and is ingeniously contrived.

With the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the young choristers from Harvard and Radcliffe, Ozawa was able to keep everything under tight rein. And he had an unusually sensitive and musicianly boy alto in 14-year old Robert Puleo, who was the soloist in the choral setting of the 23d Psalm.

Bernstein was in the box seats and raced down to embrace conductor and concertmaster. The audience gave everyone a standing ovation and momentarily stopped the show.

Finally the lights went down and Ozawa was allowed to proceed with Ligeti's "Atmospheres," which probably everyone knows was used as background music for the cinema spectacular, "2001: A Space Odyssey."

The Ligeti piece is a fascinating excursion into sound experimentalism and it is twice as fascinating to discover how the composer achieved all those weird sounds. The piano, for instance, is strummed by whisk brooms and by hand at several points. The Bostonians seemed to have everything pretty well in hand, handling its complexities with ease.

In the Berlioz, which brought the evening to a resounding conclusion, Ozawa was at his choreographic best, outdoing even Bernstein in his athletic prowess. Needless to say, his interpretation milked every ounce of melodrama from this romantic score.

Berlioz, who was himself the arch-romanticist, would probably have enjoyed this supercharged reading. Certainly the March to the Scaffold and the Witches' Sabbath have never been set forth with more clangorous effect.

For the comfort of the customers, the Tanglewood Shed has new, roomier seats that are permanently fixed in place. And I understand all are sold out for this afternoon's performance of the Mahler Second Symphony under Bernstein. Weather permitting, you can still sit on the lawn.

Ozawa and Bernstein Open Berkshire Fete

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Two dramatic personalities occupied the Boston Symphony podium during the opening Berkshire Music Festival weekend at Tanglewood.

Seiji Izawa conducted Friday and Saturday nights, and Leonard Bernstein yesterday afternoon. The big applause Ozawa received was like a light ripple of enthusiasm compared to the thunderous ovation Bernstein received after an uninterrupted performance of Mahler's Second Symphony.

Combined audiences numbered 22,489, including the open rehearsal Saturday morning. Largest crowd was yesterday's 9,122.

Specific Musical Works

The two conductors can't be compared without considering specific musical works. Ozawa's "Marriage of Figaro" Overture and "Linz" Symphony by Mozart were argumentative, someetimes acceptably individual, and shabby in spots. His "Firebird" Suite by Stravinsky was quite glorius in sound and concept.

One might have thought that Mahler wrote his Second Symphony, "Resurrection," for Bernstein. In spite of the conductor's brilliant display of calisthenics and emotional spasms, one was irresistibly drawn to the music.

Bernstein conducted the hour-and-a-half Mahler from memory. If he missed a trick, it certainly didn't show.

He made an important incident (sometimes an event) of every fragment from huge tonal masonry to fragile, bucolic stretches. It was a philosophical torrent from start to finish. Even the barren waste that precedes the finale maintained interest.

The magnificence of the orchestra was just as evident in gossamer-like material as in the opening and closing movements' brash violence.

Contralto solos were sung by Christa Ludwig in a richly vibrant voice with equal warmth in high range. Lorna Haywood's soprano contributions summoned a fine, clear quality, if not always on pitch.

The 125-mixed voice chorus from Harvard, Radcliffe and the Tanglewood Festival group was absolutely marvelous.

Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was indeed a master of the Stravinsky Violin Concerto, and Ozawa gave him unconditional support.

Both delivered the concerto's machine-like rhythms with precision while preserving flexibility, melodic domination, and individual involvement. Even the gibberish passages were made intriguing with expertise.

Fire and Subtlety

Ozawa injected fire and subtlety into Stravinsky's "Firebird" (1919 version), to which the orchestra contributed superlative playing.

The young Japanese conductor had a gesture for every detail of the Mozart scores, providing visual aid for those that needed it.

He now sports shoulder-length, gleaming black hair that serves as a picturesque prop during his more agitated maneuvers.

He directed the orchestra to prance through the Figaro Overture. It looked dashing enough but fell somewhat short of Boston Symphony standard.

Opening of the "Linz" Symphony was sloppy in attacks, but adjusted as the work progressed. The slow movement was pliant, expressive and richly voiced in strings. The minuet was made to crawl and the concluding rondo raced to the goal post.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
Monday, July 6, 1970

SEIJI OZAWA

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108.376

JUL 6 1970

New England Newsclip

At the Concer

'Moving' Mahler Sy

By EDWARD FRENCH

LENOX, MASS. — The first weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood with not too much co-operation from the weather managed to draw some 21,000 people for the three concerts.

Tanglewood is still as beautiful as ever and the new seats which have replaced the former uncomfortable narrow ones add greatly to the physical comfort of the audience.

However the really important thing at a music festival is the quality and performance of the music and Friday's concert was splendid on both counts.

TWO DISTINGUISHED ALUMNI of the Berkshire Music Center were the stars of the concert, Leonard Bernstein for his "Chichester Psalms" for mixed choir, boy solo and orchestra and Seiji Ozawa, the dynamic young conductor.

The "Weekend Prelude" was a real musical treat, featuring Rose Taylor, mezzo-soprano, Richard Taylor, baritone and Dennis Helmerich, pianist, in a most sensitive and expressive performance of Gustave Mahler's Songs from "Des Knaben Wunderhorn".

Unlike former opneing weekends which briught either baroque or classic programs with a reduced orchestra, this concert began with the full Boston Symphony Orchestra plus the Tanglewood Mixed Chorus and Robert Puleo, boy alto.

The "Chichester Psalms" was commissioned for the 1965 Chichester England Festival and like Bernstein's "Kaddish" Symphony uses a Hebraic text. The music has the Bernstein characteristics of sharp incisive syncopated rhythm, a clever use of dissonance and broad expressive melodic sections.

IT WOULD BE DIFFICULT to imagine a better choral performance than that given by the Tanglewood Chorus. The voices were of superb quality, the balance and blend were all that could be asked for and the preparation by John Oliver was most thorough.

Robert Puleo, boy alto, sang with a richness and warmth unusual in a treble voice.

An interesting exhibition of new kinds of sonorities "Atmosphere Gyorgy Liget all, there wa know it but apparently ence.

AN EXCI was given th tique, Opus orchestra. T orchestral and the dynamic contrasts were sharply drawn. This young conductor should be a great asset to the musical life of San Francisco when he takes over the reins of the orchestra there this fall.

Sunday afternoon's concert with Leonard Bernstein conductingt he Mahler Symphony No. 2"TheResurrection"was one of the most moving musical experiences this reviewer has ever enjoyed, a feeling apparently shared by practically the entire audience judging from the response.

This massive five movement work enlisted the services of the Boston Symphony, a chorus composed of the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus with Lorna Haywood, soprano and Christa Ludwig, mezzo-soprano as soloists.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN has achieved a world wide reputation as an interpreter of Mahler's works. Sunday afternoon he proved beyond any possible doubt that this reputation was richly deserved.

We have long admired the vocal artistry of Christa Ludwig, one of the great mezzo-sopranos of this era. Her singing of the "Urlicht" (Primal light in the fourth movement was distinguished by beautiful tonal quality and appropriate simplicity of style. Lorna Haywood was equally effective in her contribution.

THE ORCHESTRAL PLAYING was inspired. The off stage brass in the last movement was most effective, the pianissimo portions had an ethereal quality and the climaxes were miracles of sonority.

As on Friday evening the choral work was of the highest quality. All in all this was one of those once in a lifetime performances!

Ozawa, Bernstein Open Tanglewood 1970 Season

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

Three concerts this past weekend marked the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1970 season at Tanglewood. The programs were diversified and interesting, but eschewed the traditional orientation toward baroque and classical symphonists. Lip service was paid to Mozart Saturday, and more Mozart plus some Haydn and Bach will be forthcoming during the next eight weeks, but it is not the same kind of festival established 30 years ago by Koussevitsky and maintained with diligence by his successors.

Of course, neither of the weekend's maestri have been considered strong Mozart conductors to begin with, which seems ironic in that they are the policymakers of the Tanglewood School, which should be teaching just such fading interpretive techniques to the budding musicians that will one day be playing and conducting the old masters before the needy public. But to consider the music that was played:

Seiji Ozawa led Friday evening's opening concert. Three works comprised the program: Bernstein's Chichester Psalms, Ligeti's Atmospheres, and Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony. The five-year old Bernstein work continued to sound fresh, lyrical, interesting, and sublime. Hearing it again, one is impressed anew with its unashamed tunefullness, colorful orchestration and sonorities (somewhat difficult to achieve since the work calls for no winds or horns), the fascinating use of percussion, and most of all the tight structure that makes the piece all the more meaningful.

Chorus Assists

Ozawa and the orchestra were assisted by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, augmented with the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and boy alto Robert Puleo. The huge choir was excellent throughout, and Puleo achieved a kind of blissful purity in the slow movement that was all the more touching for his dynamic precision and outstanding intonation. The orchestral brass and strings provided a glowing sheen at all times, save for the harp, which had drastic pitch problems. The timpani had these problems also (no doubt both were due to the merciless high humidity), but of a much graver nature was the percussion's inability to read the opening movement's rhythms correctly.

Ozawa led what can only be called a brilliant performance, throwing into high relief the snappy 7-4 rhythm of the dance-like first movement, coaxing relaxed and pliant harmonies in the second, and finally culminating in an ecstatic, rarefied vision of the opening brass recitative at the work's conclusion. As a tribute to Bernstein the advisor to Tanglewood and Bernstein the composer, the performance was just splendid.

A similar level of excellence pervaded the reading of Atmospheres, familiar to some as the light-show scene of the film, "2001." Ozawa played the piece five years ago at Tanglewood, but then it received only lukewarm audience response. At least Friday a little more enthusiasm was shown for this fascinating piece, which consists of the full orchestra playing dense clusters of fractional tones that simulate a synthesized electronic music. The orchestra was marvelous, responding with an aura of tone that was by turns hypnotic and adventurous, never uninteresting or colorless.

Single Work

The second half featured a single work, and an Ozawa specialty at that, Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony. One was easily impressed by the stature of Ozawa's reading — for the most part it was fluid, graceful, impassioned. And even if it did lack that elegant classicism of form, Ozawa managed to impart an extra vividness to the story-line. The shifting hues of the first movement have rarely sounded so effortless or dizzying, particularly in that spot midway through when high first violins and low doublebasses play a staccato series of paired eighth notes against each other, or that brooding, fabulously "trippy" and virtually atonal oboe solo (accompanied by unusual harmonies indeed!) just before the first big tutti outburst.

The ball scene offered similar rewards: lovely shadings in the antiphonal strings, a sense of rapt expectancy with the introduction of the idee fixe during the waltz theme, and a whirling termination that brought the movement decisively to a close. With the pastoral third movement, the conductor's spell waxed more eloquently than ever. The lovely violin tune a few minutes in was completely disarming in its naivete, and the spritely wind playing throughout was a wonder to behold.

It was with the final movements the real impact was registered, however. The march was formidable beyond all belief, with waves of brass and percussion that all but drowned the audience in a sea of decibals. A shame Ozawa couldn't hold the opening tempo, but needlessly accelerated halfway through, thereby losing solidity and impact, not to mention consistency.

"Aufersteh'n" chorus, which was remarkably intense and affecting. I would not for a moment condemn Bernstein's merely theatrical treatment of the work, but at the same time, it would be nice to hear some of the music's form as well as its content. Bernstein's Mahler readings are establishing a whole new Mahler tradition in this country; let us hope the composer is not always done such a great disservice.

AMSTERDAM, N.Y.
RECORDER &
DEMOCRAT
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
D. 14,000

JUL 7 1970

Ozawa Provides Exciting Berlioz

By GEORGE W. STOWE

Will Seiji Ozawa provide the shot in the arm that Tanglewood needs to keep the customers coming?

The young Japanese conductor with the tremendous mop of hair and the flamboyant manner opened the Berkshire Music Festival Friday night and aroused a wild ovation when he conducted Berlioz' "Symphonie Fontastique."

Despite his showmanship (which is reminiscent of the younger Leopold Stokowski), he knows how to extract an exciting performance from the sometimes rather staid Boston Symphony. Certainly this was true of everything he chose on the opening program in Tanglewood Shed.

Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms" was an astute choice to open the festivities, for it is both dramatic and lyrically appealing. Using excerpts from several Biblical psalms, it employes a Hebrew text (as does the composer's "Kaddisch" Symphony) and is ingeniously contrived.

With the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the young choristers from Harvard and Radcliffe, Ozawa was able to keep everything under tight rein. And he had an unusually sensitive and musicianly boy alto in 14-year old Robert Puleo, who was the soloist in the choral setting of the 23d Psalm.

Bernstein was in the box seats and raced down to embrace conductor and concertmaster. The audience gave everyone a standing ovation and momentarily stopped the show.

Finally the lights went down and Ozawa was allowed to proceed with Ligeti's "Atmospheres," which probably everyone knows was used as background music for the cinema spectacular, "2001: A Space Odyssey."

The Ligeti piece is a fascinating excursion into sound experimentalism and it is twice as fascinating to discover how the composer achieved all those weird sounds. The piano, for instance, is strummed by whisk brooms and by hand at several points. The Bostonians seemed to have everything pretty well in hand, handling its complexities with ease.

In the Berlioz, which brought the evening to a resounding conclusion, Ozawa was at his choreographic best, outdoing even Bernstein in his athletic prowess. Needless to say, his interpretation milked every ounce of melodrama from this romantic score.

Berlioz, who was himself the arch-romanticist, would probably have enjoyed this supercharged reading. Certainly the March to the Scaffold and the Witches' Sabbath have never been set forth with more clangorous effect.

For the comfort of the customers, the Tanglewood Shed has new, roomier seats that are permanently fixed in place. And I understand all are sold out for this afternoon's performance of the Mahler Second Symphony under Bernstein. Weather permitting, you can still sit on the lawn.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUL 6 1970 New England Newsclip

Ozawa and Bernstein Open Berkshire Fete

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Two dramatic personalities occupied the Boston Symphony podium during the opening Berkshire Music Festival weekend at Tanglewood.

Seiji Izawa conducted Friday and Saturday nights, and Leonard Bernstein yesterday afternoon. The big applause Ozawa received was like a light ripple of enthusiasm compared to the thunderous ovation Bernstein received after an uninterrupted performance of Mahler's Second Symphony.

Combined audiences numbered 22,489, including the open rehearsal Saturday morning. Largest crowd was yesterday's 9,122.

Specific Musical Works

The two conductors can't be compared without considering specific musical works. Ozawa's "Marriage of Figaro" Overture and "Linz" Symphony by Mozart were argumentative, someetimes acceptably individual, and shabby in spots. His "Firebird" Suite by Stravinsky was quite glorius in sound and concept.

One might have thought that Mahler wrote his Second Symphony, "Resurrection," for Bernstein. In spite of the conductor's brilliant display of calisthenics and emotional spasms, one was irresistibly drawn to the music.

Bernstein conducted the hour-and-a-half Mahler from memory. If he missed a trick, it certainly didn't show.

He made an important incident (sometimes an event) of every fragment from huge tonal masonry to fragile, bucolic stretches. It was a philosophical torrent from start to finish. Even the barren waste that precedes the finale maintained interest.

The magnificence of the orchestra was just as evident in gossamer-like material as in the opening and closing movements' brash violence.

Contralto solos were sung by Christa Ludwig in a richly vibrant voice with equal warmth in high range. Lorna Haywood's soprano contributions summoned a fine, clear quality, if not always on pitch.

The 125-mixed voice chorus from Harvard, Radcliffe and the Tanglewood Festival group was absolutely marvelous.

Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was indeed a master of the Stravinsky Violin Concerto, and Ozawa gave him unconditional support.

Both delivered the concerto's machine-like rhythms with precision while preserving flexibility, melodic domination, and individual involvement. Even the gibberish passages were made intriguing with expertise.

Fire and Sublety

Ozawa injected fire and subtlety into Stravinsky's "Firebird" (1919 version), to which the orchestra contributed superlative playing.

The young Japanese conductor had a gesture for every detail of the Mozart scores, providing visual aid for those that needed it.

He now sports shoulder-length, gleaming black hair that serves as a picturesque prop during his more agitated maneuvers.

He directed the orchestra to prance through the Figaro" Overture. It looked dashing enough but fell somewhat short of Boston Symphony standard.

Opening of the "Linz" Symphony was sloppy in attacks, but adjusted as the work progressed. The slow movement was pliant, expressive and richly voiced in strings. The minuet was made to crawl and the concluding rondo raced to the goal post.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
Monday, July 6, 1970

SEIJI OZAWA

At the Concer

'Moving' Mahler Sy

By EDWARD FRENCH

LENOX, MASS. — The first weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood with not too much co-operation from the weather managed to draw some 21,000 people for the three concerts.

Tanglewood is still as beautiful as ever and the new seats which have replaced the former uncomfortable narrow ones add greatly to the physical comfort of the audience.

However the really important thing at a music festival is the quality and performance of the music and Friday's concert was splendid on both counts.

TWO DISTINGUISHED ALUMNI of the Berkshire Music Center were the stars of the concert, Leonard Bernstein for his "Chichester Psalms" for mixed choir, boy solo and orchestra and Seiji Ozawa, the dynamic young conductor.

The "Weekend Prelude" was a real musical treat, featuring Rose Taylor, mezzo-soprano, Richard Taylor, baritone and Dennis Helmerich, pianist, in a most sensitive and expressive performance of Gustave Mahler's Songs from "Des Knaben Wunderhorn".

Unlike former opneing weekends which bringht either baroque or classic programs with a reduced orchestra, this concert began with the full Boston Symphony Orchestra plus the Tanglewood Mixed Chorus and Robert Puleo, boy alto.

The "Chichester Psalms" was commissioned for the 1965 Chichester England Festival and like Bernstein's "Kaddish" Symphony uses a Hebraic text. The music has the Bernstein characteristics of sharp incisive syncopated rhythm, a clever use of dissonance and broad expressive melodic sections.

IT WOULD BE DIFFICULT to imagine a better choral performance than that given by the Tanglewood Chorus. The voices were of superb quality, the balance and blend were all that could be asked for and the preparation by John Oliver was most thorough.

Robert Puleo, boy alto, sang with a richness and warmth unusual in a treble voice.

An interesting exhibition of new kinds of sonorities
"Atmosphere
Gyorgy Liget
all, there wa know it but apparently q
ence.

AN EXCIT was given th
tique, Opus orchestra. T orchestral
and the dynamic contrasts were sharply drawn. This young conductor should be a great asset to the musical life of San Francisco when he takes over the reins of the orchestra there this fall.

Sunday afternoon's concert with Leonard Bernstein conductingt he Mahler Symphony No. 2"TheResurrection"was one of the most moving musical experiences this reviewer has ever enjoyed, a feeling apparently shared by practically the entire audience judging from the response.

This massive five movement work enlisted the services of the Boston Symphony, a chorus composed of the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus with Lorna Haywood soprano and Christa Ludwig, mezzo-soprano as soloists.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN has achieved a world wide reputation as an interpreter of Mahler's works. Sunday afternoon he proved beyond any possible doubt that this reputation was richly deserved.

We have long admired the vocal artistry of Christa Ludwig, one of the great mezzo-sopranos of this era. Her singing of the "Urlicht" (Primal light in the fourth movement was distinguished by beautiful tonal quality and appropriate simplicity of style. Lorna Haywood was equally effective in her contribution.

THE ORCHESTRAL PLAYING was inspired. The off stage brass in the last movement was most effective, the pianissimo portions had an ethereal quality and the climaxes were miracles of sonority.

As on Friday evening the choral work was of the highest quality. All in all this was one of those once in a lifetime performances!

28

Ozawa, Bernstein Open Tanglewood 1970 Season

By MILTON ZAPOLSKI

Three concerts this past weekend marked the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 1970 season at Tanglewood. The programs were diversified and interesting, but eschewed the traditional orientation toward baroque and classical symphonists. Lip service was paid to Mozart Saturday, and more Mozart plus some Haydn and Bach will be forthcoming during the next eight weeks, but it is not the same kind of festival established 30 years ago by Koussevitsky and maintained with diligence by his successors.

Of course, neither of the weekend's maestri have been considered strong Mozart conductors to begin with, which seems ironic in that they are the policymakers of the Tanglewood School, which should be teaching just such fading interpretive techniques to the budding musicians that will one day be playing and conducting the old masters before the needy public. But to consider the music that was played:

Seiji Ozawa led Friday evening's opening concert. Three works comprised the program: Bernstein's Chichester Psalms, Ligeti's Atmospheres, and Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony. The five-year old Bernstein work continued to sound fresh, lyrical, interesting, and sublime. Hearing it again, one is impressed anew with its unashamed tunefullness, colorful orchestration and sonorities (somewhat difficult to achieve since the work calls for no winds or horns), the fascinating use of percussion, and most of all the tight structure that makes the piece all the more meaningful.

Chorus Assists

Ozawa and the orchestra were assisted by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, augmented with the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and boy alto Robert Puleo. The huge choir was excellent throughout, and Puleo achieved a kind of blissful purity in the slow movement that was all the more touching for his dynamic precision and outstanding intonation. The orchestral brass and strings provided a glowing sheen at all times, save for the harp, which had drastic pitch problems. The timpani had these problems also (no doubt both were due to the merciless high humidity), but of a much graver nature was the percussion's inability to read the opening movement's rhythms correctly.

Ozawa led what can only be called a brilliant performance, throwing into high relief the snappy 7-4 rhythm of the dance-like first movement, coaxing relaxed and pliant harmonies in the second, and finally culminating in an ecstatic, rarefied vision of the opening brass recitative at the work's conclusion. As a tribute to Bernstein the advisor to Tanglewood and Bernstein the composer, the performance was just splendid.

A similar level of excellence pervaded the reading of Atmospheres, familiar to some as the light-show scene of the film, "2001." Ozawa played the piece five years ago at Tanglewood, but then it received only lukewarm audience response. At least Friday a little more enthusiasm was shown for this fascinating piece, which consists of the full orchestra playing dense clusters of fractional tones that simulate a synthesized electronic music. The orchestra was marvelous, responding with an aura of tone that was by turns hypnotic and adventurous, never uninteresting or colorless.

Single Work

The second half featured a single work, and an Ozawa specialty at that, Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony. One was easily impressed by the stature of Ozawa's reading — for the most part it was fluid, graceful, impassioned. And even if it did lack that elegant classicism of form, Ozawa managed to impart an extra vividness to the story-line. The shifting hues of the first movement have rarely sounded so effortless or dizzying, particularly in that spot midway through when high first violins and low doublebasses play a staccato series of paired eighth notes against each other, or that brooding, fabulously "trippy" and virtually atonal oboe solo (accompanied by unusual harmonies indeed!) just before the first big tutti outburst.

The ball scene offered similar rewards: lovely shadings in the antiphonal strings, a sense of rapt expectancy with the introduction of the idee fixe during the waltz theme, and a whirling termination that brought the movement decisively to a close. With the pastoral third movement, the conductor's spell waxed more eloquently than ever. The lovely violin tune a few minutes in was completely disarming in its naivete, and the spritely wind playing throughout was a wonder to behold.

It was with the final movements the real impact was registered, however. The march was formidable beyond all belief, with waves of brass and percussion that all but drowned the audience in a sea of decibals. A shame Ozawa couldn't hold the opening tempo, but needlessly accelerated halfway through, thereby losing solidity and impact, not to mention consistency.

"Aufersteh'n" chorus, which was remarkably intense and affecting. I would not for a moment condemn Bernstein's merely theatrical treatment of the work, but at the same time, it would be nice to hear some of the music's form as well as its content. Bernstein's Mahler readings are establishing a whole new Mahler tradition in this country; let us hope the composer is not always done such a great disservice.

AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
RECORDER &
DEMOCRAT
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
D. 14.000

JUL 7 1970

Mutual Fu

INVESTING COMPANIES	Bid	Ask
NEW YORK (AP) —The following quotations, supplied by the National Association of Securities Dealers, Inc., are the prices at which these securities could have been sold (bid) or bought (asked) Monday.
Aberdn	1.57	1.72
Admiralty Funds:
Grwth	unavail
Incom	unavail
Insur	unavail
Advisrs	4.05	4.43
Affiliatd	5.72	6.19
Afutre	4.80	4.80
All Am F	.48	.52
Allstate	8.39	9.02
Alpha Fd	8.39	9.17
Amcap	4.47	4.89
Am Bus	2.81	3.04
Am DvIn	8.39	9.17
Amer Express:
Capit	6.18	6.75
Incme	7.48	8.17
Invest	7.00	7.65
Speci	6.61
Stock	6.54	7.15
Am Egty	3.70	4.04
Am Grth	4.64	5.07
Am Inv	4.23	4.33
Am Mut	6.75	7.38
AmN Gth	2.11	2.31
Am Pac	5.51	6.02
Anchor Group:
Capit	6.10	6.68
Grwth	8.01	8.78
Incme	6.49	7.11
Fd Inv	6.78	7.43
Apollo Fd	6.72	7.34
Associa	10.4	1.14
Astron	3.58	3.91
Axe Houghton:
Fund A	4.32	4.70
Fund B	5.98	6.50
Stock	4.99	5.45
Sci Cp	3.71	4.03
Babson	7.06	7.06
Beacon	10.30	10.30
Berg Knt	7.14	7.14
Berk Gth	4.54	4.96
Blair Fd	4.90	5.36
Bondstk	4.75	5.19
Boston St	6.04	6.60
Bost Fdn	8.47	9.27
Boston	6.68	7.30
Broad St	10.61	11.60
Bullock Calvin:
Gen Sec	10.63	11.64
Candn	16.31	17.64
Divid	2.93	3.22
NatW S	8.66	9.37
NY Vnt	11.13	12.19
BusM Fd	6.00	6.58
CG Fd	6.92	7.48
Capamr	6.38	7.00
Capit Inv	2.53	2.77
Consol In	8.75	9.25
Consu In	2.75	3.01
Cont' MI	6.05	6.05
Cont Gth	6.37	6.43
Corp Ld	11.97	13.21
Cnly Cap	5.13	5.61
Crn WDiv	4.52	4.94
Crn WDal	5.13	5.61
deVgh M	48.17	48.17
Delaware Group:
Decat	9.43	10.31
Delwr	9.79	10.70
Delta	5.59	6.11
Drexel	11.18	11.18
Dreyf Fd	9.22	10.10
Dreyf Lv	10.47	11.47
Eaton&Howard:
Balan	8.32	9.09
Grwth	9.37	10.24
Incom	5.04	5.51
Speci	6.31	6.90
Stock	10.42	11.39
Eberst	9.92	10.84
Egret	9.65	10.49
Emrg Sc	4.10	4.48
Energy	10.00	10.00
Enterpr	4.89	....
Equity	7.10	7.76
Equt Gth	7.32	8.03
Essex	11.94	11.94
Everst In	10.49	11.46
F-D Cap	4.09	4.45
Fairfd	7.39	8.08
Farm Bu	7.78	7.78
Fed Grth	9.88	10.80
Fid Cap	8.94	9.77
Fid Fund	12.27	13.41
Fid Trnd	17.87	19.53
Financial Prog:
Dynm	3.40	3.73
Jindust	3.10	3.40
Incom	4.72	5.17
Vent	3.85	4.22
FstFr Va	unavail
FstIn Dis	5.82	6.38
Fst InGth	6.04	6.62
Fst InStk	6.79	7.48
Fst Mutl	7.02	7.13
Fst Nat	5.70	6.23
Fst Siera	27.66	30.33
Flet Cap	5.16	....
Flet Fnd	4.44	....
Fla Gth	4.41	4.82
Fnd Gth	3.53	3.84
Foundrs	6.42	7.02
Foursq	7.45	8.14
Franklin Group:
DNTC	5.97	6.54
Grwth	4.85	5.32
Util	5.19	5.69
Incom	1.72	1.88
Freedm	6.65	7.29
Fd frMut	7.88	7.88
Fund Am	6.97	7.64
Gatewy	5.95	6.43
Gen Sec	7.75	7.75
Gibraltr	5.25	5.30
Group Sec:
Apex F	5.64	6.17
Bal Fd	7.56	8.27
Com St	10.42	11.39
GrthFd A	5.54	6.05
Grth Ind	15.07	15.07
Growth	11.94	13.05
Select
Var Py
Inv Resh
Istel
Ivy
J Hncock
Johnstn
Keystone
Apollo
Cus B1
Cus B2
Cus B4
Cus K1
Cus K2
Cus S1
Cus S2
Cus S3
Cus S4
Polar
Knickb
Knick Gt
Lex Grth
Lex Rsch
Liberty
Life Stk
Life Inv
Linc Nat
Ling
Loomis Sa
Canad
Vapit
Mut
Luth Bro
Magna In
Manhtn
Mass Fd
Mass Gth
Mass Tr
Mates
Mathers
Merid Fd
MidA Mu
Moody Cp
Moody's
MIF Fd
MIF Gth
MuUS Gv
Mu OmG
Mu Omin
Mut Shrs
Mut Trst
NEA Mut
Nat Ind
Nat Invst
Nat Secu
Balan
Bond
Divid
Grwht
Pf Stk
Incom
Stock
Nel Grth
Neuw Cet
Neuw Fd
New Wld
Newton
Nich Strg
Noreast
Ocngph
Omega
100 Fd
101 Fd
One WmS

Ozawa Provides Exciting Berlioz

By GEORGE W. STOWE

Will Seiji Ozawa provide the shot in the arm that Tanglewood needs to keep the customers coming?

The young Japanese conductor with the tremendous mop of hair and the flamboyant manner opened the Berkshire Music Festival Friday night and aroused a wild ovation when he conducted Berlioz' "Symphonie Fontastique."

Despite his showmanship (which is reminiscent of the younger Leopold Stokowski), he knows how to extract an exciting performance from the sometimes rather staid Boston Symphony. Certainly this was true of everything he chose on the opening program in Tanglewood Shed.

Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms" was an astute choice to open the festivities, for it is both dramatic and lyrically appealing. Using excerpts from several Biblical psalms, it employes a Hebrew text (as does the composer's "Kaddisch" Symphony) and is ingeniously contrived.

With the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the young choristers from Harvard and Radcliffe, Ozawa was able to keep everything under tight rein. And he had an unusually sensitive and musicianly boy alto in 14-year old Robert Puleo, who was the soloist in the choral setting of the 23d Psalm.

Bernstein was in the box seats and raced down to embrace conductor and concertmaster. The audience gave everyone a standing ovation and momentarily stopped the show.

Finally the lights went down and Ozawa was allowed to proceed with Ligeti's "Atmospheres," which probably everyone knows was used as background music for the cinema spectacular, "2001: A Space Odyssey."

The Ligeti piece is a fascinating excursion into sound experimentalism ...

Ozawa and Bernstein Open Berkshire Fete

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — Two dramatic personalities occupied the Boston Symphony podium during the opening Berkshire Music Festival weekend at Tanglewood.

Seiji Izawa conducted Friday and Saturday nights, and Leonard Bernstein yesterday afternoon. The big applause Ozawa received was like a light ripple of enthusiasm compared to the thunderous ovation Bernstein received after an uninterrupted performance of Mahler's Second Symphony.

Combined audiences numbered 22,489, including the open rehearsal Saturday morning. Largest crowd was yesterday's 9,122.

Specific Musical Works

The two conductors can't be compared without considering specific musical works. Ozawa's "Marriage of Figaro" Overture and "Linz" Symphony by Mozart were argumentative, someetimes acceptably individual, and shabby in spots. His "Firebird" Suite by Stravinsky was quite glorius in sound and concept.

One might have thought that Mahler wrote his Second Symphony, "Resurrection," for Bernstein. In spite of the conductor's brilliant display of calisthenics and emotional spasms, one was irresistibly drawn to the music.

Bernstein conducted the hour-and-a-half Mahler from memory. If he missed a trick, it certainly didn't show.

He made an important incident (sometimes an event) of every fragment from huge tonal masonry to fragile, bucolic stretches. It was a philosophical torrent from start to finish. Even the barren waste that precedes the finale maintained interest.

The magnificence of the orchestra was just as evident in gossamer-like material as in the opening and closing movements' brash violence.

Contralto solos were sung by Christa Ludwig in a richly vibrant voice with equal warmth in high range. Lorna Haywood's soprano contributions summoned a fine, clear quality, if not always on pitch.

The 125-mixed voice chorus from Harvard, Radcliffe and the Tanglewood Festival group was absolutely marvelous.

Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was indeed a master of the Stravinsky Violin Concerto, and Ozawa gave him unconditional support.

Both delivered the concerto's machine-like rhythms with precision while preserving flexibility, melodic domination, and individual involvement. Even the gibberish passages were made intriguing with expertise.

Fire and Sublety

Ozawa injected fire and subtlety into Stravinsky's "Firebird" (1919 version), to which the orchestra contributed superlative playing.

The young Japanese conductor had a gesture for every detail of the Mozart scores, providing visual aid for those that needed it.

He now sports shoulder-length, gleaming black hair that serves as a picturesque prop during his more agitated maneuvers.

He directed the orchestra to prance through the Figaro" Overture. It looked dashing enough but fell somewhat short of Boston Symphony standard.

Opening of the "Linz" Symphony was sloppy in attacks, but adjusted as the work progressed. The slow movement was pliant, expressive and richly voiced in strings. The minuet was made to crawl and the concluding rondo raced to the goal post.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUL 6 1970

New England Newsclip

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
Monday, July 6, 1970

SEIJI OZAWA

At the Concert

'Moving' Mahler Symphony

By EDWARD FRENCH

LENOX, MASS. — The frst weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood with not too much co-operation from the weather managed to draw some 21,000 people for the three concerts.

Tanglewood is still as beautiful as ever and the new seats which have replaced the former uncomfortable narrow ones add greatly to the physical comfort of the audience.

However the really important thing at a music festival is the quality and performance of the music and Friday's concert was splendid on both counts.

TWO DISTINGUISHED ALUMNI of the Berkshire Music Center were the stars of the concert, Leonard Bernstein for his "Chichester Psalms" for mixed choir, boy solo and orchestra and Seiji Ozawa, the dynamic young conductor.

The "Weekend Prelude" was a real musical treat, featuring Rose Taylor, mezzo-soprano, Richard Taylor, baritone and Dennis Helmerich, pianist, in a most sensitive and expressive performance of Gustave Mahler's Songs from "Des Knaben Wunderhorn".

Unlike former opneing weekends which briught either baroque or classic programs with a reduced orchestra, this concert began with the full Boston Symphony Orchestra plus the Tanglewood Mixed Chorus and Robert Puleo, boy alto.

The "Chichester Psalms" was commissioned for the 1965 Chichester England Festival and like Bernstein's "Kaddish" Symphony uses a Hebraic text. The music has the Bernstein characteristics of sharp incisive syncopated rhythm, a clever use of dissonance and broad expressive melodic sections.

IT WOULD BE DIFFICULT to imagine a better choral performance than that given by the Tanglewood Chorus. The voices were of superb quality, the balance and blend were all that could be asked for and the preparation by John Oliver was most thorough.

Robert Puleo, boy alto, sang with a richness and warmth unusual in a treble voice.

An interesting exhibition of new kinds of sonorities was demonstrated in the "Atmospheres" by the Hungarian born Gyorgy Ligeti. He used no percussion at all, there was no traditional form as we know it but the sounds were noval and apparently quite acceptable to the audience.

AN EXCITING VIRTUOSO READING was given the Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique, Opus 14a by Seija Ozawa and the orchestra. There was great clarity in the orchestral testure, the coloringwasvivid and the dynamic contrasts were sharply drawn. This young conductor should be a great asset to the musical life of San Francisco when he takes over the reins of the orchestra there this fall.

Sunday afternoon's concert with Leonard Bernstein conductingt he Mahler Symphony No. 2"TheResurrection"was one of the most moving musical experiences this reviewer has ever enjoyed, a feeling apparently shared by practically the entire audience judging from the response.

This massive five movement work enlisted the services of the Boston Symphony, a chorus composed of the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus with Lorna Haywood, soprano and Christa Ludwig, mezzo-soprano as soloists.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN has achieved a world wide reputation as an interpreter of Mahler's works. Sunday afternoon he proved beyond any possible doubt that this reputation was richly deserved.

We have long admired the vocal artistry of Christa Ludwig, one of the great mezzo-sopranos of this era. Her singing of the "Urlicht" (Primal light in the fourth movement was distinguished by beautiful tonal quality and appropriate simplicity of style. Lorna Haywood was equally effective in her contribution.

THE ORCHESTRAL PLAYING was inspired. The off stage brass in the last movement was most effective, the pianissimo portions had an ethereal quality and the climaxes were miracles of sonority.

As on Friday evening the choral work was of the highest quality. All in all this was one of those once in a lifetime performances!

Music

Mahler's 'Resurrection': Unforgettable Experience

By Robert Finn

I wonder if somewhere among the crowd listening to Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony Thursday night at Blossom Music Center there might be a high school kid of 17 or 18, hearing the piece for the very first time.

ROBERT FINN

If so, it will be some kind of poetic justice, for 22 years ago just such a kid sat in the second balcony of Symphony Hall in Boston and listened in thunderstruck awe as Leonard Bernstein conducted the Boston Symphony in the same work.

Those who may read this column regularly know that I am a certified Mahler nut, and in particular a shameless propagandist for the Mahler Second Symphony. This all goes back to Bernstein and that Boston performance. I became a Mahler convert precisely between the hours of 3 and 4:30 p.m. on the afternoon of Friday, Feb. 6, 1948. It was like the revelation visited upon Saul of Tarsus that turned him overnight into a Christian.

1948, of course, was the bad old days when Mahler was a dirty word in the musical press and the reference books. Like everyone else, I had been brought up on the party line: Mahler? He may have had a good idea here and there, but he was SO long-winded and SO self-pitying and SO un-self-critical and SO boring — just not to be taken seriously by "real" music lovers.

The hooker was, of course, that none of the public and very few of the critics had heard much of the music. Among the major Mahler works there were only occasional performances of the First and Fourth Symphonies and of "Das Lied von der Erde" (the latter a generally accepted masterwork — the ONLY generally accepted masterwork in Mahler's output).

Back in the forties there had been a series of drastically abridged radio performances of the Mahler symphonies by, of all people, Erno Rapee and the Radio City Music Hall Orchestra. But in our house those coincided with Sunday dinnertime and made no real impression.

SO WHEN it was announced that Bernstein would conduct the Mahler Second at Symphony Hall, it caused no special excitement. I debated for a while whether to even go. But I did, and it was one of those afternoons that stays green in the memory for the rest of one's life.

I remember being at once thrilled and confused by the 20-minute first movement of the "Resurrection" — deeply moved by its elevated, apocalyptic language and the startling beauty of its orchestration, but not able to grasp at first hearing its formal coherence. It seemed beautiful beyond words, but chaotic.

Then came the gentle dance-like slow movement and the fantastic, swirling scherzo — and after them the beautiful "Urlicht" movement and then that long, shattering finale. The work really burst like a bomb upon me and upon an audience totally unprepared for it, totally unsure of what to expect.

THE CHEERING, screaming and stomping after that titanic finale were really something, and the reaction of the Boston critics (their reviews are still pasted in the back of my Kalmus edition of the score) echoed the audience's enthusiasm. They alternated between dazed cheers for a patent masterpiece and musings of "where has this piece been all these years?"

The advent of the LP record — which coincided almost exactly with that performance — was, of course, a great boon to Mahler. For the first time, his lengthy, weighty works were available in easily obtained and sonically adequate albums. But one must not underestimate the contribution of a conductor like Bernstein who made available the all-important experience of the live performance. Hearing the Second, the Third, the Eighth or any of the other big Mahler scores in a live performance is like personally experiencing some great natural upheaval instead of watching it on black-and-white TV. It is a musical experience that hits you in the gut.

THURSDAY'S Blossom audience will come to the Mahler Second vastly better prepared than did its Boston predecessor of 1948. There are half a dozen recordings available, and the piece is becoming, praise be, a repertory item. Mahler has made it.

But at that gripping moment in the finale when the tangle of orchestral birdcalls dies quietly away and the chorus enters as softly as possible with its "You Shall Rise Again, my Soul" — advance preparation or no advance preparation, it is enough to turn a strong man to jelly.

Leonard Bernstein conducts the Cleveland Orchestra in a benefit concert Thursday night at Blossom Music Center.

THE PLAIN DEALER
CLEVELAND, OHIO
D. 409,414 SUN. 515,032
JUL 5 1970

AT TANGLEWOOD

Bernstein's Dramatic Flair Ideal for Mahler's Music

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX —Lennie packed the house Sunday afternoon. He filled it with people and music. Certainly it wasn't only Mahler's music that brought 9122 listeners to Tanglewood's great shed and lush lawns.

Memorable Experience

Everything was lush, Leonard Bernstein's dramatic conducting technique, Mahler's monumentally romantic "Resurrection" symphony — even the air was lush, warm and heavy with humidity.

It was a truly memorable musical experience; the setting and the staging were ideal for Mahler's grand 96-minute symphony. That's how long it lasted Sunday, not counting pauses between movements.

It is a vast, titanic work, not simply in its relentless length of performance but more in its sonic scope. It is stentorian and benign, richly imposing and transparently light, thunderous and lyrical.

Expansive Connotations

It connotes towering mountains and grand canyons and broad prairies, an endless series of tensions and releases.

It uses all of the colorful 19th century powers of tonal brilliance and versatility found only in a great orchestra, first unearthed by Berlioz and believed carried nearly to completion by Wagner and Strauss.

Bernstein's flamboyant podium styles well suited to this kind of musical show. It is polished melodrama, and he is suburbia's ideal conductor; he is a teenager's day-dream conductor.

The fact that he is also a first-rate musician and extremely successful in interpreting Mahler's intentions is a bonus of value to those listeners who care for the music as well as the demonstration.

Long, Long Ovation

He was given a shouting ovation that lasted nine minutes by my casual timing and eleven minutes by his wife's. Either way it was a very very long time to applaud a symphony. He was still on stage a half-hour after the performance surrounded by his fans.

What accounts for this kind of popularity? Who knows? Probably it is his personification of Everyman's idea of what a conductor should look like.

He is extremely active. He makes all those motions on the podium one has learned to expect from a movie version of the heroic conductor.

Choreographed Conducting

His arms flail and punch and sweep. His fists draw thunderbolts, and his pointing fingers shoot lightning. He crouches and hunches and swings and dances and stands with feet wide. He leaps far into the air. His head throws back to his shoulder blades and hangs down on his chest in despair.

Grins of joy, sweet smiles of ecstasy, and twisted grimaces of anguish cross his face.

All the time he is demonstrating choreographically how he would like to have the orchestra make the music sound (occasionally inserting semi-secret smiles or nods to the musicians indicating approval) and simultaneously responding personally and physically to how the music sounds in his mind's ear.

Tremendous Performance

His mannerisms have been derided, but he is a success with his musicians and his audiences. They respond. They responded beautifully Sunday. The performance was tremendous.

Most impressive dramatically, of course, were the moments of sudden dynamic contrast; but highly pleasing over somewhat longer periods were the second movement (12 minutes), which was nice and light and full of grace, and the fourth movement simple song was sung with and the fourth movement (about six minutes), whose simple song was sung with a voice of pure gold by the contralto, Christa Ludwig.

The chorus too was impressive as was the soprano, Lorna Haywood, although she had little to do.

Mahler's music is most impressive cumulatively; the total effect is what really counts, and the listener who just sits patiently and waits for it is the one most rewarded.

The weekend's gate counts were 4373 Friday night, 2640 for the open rehearsal Saturday morning, 6354 Saturday night and 9122 Sunday afternoon for a total of 22,489.

* * *

This week's programs will bring rock music Tuesday at 6 (The Who, Jethro Tull, It's a Beautiful Day); the St. John's College Choir of Cambridge, England, Friday at 7; Rafael Fruhbeck DeBurgos to conduct a concert performance of Mozart's big singspiel, "Cosi Fan Tutte" Saturday at 8.30 with six soloists and chorus; and Ozawa to lead the orchestra Saturday at 2.30 with Peter Serkin as piano soloist and Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band to join the orchestra for a new work called "Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra."

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
JUL 6 1970
New England Newsclip

AT TANGLEWOOD

Familiar Music Played Warmly

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Seiji Ozawa conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in an unusual pairing of familiar composers with familiar music Saturday night at Tanglewood — Mozart before intermission, Stravinsky afterward.

Silverstein Soloist

Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was soloist for Stravinsky's Violin Concerto in D composed in 1931. It's a lively eccentric 15 - minute piece in four sections.

Silverstein is a highly skilled violinist, about at virtuoso level, but he plays with a sweet, warm tone, a phlegmatic expression and no physical mannerisms at all.

So even when he is playing the most spectacularly difficult and dramatic music, he seems to be getting sleepy while his violin is swinging up a storm.

Such was the case Saturday. I like the sweet, warm tone on the fiddle; and I think such tonal color is helpful in keeping the overly dramatic works from becoming too theatrical.

Silverstein does it nicely with Stravinsky and Bartok and Schoenberg and such. He did it nicely Saturday.

Acrobatic Conducting

Ozawa is a slender, supple conductor with a friendly, boyish grin and a giant thatch of thick black hair. It looks like a furry football helmet and it attracts a lot of attention because of Ozawa's propensity for physical action.

He is a member of the acrobatic conducting school, like Bernstein, who will conduct at Tanglewood today. He bobs and bounces and sways vigorously, and his hair bobs and bounces along with him...but not so much with Mozart.

The Mozart on the program Saturday was the overture to "Figaro" (for four minutes) and the "Linz" Symphony, K 425 (20 minutes). It was nice Mozart because Ozawa is a skillful and versatile conductor, but it was not inspired.

Pace Restrained

The first movement was neat and tidy, the second sombre and graceful and slow, the third stately and the fourth middling brisk.

As a whole it seemed to be taken at a very carefully measured pace; refined and elegant but a bit lacking in spirit.

The concert ended with Stravinsky's 20-minute suite from "The Firebird" ballet.

This afternoon at 2:30 Bernstein will lead the orchestra and chorus with two vocal soloists through Mahler's "Resurrection" symphony without intermission...five movements 88 minutes.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754
JUL 5, 1970
New England Newsclip

Ozawa Bato Familiar C

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Seiji Ozawa conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in an unusual pairing of familiar composers with familiar music Saturday night at Tanglewood — Mozart before intermission, Stravinsky afterward.

Silverstein Soloist

Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was soloist for Stravinsky's Violin Concerto in D composed in 1931. It's a lively eccentric 15 - minute piece in four sections.

Silverstein is a highly skilled violinist, about at virtuoso level, but he plays with a sweet, warm tone, a phlegmatic expression and no physical mannerisms at all.

So even when he is playing the most spectacularly difficult and dramatic music, he seems to be getting sleepy while his violin is swinging up a storm.

Such was the case Saturday. I like the sweet, warm tone on the fiddle; and I think such tonal color is helpful in keeping the overly dramatic works from becoming too theatrical.

Silverstein does it nicely with Stravinsky and Bartok and Schoenberg and such. He did it nicely Saturday.

Acrobatic Conducting

Ozawa is a slender, supple conductor with a friendly, boyish grin and a giant thatch of thick black hair. It looks like a furry football helmet and it attracts a lot of attention because of Ozawa's propensity for physical action.

He is a member of the acrobatic conducting school, like Bernstein, who conducted at Tanglewood Sunday. He bobs and bounces and sways vigorously, and his hair bobs and bounces along with him...but not so much with Mozart.

The Mozart on the program Saturday was the overture to "Figaro" (for four minutes) and the "Linz" Symphony, K.425 (20 minutes). It was nice Mozart because Ozawa is a skillful and versatile conductor, but it was not inspired.

Pace Restrained

The first movement was neat and tidy, the second sombre and graceful and slow, the third stately and the fourth middling brisk.

As a whole it seemed to be taken at a very carefully measured pace; refined and elegant but a bit lacking in spirit.

The concert ended with Stravinsky's 20-minute suite from "The Firebird" ballet.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
JUL 6 1970
New England Newsclip

Music

Mahler's 'Resurrection': Unforgettable Experience

By Robert Finn

I wonder if somewhere among the crowd listening to Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony Thursday night at Blossom Music Center there might be a high school kid of 17 or 18, hearing the piece for the very first time.

ROBERT FINN

If so, it will be some kind of poetic justice, for 22 years ago just such a kid sat in the second balcony of Symphony Hall in Boston and listened in thunderstruck awe as Leonard Bernstein conducted the Boston Symphony in the same work.

Those who may read this column regularly know that I am a certified Mahler nut, and in particular a shameless propagandist for the Mahler Second Symphony. This all goes back to Bernstein and that Boston performance. I became a Mahler convert precisely between the hours of 3 and 4:30 p.m. on the afternoon of Friday, Feb. 6, 1948. It was like the revelation visited upon Saul of Tarsus that turned him overnight into a Christian.

1948, of course, was the bad old days when Mahler was a dirty word in the musical press and the reference books. Like everyone else, I had been brought up on the party line: Mahler? He may have had a good idea here and there, but he was SO long-winded and SO self-pitying and SO un-self-critical and SO boring — just not to be taken seriously by "real" music lovers.

The hooker was, of course, that none of the public and very few of the critics had heard much of the music. Among the major Mahler works there were only occasional performances of the First and Fourth Symphonies and of "Das Lied von der Erde" (the latter a generally accepted masterwork — the ONLY generally accepted masterwork in Mahler's output).

Back in the forties there had been a series of drastically abridged radio performances of the Mahler symphonies by, of all people, Erno Rapee and the Radio City Music Hall Orchestra. But in our house those coincided with Sunday dinnertime and made no real impression.

SO WHEN it was announced that Bernstein would conduct the Mahler Second at Symphony Hall, it caused no special excitement. I debated for a while whether to even go. But I did, and it was one of those afternoons that stays green in the memory for the rest of one's life.

I remember being at once thrilled and confused by the 20-minute first movement of the "Resurrection" — deeply moved by its elevated, apocalyptic language and the startling beauty of its orchestration, but not able to grasp at first hearing its formal coherence. It seemed beautiful beyond words, but chaotic.

Then came the gentle dance-like slow movement and the fantastic, swirling scherzo — and after them the beautiful "Urlicht" movement and then that long, shattering finale. The work really burst like a bomb upon me and upon an audience totally unprepared for it, totally unsure of what to expect.

THE CHEERING, screaming and stomping after that titanic finale were really something, and the reaction of the Boston critics (their reviews are still pasted in the back of my Kalmus edition of the score) echoed the audience's enthusiasm. They alternated between dazed cheers for a patent masterpiece and musings of "where has this piece been all these years?"

The advent of the LP record — which coincided almost exactly with that performance — was, of course, a great boon to Mahler. For the first time, his lengthy, weighty works were available in easily obtained and sonically adequate albums. But one must not underestimate the contribution of a conductor like Bernstein who made available the all-important experience of the live performance. Hearing the Second, the Third, the Eighth or any of the other big Mahler scores in a live performance is like personally experiencing some great natural upheaval instead of watching it on black-and-white TV. It is a musical experience that hits you in the gut.

THURSDAY'S Blossom audience will come to the Mahler Second vastly better prepared than did its Boston predecessor of 1948. There are half a dozen recordings available, and the piece is becoming, praise be, a repertory item. Mahler has made it.

But at that gripping moment in the finale when the tangle of orchestral bird-calls dies quietly away and the chorus enters as softly as possible with its "You Shall Rise Again, my Soul" — advance preparation or no advance preparation, it is enough to turn a strong man to jelly.

Leonard Bernstein conducts the Cleveland Orchestra in a benefit concert Thursday night at Blossom Music Center.

THE PLAIN DEALER
CLEVELAND, OHIO
D. 409,414 SUN. 515,032
JUL 5 1970

AT TANGLEWOOD

Bernstein's Dramatic Flair Ideal for Mahler's Music

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX —Lennie packed the house Sunday afternoon. He filled it with people and music. Certainly it wasn't only Mahler's music that brought 9122 listeners to Tanglewood's great shed and lush lawns.

Memorable Experience

Everything was lush, Leonard Bernstein's dramatic conducting technique, Mahler's monumentally romantic "Resurrection" symphony — even the air was lush, warm and heavy with humidity.

It was a truly memorable musical experience; the setting and the staging were ideal for Mahler's grand 96-minute symphony. That's how long it lasted Sunday, not counting pauses between movements.

It is a vast, titanic work, not simply in its relentless length of performance but more in its sonic scope. It is stentorian and benign, richly imposing and transparently light, thunderous and lyrical.

Expansive Connotations

It connotes towering mountains and grand canyons and broad prairies, an endless series of tensions and releases.

It uses all of the colorful 19th century powers of tonal brilliance and versatility found only in a great orchestra, first unearthed by Berlioz and believed carried nearly to completion by Wagner and Strauss.

Bernstein's flamboyant podium styles well suited to this kind of musical show. It is polished melodrama, and he is suburbia's ideal conductor; he is a teenager's day-dream conductor.

The fact that he is also a first-rate musician and extremely successful in interpreting Mahler's intentions is a bonus of value to those listeners who care for the music as well as the demonstration.

Long, Long Ovation

He was given a shouting ovation that lasted nine minutes by my casual timing and eleven minutes by his wife's. Either way it was a very very long time to applaud a symphony. He was still on stage a half-hour after the performance surrounded by his fans.

What accounts for this kind of popularity? Who knows? Probably it is his personification of Everyman's idea of what a conductor should look like.

He is extremely active. He makes all those motions on the podium one has learned to expect from a movie version of the heroic conductor.

Choreographed Conducting

His arms flail and punch and sweep. His fists draw thunderbolts, and his pointing fingers shoot lightning. He crouches and hunches and swings and dances and stands with feet wide. He leaps far into the air. His head throws back to his shoulder blades and hangs down on his chest in despair.

Grins of joy, sweet smiles of ecstasy, and twisted grimaces of anguish cross his face.

All the time he is demonstrating choreographically how he would like to have the orchestra make the music sound (occasionally inserting semi-secret smiles or nods to the musicians indicating approval) and simultaneously responding personally and physically to how the music sounds in his mind's ear.

Tremendous Performance

His mannerisms have been derided, but he is a success with his musicians and his audiences. They respond. They responded beautifully Sunday. The performance was tremendous.

Most impressive dramatically, of course, were the moments of sudden dynamic contrast, but highly pleasing over somewhat longer periods were the second movement (12 minutes), which was nice and light and full of grace, and the fourth movement simple song was sung with and the fourth movement (about six minutes), whose simple song was sung with a voice of pure gold by the contralto, Christa Ludwig.

The chorus too was impressive as was the soprano, Lorna Haywood, although she had little to do.

Mahler's music is most impressive cumulatively; the total effect is what really counts, and the listener who just sits patiently and waits for it is the one most rewarded.

The weekend's gate counts were 4373 Friday night, 2640 for the open rehearsal Saturday morning, 6354 Saturday night and 9122 Sunday afternoon for a total of 22,489.

* * *

This week's programs will bring rock music Tuesday at 6 (The Who, Jethro Tull, It's a Beautiful Day); the St. John's College Choir of Cambridge, England, Friday at 7; Rafael Fruhbeck DeBurgos to conduct a concert performance of Mozart's big singspiel, "Cosi Fan Tutte" Saturday at 8.30 with six soloists and chorus; and Ozawa to lead the orchestra Saturday at 2.30 with Peter Serkin as piano soloist and Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band to join the orchestra for a new work called "Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra."

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
JUL 6 1970
New England Newsclip

AT TANGLEWOOD

Familiar Music Played Warmly

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Seiji Ozawa conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in an unusual pairing of familiar composers with familiar music Saturday night at Tanglewood — Mozart before intermission, Stravinsky afterward.

Silverstein Soloist

Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was soloist for Stravinsky's Violin Concerto in D composed in 1931. It's a lively eccentric 15 - minute piece in four sections.

Silverstein is a highly skilled violinist, about at virtuoso level, but he plays with a sweet, warm tone, a phlegmatic expression and no physical mannerisms at all.

So even when he is playing the most spectacularly difficult and dramatic music, he seems to be getting sleepy while his violin is swinging up a storm.

Such was the case Saturday. I like the sweet, warm tone on the fiddle; and I think such tonal color is helpful in keeping the overly dramatic works from becoming too theatrical.

Silverstein does it nicely with Stravinsky and Bartok and Schoenberg and such. He did it nicely Saturday.

Ozawa is a slender, supple conductor with a friendly, boyish grin and a giant thatch of thick black hair. It looks like a furry football helmet and it attracts a lot of attention because of Ozawa's propensity for physical action.

He is a member of the acrobatic conducting school, like Bernstein, who conducted at Tanglewood Sunday. He bobs and bounces and sways vigorously, and his hair bobs and bounces along with him...but not so much with Mozart.

The Mozart on the program Saturday was the overture to "Figaro" (for four minutes) and the "Linz" Symphony, K 425 (20 minutes). It was nice Mozart because Ozawa is a skillful and versatile conductor, but it was not inspired.

Pace Restrained

The first movement was neat and tidy, the second sombre and graceful and slow, the third stately and the fourth middling brisk.

As a whole it seemed to be taken at a very carefully measured pace; refined and elegant but a bit lacking in spirit.

The concert ended with Stravinsky's 20-minute suite from "The Firebird" ballet.

This afternoon at 2:30 Bernstein will lead the orchestra and chorus with two vocal soloists through Mahler's "Resurrection" symphony without intermission...five movements, 88 minutes.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
113,754
JUL 5 1970
New England Newsclip

VATICAN CITY (UPI) — An Italian Roman Catholic bishop receives a yearly salary of $4,307 minus social security deductions, the Vatican press spokesman said Saturday.

of bishops

Ozawa Baton Pairs Familiar Composers

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Seiji Ozawa conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in an unusual pairing of familiar composers with familiar music Saturday night at Tanglewood — Mozart before intermission, Stravinsky afterward.

Silverstein Soloist

Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, was soloist for Stravinsky's Violin Concerto in D composed in 1931. It's a lively eccentric 15 - minute piece in four sections.

Silverstein is a highly skilled violinist, about at virtuoso level, but he plays with a sweet, warm tone, a phlegmatic expression and no physical mannerisms at all.

So even when he is playing the most spectacularly difficult and dramatic music, he seems to be getting sleepy while his violin is swinging up a storm.

Such was the case Saturday. I like the sweet, warm tone on the fiddle; and I think such tonal color is helpful in keeping the overly dramatic works from becoming too theatrical.

Silverstein does it nicely with Stravinsky and Bartok and Schoenberg and such. He did it nicely Saturday.

Ozawa is a slender, supple conductor with a friendly, boyish grin and a giant thatch of thick black hair. It looks like a furry football helmet and it attracts a lot of attention because of Ozawa's propensity for physical action.

He is a member of the acrobatic conducting school, like Bernstein, who conducted at Tanglewood Sunday. He bobs and bounces and sways vigorously, and his hair bobs and bounces along with him...but not so much with Mozart.

The Mozart on the program Saturday was the overture to "Figaro" (for four minutes) and the "Linz" Symphony, K.425 (20 minutes). It was nice Mozart because Ozawa is a skillful and versatile conductor, but it was not inspired.

Pace Restrained

The first movement was neat and tidy, the second sombre and graceful and slow, the third stately and the fourth middling brisk.

As a whole it seemed to be taken at a very carefully measured pace; refined and elegant but a bit lacking in spirit.

The concert ended with Stravinsky's 20-minute suite from "The Firebird" ballet.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
JUL 6 1970
New England Newsclip

30

Tanglewood Review

Opening Weekend At 33rd Festival

by Martha deB. Beaver

There was little doubt that the opening weekend of the 33rd Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, was dominated, through his enormous popularity, by the current advisor, famed Leonard Bernstein, who conducted Sunday's concert only. Although Friday's program was in the hands of Seiki Ozawa the youthful, artistic director, the evening began with Bernstein's Chichester Psalms. These elicited such prolonged and abandoned applause for the composer that 15 minutes elapsed before the program could proceed.

Ozawa impulsively ran down into the Shed, and persuaded Bernstein, who had acknowledged applause from his box, to come onstage. It did seem a bit too much. But the people love Lenny, and love to show their affection, and who would stop them? He is a unique (and deserving) personality, whose inspiration (which he passes on to his students) continues to stem from another beloved individual, Serge Koussevitsky, and without whose cufflinks, it is said, Bernstein never conducts a concert.

Simply Conceived

The Chichester Psalms is a simply conceived, unprepossessing work, having a clean texture, in which folklike melodies, spiritual and jazz idioms interchange with the mood of each of the seven psalms.

Sweetly evocative was boy alto Robert Puleo, suggesting David the shepherd, accompanied only by solo harp, expressing the 23rd psalm. We thought the melody a little syrupy, but liked the dramatic contrasts when the men's choir interrupts with the ferocious outburst "Who do the heathen rage," Psalm 2 vv. 1-4, and the movement continues quietly but always with a subdued, savagely menacing undercurrent.

Totally different in sound and texture was Hungarian composer Gyorgy Ligeti's "Atmospheres," the next offering by Ozawa and the orchestra, scored without percussion except for the piano, of which only the strings were whisked and plucked at intervals. In this, Ligeti notes "I have attempted to supersede the structural approach to music, which once superseded the motivic-thematic approach, to establish a new textural concept of music...an uninhabited, imaginary musical space...tone color is liberated from form to become an independent musical entity."

Partial Tones

To achieve this sensationally complex and sonorous texture, the composer assigned individual parts to each instrument, consisting of a number of "partial" tones, each sound in itself a "partial" of a still more intricate acoustical structure.

The effect would be likened to a fast-moving display of sample cloths woven from completely foreign yet fascinating materials, at once aurally startling and esthetically acceptable. Those who saw the movie "2001" would have heard some sections of "Atmospheres," which we were told, were badly misused.

In spite of his constant conductorial movements, Ozawa didn't quite bring off Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony. Perhaps we expected too much, being partial to Munch's magnificent interpretation, which probed the heights and depths equally and characteristically. We admit that conductor and orchestra produced a silken waltz in the second movement, that swayed and flowed, and over and over left one in breathless suspension on the high point of a phrase, then to drop with soft abandon and repeated expectancy. It was almost too much.

Pastoral Vein

We could still appreciate the Adagio's introductory and delightful dialogue between English horn and oboe, set in a pastoral vein but with a hint of sadness. The length of this movement engenders its atmosphere of lonely vastness, inherent in Berlioz' own preferred solitude, expressing to perfection despondence and weariness of spirit, but also having moments of happiness, or perhaps tranquillity.

Ozawa and the orchestra finished this imaginatively conceived symphony with the flourish and fantasy it deserves. Somehow the music can still speak for itself, whether the conductor delves deeply enough or not. We felt the whole more of a flirtation than an interpretation. Ozawa was given a standing ovation, and again on Saturday evening.

Mozart and Stravinsky comprised this program, opening with the former's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," lacking in bubbling excitement, and his "Linz" Symphony No. 36 in C, neatly packaged, but uneven rhythmically at times, tempo uncertain, the conductor seemingly without profound musical assurance.

An entirely different feeling prevaded the second half, starting with Stravinsky's Violin Concerto in D, exquisitely played by Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster, a perfect vehicle for his inimitable style, introspective, contained, with a delightful discourse between flutes, brass and winds, in the third section.

The Firebird

The eclectic Suite from the ballet "The Firebird" was beautifully handled by Ozawa and the orchestra, its many-hued web of orchestral enchantment holding the audience enthralled throughout the choreographically attuned musical tale.

Attendance at the weekend's performances totaled 22,489, increasing as the weekend progressed, climaxed by 9122 for the Sunday concert, the unpromising weather a deterrent perhaps, but not for Bernstein devotees. His electric and kinetic conduction of Mahler's Second Symphony, "The Resurrection," was superbly interpreted; the coordination of solo and choral voices in the triumphant last movement unparalleled.

We attended Saturday morning's open rehearsal of this movement work, during which Berstein was more off the ground than on in his zeal to elicit the most finished and sensitive musical interpretation from the performers. At one point he had to inform the noisy onlookers that absolute quiet was a must ..."we're working here;" but a final "Raus" was necessary before silence ensued. A "trust me" to concertmaster Silverstein concerning rhythm, an encouraging "there, you're not so cold," to oboeist Ralph Gomberg after a particularly moving phrase, and repetitions with contralto Christa Ludwig for more articulate consonants. Exhausted just listening to the intricacies of the symphony, we wondered if the emotional exhilaration carries Bernstein through such strenuous mental and physical dedication.

Rehearsal time paid off in Sunday's polished performance, during which Bernstein's calisthenics seemed restrained in comparison to Saturday's. "A symphony conveying a religious message," Mahlers' close friend Bruno Walter calls it; "born out of a mood of sorrow it became a symphonic masterpiece."

Dramatic Intensity

Each movement is developed with dramatic intensity, full of sudden contrasts in dynamics and mood, beautifully apparent throughout...the brass and woodwinds in stunning tonal control...the second movement taken at a lingeringly slow but savory tempo (shades of Koussevitsky)...the third playfully brisk with an almost anguished climax of sound before the pianissimo close...without a break the fourth following. Christa Ludwig intoning the supremely inspired music of the solemn text, a visionary mood expressing a simple belief in salvation...a soft moment setting the stage for the Finale ushered in with startling crescendo rolls of the drums after which the horns predominate before a relentless march theme develops.

Trumpet fanfares offstage and on, mingled with bird calls established a completely different mood, pastoral and sweet yet awesome... a scarcely perceptible pause and the chorus, barely audible at first, enters as one delicate instrument, unaccompanied, the lovely soprano voice of soloist Lorna Haywood rising above the rest. (The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society were excellently trained by Elliot Forbes, director, while the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, also participating, rehearsed for the performance with their very competent director John Oliver).

In ecstatic involvement Berstein looked heavenward as he brought the full orchestra, organ and chimes included, to a jubilant climax. The audience, as one, responded in the same uplifted mood.

More Capable

Mahler maintained that music was "far more capable of expression and illumination than words."...and abhorred program notes which he said narrow the esthetic and emotional scope of the music. He envisioned the verses of his Finale (from Klopstock's ode "Resurrection" and Mahler's own pen) as a summons to faith...nothing is in vain... loving, struggling, suffering. "Opinions gained through life's feverish struggle the soul will soar to the Light that no eye has ever beheld."

This weekend's concerts will feature Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos conducting Falla's El amor brujo. Two suites from "The Three-cornered Hat" and Stravinsky's Le Sacre du Printemps, Friday at 9:00. Saturday Seiji Ozawa will direct a concert version of Mozart's Cosi Fan tutte, beginning at 8:30. Sunday starting at 2:30 he will conduct Prokofiev's "Music from Romeo and Juliet," Schoenberg's Piano Concerto with Peter Serkin, and Russo's Three pieces for blues band with Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

JUL 10 1970 New England Newsclip

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 4 1970 New England Newsclip

33d Music Festival Opens at Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The Boston symphony orchestra began its 33rd music festival at Tanglewood without fanfare Friday night. The music was bright and brassy, though.

The full orchestra was on stage a departure from the years of presenting half the orchestra to play Mozart and Bach during the festival first two weekends.

The first note was a resounding cymbal crash which started the 'Chichester psalms' by Leonard Bernstein, who subsequently bounded up on the stage in response to a summons from the conductor, Seiji Ozawa. He took a bow and was given an accolade for his music.

He deserved it. The piece is a substantial work even though only 20 minutes long. Its three movements use a chorus (about 120 Friday) and a boy soprano to voice excerpts from Psalms 2, 23, 108, 131, and 133.

The first is volatile and pulsing, the second a liquid melody and the third a statement of calm optimism.

Ligeti's "Atmospheres," which followed, is a 1961 work using contemporary atonal and rhythmless techniques to establish a static rather than linear, acoustic experience whence the title.

It was academically fascinating and emotionally remote, but certainly not barren. The tonal textures included (Among those more familiar) shrieking, rustling, whispering, fluttering, rumbling.

In spite of Ligeti there was a sequential element in it; and probably to his enjoyment, it brought a lonely, but a loud Bronx cheer from somewhere in the audience during the long pause before the applause broke out.

After intermission there was more orchestral brilliance, but of a more familiar color, i.e., Berlioz's very popular, five-movement suite "Symphonie Fantastique."

The 7 o'clock prelude program attracted about 1000 early arrivals to hear 11 of Mahler's art songs from "Des Knaben Wunderhorn" plus encores).

They were sung by Richard Taylor and his wife, Rose, who were fellows of the Berkshire Music Center last summer. They were accompanied by Dennis Helmrich vocal coach at the center.

She, a mezzosoprano sang four of the songs; he, a baritone, sang four.

Together they sang three.

She sang with icy clarity and emotional strength; he with a light flexibility. Both indicated sure control and a rejection of melodramatics.

They were best in duet.

Tonight at 8.30, a new starting time, (for many years the Saturday concert had begun at 8), Ozawa will conduct a Mozart overture and symphony (Linz) and Stravinsky's Violin Concerto in D and a suite from "The Firebird" ballet.

Tomorrow at 2.30, Leonard Bernstein will conduct Mahler's "Resurrection" symphony for orchestra, chorus and soprano and contralto soloists.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 6 1970 New England Newsclip

Music—Concerts At Tanglewood

By HARRY NEVILLE
HT Music Critc

LONOX — The first of this season's weekend concerts at Tanglewood took place Friday, Saturday and yesterday and although the weather was dismal enough to affect the size of the turnouts, it's good to be able to report that it had no effect whatever on the customary enthusiasm of Berkshire Festival audiences.

Seiji Dzawa and Leonard Bernstein, two of the Festival's new guiding artistic triumvirate, were present on the podium and, in the case of the latter, on the program. Aside from that, the most striking difference between this and previous years is the new seats and seating arrangement.

THERE ARE NOW 5,088 chairs in the shed and because they are wider than before, more comfortably designed and more widely separated from adjoining rows, listening is now an altogether more pleasurable physical experience than in former years. According to the Tanglewood news release, the old seats followed the arc of the shed and were focused at a point at the back of the shed, whereas the new seats are focused at the conductor. Needless to say, that is pretty much where one's attention focuses with Messrs. Bernstein and Ozawa.

Things got under way Friday night with Ozawa leading the BSO, Tanglewood Festival Orchestra, Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society in Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms' (1965), the composer's only major work since the "Kaddish" Symphony of 1963. "Psalms" is a singularly unprepossessing work — singularly so because the composer seems to have made a special effort to write direct and simple music of immediate appeal, and yet he has failed on nearly all counts.

Harmonically the work makes overmuch use of "wrong note" chords, while rhythmically the fast sections tend to be bumptious in the manner of Broadway musicals. Melodically too the work is reminscent of Broadway, although the melodies don't really have the distinctiveness of good show tunes.

ONE COULD POINT to several composers who appear to have influenced the writing but Bernstein, who seems to have developed no style of his own, would not be among them. Ultimately the most interesting thing about "Psalms' is the vast gap it reveals between Bernstein the composer and Bernstein the conductor.

On this same program was Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique," of which Ozawa gave a vivid, driving reading, one that was at times quite electrifying and yet always controlled and mindful of the work's structure. Much the same was true too of Stravinsky's "Firebird Suite," which Ozawa led the following evening.

The highpoint, however, of the first two concerts was Joseph Silverstein's beautifully poised cooly elegant performance of Stravinsky's Violin Concerto in D. Silverstein's refined musical temperament seems ideally suited to the requirements of this work and while he has given many fine performances in the past, he outdid himself in this instance.

YESTERDAY afternoon was devoted entirely to a performance of Hahler's monumental Symphony No. 2 ("Resurrection"), with the choruses previously mentioned and with soloist Lorna Haywood, soprano, and Christa Ludwig, contralto. Leonard Bernstein conducted and he elicited from the combined forces playing and singing that was, in a word, magnificent. Bernstein's grasp of this music is brilliant and profound, and the event was one of those unique experiences the listener treasures for years afterwards.

WELCH

AMUSE TANGLE HTC TODAY NE

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

During the opening week of the Berkshire Festival here, Leonard Bernstein, serving for the first time as "adviser to Tanglewood," dominated the proceedings by name and in person. He offered wise counsel on "the principle of hope" at the convocation of young musicians chosen to study at the Berkshire Music Center, and later led their five-day-old orchestra in an extraordinary evocation of Bruckner's Ninth Symphony. His own "Chichester Psalms" had a first performance by the Boston Symphony at the festival's opening concert under Seiji Ozawa's direction, and on Sunday afternoon, before a throng of more than 9,000, Mr. Bernstein conducted Mahler's Second Symphony in a manner which, for sheer excitement and epic grandeur, could only recall to those who could remember, the palmy Tanglewood days of Serge Koussevitzky.

Mr. Bernstein is now free of entangling administrative alliances with any musical organization, and back on the very spot where "30 years ago . . . in a state of wild excitement and anticipation," on the first day of the first session of the music center, he received the word from Koussevitzky on "the central line . . . the line leading to perpetual discovery, a mystical line to truth as revealed in the musical art."

GEO. PARKER

In telling today's students about his feelings then, and relaying to them, through the demanding Bruckner readings, the fruits of following "the central line," Mr. Bernstein has actually demonstrated his deep concern, combined with reassuring optimist, for the "instant generation's" musical future.

Personal involvement

Sunday afternoon's performance of Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony — his only appearance with the BSO this summer — offered a public view of a new unfettered Bernstein. Directing orchestra, soloists (mezzo Christa Ludwig and soprano Lorna Haywood in their BSO debuts) and a large choral group (the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society, and Tanglewood Festival Chorus), he confirmed the ecstatic reactions that have been emanating from Vienna, that stronghold of Beethoven, Bruckner, and Mahler, with breathtaking, musicianly brillance.

GRACE

For Mr. Bernstein, from the foreboding beginning to the smashing finale of the Mahler, conveyed unmistakably to everyone within eyeshot and earshot a complete personal involvement with this music. It was not long before those who came to "see Bernstein" instead became absorbed with what they were hearing. For calculated leaps and showy gestures do not produce the kind of sound and emotional response that Mr. Bernstein generated in his musicians and his audiences on Sunday. The wonderful, inexplicable Mahler score, invisible in Mr. Bernstein's head on this occasion, indeed flowed out to his interpreters in a "central line,"' which was passed on to listeners in the form of unvarnished tonal truth.

Every nuance was definitively explored—the lilting second and third movements floated with disembodied grace—and the haunting "Urlicht" passage, lushly and feelingly sung by Miss Ludwig, was conceived with heartbreaking simplicity. The tremendous finale, composed of so many elements, each strongly defined, was distinguished also by the delicately balanced work of the chorus, and beautiful sounds by Miss Haywood and Miss Ludwig (again). The complicated apparatus of offstage horns, bells, and even unscheduled, complimentary bird sounds in and outside the Shed, contributed to the tremendous climax with which Mr. Bernstein brought the afternoon to a stunning end. The audience responded with a rising shout which released emotions and enthusiasm in equal measure. It was a performance that belongs in the top echelon of Tanglewood triumphs.

TANGLEWOOD OPENS

The Old Place Is Looking Younger

By Peter M. Knapp

LENOX — There are major changes at Tanglewood this year, with the passing of the Boston Symphony Baton from Erich Leinsdorf to the new co-directorship of Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, and with Leonard Bernstein serving as adviser.

It's a younger, swinging musical generation, and the re-arranging extends even to the furniture. The Shed this year has wider wooden seating, replacing the a narrow metal chairs, and there is more leg room. Shed seating capacity has been reduced by about 1,000, but as a thrift note consider that the Boston Symphony purchased the former metal hairs for about $3,000 in 1938, used them until last year and sold them for twice the purchase price.

Programming has changed too. In the past, the first two weeks have been generally reserved for predominantly Mozart-Bach works for reduced orchestra. This year, Bach has been scrubbed and Mozart de-emphasized for concerts built around Romantic and 20th-Century composers.

Overpowering Resurrection

The major work of the first weekend was Sunday afternoon's over-powering performance of Gustav Mahler's massive "Resurrection" Symphony, no. 2 in c minor. Bernstein conducted the Boston Symphony with the massed voices of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Contralto Christa Ludwig and Soprano Lorna Haywood were the soloists.

Mahler's Second is a work of epic dimensions in scale, length, and musical imagination. There are pages of demonic force, chilling anticipation and sardonic surprises, cloaked in Mahler's exotic orchestration. What begins as a violent funeral march ends in an apocalyptic vision of the Last Judgment, capped by the triumphant proclamation of the Resurrection.

Bernstein, clad in a white Nehru jacket, led the hour-and-a-half symphony from memory in a performance of ecstatic grandeur that left the 9,122 listeners emotionally drained — to say nothing of the musicians. There was an 11-minute ovation, and the conductor was mobbed by audience members who leaped on the stage.

Talk of the Town

Mahler, to tell the truth, rarely gets this kind of reception. But already before the performance the Saturday morning rehearsal was the talk of the town. The work itself with its intensity and theatrical qualities, is ready-made for a conductor of Bernstein's bounding temperament. Along with the brass-laden sonority he drew from the orchestra and the cataclysmic climaxes, Bernstein also found room for occasions of quivering schmaltz, and the tempi of the first two movements were quite deliberate. In all, it was an exciting reading, despite these lapses, and both soloists — especially Miss Ludwig with her warm, creamy voice, sang with distinction.

The rest of the weekend was Seiji Ozawa's. The flop-haired Japanese dynamo opened the Berkshire Festival's eight-week season on a damp Friday Evening before 4,373 with Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms", Georgy Ligeti's "Atmospheres" and Hector Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique".

The Psalms, using the same choral forces as in Sunday's Mahler, made a boisterous "joyful noise unto the Lord," and boy alto Robert Puleo sang his solo in the middle movement with confident purity. Bernstein's work, diatonic and rhythmic, has an easy directness and flamboyance befitting its composer, who touched off an affectionate demonstration when he sprinted onstage for a bow.

Less Than Ideal

The Ligeti is sterner material: an extraordinary experiment in the use of apparently stationary sound. "Atmospheres" has no rhythmical scheme, no real harmony, no melody — just clouds of shimmering sound and gradual metamorphoses of sound and texture. Each individual part is in motion; but the total effect of such motions is to cancel out overt movement.

Ozawa's performance fell short of the ideal, with some of the events being rather hurriedly developed and not all of the sensitive balance problems solved. In the first ruge orchestral cluster, for example, the violin highs were faint. "Atmospheres" came to an unanticipated end when an explosive, stifled sneeze from the audience punctuated the silence of the last event.

LORNA HAYWOOD: Mahler's 'Resurrection'

Berlioz was up and down — impetuous and occasionally adrift in the early movements, wildly energetic at the end when Ozawa whipped up the witches' sabbath. The audience loved it.

Cheers and Control

They also cheered Ozawa for Saturday night's "Firebird" 1919 suite, concluding a Mozart-Stravinsky pairing which Stravinsky clearly won. A gathering of 6,354 heard Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" Overture and "Linz" Symphony as well as Stravinsky's Violin Concerto in D and "Firebird."

Ozawa's control over the piquant accompaniment of the Violin Concerto is not thoroughly polished, but Joseph Silverstein's playing of the solo part is a superb conception. As in his Symphony Hall performance this winter, Silverstein demonstrated mastery of the technical demands, as well as the style and spicy wit of the piece. And his playing of the two arias was unfailingly lovely.

The "Linz" Symphony was deadly, heavy and uninteresting: an example of proficient note-playing without a spark.

RUSSELL

Ozawa at the helm

"Berkshire weather," which smiled on the Sunday afternoon concert, had been less kind to the Friday opening and Saturday evenings conducted by Mr. Ozawa, artistic codirector with Gunther Schuller of the festival.

At the first, Mr. Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms" proved eminently listenable, particularly as sung by the resident choruses, and in the case of Psalm 23, by the clear-voiced and professionally projected alto of 14-year-old Robert Puleo. Gyorgy Ligeti's venture into "imaginary musical space"—"Atmospheres"—which Mr. Ozawa had played at a previous festival, received a suitably shimmery performance, abetted by the recollections of those who recalled its use in the film, "2001." Mr. Ozawa's conception of the Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique" turned out to be chilling in a spidery sort of way, with a dark skeletal quality substituted for the rich romanticism recalled from other eras in these surroundings. Bony Berlioz, but exciting.

G PARKER

Mr. Ozawa's persuasive way with Mozart was evidenced by his trim reading of the Symphony No. 36 in C ("The Linz"), as nice a house present as could be imagined, confected and performed by Mozart during a five-day stay with his wife at Count Thun's. (How many Berkshire hosts did as well?) Saturday also featured the most brilliant performance to date by Joseph Silverstein as soloist in Stravinsky's Violin Concerto in D, the work's first performance at the festival. A colorful, richly pictorial interpretation by Mr. Ozawa of the 1919 suite from Stravinsky's "Firebird" concluded the second concert to great enthusiasm.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

JUL 7 1970

New England Newsclip

Music

Bernstein, Ozawa & Shapiro at Tanglewood

By Laura Shapiro

Choral singing is a disease, and a fine one. You get all the excitement and ego-thrills of performing on stage with a whole orchestra at your feet, and none of the responsibility of stage-fright or years of tireless dedication. It's one of the few things done by more than four people that appeals to me. I'd much rather sing than listen. Most choral music strikes me as just a big messy blur when I hear it; and up on stage with my fellow altos (what a great part, the very life-blood of music) I love to throw myself in and drown in the general glory. You do get rather a distorted impression of most pieces: what seems to be a moving theme in the alto line turns out to be buried in some obscure corner of the harmony when you hear the record. Most composers, in fact, will throw the altos an old carcass of B flats to chew on for bars at a time, but every now and then there's something like Brahm's Requiem and someone like Brahms, who really knew what altos were all about.

My latest opportunity to indulge in choralizing came last weekend at the opening of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. The Festival people had decided to drop the traditional chamber music opening weekends for a razzle-dazzle curtain raiser involving Leonard Bernstein, Seiji Ozawa, Robert Puleo, Joseph Silverstein, Lorna Haywood, Christa Ludwig, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society (I played a fraction of the last-named organization.) Even that star-studded marquee attracted only 1600 more people than did a very esoteric three days of chamber music last July, but the weather this year, as everyone pointed out, was lousy. The two choral numbers were Bernstein's Chichester Psalms, with Ozawax conducting, and Mahler's Second Symphony, with Bernstein, on Friday night and Sunday afternoon respectively.

After rehearsing in Boston, the two choruses traveled up to Tanglewood in time for a Wednesday night rehearsal of the Chichester Psalms. With us in the Shed was a crew of men putting the finishing touches—with electric saws, drills and hammers—on the new seats; they were going to stay through the whole rehearsal but finally agreed to take a limited break. The chorus spent its first half hour at Tanglewood getting into a very idealistic line-up. Most choruses stand Soprano/Alto/Tenor/Bass, with all the members of one part together; it's much more fun to sing in a solo quartet but you have to know the music a lot better and it may be more difficult for the conductor. The solution here was octets: SS/TT/AA/BB, meaning you have a good mixed sound but there is always another alto there for moral (or direct) support.

I call this idealistic because it was done by parts and not by height, so that after a half hour of managerial finesse, at least a quarter of the chorus couldn't see Ozawa. Eventually the whole thing was reworked into octets-by-height and turned into a good idea, but meanwhile the rehearsal was hellish. Every few bars I had written "Watch! Watch!" in my music., and all I could see was the back of a giant tenor.

Chichester Psalms was written for the 1965 choral festival of the Chichester, Winchester and Salisbury Cathedrals; it is scored for mixed chorus, boy's choir and boy alto but Bernstein agrees in a preface to let the mixed women sing the boys' part. It's a setting for all or part of psalms no. 108, 100, 23, 2, and 131, in three movements, all in Hebrew. Bernstein wrote in very specific markings, such as ". . . (blissfully unaware of threat)," playing up the dramatic elements of dialogue, emotion, movement, and climax. Ozawa played them up too. He wore a long, loose, white cotton shirt, a string of beads, and bellbottoms; he trotted around the stage with all that thick black hair in his eyes and he was absolutely endearing, there's no other word and I'll use it again and again. His beat is entirely legible; in fact you can read everything he wants in his body. The introduction to the first movement is a phrase ending with a little yelp (I'm sure there's a musical term for that) which Ozawa wanted "ahhhh" (body tensed, ready for leap) ". . .uh "(with a sudden lunge into the harp.)" He acted it out several times: "Ahhhh—uh! Ahhhh—uh!" The whole piece was conducted like that, not necessarily with gymnastics but with total attention to every entrance, every bend and turn; the lowliest voice was made to feel a vital part of the music. Seiji cared. And endearing, my God, you could fall off the riser. "I think this is very physical music here. You will feel the quarter-notes, please. Is more." Sometimes he brushed his hair back and beacame a stern old Japanese courtier and then it would all tumble forward with the first downbeat and he would become just little and dear and blind and keep pushing away.

We had been told at the beginning of the rehearsal that Bernstein was expected to show up, and every five minutes some manager or aide would rush into the Shed and whisper to someone, "He just drove in!" Then everybody would scan the dark rows of seats, peering at the scattered faces. At the end of the rehearsal he really did appear, looking tired but hale, and embraced Ozawa, John Oliver (conductor of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus), El Forbes (conductor of Harvard-Radcliffe), assorted friends and hangers—on, and then looked longingly at the chorus as if he wanted to throw arms around us too. Everybody called him Lennie. Everybody knew him at Harvard. Everybody knew him when he was Koussevitsky's prodigy at Tanglewood. Everybody was in New York when Bruno Walter became sick suddenly and young Lennie sprang to the podium. Fellowship and nostalgia trickled over the stage. "I was just going to stand in the back and listen," Bernstein protested.

Ozawa took us through the piece once more and Bernstein stood close by, conducting quietly to himself. He looked utterly in love with his music and this performance, or do all composers look that way when they hear their own work? For the boy alto's solo he came up on stage to gaze adoringly at the youth, fourteen year old Robert Puleo, who remained unfazed. "Fantastic," he told the chorus afterwords. "Terrific. You're great." Which is a nice thing to hear from Leonard Bernstein. When the rehearsal was over, people crowded around him; he seems to invite it. He's a hero all right, but an approachable one. You would never crowd around Ozawa, although you would be more likely to hold him adoringly in your secret heart.

Thursday morning we had another rehearsal with Ozawa, this time with full orchestra. Full orchestra in the Psalms means strings, three trumpets, three trombones, two harps and a very neat percussion section including rasps, whip and bongos. John Oliver became vehement about vowels and urged Seiji to do the same, which he did grinning. Oliver is one of the best choral directors I've known, he understands the music, he knows vocal technique, he can feel the personality of a particular chorus as well as its emotional level at a given time; he's patient and down to earth and very articulate; and he's demanding but always encouraging. He praised Ozawa with enthusiasm and appreciation, "And isn't he wonderful to care so much about the chorus, and keep the orchestra down like that? So many conductors wouldn't bother." He also told the altos they needed more balls.

In the afternoon we rehearsed the choral part of Mahler's Second with Bernstein, in the West Barn rehearsal studio, which is off in the woods across the street. He came in with a blue pullover and no voice, explaining that when he conducts he sings everything in his throat, and he had come straight from the Bruckner ninth symphony. "If you don't have the low B flat," he said to the basses, "I do." The choral section comes at the end of the hour and a half symphony and lasts about seven minutes. Bernstein told us that we would probably flat wildly in the opening phrase because he was going to take it as pianissimo and as slowly as he possibly could. Moreover we would be sitting down, since the chorus is supposed to enter almost imperceptibly after the off-stage trumpets and vogelstimme, like a voice from some unknown, unearthly source. "Aufersteh'n, ja aufersteh'n wirst du, mein Staub, nach kurzer Ruh!" ("You will rise again, my dust, after a short repose!"). It's a neat effect, which we flatted wildly.

Our entrance came when his baton stopped a very slow descent from shoulder to mid chest, during which we were to breathe and think "H" so that we would just slip very quietly into "(h)Auf." That took a while. Bernstein stinted neither praise nor criticism, and he seemed to be working with the chorus, not outside and trying to pull something from it. It would have been a terrible personal loss for everyone, was the idea, if we hadn't finally landed on pitch. He was happy when we did, and loved us. Then he took a cigarette and 125 voices hissed him gently but reprovingly. "I know," he said ruefully. The contralto soloist was not at rehearsal and her part was sung by a student.

"What a beautiful voice," Bernstein cried after her first three notes. "What did you say her name was?" "Rose Taylor," she said, very distinctly.

Friday morning Bernstein led a full rehearsal of the Mahler, kindly beginning with the fifth movement. Christa Ludwig and Lorna Hayword were the contralto and soprano soloists; they were good and we were good but Lennie was unhappy with the orchestra. It was skimpy, for one thing: the off-stage musicians had to run back and forth steathily and a percussion player was lacking. He remonstrated with everyone on a first-name basis and they assured him," Lennie, we'll take care of it. It won't happen tomorrow." John Oliver stood out in the audience and waved two signals at us: arms straight up in the air meant sing high, and hands on the hips meant breathe low.

That night Rose Taylor and her baritone husband Richard sang songs from Mahler's "Des Knaben Wunderhorn" as the week end prelude, and then the chorus gathered under the rehearsal tent just outside the Shed for a warm-up. Vowels were widely stressed. It was getting dark when Seiji appeared, enveloped in a huge long coat. "I leave my evening jacket, so I am late," he apologized. "Beginning." Bits of audience were standing outside the tent watching curiously, we could hardly see him, and the music not at all. We began, straining through the dark to see the small, draped figure with the bent head who was even at that last minute concentrating totally on what he was hearing. He nodded when we had finished the first movement. "Very good. Ah. . .composer says no sentiment here but—I think—is sentimental music." Seiji! We sang our very hearts out for you and Lennie loved it, he said so; but Michael Steinberg in the "Globe" said it was "messy". Sniff. During the ovation Ozawa leaped nimbly down from the stage with Robert Puleo, ran around to the side backstage entrance, re-entered with Bernstein and the two chorus directors, and then trotted off, grinning all the way.

Saturday morning Bernstein led the traditional open rehearsal of Sunday's program, this time beginning at the beginning. Two hours later the orchestra had stumbled through the first two movements and he was on his second shirt. A snappy neckerchief had been discarded early in the game. He had begun by telling the orchestra very quietly how disappointed he had been the day before and that he sensed a lack of commitment. As the symphony progressed he made painful faces at the wrong notes and poor tuning but when something pleased him he called out, "Beautiful! Lovely!" The audience seemed to have a limited attention span, to put it kindly, talking and clapping and roaming about at random intervals. After one thunderous chord followed by an impassioned silence, the crowd predictably burst into applause; Bernstein stood absolutely rigid, arms flung out, and mouthed "Oh, my God," in agony waiting for them to stop. Members of the audience under two years of age cried a lot, this was also predictable and their culture-minded mothers should have predicted it before leaving home. To one very young and vocal listener Bernstein finally turned in exasperation and shouted "Raus!" for which the audience clapped agreeably.

The last three movements went much better. John Oliver had added another sign, placing his forefinger behind his front teeth to indicate that we should place our voices up and forward. He also instructed us to watch Christa breathe, but that potentially educational lady had surrounded herself in a large beige shawl, hiding every rib and muscle.

Lennie filled the house the next day, and brought it promptly down. As in the rehearsal the first two movements were weak, but everyone woke up for the rest of the symphony and tore the place apart. The chorus was spellbinding, if I may take the role of music critic for a moment, and Lennie beamed upon us. The ovation was huge, he clung to Christa's hand for several moments (she was magnificent and in a fitted dress was seen to breathe in splendor), he embraced several orchestra members, he embraced John and El, he embraced the soprano, he embraced Michael Tilson Thomas who looked a little surprised; and the fans went mad. That's not always what it's like, singing in choruses, but it can't hardly ever be better. ■

photo: whitestone

ABCs of Tanglewood

By ROBERT FORT

It is easy to confuse the term concert with the definitively different social event that is the festival. A concert is basically one musical event which has featured artists who perform selections from their repertoires and then leave amid accolades of applause. A festival is constant; it has not silence, no boring moments. It is a gigantic spark which, once ignited, refuses to be snuffed out, refuses to accede to its own demise. Tanglewood and the Berkshire Festival are the quintessence of just such a festival.

Every wheel has its hub, every festival its central attraction,and at Tanglewood the hub is the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The BSO plays three regular concerts plus one open rehearsal each weekend to the huge festival audiences. But there is more, much more. On the festival grounds is the unique Berkshire Music Center, where the BSO trains top young musicians in the final performing sophistication of their respective instruments. The center has its own top quality orchestra, plus many chamber ensembles. There is also a series entitled Contemporary Trends which brings rock, folk, jazz, and pop music to the Tanglewood shed on Tuesday evenings. Also on the grounds are artists from Boston University and other institutions. There is a special Art Barn where these aspiring young artists display their talents.

The BSO performs under the direction of some of the worlds' finest conductors. For the opening weekend's concerts, July 3-5, Seiji Ozawa and Leonard Bernstein performed the conducting honors. Ozawa, whose first appearance at Tanglewood was in 1964, conducted the BSO's opening Tanglewood concert of Bernstein's impressive new piece, Chichester Psalms, Ligeti's hypnotic Atmospheres, and Berlioz' timeless Symphonie Fantastique. The first and last of these pieces are extremely wide-ranging and complex. The Berlioz work is intricately scored and a masterpiece of subtlety and innuendo. Conducting this program Friday night, Ozawa was outstanding, able to command legions of musicians with a grace and precision that are almost sylphlike. It is Ozawa's ability to conduct such pieces of music with clean and crisp control while retaining a high emotional pitch which gives him his considerable charisma.

Saturday evening's performance was not the equal of Friday's, the material performed being the most obvious cause. The only genuinely first-rate piece was Stravinsky's ballet, The Firebird Suite. Another selection from Stravinsky, his Violin Concerto, was an unwise choice for a hall as mammoth as the Tanglewood Shed. The work itself is far from powerful, and violinist Joseph Silverstein was often drowned out by the orchestra. The Shed's sound system and acoustics have never been kind to string soloists. This was probably the most unfortunate performance of the entire weekend, despite Ozawa's masterful conducting.

On Saturday afternoon Bernstein led the discussion in a Berkshire Music Center conducting seminar involving about fourteen students.

These apprentice conductors, like all the Fellows of the BMC, are more than competent in the basic skills of their profession. They attend the BMC to become proficient in actual performance situations. The BMC has its own full orchestra conducted by these students.

This seminar made use of recorded performances conducted by the students. Bernstein would listen to the tape, halting it to discuss specific problems. He handled the seminar as if the students were profesional working in his own orchestra, and devoted particular attention to difficulties of tempo and approaches to pianissimo. At times he would use the piano at which he was seated to show how a particular section could have been improved. While the tapes were being played he would listen closely, leading with his hands and reserving in his mind the advice he would afterwards proffer.

More should be said at this point about the music that Bernstein writes, and conducts. Bernstein's Chichester Psalms, which Ozawa conducted on Friday evening, is scored for full orchestra (with some extra percussion instruments), a giant choir, and a boy soprano soloist. Bernstein wrote the work in Hebrew. The crazy instrumentation includes bongo drums, a glockenspiel, chimes, cymbals, blocks, and a whip. Ozawa was splendid in his massive direction Friday night. It was the first time the piece had been performed at Tanglewood, and it received a marvelous reception from the audience.

Bernstein the conductor was equally successful when on Sunday, July 5, he conducted Mahlers' "Resurrection" Symphony. This was Bernstein's only scheduled appearance in front of the BSO for the season and he made the best of it. The monumental work was performed without interruption for intermission. Bernstein at fifty-two has a phenomenal store of energy. He was the embodiment of the Mahler work. Lorna Haywood and Christa Ludwig sang the soprano and contralto soli, respectively. Miss Ludwig's powerful contralto was especially effective. She managed to project splendidly above the large orchestra and choir without any noticeable depreciation of quality. Bernstein's performance was a fitting grand finale to the opening weekend's concert performances.

The Berkshire Music Center, whose funding is completely underwritten by the BSO, sponsors many worthwhile functions and projects during the summer. It is in charge of the Contemporary Trends concerts which bring people like The Who, Jethro Tull, and Joe Cocker to Tanglewood, and also sponsors a program known as "Days in the Arts." DART (the official abbreviation) brings busloads of "culturally deprived" children from the Boston ghettos to Tanglewood. These kids are given the freedom of the grounds and admittance to all musical functions and events. For many of these youngsters it is the first time they have ever seen orchestral instruments. The young people involved at the BMC are tremendously nice to the kids. The Music Center Fellows practice on the lawns of the Tanglewood estates, and many of them allow the kids to touch their instruments and try to make sounds with them. DART has become one of the most rewarding programs that Tanglewood maintains.

The BSO is comprised of many of the world's most skilled musicians. These men give of themselves whole-heartedly at the Berkshire Music Center. They work with the Fellows and offer these young musicians great amounts of help and guidance. There is no other place in the States quite like this very important BMC. Because of the quality of the BSO tutelage, almost one-quarter of the Boston, New York and Philadelphia orchestras are "graduates" of the Berkshire Music Center. About one-tenth of the members of all of the major orchestras in America are people who have attended the Music Center.

Sometimes a blooper is the highlight of an event and cannot be overlooked. On Friday evening, July 3rd, Ozawa did a phenomenal job conducting Ligeti's Atmosphere. The work is a representation of the fullness of empty space. The ending looms unannounced to the audience. It finishes with an extended pianissimo which subsides in the quietest sort of still silence. imaginable. Ozawa was standing on his podium, arms extended for the final soft notes, when someone in the front of the Shed decided to blow his nose. The noise that he made sounded like a fog horn at four in the morning. The audience, shocked, started to chuckle nervously. It is extremely sad that one little boor could have disrupted the audience so measurably. Fortunately, there will be few like him while the rest of the people go to Tanglewood to hear some of the finest music in the world.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN ARRIVES (photo by Robert Fort)

WHERE MAGAZINE
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUN 27 1970

At the Garden Arts Center, Pearl Bailey and Cab Calloway star in "Hello Dolly!" from June 22 to 27. The popular musical will be followed by Tom Jones, appearing from June 29 to July 4.

The Boston Symphony opens the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood July 3. The "Weekend Prelude" program at 7 p.m. features compositions by Mahler. At 9 p.m., the festival opens officially with Leonard Bernstein conducting the Chichester Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Ligeti's Atmospheres and Berloiz's Symphonic Fantastique. At the open rehearsal July 4, at 10:30 a.m., the program includes Mozart's The Marriage of Figaro Overture and Stravinsky's Firebird Suite.

Rock fans can see The Who, the British rock group that wrote the opera "Tommy," on June 24 at Tanglewood, and the Temptations play their soul music on June 27.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUN 28 1970

New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY concert master Joseph Silverstein will be soloist with the orchestra in the Stravinsky Violin Concerto at Saturday evening's Berkshire Festival concert at Tanglewood. Silverstein is chairman of the orchestra's school, the Berkshire Music Center, now in its 30th year.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

JUN 28 1970

New England Newsclip

Bernstein Opening Tanglewood

Leonard Bernstein, alumnus of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and newly appointed advisor there, will deliver the principle address opening the 30th Tanglewood season this afternoon at 2:30 in the Theater-Concert Hall.

The Boston Symphony will give its first Berkshire Festival concert Friday at 9 p. m. under the direction of Seiji Ozawa, who is artistic director of Tanglewood with Gunther Schuller.

The program will open with Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms" with boy soprano Robert Puleo, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Ligeti's "Atmospheres" will follow and Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique" will close the program.

Seiji Ozawa Director Of Boston Group

LENOX, MASS.-The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first Berkshire festival concert Friday at 9 p.m. under the direction of Seiji Ozawa.

The program opens with Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms," with boy soprano Robert Puleo, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Ligeti's "Atmospheres" follows, and the program closes with Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique."

Bernstein will conduct Sunday at 2:30 p.m. Mahlee's Symphont No.2 with sopranos Lorna Haywood and Christa Ludwig, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Harvard Glee Club and Radcliff Choral Society.

Weekend Programs in the Music Shed start Friday at 7 p.m. with Richard and Rose Taylor in a program of Mahler songs.

These concerts of guest artists and members of the orchestra in short recitals continue each Friday night at 7 at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

The first of the open rehearsals will take place Saturday at 10:30 a.m. in the shed. Seats for open rehearsals are unreserved and go on sale the morning of the rehearsal.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

JUN 24 1970

New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood on Saturday, July 4 at 8:30 p.m., Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will perform Stravinsky's violin concerto under the baton of Seiji Ozawa.

HUDSON, N. Y.
REGISTER STAR
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
D. 10,500

JUN 29 1970

Tanglewood Season Opens On Sunday

The 1970 Tanglewood Season opens on Sunday, June 28 at 2:30 pm in the Theatre Concert Hall with the 30th anniversary Opening Exercises of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy at Tanglewood.

Leonard Bernstein, an alumnus of the Berkshire Music Center and newly appointed Advisor to Tanglewood, will deliver the principle address.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its first Berkshire Festival concert on Friday, July 3 at 9 pm, under the direction of Seiji Ozawa. Ozawa and Gunther Schuller are Artistic Directors of Tanglewood.

On Sunday, July 5 a

On Sunday, July 5 at 2:30 pm. Leonard Bernstein will conduct. The program consists of a single work, Mahler's Symphony no. 2, Ressurection. Sopranos Lorna Haywood and Christa Ludwig will be soloists along with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200

JUN 25 1970

New England Newsclip

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

JUL 14 1970

New England Newsclip

SPOTLIGHTED. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony will perform Stravinsky's Violin Concerto with the orchestra under the baton of Seiji Ozawa Saturday at 8:30 p.m. in the music shed at the Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
S. 251,094

JUN 28 1970

ABCs of Tanglewood

By ROBERT FORT

It is easy to confuse the term concert with the definitively different social event that is the festival. A concert is basically one musical event which has featured artists who perform selections from their repertoires and then leave amid accolades of applause. A festival is constant; it has not silence, no boring moments. It is a gigantic spark which, once ignited, refuses to be snuffed out, refuses to accede to its own demise. Tanglewood and the Berkshire Festival are the quintessence of just such a festival.

Every wheel has its hub, every festival its central attraction,and at Tanglewood the hub is the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The BSO plays three regular concerts plus one open rehearsal each weekend to the huge festival audiences. But there is more, much more. On the festival grounds is the unique Berkshire Music Center, where the BSO trains top young musicians in the final performing sophistication of their respective instruments. The center has its own top quality orchestra, plus many chamber ensembles. There is also a series entitled Contemporary Trends which brings rock, folk, jazz, and pop music to the Tanglewood shed on Tuesday evenings. Also on the grounds are artists from Boston University and other institutions. There is a special Art Barn where these aspiring young artists display their talents.

The BSO performs under the direction of some of the worlds' finest conductors. For the opening weekend's concerts, July 3-5, Seiji Ozawa and Leonard Bernstein performed the conducting honors. Ozawa, whose first appearance at Tanglewood was in 1964, conducted the BSO's opening Tanglewood concert of Bernstein's impressive new piece, Chichester Psalms, Ligeti's hypnotic Atmospheres, and Berlioz' timeless Symphonie Fantastique. The first and last of these pieces are extremely wide-ranging and complex. The Berlioz work is intricately scored and a masterpiece of subtlety and innuendo. Conducting this program Friday night, Ozawa was outstanding, able to command legions of musicians with a grace and precision that are almost sylphlike. It is Ozawa's ability to conduct such pieces of music with clean and crisp control while retaining a high emotional pitch which gives him his considerable charisma.

Saturday evening's performance was not the equal of Friday's, the material performed being the most obvious cause. The only genuinely first-rate piece was Stravinsky's ballet, The Firebird Suite. Another selection from Stravinsky, his Violin Concerto, was an unwise choice for a hall as mammoth as the Tanglewood Shed. The work itself is far from powerful, and violinist Joseph Silverstein was often drowned out by the orchestra. The Shed's sound system and acoustics have never been kind to string soloists. This was probably the most unfortunate performance of the entire weekend, despite Ozawa's masterful conducting.

On Saturday afternoon Bernstein led the discussion in a Berkshire Music Center conducting seminar involving about fourteen students.

These apprentice conductors, like all the Fellows of the BMC, are more than competent in the basic skills of their profession. They attend the BMC to become proficient in actual performance situations. The BMC has its own full orchestra conducted by these students.

This seminar made use of recorded performances conducted by the students. Bernstein would listen to the tape, halting it to discuss specific problems. He handled the seminar as if the students were profesional working in his own orchestra, and devoted particular attention to difficulties of tempo and approaches to pianissimo. At times he would use the piano at which he was seated to show how a particular section could have been improved. While the tapes were being played he would listen closely, leading with his hands and reserving in his mind the advice he would afterwards proffer.

More should be said at this point about the music that Bernstein writes, and conducts. Bernstein's Chichester Psalms, which Ozawa conducted on Friday evening, is scored for full orchestra (with some extra percussion instruments), a giant choir, and a boy soprano soloist. Bernstein wrote the work in Hebrew. The crazy instrumentation includes bongo drums, a glockenspiel, chimes, cymbals, blocks, and a whip. Ozawa was splendid in his massive direction Friday night. It was the first time the piece had been performed at Tanglewood, and it received a marvelous reception from the audience.

Bernstein the conductor was equally successful when on Sunday, July 5, he conducted Mahlers' "Resurrection" Symphony. This was Bernstein's only scheduled appearance in front of the BSO for the season and he made the best of it. The monumental work was performed without interruption for intermission. Bernstein at fifty-two has a phenomenal store of energy. He was the embodiment of the Mahler work. Lorna Haywood and Christa Ludwig sang the soprano and contralto soli, respectively. Miss Ludwig's powerful contralto was especially effective. She managed to project splendidly above the large orchestra and choir without any noticeable depreciation of quality. Bernstein's performance was a fitting grand finale to the opening weekend's concert performances.

The Berkshire Music Center, whose funding is completely underwritten by the BSO, sponsors many worthwhile functions and projects during the summer. It is in charge of the Contemporary Trends concerts which bring people like The Who, Jethro Tull, and Joe Cocker to Tanglewood, and also sponsors a program known as "Days in the Arts." DART (the official abbreviation) brings busloads of "culturally deprived" children from the Boston ghettos to Tanglewood. These kids are given the freedom of the grounds and admittance to all musical functions and events. For many of these youngsters it is the first time they have ever seen orchestral instruments. The young people involved at the BMC are tremendously nice to the kids. The Music Center Fellows practice on the lawns of the Tanglewood estates, and many of them allow the kids to touch their instruments and try to make sounds with them. DART has become one of the most rewarding programs that Tanglewood maintains.

The BSO is comprised of many of the world's most skilled musicians. These men give of themselves whole-heartedly at the Berkshire Music Center. They work with the Fellows and offer these young musicians great amounts of help and guidance. There is no other place in the States quite like this very important BMC. Because of the quality of the BSO tutelage, almost one-quarter of the Boston, New York and Philadelphia orchestras are "graduates" of the Berkshire Music Center. About one-tenth of the members of all of the major orchestras in America are people who have attended the Music Center.

Sometimes a blooper is the highlight of an event and cannot be overlooked. On Friday evening, July 3rd, Ozawa did a phenomenal job conducting Ligeti's Atmosphere. The work is a representation of the fullness of empty space. The ending looms unannounced to the audience. It finishes with an extended pianissimo which subsides in the quietest sort of still silence. imaginable. Ozawa was standing on his podium, arms extended for the final soft notes, when someone in the front of the Shed decided to blow his nose. The noise that he made sounded like a fog horn at four in the morning. The audience, shocked, started to chuckle nervously. It is extremely sad that one little boor could have disrupted the audience so measurably. Fortunately, there will be few like him while the rest of the people go to Tanglewood to hear some of the finest music in the world.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN ARRIVES (photo by Robert Fort)

Seiji Ozawa Director Of Boston Group

LENOX, MASS.-The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first Berkshire festival concert Friday at 9 p.m. under the direction of Seiji Ozawa.

The program opens with Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms," with boy soprano Robert Puleo, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Ligeti's "Atmospheres" follows, and the program closes with Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique."

Bernstein will conduct Sunday at 2:30 p.m. Mahlee's Symphont No.2, with sopranos Lorna Haywood and Christa Ludwig, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Harvard Glee Club and Radcliff Choral Society.

Weekend Programs in the Music Shed start Friday at 7 p.m. with Richard and Rose Taylor in a program of Mahler songs.

These concerts of guest artists and members of the orchestra in short recitals continue each Friday night at 7 at no extra charge to Friday evening ticket holders.

The first of the open rehearsals will take place Saturday at 10:30 a.m. in the shed. Seats for open rehearsals are unreserved and go on sale the morning of the rehearsal.

JUN 24 1970
New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood on Saturday, July 4 at 8:30 p.m., Joseph Silverstein, Concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will perform Stravinsky's violin concerto under the baton of Seiji Ozawa.

HUDSON, N. Y.
REGISTER STAR
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
D. 10,500
JUN 29 1970

Tanglewood Season Opens On Sunday

The 1970 Tanglewood Season opens on Sunday, June 28 at 2:30 pm in the Theatre Concert Hall with the 30th anniversary Opening Exercises of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer academy at Tanglewood.

Leonard Bernstein, an alumnus of the Berkshire Music Center and newly appointed Advisor to Tanglewood, will deliver the principle address.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its first Berkshire Festival concert on Friday, July 3 at 9 pm, under the direction of Seiji Ozawa. Ozawa and Gunther Schuller are Artistic Directors of Tanglewood.

On Sunday, July 5 a

On Sunday, July 5 at 2:30 pm. Leonard Bernstein will conduct. The program consists of a single work, Mahler's Symphony no. 2, Ressurection. Sopranos Lorna Haywood and Christa Ludwig will be soloists along with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

CITIZEN
BELMONT, MASS.
WEEKLY 4,200
JUN 25 1970
New England Newsclip

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500
JUL 14 1970
New England Newsclip

At the Garden Arts Center, Pearl Bailey and Cab Calloway star in "Hello Dolly!" from June 22 to 27. The popular musical will be followed by Tom Jones, appearing from June 29 to July 4.

The Boston Symphony opens the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood July 3. The "Weekend Prelude" program at 7 p.m. features compositions by Mahler. At 9 p.m., the festival opens officially with Leonard Bernstein conducting the Chichester Psalms with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Ligeti's Atmospheres and Berloiz's Symphonic Fantastique. At the open rehearsal July 4, at 10:30 a.m., the program includes Mozart's The Marriage of Figaro Overture and Stravinsky's Firebird Suite.

Rock fans can see The Who, the British rock group that wrote the opera "Tommy," on June 24 at Tanglewood, and the Temptations play their soul music on June 27.

WHERE MAGAZINE
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
W. - CIRC. N. AVAIL.
JUN 27 1970

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
JUN 28 1970
New England Newsclip

BOSTON SYMPHONY concert master Joseph Silverstein will be soloist with the orchestra in the Stravinsky Violin Concerto at Saturday evening's Berkshire Festival concert at Tanglewood. Silverstein is chairman of the orchestra's school, the Berkshire Music Center, now in its 30th year.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
JUN 28 1970
New England Newsclip

Bernstein Opening Tanglewood

Leonard Bernstein, alumnus of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and newly appointed advisor there, will deliver the principle address opening the 30th Tanglewood season this afternoon at 2:30 in the Theater-Concert Hall.

The Boston Symphony will give its first Berkshire Festival concert Friday at 9 p. m. under the direction of Seiji Ozawa, who is artistic director of Tanglewood with Gunther Schuller.

The program will open with Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms" with boy soprano Robert Puleo, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Ligeti's "Atmospheres" will follow and Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique" will close the program.

SPOTLIGHTED. Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony will perform Stravinsky's Violin Concerto with the orchestra under the baton of Seiji Ozawa Saturday at 8:30 p.m. in the music shed at the Berkshire Music Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
S. 251,094
JUN 28 1970

34

Tanglewood Season opens June 28

The Tanglewood season opens June 28, the Sunday before the Berkshire Festival opening when Leonard Bernstein delivers the opening address (2:30 p.m.) on the 30th anniversary of the Berkshire Music Center.

On July 2 Bernstein will conduct the BMC Orchestra and vocal soloists performing the first act of Wagner's Die Walkyrie.

Concerts in the famous Shed at Tanglewood will be given July 3-Aug. 23. William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six all-Beethoven concerts in honor of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Final program Aug. 23 will be the Berlioz "Requiem" in memory of the late Charles Munch, Boston Symphony Orchestra director 1949-1962.

Also in the Berkshires:

Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival launches its 38th year on June 25, 26 and 27 with world-famous ballet dancer Edward Villella presenting four performances in the Ted Shawn Theater, located nine miles east of Lee. Sharing the initial program with Villella will be the North Carolina Dance Theater, which will be held over for the second weekend, July 2, 3 and 4, when Pauline Koner also will appear.

Both leading Summer theaters in the Berkshires are offering a varied bill of fare for the season. The Williamstown Summer Theater on the beautiful Williams College campus, now in its 16th year, opens July 2 with a schedule of six plays and one musical, and ends the season Aug. 29. Under consideration are "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead," "The Price" by Miller, "The Inspector General," Chekhov's "The Three Sisters," "Sweet Bird of Youth," by Tennessee Williams, and a musical to be selected later.

In Stockbridge the Berkshire Theater Festival opens July 1 in the handsome old Berkshire Playhouse, and runs through Aug. 26. Highlight of the Summer will be Anne Bancroft in a gala performance July 12 in "An Evening With Anne Bancroft," to be followed by a champagne reception. In addition there will be three main plays, and a one-week festival, Aug. 19 to 26, which will include workshops in the big barn and coach house on the festival grounds.

RELAX to good music at Tanglewood

HOUSE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967
(S) 563,377
JUN 14 1970
New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 208,349
JUN 28 1970
New England Newsclip

FRIDAY

LENOX (Berkshire Music Festival) — Seiji Ozawa will conduct the first concert of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. Curtain: 9:00 p.m.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500
JUL 2 1970
New England Newsclip

CONCERTMASTER . . . Joseph Silverstein will perform Stravinsky's Violin Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday, July 4 at Tanglewood under the baton of Seiji Ozawa.

YOUNG ENGLISH SOPRANO . . . Lorna Haywood will perform Mahler's Second Symphony, "Resurrection," at Tanglewood Sunday, July 5, under the baton of Leonard Bernstein.

CHRISTA LUDWIG . . . who is endowed with a voice of great range and volume, will perform Mahler's Second Symphony, "Resurrection," on Sunday, July 5, at Tanglewood.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813
JUL 2 1970
New England Newsclip

In Berkshires

Big summer opening expected on weekend

"The biggest summer-season-opening weekend ever" is forecast for Friday, Saturday and Sunday in Berkshire County by John V. Geary, executive director of the Berkshire Hills Conference in Pittsfield, and Miss Emma Blizzard, executive director of the Mohawk Trail Assn., headquartered in Charlemont.

With Tanglewood opening Friday night and Leonard Bernstein conducting there Sunday, Mr. Geary said, "I think everybody from New York is coming up. Miss Blizzard agreed that Tanglewood this weekend will be a big drawing card for Boston area residents as well and predicted the Mohawk Trail into North Adams and Williamstown will be visited by many tourists.

The summer bulge in the Berkshires began last weekend with the arrival of the first of about 4,500 summer campers into the 30 camps in the county and 1,500 staff members of those camps who arrived earlier last week.

In Pittsfield Mr. Geary said most commercial rooms and many rooms in private homes already have been reserved for the weekends of July 24-25 and July 31-Aug. 1 — the weekends when most of the camps will have parents visiting the youngsters.

"But it's possible this first weekend may even be the busiest of the season," he said.

In addition to the Tanglewood opener, it is the Fourth of July weekend and the Pittsfield Firemen's Muster parade will be Saturday.

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,961 SUN. 423,790
JUL 5 1970

TRAVEL IN CIRCLES

BY JOEL SLEED

Greyhound Bus Lines has planned two escorted weekend tours this summer to Marble Island Resort on Lake Champlain, near Burlington, Vt., as part of their "Amazing America Vacations."

Departures, scheduled July 17 and August 14, leave from the Biltmore Hotel at Madison Ave. and 43rd St., Manhattan, at 5 p.m. The trip takes 6 hours by air-conditioned coach. Return bus leaves Marble Island, 4 p.m. Sunday.

* * *

Quality Courts Motels, Inc. reports it is now honoring some 22 million BankAmericards at more than 400 franchised motels in the United States.

Other cards honored at Quality Motels include Master Charge, American Express, Diners Club, Phillips 66, American Oil, Imperial Oil Limited (in Canada), and National Car Rental.

* * *

Art Kahn, entertainment director at the Nevele C.C. in Ellenville, reports Morty Gunty, Dick Capri, Ronnie Martin, Corbett Monica, Jerry Shane, Londen Lee, Vic Arnell, Cavril Payne, Prentice Minner, Jack Haskell, Matteo and Los Trovadores de Espana have been signed to appear at the resort this summer.

* * *

Hotelman Irving Cowan and the Hyatt Corp. have reached an agreement whereby the Diplomat Hotel interests have acquired Hyatt's ownership of the Marco Polo at Miami Beach. Cowan, president of the Diplomat Resorts and Country Club, has named John Monahan and Roland F. ("Mickey") McCann to head up management of the 500-room property, which will be operated as a separate entity from the Diplomat.

* * *

Summer visitors to the Dutch Caribbean islands of Aruba, Bonaire and Curacao will get a bonus this year with free gifts, drinks, sightseeing and other items offered as part of the Free Spree in the Sun program announced by the Tourist Bureaus of the ABC islands.

The Free Spree in the Sun program is valid between now and Dec. 15.

In addition, hotels on Aruba, Bonaire and Curacao will offer a seventh night free to visitors who book a six-night stay on any one of the islands.

You can obtain a Free Spree in the Sun certificate from any travel agent, KLM Royal Dutch Airlines or ALM Antillean Airlines office in the United States.

* * *

The 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens July 3 with a program conducted by Seiji Ozawa, one of Tanglewood's artistic directors. Ozawa conducts two concerts on the first weekend of the Festival. The third is conducted by Leonard Bernstein, advisor to Tanglewood and laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic.

* * *

According to National Airlines, vacationers may now savor the best of two worlds on a "Fiesta Miami Beach" summer holiday.

The package offers the glitter, glamor, and the New World excitement of Miami — or Miami, plus the Old World charm of Nassau or Freeport in the Bahamas.

In Miami, 30 oceanfront hotels and motels have special rates starting at $76.35 per person, double occupancy, for a one week stay.

Breakfast and dinner are included in the rate in most instances. The package also encompasses free round-trip transportation between hotel and airport; an evening — "on the house" — at the Fontainebleu Hotel's Boom Boom Room, and reduced rates on rental cars.

Travelers with the wander lust may also extend their vacation to Nassau or Freeport. Should they so desire, they may cut their Miami visit short and spend the last three days of their holiday in the Bahamas.

Three-day cruises to the Bahamas, aboard the T.S. Flavia, start at $38 per person, double occupancy. On the other hand, "if the place is the thing," the vacationer may jet directly to Nassau or Freeport.

* * *

Vacation-bound Mets fans are getting the message to keep America Beautiful from Rheingold, prime broadcast sponsor of the team's games. The beer company is using part of its commercial time to wage an anti-litter campaign. The thousands of Mets fans, who'll soon be hitting the roads on their summer holidays, are reminded several times during every game to: "Prevent litter and help keep America beautiful."

Bernstein Opens Berkshire Season

24 JUN 70

Leonard Bernstein, alumnus of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and newly appointed adviser there, delivered the principal address opening the 30th Tanglewood season Sunday afternoon at the Theater-Concert Hall.

The Boston Symphony will give its first Berkshire Festival concert Friday at 9 p. m. under the direction of Seiji Ozawa, who is artistic director of Tanglewood with Gunther Schuller.

The program wil open with Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms" with boy soprano Robert Puleo, the Harvord Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Liget's "Atmospheres" will follow and Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique" will close the program.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300
JUN 30 1970
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Season opens June 28

The Tanglewood season opens June 28, the Sunday before the Berkshire Festival opening when Leonard Bernstein delivers the opening address (2:30 p.m.) on the 30th anniversary of the Berkshire Music Center.

On July 2 Bernstein will conduct the BMC Orchestra and vocal soloists performing the first act of Wagner's Die Walkyrie.

Concerts in the famous Shed at Tanglewood will be given July 3-Aug. 23. William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six all-Beethoven concerts in honor of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Final program Aug. 23 will be the Berlioz "Requiem" in memory of the late Charles Munch, Boston Symphony Orchestra director 1949-1962.

Also in the Berkshires:

Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival launches its 38th year on June 25, 26 and 27 with world-famous ballet dancer Edward Villella presenting four performances in the Ted Shawn Theater, located nine miles east of Lee. Sharing the initial program with Villella will be the North Carolina Dance Theater, which will be held over for the second weekend, July 2, 3 and 4, when Pauline Koner also will appear.

Both leading Summer theaters in the Berkshires are offering a varied bill of fare for the season. The Williamstown Summer Theater on the beautiful Williams College campus, now in its 16th year, opens July 2 with a schedule of six plays and one musical, and ends the season Aug. 29. Under consideration are "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead," "The Price" by Miller, "The Inspector General," Chekhov's "The Three Sisters," "Sweet Bird of Youth" by Tennessee Williams, and a musical to be selected later.

In Stockbridge the Berkshire Theater Festival opens July 1 in the handsome old Berkshire Playhouse, and runs through Aug. 26. Highlight of the Summer will be Anne Bancroft in a gala performance July 12 in "An Evening With Anne Bancroft," to be followed by a champagne reception. In addition there will be three main plays, and a one-week festival, Aug. 19 to 26, which will include workshops in the big barn and coach house on the festival grounds.

RELAX to good music at Tanglewood

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(M) 66,728 (S) 208,349

JUN 28 1970 New England Newsclip

FRIDAY

LENOX (Berkshire Music Festival) — Seiji Ozawa will conduct the first concert of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. Curtain: 9:00 p.m.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

JUL 2 1970 New England Newsclip

CONCERTMASTER . . . Joseph Silverstein will perform Stravinsky's Violin Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday, July 4 at Tanglewood under the baton of Seiji Ozawa.

YOUNG ENGLISH SOPRANO . . . Lorna Haywood will perform Mahler's Second Symphony, "Resurrection," at Tanglewood Sunday, July 5 [illegible] the baton of Leonard Bernstein.

CHRISTA LUDWIG . . . who is endowed with a voice of great range and volume, will perform Mahler's Second Symphony, "Resurrection," on Sunday, July 5, at Tanglewood.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 2 1970 New England Newsclip

In Berkshires

Big summer opening expected on weekend

"The biggest summer-season-opening weekend ever" is forecast for Friday, Saturday and Sunday in Berkshire County by John V. Geary, executive director of the Berkshire Hills Conference in Pittsfield, and Miss Emma Blizzard, executive director of the Mohawk Trail Assn., headquartered in Charlemont.

With Tanglewood opening Friday night and Leonard Bernstein conducting there Sunday, Mr. Geary said, "I think everybody from New York is coming up. Miss Blizzard agreed that Tanglewood this weekend will be a big drawing card for Boston area residents as well and predicted the Mohawk Trail into North Adams and Williamstown will be visited by many tourists.

The summer bulge in the Berkshires began last weekend with the arrival of the first of about 4,500 summer campers into the 30 camps in the county and 1,500 staff members of those camps who arrived earlier last week.

In Pittsfield Mr. Geary said most commercial rooms and many rooms in private homes already have been reserved for the weekends of July 24-25 and July 31-Aug. 1 — the weekends when most of the camps will have parents visiting the youngsters.

"But it's possible this first weekend may even be the busiest of the season," he said.

In addition to the Tanglewood opener, it is the Fourth of July weekend and the Pittsfield Firemen's Muster parade will be Saturday.

[illegible] MASS.
[illegible]
JUL 14 1970 New England Newsclip

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 441,061 SUN. 423,790

JUL 5 1970

TRAVEL IN CIRCLES

BY JOEL SLEED

Greyhound Bus Lines has planned two escorted weekend tours this summer to Marble Island Resort on Lake Champlain, near Burlington, Vt., as part of their "Amazing America Vacations."

Departures, scheduled July 17 and August 14, leave from the Biltmore Hotel at Madison Ave. and 43rd St., Manhattan, at 5 p.m. The trip takes 6 hours by air-conditioned coach. Return bus leaves Marble Island, 4 p.m. Sunday.

* * *

Quality Courts Motels, Inc. reports it is now honoring some 22 million BankAmericards at more than 400 franchised motels in the United States.

Other cards honored at Quality Motels include Master Charge, American Express, Diners Club, Phillips 66, American Oil, Imperial Oil Limited (in Canada), and National Car Rental.

* * *

Art Kahn, entertainment director at the Nevele C.C. in Ellenville, reports Morty Gunty, Dick Capri, Ronnie Martin, Corbett Monica, Jerry Shane, Londen Lee, Vic Arnell, Cavril Payne, Prentice Minner, Jack Haskell, Matteo and Los Trovadores de Espana have been signed to appear at the resort this summer.

* * *

Hotelman Irving Cowan and the Hyatt Corp. have reached an agreement whereby the Diplomat Hotel interests have acquired Hyatt's ownership of the Marco Polo at Miami Beach. Cowan, president of the Diplomat Resorts and Country Club, has named John Monahan and Roland F. ("Mickey") McCann to head up management of the 500-room property, which will be operated as a separate entity from the Diplomat.

* * *

Summer visitors to the Dutch Caribbean islands of Aruba, Bonaire and Curacao will get a bonus this year with free gifts, drinks, sightseeing and other items offered as part of the Free Spree in the Sun program announced by the Tourist Bureaus of the ABC islands.

The Free Spree in the Sun program is valid between now and Dec. 15.

In addition, hotels on Aruba, Bonaire and Curacao will offer a seventh night free to visitors who book a six-night stay on any one of the islands.

You can obtain a Free Spree in the Sun certificate from any travel agent, KLM Royal Dutch Airlines or ALM Antillean Airlines office in the United States.

* * *

The 1970 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens July 3 with a program conducted by Seiji Ozawa, one of Tanglewood's artistic directors. Ozawa conducts two concerts on the first weekend of the Festival. The third is conducted by Leonard Bernstein, advisor to Tanglewood and laureate conductor of the New York Philharmonic.

* * *

According to National Airlines, vacationers may now savor the best of two worlds on a "Fiesta Miami Beach" summer holiday.

The package offers the glitter, glamor, and the New World excitement of Miami — or Miami, plus the Old World charm of Nassau or Freeport in the Bahamas.

In Miami, 30 oceanfront hotels and motels have special rates starting at $76.35 per person, double occupancy, for a one week stay.

Breakfast and dinner are included in the rate in most instances. The package also encompasses free round-trip transportation between hotel and airport; an evening — "on the house" — at the Fontainebleu Hotel's Boom Boom Room, and reduced rates on rental cars.

Travelers with the wander lust may also extend their vacation to Nassau or Freeport. Should they so desire, they may cut their Miami visit short and spend the last three days of their holiday in the Bahamas.

Three-day cruises to the Bahamas, aboard the T.S. Flavia, start at $38 per person, double occupancy. On the other hand, "if the place is the thing," the vacationer may jet directly to Nassau or Freeport.

* * *

Vacation-bound Mets fans are getting the message to keep America Beautiful from Rheingold, prime broadcast sponsor of the team's games. The beer company is using part of its commercial time to wage an anti-litter campaign. The thousands of Mets fans, who'll soon be hitting the roads on their summer holidays, are reminded several times during every game to: "Prevent litter and help keep America beautiful."

Bernstein Opens Berkshire Season

Leonard Bernstein, alumnus of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood and newly appointed adviser there, delivered the principal address opening the 30th Tanglewood season Sunday afternoon at the Theater-Concert Hall.

The Boston Symphony will give its first Berkshire Festival concert Friday at 9 p. m. under the direction of Seiji Ozawa, who is artistic director of Tanglewood with Gunther Schuller.

The program wil open with Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms" with boy soprano Robert Puleo, the Harvord Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. Liget's "Atmospheres" will follow and Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique" will close the program.

24
076

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

JUN 30 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood
Season opens June 28

The Tanglewood season opens June 28, the Sunday before the Berkshire Festival opening when Leonard Bernstein delivers the opening address (2:30 p.m.) on the 30th anniversary of the Berkshire Music Center.

On July 2 Bernstein will conduct the BMC Orchestra and vocal soloists performing the first act of Wagner's Die Walkyrie.

Concerts in the famous Shed at Tanglewood will be given July 3-Aug. 23. William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct six all-Beethoven concerts in honor of the 200th anniversary of the composer's birth. Final program Aug. 23 will be the Berlioz "Requiem" in memory of the late Charles Munch, Boston Symphony Orchestra director 1949-1962.

Also in the Berkshires:

Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival launches its 38th year on June 25, 26 and 27 with world-famous ballet dancer Edward Villella presenting four performances in the Ted Shawn Theater, located nine miles east of Lee. Sharing the initial program with Villella will be the North Carolina Dance Theater, which will be held over for the second weekend, July 2, 3 and 4, when Pauline Koner also will appear.

Both leading Summer theaters in the Berkshires are offering a varied bill of fare for the season. The Williamstown Summer Theater on the beautiful Williams College campus, now in its 16th year, opens July 2 with a schedule of six plays and one musical, and ends the season Aug. 29. Under consideration are "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead," "The Price" by Miller, "The Inspector General," Chekhov's "The Three Sisters," "Sweet Bird of Youth" by Tennessee Williams, and a musical to be selected later.

In Stockbridge the Berkshire Theater Festival opens July 1 in the handsome old Berkshire Playhouse, and runs through Aug. 26. Highlight of the Summer will be Anne Bancroft in a gala performance July 12 in "An Evening With Anne Bancroft," to be followed by a champagne reception. In addition there will be three main plays, and a one-week festival, Aug. 19 to 26, which will include workshops in the big barn and coach house on the festival grounds.

RELAX to good music at Tanglewood

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,957 (D) 194,[illegible]
(S) 566,[illegible]
JUN 17 1970
New England Newsclip

AT TANLEWOOD — Christa Ludwig, left, and soprano Lorna Haywood will perform in Mahler's Second Symphony ("Resurrection") at 2:30 p.m. Sunday at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. Leonard Bernstein will conduct the Boston Symphony in the performance with choral groups from Harvard, Radcliffe and Tanglewood.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
JUL 2 1970
New England Newsclip

Lorna Haywood

The British soprano will be a soloist in Mahler's Second Symphony, "Resurrection," with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Leonard Bernstein's direction on Sunday afternoon, July 5, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
ALBANY TIMES UNION
Wednesday, July 1, 1970

At Tanglewood

At Tanglewood on Sunday, July 5 at 2:30 p.m., the young English soprano, Lorna Haywood, will perform Mahler's Second Symphony, "Resurrection" under the baton of Leonard Bernstein. Miss Haywood was a student of the Royal College of Music and Juilliard School of Music.

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,600
JUN 24 1970
New England Newsclip

Mozart mezzo

Rosalind Elias will be among the Metropolitan Opera singers to be heard in a concert performance of "Cosi Fan Tutte," with the Boston Symphony under Seiji Ozawa's direction, on Saturday evening, July 11, at the Berkshire Festival, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
ALBANY TIMES UNION
Wednesday, July 1, 1970

SYMPHONIC SOLOISTS. Christa Ludwig, left, and English soprano Lorna Haywood have been selected by Leonard Bernstein as the feminine soloists for the presentation of Mahler's "Resurrection," his second symphony, Sunday at 2:30 p.m. with the Boston Symphony at the Berkshire Music Center. The concert will be in the music shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
JUL 9 1970 New England Newsclip

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
DUNKIRK OBSERVER
Thursday, July 9, 1970

New York Post
D. 7[illegible] SUN. [illegible]
JUL 10 1970

RECORDER-GAZETTE
GREENFIELD, MASS.
(E) 13,822
JUL 10 1970 New England

Bernstein's Orbital Thrust

MARYVILLE, TENN.
ALCOA TIMES
D. 14,000
JUL 13 1970

BILLINGS, MONT.
GAZETTE
D. 42,500 S. 54,000
JUL 10 1970

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
Watertown Daily Times
Wednesday, July 8, 1970

The Evening Bulletin
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
D. 654,741
JUL 8 1970

JOURNAL-COURIER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(M) 32,350
JUL 9 1970

TIMES REPORTER
BELLOWS FALLS, VERMONT
4,768
JUL 11 1970 New England Newsclip

Second Symphony is conductor Leo-uest conductor of the Boston Symph-
(AP)

THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 217,494 SAT. 169,405
JUL 9 1970

UPI Photo

tor Leonard Bernstein really the Boston Symphony Orchestra on" symphony at Tanglewood recently.

READING, PA.
EAGLE
D. 48,500 S. 85,500
JUL 9 1970

ie Music

t the climax of Mahler's "Resurrection" Symof the Boston Symphony an 11-minute ovation.

UPI Telephoto

ony Orchestra to a crescendo at the nglewood in Lenox, Mass.

All

Conductor Leonard
at the finale of Ma
during a recent Tan
ance. The audience of the Boston Sym
tion.—Photofax.

UPI Telephoto

END OF THE LINE, CONDUCTOR — Leonard Bernstein gives it all he has as he puts the finishing touches to Mahler's "Resurrection Symphony" at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., with Boston Symphony. Sellout audience enjoyed his performance enough to provide an 11-minute ovation.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUL 6 1970
New England Newsclip

Lubbock Avalanche Journal
LUBBOCK, TEXAS
D. 30,386 (EVENING)
JUL 10 1970

CHICAGO DAILY NEWS
D. 461,357 SAT. 453,757
JUL 9 1970

CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA.
PROGRESS
D. 23,500
JUL 10 1970

MIDDLETOWN, N. Y.
TIMES HERALD RECORD
D. 4,500
JUL 16 1970

CHEYENNE, WYO.
WYOMING STATE TRIBUNE
D. 10,500
JUL 8 1970

The Record
HACKENSACK, N. J.
D. & SUN. 147,484
JUL 10 1970

FOND DU LAC, WIS.
COMMONWEALTH REPORTER
D. 22,000
JUL 9 1970

BRISTOL, VA.
HERALD COURIER
D. 23,500 S. 30,000
JUL 9 1970

QUINCY, ILL.
HERALD-WHIG
D. 32,500 S. 33,000
JUL 9 1970

BERNSTEIN ACCLAIMED — Orbital thrust was achieved by conductor L
Bernstein at the climax of Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony yester
Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. A sell-out audience gave the guest conductor of the Symphony an 11-minute ovation. (UPI Telephoto)

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NO. TONAWANDA NEWS
Thursday, July 9, 1970

Orbital Thrust Is Achieved By Conductor

Orbital thrust was achieved by conductor Leonard Bernstein at the climax of Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. A sell-out audience gave the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony an 11-minute ovation. (UPI)

Orbital windup'

onard Bernstein, guest conductor of the Boston symph

Giving his all at climax of conductor Leonard Bernstein, achieved by conductor Leonard Bernstein at the ny Sunday at Tanglewood near Lenox, Mass. A of the Boston Symphony an 11-minues ovation.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUL 6 1970
New England Newsclip

Lubbock Avalanche Journal
LUBBOCK, TEXAS
D. 30,386 (EVENING)
JUL 10 1970

CHICAGO DAILY NEWS
D. 461,357 SAT. 453,757
JUL 9 1970

CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA.
PROGRESS
D. 23,500
JUL 10 1970

MIDDLETOWN, N. Y.
TIMES HERALD RECORD
D. 4,500
JUL 16 1970

CHEYENNE, WYO.
WYOMING STATE TRIBUNE
D. 10,500
JUL 8 1970

The Record
HACKENSACK, N. J.
D. & SUN. 147,484
JUL 10 1970

FOND DU LAC, WIS.
COMMONWEALTH REPORTER
D. 22,000
JUL 9 1970

BRISTOL, VA.
HERALD COURIER
D. 23,500 S. 30,000
JUL 9 1970

QUINCY, ILL.
HERALD-WHIG
D. 32,500 S. 33,000
JUL 9 1970

BERNSTEIN ACCLAIMED — Orbital thrust was achieved by conductor Leonard Bernstein at the climax of Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony yesterday at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. A sell-out audience gave the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony an 11-minute ovation. (UPI Telephoto)

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NO. TONAWANDA NEWS
Thursday, July 9, 1970

Orbital Thrust Is Achieved By Conductor

Orbital thrust was achieved by conductor Leonard Bernstein at the climax of Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass. A sell-out audience gave the guest

Orbital windup'

onnard Bernstein, guest conductor of the Boston symph

Giving his all at climax of conductor Leonard Bernstein.

REACHING OUT—Orbital thrust was achieved by conductor Leonard Bernstein at the climax of Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony Sunday at Tanglewood near Lenox, Mass. A sell-out audience gave the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony an 11-minues ovation. (UPI).

INFORMATION OBSCURED

38

CLARKSVILLE, TENN.
LEAF-CHRONICLE
D. 13,000
JUL 12 1970

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654
JUL 8 1970
New England Newsclip

HARRISONBURG, VA.
NEWS-RECORD
D.20,500
JUL 10 1970

al Thrust

climax of Mahler's Second Symphony
'he audience gave the guest conductor

The Ann Arbor News
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
D. 38,589
JUL 9 1970

IRON MOUNTAIN, MICH.
NEWS
D. 11,000
JUL 10 1970

ORBITAL THRUST — Giving it his all at the climax of Mahler's Second Symphony is conductor Leonard Bernstein at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., recently. The audience gave the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony an 11-minute ovation. (AP Wirephoto) audience

e ovation.

Orbital Thrust

Tanglewood Sunday,
ence gave him and
n after his energetic
Mozart's "Cosi fan
tutte" will be offered at 8:30 p.m. t
Sunday, pianist Peter Serkin will pe concerto.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER
CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK
STATE SERVICE
ALBANY CITIZEN
Thursday, July 9, 1970

AP Wirephoto

Orbital thrust

Giving it his all at the climax of Mahler's Second Symphony is conductor Leonard Bernstein at Tanglewood. The audience gave the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony an 11-minute ovation.

Chicago
today
American
Always on Top of the News
D. 436,893 SUN. 483,418
JUL 9 1970

A Moving Moment

AP Wirephoto

Giving it his all

At a soaring passage in Mahler's Second Symphony, Leonard Bernstein flings his arms skyward while guest conducting the Boston Symphony at famed Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.

a climactic moment,
mance. The Boston
hler's "Resurrection"
tly at Lenox, Mass.
AP Photo

NEW CASTLE, PA.
NEWS
D. 23,500
JUL 10 1970

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 166,056 SUN. 181,755
JUL 9 1970

Bernstein Takes Off

Leonard Bernstein achieved orbital thrust at the close of his concert at Tanglewood, Mass., Sunday. The sell-out crowd gave him an 11-minute standing ovation. He was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony.

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 387,180 SUN. 610,016
JUL 19 1970

Chicago
today
American
Always on Top of the News
D. 436,893 SUN. 483,418
JUL 9 1970

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 166,696 SUN. 181,755
JUL 9 1970

A Moving Moment

AP Wirephoto

Giving it his all

At a soaring passage in Mahler's Second Symphony, Leonard Bernstein flings his arms skyward while guest conducting the Boston Symphony at famed Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.

Bernstein Takes Off

Leonard Bernstein achieved orbital thrust at the close of his concert at Tanglewood, Mass., Sunday. The sell-out crowd gave him an 11-minute standing ovation. He was guest conductor of the Boston Symphony.

a climactic moment, mance. The Boston hler's "Resurrection" tly at Lenox, Mass.
AP Photo

NEW CASTLE, PA.
NEWS
D. 23,500
JUL 10 1970

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH
D. 387,180 SUN. 610,016
JUL 19 1970

BLANK PAGE

40

Boston Symphony Bridges Generation Gap Over Weekend

By MILTON ZAPOLSKY

Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor and the man on whom fell the burdens of the winter concert season, found himself in the familiar role of pinch hitter Friday night at Tanglewood. Scheduled conductor Rafael Frubeck de Burgos could not appear and Thomas was asked to subistitute. The program had to be revised a bit, with a pair of Russian works replacing the two Spanish pieces originally slated for the first half. It was quite a surprise to see Thomas coming out in the first place; still more of a surprise to hear Glinka's Russlan and Ludmilla overture instead of de Falla's El Amor Brujo!

The Glinka was crisply executed, more a credit to the orchestra's familiarity with the work than to Thomas' leadership. The brass and timpani had themselves a grand old time, and the cellos contributed a glowing, singing tone in the second subject based on the "O Ludmilla" aria.

Tchaikovsky's Winter Dreams symphony was featured next, and if memory serves, Thomas conducted this piece in Boston a few months ago. The symphony, Tchaikovsky's first, is graced by lovely tunes that go nowhere; the developmental sections merely shift the tunes to different instruments rather than expand and clarify their content. Nevertheless, this is Tchaikovsky's most refreshing of the early symphonies and one can be satisfied with such ravishing melodies even as he serenely disdains their tedious presentation.

Relaxed Sound

Thomas got a warm, relaxed sound from the players. He was quite good with the wind parts, easily Tchaikovsky's best part-writing. Perhaps best of all was the performance of the slow movement with its sentimental introduction on muted strings and "climactic" massed horn passage. Still, the B minor clarinet tune of the first movement, the scherzo's counterpoint, and the boisterous finale made similarly good impressions.

For the second half Thomas conducted a third Russian work, Stravinsky's Rite of Spring. I don't believe Thomas conducted this work earlier in the season, but he has recorded it in a duo-piano version.

Friday's performance was very fine. Thomas' approach was subtle and understated, with encouragement to play in a somewhat yielding manner. The result was a genuinely melodic Rite, one of great delicacy, even beauty. No one could fault the lyricism (so rarely brought out) of the long introduction to the second part, and the many "conventional" dances of the first part assumed a new freshness. Moreover, Thomas' restrained approach assured a gradual build-up throughout, leading to a violent culmination that was all the more barbaric and shocking. The extreme frenzy he worked up could be ascertained by observing the percussion, whose members ever more savagely attacked their instruments, delivering assault after vicious assault until the coup de gras.

Sunday Concert

Sunday's concert was under the direction of Seiji Ozawa. Peter Serkin was on hand as soloist in Schoenberg's Piano Concerto, a work which deserves far more attention than it receives. One of Schoenberg's more accessible scores, it employs the 12-tone or serial principles he made famous 30 years earlier.

Suffice it to say Sunday's performance was close to ideal. To be sure, the orchestral laendler rhythms could have been much freer and tempi were on the slow side, but the aesthetic commitment was rare and inspiring. Serkin's pianism evinced fantastic shadings, great musical depth, and a keen awareness at all times of where the music was going. His pedal work was marvelous, with great restraint on the sustaining pedal so as not to blur unnecessarily the textures or merely to sound loud, and the organic growth his musical ideas revealed bespeak an eloquent philosophy unusual for his age. Ozawa and the orchestra contributed an accompaniment that complemented Serkin's approach in a highly convincing way.

New Effort

The second half was devoted to William Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra, a work new to the BSO and virtually everyone in the audience, myself included. In the recent past some modern composers have tried to incorporate symphonic and jazz elements (the so-called third stream school), but to the best of my knowledge, this is the first time a modern rock group has appeared on stage in a concertante capacity. Judging from the program notes, the Blues Band part is written out, which means the piece will always be substantially the same, albeit for any improvisation. This is a very new innovation, for in the past improvisation was the only procedure employed in writing for non-symphony groups.

Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band joined the orchestra, providing fabulous riffs and pointed blues sounds that caused many to become transfixed with delight and fascination. There was an opening harmonica recitative that wailed and generated lonely feelings within that no orchestra in the world possibly could; there was lead guitar work that outdid Mike Bloomfield; piano and bass work that was just plain together, and a drummer who could mix and act as a foil with all of them.

The orchestra part was no mere accompaniment, but a collage against which the band could play and which itself commanded attention. There was even a bluesy violin part (there are many jazz and a few rock violinists) for the concertmaster, which Joe Silverstein so beautifully and idiomatically played it earned him a shuffle from the orchestra (the orchestra's compliment to a part extremely well-played) and grinning encouragement from the band.

Something Worthwhile

Judging from the audience response, many of the older members found something worthwile for the first time in rock music, and will never hear it with the same condemning, flinching ears. They even asked for an encore, which the band provided. There was even some musical humor going on: Jim Schwall, lead guitar, bridged the generation and musical gap by improvising around the opening of Mozart's Hafner Symphony, causing the orchestral cellists great amusement.

Considering the way the program was organized, was it important, do you think, that the concert opened with a suite of music from Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet? After all, the performers Sunday were all young, "hippie-looking," if you will: the band long-haired, Peter Serkin looking similarly freaked-out with his long hair and wire-rimmed glasses, even Ozawa with shoulder-length hair and bell-bottoms. In the music, as in Shakespeare's play, the young lovers are kept from personal and social fulfillment by parental will and "establishment" preconceptions regarding youth's allegiances and destiny; do you think Ozawa in his programming was trying to tell us something? Judging from the overwhelming audience response at the end, I, for one, still feel there is hope.

AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
RECORDER &
DEMOCRAT
(ALBANY MARKET AREA)
D. 14,000

JUL 15 1970

Thomas Subs in The Shed

By GEORGE W. STOWE

Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos came down with a virus at the last mintue and had to be replaced by Michael Tilson Thomas at Friday night's concert by the Boston Symphony in the Shed at Tanglewood.

And Thomas, the young assistant conductor of the Boston Orchestra, did a very creditable job, considering the circumtsances. Of course, he came to the rescue of the orchestra's regular conductor, William Steinberg, earlier in the Boston season when Steinberg was sick. He has been doing yeoman service this year.

The program itself was changed but Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," the most challenging piece on the musical agenda, was retained. It was, of course, a disappointment not to hear Fruhbeck de Burgos in the music of his countryman, Manuel de Falla.

However, Tilson Thomas started things off in lively fashion with a spirited reading of Glinka's "Russlan and Ludmilla" Overture. The Boston strings played with verve and effervescence throughout and everything got off to an admirable start.

Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 1 ("Winter Daydreams") was another excellent choice, a work that is heard far too infrequently.

In the opening movement of this lyric work the strings lacked the precision that is the trademark of the Boston orchestra and there were some spots where attacks were not all they should have been, considering the caliber of the orchestra.

Nevertheless, the conductor's tempos were well-chosen and the second movement demonstrated a marked improvement in the precision of the ensemble sound. The scherzo came off beautifully and the finale, if somewhat overblown, at least brought the work to an exhilarating conclusion.

The Stravinsky, once the most avant-garde of pieces and now a solid repertory item, was considerably more exciting than the one I heard under Leinsdorf with the same orchestra a season or two ago.

Although the percussion was somewhat overpowering in the climaxes, which covered the rest of the orchestra unduly, the young conductor of the Bostonians seemed to have the rhythmic scheme under tight rein. He is an extroverted, energetic figure on the podium and his cues were always clearcut.

The weather was hardly ideal but no rain fell during the concert. This was not one of the larger crowds (4,200 people) at the Berkshire Festival and nothing to compare with the 18,000 people who gathered to hear the contemporary sound of "The Who."

Second Weekend Of The Berkshire Festival

Tanglewood Review

The second weekend of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox started auspiciously Friday evening with the bonus Prelude at 7:00, presenting the young Choir of St. John's College, Cambridge, directed with stylistic sensitivity by Welshman George Guest. Guest was first director of the Berkshire Boy Choir in 1967, and is again in charge this summer. He holds many titles at St. John's and other colleges, including lecturer in music and director of studies in music.

The religiously oriented program ranged from 16th and 17th century works by Orlando Gibbons, Andrea Gabrieli, Philips Peter, Tomas Luis de Victoria (rather uncoordinated) in three and four-part voices, to late 19th and early 20th century, including an impressive "O sacrum convivium" by Messiaen, Three Motets by Bruckner, each fascinating in counterpuntal and harmonic structure, and the lovely "Set me a seal upon thy heart" from The Song of Solomon. It was a delight to hear this unique choir, and see those appealing blond boys (one couldn't have been more than seven), their soprano voices sweet and clear, even though at times one heard them well above the others so that good balance was not always realized.

At the 9:00 concert, it wasn't until intermission that we learned that the Spanish conductor (ill with the flu) Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, was not on the podium. We had decided that the music couldn't be de Falla, which, with de Burgos, we had looked forward to hearing. But the unusual vigor and command of the rugged-looking (he could pass for Spanish) 25-year old Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor, eschewed any disappointment. We had never seen him either, and were extremely delighted at the privilege.

The revised program started with a stirring reading of Glinka's Overture to "Russla and Ludmilla", and served to introduce the dedicated musicality of Thomas, his emphatic and visible directions, and confident rapport with the musicians. The seldom heard first symphony in Gminor Op.13 of Tschaikovsky, known as "Winter Daydreams" was heard in its premiere performance at Tanglewood. All its youthfully conceived material, the introductory folk-song, dramatic pauses (the total silence achieved was astounding) and brass fanfare (to become almost a mannerism later), were controlled and turned by Thomas into a beautifully comprehensive and esthetically satsifying experience.

Spring followed winter, with Stravinsky's exciting "Rite of Spring," each mood graphically exact, the juxtaposition of wind and brass as always achieving the most intriguing textural effects today surpassed in more complex fashion by younger composers, the marvelously inventive orchestration which precipitated increasingly active and angry demonstrations at the Ballet's Paris premiere in 1913, and 39 years later, when repeated under Monteux' direction, was accorded wild acclaim. Thomas and the orchestra more than deserved their ovation.

We'd like to report that Saturday's performance of Mozart's elegant and witty "Cosi fan Tutte" (ossia la scuola degli amanti) also was outstanding. But such was not the case. Conducted by Seijii Ozawa at a much too brisk tempo, starting with the overture and continuing through the first act, (the second was more relaxed and quiet) the clarity and charm of the music was clouded; the ability of the singers to articulate and dramatize hampered by almost breathless speed. And from their elevated position at stage rear, they were often enveloped in the orchestral score. Andrew Raeburn devised the staging, using scant but most suitable scenery.

From the beginning the male voices were more effective than female, with dramatization handled more or less equal among individual characterizations, including Teresa Stratas as Despina, the sisters' maid, beguiling and very audible in her triple roles. Phyllis Curtin (Fiordiligi) and Rosalind Elias (Dorabella) in their first duet, "Guarda, sorella" were surpassed by their respective lovers Guglielmo (Tom Krause) and Ferrando (George Shirley), and the old cynic Don Alfonso (Ezio Flagello), in the trio following the admirable quintet "Sento a Dio." For some reason, (prompting or unfamiliarity with the opera) Flagello carried a score throughout. It didn't take away from his solo's amusing sentiments ... "to put one's trust in a woman is as futile as wrapping up the ocean, planting seeds in sand ..."

The story concerns two sisters, their lovers, maid and the cynical Don Alfonso, who conceives a plot to prove his contention that all women are unfaithful. The young men apparently go off to war, and with the don's and maid's contrivance, reappear as Albanians to woo the sisters, but changing the original pairing-off. Fiordiligi almost remains constant, but finally gives in, thus upsetting the lovers' belief in their ladies' enduring and implacable love. The third scene of the second act ends with the don singing that "women are women and in matters of love are unpredictable ... Cosi fan tutte!" (All are like that), with Ferrnado and Guglielmo unhappily repeating the too true phrase.

Elias, whose intonation was not always secure, presented a lovely aria in the third scene of the first act, "Smanie implacabili" denoting her enduring love, while Curtin experienced difficulty with her low tones in the demanding vocal range of the brilliant passages in "Come Scoglio" (my love anchored on a rock), some of the more ardent music in Cosi.

In the same scene, Guglielmo's aria "Non siate ritrosi," imploring the ladies to suggest whatever would make them (the strangers) more acceptable as lovers, and Ferrando's "Un aura amorosa," a discourse on the sustaining powers of love, received extended applause, as did all the solos. An impressively brilliant ensemble closed the hilarious fourth scene and first act. Again Curtin displayed the rich quality of her voice in the dramatic recitative "E parte! ... Senti! Ah no!" expressing mingled agitation and uncertainty, (the second act's second scene) and the following aria "Per pieta, ben mio perdona," torn by passions and desires, remorse and self reproach, as she finally gives in to her lover's entreaties. These alone would tax any singer's talents, but Miss Curtin responded splendidly.

There is some excellent ensemble writing in the fourth and final scene, in canon form, as the sisters prepare for marriage to the strangers, and the singers, including the Tanglewood Chorus Festival prepared by John Oliver, made it a joy. After the sisters' duplicity (and their lovers') is uncovered and finally forgiven, all ends on a note of happy optimism, the six principals joining in the joyous "Fortunato l'uom," (happy is the man who does not allow himself to be distracted by his troubles, but seeks peace within himself, laughing at things that make others weep). The audience, as is customary at Tanglewood, responded with unrestrained enthusiasm.

Sunday's afternoon program began with Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet" Suite, directed by Seijii Ozawa with perhaps too much vigor and not enough elan. Using a Baldwin piano, Peter Serkin gave an introspective reading of Schoenberg's Piano Concerto, op 42, but it was lacking in crispness and transparency, which could be due to the instrument's inherent qualities. This was a first performance at Tanglewood, but not for Serkin.

A premiere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the closing composition by William Russo, "Three pieces for blues band and symphony orchestra," using Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band, in an oddly effective blending of improvisatory (by the soloists, electric piano and guitar, harmonica, bass guitar and drums) and written music. Again the listeners approved.

The third weekend concerts start with Friday's prelude at 7:00 of piano music by Mozart and Messaien, played by Yuji Takahashi, who will be soloist, for the 9:00 program, in Mozart's piano concerto in A, K. 488, and including Haydn's Symphony no. 86 in D., Britten's Serenade for tenor, horn and strings op. 31 with John Alexander and James Stagliano, Ibert's Divertissement. Saturday's concert, also conducted by Ozawa, features Lili Kraus in Mozart's piano concerto in D minor K. 466, and his Serenade no. 10 in B flat for 13 wind instruments K. 361. Sunday Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct Haydn's Symphony no. 98 in B flat, Bach's Cantata no. 51, Krenek's Concert aria Die Nachtigall with Bethany Beardslee, and Stravinsky's Suite from "Pulcinella."

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

JUL 17 1970

New England Newsclip

42

A Mystery Is Solved at Tanglewood

CANCELLED CONCERT—Rafaèl Frubeck de Burgos, who cancelled his conducting duties at Tanglewood due to illness, was replaced at the last minute by Michael Tillson Thomas.

By RICHARD VINCENT

LENOX, Mass.—There was a great deal of anticipation concerning the appearance at Tanglewood of Rafael Frubeck de Burgos, the Spanish conductor who has made a considerable European reputation in the past few years as the director of the Madrid Symphony Orchestra. He has been variously described, but one particular description seemed particularly interesting. In Europe, we are told, he is called the bullfighter of the podium. The image that this brings to mind, that of the man citing the orchestra in its own terrain, was the stuff of which legends are made.

And the program! De Falla's "El Amor Brujo" and the "Three Cornered Hat" followed by "Le Sacre du printemps," by Stravinsky.

THE BULLFIGHTER of the podium appeared, young and slight, and off we went.

Whatever it was it was not "El Amor Brujo.' It was an overture, so completely familiar that it was hard to identify. Rossini? Bizet? Verdi: Finally we pinned it down. It was the Overture to "Russlan and Ludmila." Well played, everything was proper, but what happened to de Falla?

The mystery deepened. The downbeat produced a vintage Tchaikowsky chord and sequence. It wasn't the symphonies 4, 5, or 6 so it had to be 1, 2, or 3. We chose number 1 and were eventually proven correct.

A VISIT to the press office explained everything. De Burgos was sick and on very short notice indeed Michael Tillson Thomas, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony was filling in and had changed the program. An insert had been provided but my program did not have it.

This was the first time that the Boston had played Tchaikowsky's First at the Festival and there is really no reason why they should. Although all the hallmarks of his particular musical vision were present, it is, to these ears essentially a bland piece. Because it was Tchaikowsky it was in the minor and had moments of real emotion. But the grea singing melodies that this man could and did write were not quite achieved.

The program closed with Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," and Thomas and the orchestra did the job. The orchestra was obviously sympathetic to Mr. Thomas' predicament, his last moment substitution, and they did everything they could to help. It all came out very well, and, of course, the work itself is as exciting as anything written in this century or any century.

THOMAS is to be commended on his performance and so is the orchestra who, to a man, closed ranks to bail the young man out. Thomas tried no tricks, the reading was forthright and competent. He kept things moving although the players didn't seem to be watching him very much.

The audience, also sympathetic, gave Thomas an ovation at the end and well they might.

The crowd in the shed was skimpy, whether due to the weather or to some privileged manner in which they knew about De Burgos' absence is hard to determine. At any rate we have yet to see De Burgos in action which is a shame. However he is still scheduled to appear at Saratoga in August and we will look forward to it.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
ALBANY TIMES UNION
Tuesday, July 14, 1970

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
JUL 12 1970
New England Newsclip

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
JUL 16 1970
New England Newsclip

AT TANGLEWOOD

Fine Cast Makes Mozart Opera Lively Fun

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — One of the great virtues of opera is its ability to be enjoyed without knowing or caring about the story.

Abstract Enjoyment

This is especially true of concert versions such as that presented at Tanglewood Saturday night. The music can be enjoyed abstractly, and if the listener knows the details of the story, so much the better.

The opera at Tanglewood Saturday was Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte," a foolish singspiel with a comic-strip plot about female inconstancy and male trickery enhanced by music of sublime wit.

There are six characters: two couples who get mixed up, a coniving friend and a sly maid. They were portrayed with professional polish as follows: Fiordiligi by Phyllis Curtin, Dorabella by Rosalind Elias, Guglielmo by Tom Krause, Ferrando by George Shirley, Despina by Teresa Stratas and Don Alfonso by Ezio Flagello.

Orchestra Reduced

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was reduced to half strength as befits Mozart's music, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus numbered 22. Conductor was Seiji Ozawa. The first act ran 90 minutes, the second 75, plus interruptilons for applause.

There are always a great many things to be said about an opera performance, many points to check, and it is easy to run on too far; so let us tick off a few observations without details.

It took the orchestra a while to warm to its work; there were signs of an imprecision with Mozart's crystaline craftsmanship that were not evident in Boston's orchestra a year ago.

Ozawa's best work is not with Mozart.

The opening scene with Krause, Shirley and Flagello got the opera off to a rousing, robust start. It was full of manly high spirits and braggadocio.

Duets Set High Standard

The soprano duet by Curtin and Elias in the second scene also set a high standard for its followers.

The cast members are all highly experienced, first-class opera stars well schooled in the niceties of ensemble singing, which is the key to the success of any Cosi performance.

The opera is packed with ensembles; the solo work is almost entirely confined to passages sandwiched by duets, trios, quartets, quintets and sextets.

Five of the six soloists sang, and acted, from memory and the sixth carried the score only as an occasional reminder, a circumstance which gave them all an exuberant freedom of movement.

The ensembles ran off like clockwork — smooth, easy, neatly balanced, and nicely tailored and funny, melodramatic, pompous, burlesqued or simply beautiful as the occasion demanded.

Acting Accurate

The acting was confined to platforms above and behind the orchestra, modified, of course, because of limited circumstances, but apt and accurate enough to enlist the imagination of the audience which contributed much laughter at the antics. especially those of little Despina, a clever gamin.

"Cosi" is not usually taken seriously because it is such fluffy stuff, but it is one of the best examples of its style, and is pure, frivolous entertainment.

Off hand, it doesn't seem as if a better cast could be assembled — equally good, yes, and different, but not better. It was a good evening.

★ ★ ★

SCHOENBERG was approaching 70 when he wrote his "Piano Concerto, Op. 42," in 1942 (for lovers of musical trivia, all of this composer's concerti share their opus number with their year of completion). The work rather neatly refutes two often heard criticisms of twelve-tone music: That it is merely academic number games and-or that it is incapable of expressing any emotion other than anguish.

Although the concerto is in the traditional three movements and the soloist is allowed two cadenzas for technical display, the music is generally of an intimate nature.

Yesterday's soloist was Peter Serkin, the son and pupil of the great Rudolf Serkin. Although the younger Serkin is a more poetic, less angular performer than his father, both display the same intense involvement with the music they are playing and othe are splendid technicians.

The afternoon's last (and by all means least) offering was William Russo's "Three Pieces for Blues Band and Symphony Orchestra, Op. 50," which received its premiere just two years ago under Mr. Ozawa's baton.

★ ★ ★

NO ONE KNOWS how many Prokofiev or Schoenberg converts were made yesterday, but Mr. Russo's efforts at lifesaving made euthanasia seem at least worthy of consideration.

Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band was shown to much better effect on their own when they concluded the concert with an encore.

LONG RIVER

PORT CREDIT, Ont. (AP) — When Helen Louisa Leavers celebrated her 107th birthday last week she was asked the standard question about longevity. "My husband died 35 years ago—that's why I've lived so long," she replied.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638
JUL 13 1970

At the Concert

Tanglewood Concert 'Particularly Novel'

By MICHAEL WIENER

LENOX, Mass. — Seiji Ozawa has been coming up with some interesting programs at Tanglewood this summer, but yesterday's all 20th century concert proved to be particularly novel.

The program opened with five excerpts from Prokofiev's ballet "Romeo and Juliet." Although spiced with the composer's typical irony, the score is so filled with romantic lyricism that it almost seems like Tchaikovsky brought up to date, with the elder composer's self-pity replaced by true dramatic force.

Mr. Ozawa and this music were made for each other, and he led the Boston Symphony in a trully inspired performance.

Music has always tightroped its compulsive way between the polarities of immediacy of experience and generalized images for the larger moments of realization. The Russo pieces, especially at the moments of extravagant improvisation, recall the oriental-cantorial chants, demonic but sacred with affirmation, heated to incandescence. The boys-of-the-band tumble at the star of life like a jongleur of Notre Dame.

At Tanglewood

Symphonic Works and Cosi Fan Tutte

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Michael Tilson Thomas took over from ailing de Burgos last Friday and, as usual, did a good job. Dropping the de Falla works for Glinka: Overture to Russlan and Ludmila, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 1, followed by the expected Stravinsky "Rite of Spring," afforded an all-Russian program on the light side. At a fast clip, well-played, with the 'cellos singing sonorously on the one expansive melody, Glinka made a good Pops opening. The early Tchaikovsky would also be appropriate for a Pops concert with its verbal program ("Daydreams on a wintry road," "Land of gloom, land of mists"), it is obvious music but melody-rich and dramatically skillful, remembering Mozart twice removed—some climax-building (and centainly the grand ending) really tedious. The Scherzo is charming with infectious rhythm, and throughout there are moments anticipating the future: woodwind-string counterpoint, darkly glowing passages for the low strings, the mixture of brooding and drama.

The Rite, with or without Thomas, is always stirring as played by the Boston Symphony—properly raucous in its inspired, sophisticated primitivism.

Saturday night Seiji Ozawa conducted, without score, a Cosi Fan Tutte that Mozart would have envied for its near-perfection, vocal and instrumental, and its witty humanity. Metropolitan singers performing included Phyllis Curtin, Rosalind Elias, Tom Krause, George Shirley, Teresa Statos and Ezio Flagello. The women were vocally distinctive, each in her own character-style, the men equally so. The sextet of the two pairs of lovers, the lovely clown of a maid, and the cynical Don who masterminds the plot comprised concerted moments of well-matched resonance. The plot, of course, is good Minsky in 18th century dress — the two men tempted to try their ladies' faithfulness by the Iago-Don, their fake departure to the wars and sly return as Albanian noblemen, moments of sentiment and of broad satire, and finally the inamoratas' sexual weakness resolved by marriage.

The, amazing score which precedes the Magic Flute by a year is so well-knit and dramatic in continuity that audience applause after arias is a curse by inevitable. As sung last Saturday it would take severe control not to respond and fortunately the linkage sometimes forstalled the fracture of applause. The acting, on a raised stage behind the orchestra, was just enough to flesh-out the da Ponte—Mozart text and the costuming minimal for disguise. A high point of disguise was the maid Strata's weaselly voice as the doctor. Her comedy, vocally convincing, too, was a complete success in her first appearance with the B.S.O. Finally we must return to Ozawa, who kept singers and orchestra in effective balance with no repression, anticipated every change with economical gesture and paced the whole drama so justly that there was always a feeling of Mozartean naturalness.

Sunday afternoon proved Mr. Ozawa equally apt as middleman in a concerto, Schoenberg's Piano Concerto, Op. 42, with Peter Serkin as pianist. It is one of the few great modern concerto's and, as expressively understood by both Serkin and Ozawa, should grow in acceptance. Schoenberg, himself, decried the twelve-tone mongering for listeners and only asked for direct response to expressive sound. The modern level of dissonance is relative to the momentary pattern of evolution (more and less, as in the shaping of all "classic" works). The basic innards are contrapuntally alive; and the degree of frenetic change should seem natural to anyone now aware of the world. Moreover there are quietly introspective moments when the music dreams (the piano opening of the first movement, the cadenza of the Adagio). The last phase (the movements are continuous) is labeled Giocoso. It's sometimes hard to tell when Schoenberg is joking, but here there was a clue in the heavy bounce and moments of wandering — like elephants dancing and then forgetting the steps. The ensemble of piano and orchestra was effective, one or the other dominating without overbearing and often merging as equals.

The Concerto was preceded by Prokofiev's Suite from Romeo and Juliet, Op. 64. Of the two suites the composer arranged, when ballet performance was intolerably delayed, Ozawa made a canny choice of four movements from the second and one from the first. Prokofiev's return to Russia after Paris exile must have meant a psychological conversion to direct communication without need for the heavy hand of Soviet conservatism. In "Romeo and Juliet" certainly the music is always alive with the dissonant clash of Montague-Capulet feud.

After intermission all bets were off; Corky Siegal's Harry Year Band was to do three pieces by Russo for blues band and symphony. It is fresh from 1967-68 commissioned for the Chicago Symphony and its impact was immediate, its concentrated blues idiom contagious. Russo is one of the new breed of musicians who's training and experience spans all modern music with no disregard for either jazz or symphonic. In these pieces the orchestra does an important job of supporting rhythms, melodic range and dramatic brassy climax as a sort of punctuation for the improvisatory intensities of the little band. The passages for electrified harmonica were indeed electrifying, startling often with a high wail that cascaded down in intricate figuration against the sometime boogy-woogie bass figures of the orchestra.

A Mystery Is Solved at Tanglewood

CANCELLED CONCERT—Rafaèl Frubeck de Burgos, who cancelled his conducting duties at Tanglewood due to illness, was replaced at the last minute by Michael Tillson Thomas.

By RICHARD VINCENT

LENOX, Mass.—There was a great deal of anticipation concerning the appearance at Tanglewood of Rafael Frubeck de Burgos, the Spanish conductor who has made a considerable European reputation in the past few years as the director of the Madrid Symphony Orchestra. He has been variously described, but one particular description seemed particularly interesting. In Europe, we are told, he is called the bullfighter of the podium. The image that this brings to mind, that of the man citing the orchestra in its own terrain, was the stuff of which legends are made.

And the program! De Falla's "El Amor Brujo" and the "Three Cornered Hat" followed by "Le Sacre du printemps," by Stravinsky.

THE BULLFIGHTER of the podium appeared, young and slight, and off we went.

Whatever it was it was not "El Amor Brujo.' It was an overture, so completely familiar that it was hard to identify. Rossini? Bizet? Verdi: Finally we pinned it down. It was the Overture to "Russlan and Ludmila." Well played, everything was proper, but what happened to de Falla?

The mystery deepened. The downbeat produced a vintage Tchaikowsky chord and sequence. It wasn't the symphonies 4, 5, or 6 so it had to be 1, 2, or 3. We chose number 1 and were eventually proven correct.

A VISIT to the press office explained everything. De Burgos was sick and on very short notice indeed Michael Tillson Thomas, the assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony was filling in and had changed the program. An insert had been provided but my program did not have it.

This was the first time that the Boston had played Tchaikowsky's First at the Festival and there is really no reason why they should. Although all the hallmarks of his particular musical vision were present, it is, to these ears essentially a bland piece. Because it was Tchaikowsky it was in the minor and had moments of real emotion. But the grea singing melodies that this man could and did write were not quite achieved.

The program closed with Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps," and Thomas and the orchestra did the job. The orchestra was obviously sympathetic to Mr. Thomas' predicament, his last moment substitution, and they did everything they could to help. It all came out very well, and, of course, the work itself is as exciting as anything written in this century or any century.

THOMAS is to be commended on his performance and so is the orchestra who, to a man, closed ranks to bail the young man out. Thomas tried no tricks, the reading was forthright and competent. He kept things moving although the players didn't seem to be watching him very much.

The audience, also sympathetic, gave Thomas an ovation at the end and well they might.

The crowd in the shed was skimpy, whether due to the weather or to some privileged manner in which they knew about De Burgos' absence is hard to determine. At any rate we have yet to see De Burgos in action which is a shame. However he is still scheduled to appear at Saratoga in August and we will look forward to it.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
JUL 12 1970
New England Newsclip

Tuesday, July 14, 1970

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000
JUL 16 1970
New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

Symphonic Works and Cosi Fan Tutte

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

Michael Tilson Thomas took over from ailing de Burgos last Friday and, as usual, did a good job. Dropping the de Falla works for Glinka: Overture to Russlan and Ludmila, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 1, followed by the expected Stravinsky "Rite of Spring," afforded an all-Russian program on the light side. At a fast clip, well-played, with the 'cellos singing sonorously on the one expansive melody, Glinka made a good Pops opening. The early Tchaikovsky would also be appropriate for a Pops concert with its verbal program ("Daydreams on a wintry road," "Land of gloom, land of mists"), it is obvious music but melody-rich and dramatically skillful, remembering Mozart twice removed—some climax-building (and centainly the grand ending) really tedious. The Scherzo is charming with infectious rhythm, and throughout there are moments anticipating the future: woodwind-string counterpoint, darkly glowing passages for the low strings, the mixture of brooding and drama.

The Rite, with or without Thomas, is always stirring as played by the Boston Symphony—properly raucous in its inspired, sophisticated primitivism.

Saturday night Seiji Ozawa conducted, without score, a Cosi Fan Tutte that Mozart would have envied for its near-perfection, vocal and instrumental, and its witty humanity. Metropolitan singers performing included Phyllis Curtin, Rosalind Elias, Tom Krause, George Shirley, Teresa Statos and Ezio Flagello. The women were vocally distinctive, each in her own character-style, the men equally so. The sextet of the two pairs of lovers, the lovely clown of a maid, and the cynical Don who masterminds the plot comprised concerted moments of well-matched resonance. The plot, of course, is good Minsky in 18th century dress — the two men tempted to try their ladies' faithfulness by the Iago-Don, their fake departure to the wars and sly return as Albanian noblemen, moments of sentiment and of broad satire, and finally the inamoratas' sexual weakness resolved by marriage.

The amazing score which precedes the Magic Flute by a year is so well-knit and dramatic in continuity that audience applause after arias is a curse by inevitable. As sung last Saturday it would take severe control not to respond and fortunately the linkage sometimes forstalled the fracture of applause. The acting, on a raised stage behind the orchestra, was just enough to flesh-out the da Ponte—Mozart text and the costuming minimal for disguise. A high point of disguise was the maid Strata's weaselly voice as the doctor. Her comedy, vocally convincing, too, was a complete success in her first appearance with the B.S.O. Finally we must return to Ozawa, who kept singers and orchestra in effective balance with no repression, anticipated every change with economical gesture and paced the whole drama so justly that there was always a feeling of Mozartean naturalness.

Sunday afternoon proved Mr. Ozawa equally apt as middleman in a concerto, Schoenberg's Piano Concerto, Op. 42, with Peter Serkin as pianist. It is one of the few great modern concerto's and, as expressively understood by both Serkin and Ozawa, should grow in acceptance. Schoenberg, himself, decried the twelve-tone mongering for listeners and only asked for direct response to expressive sound. The modern level of dissonance is relative to the momentary pattern of evolution (more and less, as in the shaping of all "classic" works). The basic innards are contrapuntally alive; and the degree of frenetic change should seem natural to anyone now aware of the world. Moreover there are quietly introspective moments when the music dreams (the piano opening of the first movement, the cadenza of the Adagio). The last phase (the movements are continuous) is labeled Giocoso. It's sometimes hard to tell when Schoenberg is joking, but here there was a clue in the heavy bounce and moments of wandering — like elephants dancing and then forgetting the steps. The ensemble of piano and orchestra was effective, one or the other dominating without overbearing and often merging as equals.

The Concerto was preceded by Prokofiev's Suite from Romeo and Juliet, Op. 64. Of the two suites the composer arranged, when ballet performance was intolerably delayed, Ozawa made a canny choice of four movements from the second and one from the first. Prokofiev's return to Russia after Paris exile must have meant a psychological conversion to direct communication without need for the heavy hand of Soviet conservatism. In "Romeo and Juliet" certainly the music is always alive with the dissonant clash of Montague-Capulet feud.

After intermission all bets were off; Corky Siegal's Harry Year Band was to do three pieces by Russo for blues band and symphony. It is fresh from 1967-68 commissioned for the Chicago Symphony and its impact was immediate, its concentrated blues idiom contagious. Russo is one of the new breed of musicians who's training and experience spans all modern music with no disregard for either jazz or symphonic. In these pieces the orchestra does an important job of supporting rhythms, melodic range and dramatic brassy climax as a sort of punctuation for the improvisatory intensities of the little band. The passages for electrified harmonica were indeed electrifying, startling often with a high wail that cascaded down in intricate figuration against the sometime boogy-woogie bass figures of the orchestra.

Music has always tightroped its compulsive way between the polarities of immediacy of experience and generalized images for the larger moments of realization. The Russo pieces, especially at the moments of extravagant improvisation, recall the oriental-cantorial chants, demonic but sacred with affirmation, heated to incandescence. The boys-of-the-band tumble at the star of life like a jongleur of Notre Dame.

AT TANGLEWOOD

Fine Cast Makes Mozart Opera Lively Fun

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — One of the great virtues of opera is its ability to be enjoyed without knowing or caring about the story.

Abstract Enjoyment

This is especially true of concert versions such as that presented at Tanglewood Saturday night. The music can be enjoyed abstractly, and if the listener knows the details of the story, so much the better.

The opera at Tanglewood Saturday was Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte," a foolish singspiel with a comic-strip plot about female inconstancy and male trickery enhanced by music of sublime wit.

There are six characters: two couples who get mixed up, a coniving friend and a sly maid. They were portrayed with professional polish as follows: Fiordiligi by Phyllis Curtin, Dorabella by Rosalind Elias, Guglielmo by Tom Krause, Ferrando by George Shirley, Despina by Teresa Stratas and Don Alfonso by Ezio Flagello.

Orchestra Reduced

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was reduced to half strength as befits Mozart's music, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus numbered 22. Conductor was Seiji Ozawa. The first act ran 90 minutes, the second 75, plus interruptilons for applause.

There are always a great many things to be said about an opera performance, many points to check, and it is easy to run on too far; so let us tick off a few observations without details.

It took the orchestra a while to warm to its work; there were signs of an imprecision with Mozart's crystaline craftsmanship that were not evident in Boston's orchestra a year ago.

Ozawa's best work is not with Mozart.

The opening scene with Krause, Shirley and Flagello got the opera off to a rousing, robust start. It was full of manly high spirits and braggadocio.

Duets Set High Standard

The soprano duet by Curtin and Elias in the second scene also set a high standard for its followers.

The cast members are all highly experienced, first-class opera stars well schooled in the niceties of ensemble singing, which is the key to the success of any Cosi performance.

The opera is packed with ensembles; the solo work is almost entirely confined to passages sandwiched by duets, trios, quartets, quintets and sextets.

Five of the six soloists sang, and acted, from memory and the sixth carried the score only as an occasional reminder, a circumstance which gave them all an exuberant freedom of movement.

The ensembles ran off like clockwork — smooth, easy, neatly balanced, and nicely tailored and funny, melodramatic, pompous, burlesqued or simply beautiful as the occasion demanded.

Acting Accurate

The acting was confined to platforms above and behind the orchestra, modified, of course, because of limited circumstances, but apt and accurate enough to enlist the imagination of the audience which contributed much laughter at the antics, especially those of little Despina, a clever gamin.

"Cosi" is not usually taken seriously because it is such fluffy stuff, but it is one of the best examples of its style, and is pure, frivolous entertainment.

Off hand, it doesn't seem as if a better cast could be assembled — equally good, yes, and different, but not better. It was a good evening.

LONG RIVER

PORT CREDIT, Ont. (AP) — When Helen Louisa Leavers celebrated her 107th birthday last week she was asked the standard question about longevity. "My husband died 35 years ago —that's why I've lived so long," she replied.

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
JUL 13 1970

At the Concert

Tanglewood Concert 'Particularly Novel'

By MICHAEL WIENER

LENOX, Mass. — Seiji Ozawa has been coming up with some interesting programs at Tanglewood this summer, but yesterday's all 20th century concert proved to be particularly novel.

The program opened with five excerpts from Prokofiev's ballet "Romeo and Juliet." Although spiced with the composer's typical irony, the score is so filled with romantic lyricism that it almost seems like Tchaikovsky brought up to date, with the elder composer's self-pity replaced by true dramatic force.

Mr. Ozawa and this music were made for each other, and he led the Boston Symphony in a truly inspired performance.

★ ★ ★

SCHOENBERG was approaching 70 when he wrote his "Piano Concerto, Op. 42," in 1942 (for lovers of musical trivia, all of this composer's concerti share their opus number with their year of completion). The work rather neatly refutes two often heard criticisms of twelve-tone music: That it is merely academic number games and-or that it is incapable of expressing any emotion other than anguish.

Although the concerto is in the traditional three movements and the soloist is allowed two cadenzas for technical display, the music is generally of an intimate nature.

Yesterday's soloist was Peter Serkin, the son and pupil of the great Rudolf Serkin. Although the younger Serkin is a more poetic, less angular performer than his father, both display the same intense involvement with the music they are playing and othe are splendid technicians.

The afternoon's last (and by all means least) offering was William Russo's "Three Pieces for Blues Band and Symphony Orchestra, Op. 50," which received its premiere just two years ago under Mr. Ozawa's baton.

★ ★ ★

NO ONE KNOWS how many Prokofiev or Schoenberg converts were made yesterday, but Mr. Russo's efforts at lifesaving made euthanasia seem at least worthy of consideration.

Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band was shown to much better effect on their own when they concluded the concert with an encore.

The Sound of Music

Fast-Paced 'Cosi Fan Tutte'

By Peter M. Knapp

LENOX — A concert version of Mozart's comic opera, "Cosi Fan Tutte," was the major offering of the second weekend at Tanglewood, Saturday night's presentation before 4,622 being the only program this summer exclusively Mozart's.

Seiji Ozawa led the Boston Symphony on yet another misty evening, unkind to vocal chords and orchestral strings, reeds and skins. In what has become Tanglewood performing style, the singers appeared on a raised platform behind the orchestra and made entrances from screens.

"Cosi" was the most fully-staged concert opera of the last several years here — no real costumes or sets (though the ladies appeared in a series of delicious gowns and the men had feathered turbans for their diguise), but basic stage movements. "Cosi" is adaptable to a simplicity of style, and Andrew Raeburn's staging was appropriate and amusing.

Subtleties Missed

Though Ozawa has done "Cosi" in Salzburg, he is not a compelling Mozart conductor at this stage in his career. He led a brisk performance, but speed is not everything, and one often missed the suppleness, the nuance, the lightness and artful profile Mozart requires.

There were several instances in which delightful turns of phrase were whisked over, or where singers had little room for the flexibility that breathes life into the music (Ferrando's beautiful aria, "Un'aura amorosa," one outstanding example), and the recitatives of the first act were mercilessly rushed. Over-all, the pacing was too fast for comfort. And Ozawa should rid himself of the habit of snorting and chuffing while conducting.

Among the singers, the men held the edge — the exception being Teresa Stratas' pert, funny and show-stealing Despina. Miss Stratas sang well, and reinforced her audience appeal with skillful acting.

Some of the most inflected and best enunciated vocalism came from the sturdy Ezio Flagello (the only one to use a score), a sonorous and pointed Don Alfonso. Tom Krause furnished an affable Guglielmo in his resonant baritone, while George Shirley was a superb Ferrando. The tenor took some time to clear up initial huskiness, but by the middle of Act 2 was singing freely and stylishly in the way that has made him one of the most appealing and reliable of Mozart singers.

The two sisters — Rosalind Elias as Dorabella and Phyllis Curtin as Fiordiligi — had their vocal difficulties at the beginning. But Miss Elias improved while Miss Curtin continued to struggle. Both were best in the many sparkling ensembles among "Cosi's" delectable assets. Miss Curtin, sadly, doesn't have the range or flexibility for either of Fiordiligi's big arias. Though she professionally covered some of her difficulties, there was no disguising her difficulties in the lower register or her lack of force.

"Cosi" is always a fun piece and Saturday night's production had its moments of enjoyment. But it was musically off and on, and one had hoped for better from this cast of established singers.

For The Mods

For his Sunday afternoon program, Ozawa turned the clock ahead two centuries for a concert of 20th century music, heard by 7,019. This is his fortissimo, and he had a good afternoon on the podium.

It was also a program apparently calculated to appeal to the mod generation: selections from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet" ballet; the Schoenberg Piano Concerto with Peter Serkin as soloist, and William Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Symphony Orchestra, with Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band.

The Prokofiev was well enough done, colorful, crisp and with a good dose of tension, though without the terrifying sense of drama that Erich Leinsdorf evoked. Ozawa made his own selections from the two suites, and curiously chose to place the theatrical Death of Tybalt section last and the emotional peak of the ballet, "Romeo at Juliet's Tomb," third among the five episodes.

For all its reputed technical mastery, much of the Schoenberg Concerto leaves me with the sense of more construction than composition, exceptions being the variations of the first section (there are four movements played without pause) and the adagio. It is obviously not a crowd-pleaser (though the other two works on the program are), and Ozawa thus deserves some credit for programming it, as well as directing a basically well-knit performance.

SEIJI OZAWA — fast with Mozart, better with moderns

Glenn Gould used to be a champion of the Schoenberg, and Peter Serkin, Rudolf's son, has some of the twitchy characteristics of Gould at the keyboard, as well as a gift for color and placement of sound. Gould sometimes wore a maxi-coat that seemed left over from the Bolshevik Revolution and an abstract expression, as if he either wondered where he was, or wished he were not.

Serkin appeared in a long white collarless coat that looked like a hospital johnny — or grandpa's nightshirt. Opinions were mixed on this. He has long hair down his back, fastened with a barette, and an abstract expression, as if . . . etc. He plays expressively and introspectively with sweeping arm motions — not like Gould, certainly not Serkin pere. The Schoenberg is not a piece of overt virtuosity, though the writing is technically excruciating enough, and Serkin never blew it out of proportion in his lyrical, thoughtful performance.

Long hair and colored shirts are the uniforms for Corky Siegel's four-man group (two guitars, drums and Corky on harmonic and electric piano). But this is contemporary not eccentric, and the audience was at first startled, then delighted, by the blues band beat. The composer, William Russo, may be recalled as the Bill Russo with the driving trombone in Stan Kenton's band of the 1950s. Like many young musicians, he has had wide training and experience and his compositions tend to be in the "third stream" mixture of jazz, pop and symphonic.

Blues and Fun

The blues band piece is fun — particularly with the soul-felt harmonica and guitar improvisations the score allows — as a kind of modern-day concerto grosso. But the blues band material clearly wins out over the blander orchestral part, and Russo — like many before him — is not really persuasive in reconciling the two musical worlds or styles. The orchestra, at last, becomes mainly an irrelevant backdrop for the more exciting blues band flights — just as visually the involved, swaying, head-bobbing Corky Siegel group clearly stood apart from the serious white-clad men of the BSO.

The audience relished the incongruity, Ozawa's enthusiastic conducting, and certainly Corky Siegel's men, who played an encore.

Friday evening's scheduled conductor was Rafael Fruehbeck de Burgos, the Spanish conductor who would have made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony. But he caught the flu and Michael Tilson Thomas, the BSO's associate conductor, took over. And the mostly Spanish program became all-Russian.

On a damp evening before a small audience of 4,277, Thomas led Glinka's Overture to "Russlan and Ludmila", Tschaikovsky's Symphony No. 1 in g minor, and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." Lithe, dynamic and precise in beat, he directed the "Rite" with extraordinary clarity and beauty of sound — qualities which often become sacrificed to Stravinsky's pagan rhythms. It is rare to hear the "Rite" performed with such detail and control, and with such chamber-music lucidity.

Ravishing Sound

The orchestra, too, put forth ravishing sound and there were many fine individual details — the woodwinds in the Introduction, the trumpet interjections, the beauty of the cello sound (also noteworthy in the Glinka and the Tschaikovsky). Rhythms were precisely defined and the pacing carefully controlled, slower than customary; there were vibrant climaxes, but no showy effects. In all, a very beautiful and often exciting conception without the frenetic quality of many readings.

Thomas evidently likes the Tschaikovsky "Winter Daydreams" symphony, a piece of gentle melody reminiscent of the ballet scores. Thomas shaped the melodic contours of the piece well and struck a fine balance between tension and relaxation. It is not a virtuoso piece as the late Tschaikovsky symphonies (though it winds up with the usual peroration prefaced by an embarrassingly academic fughetto), but predominantly gentle and reflective.

The Glinka started out with a whoosh, was taken at a dashing tempo and had some moments of garbled woodwinds.

At the Concert

'Cosi Fan Tutti' Given Splendid Presentation

By EDWARD FRENCH

LENOX, Mass. — For several years one of the highlights of the Berkshire Festival has been the presentation of an opera in semi-concert form. We say "semi" because there is some indication of the dramatic action although the singers are in concert attire rather than costumes and the space available on the stage precludes any use of props. The lack of a real stage production is compensated for some of us by the superb quality of the orchestral playing and the general over-all musical excellence of the performance.

We felt that Saturday evening's presentation of Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutti" ("Thus do all Women") came off better as a whole than last year's offering of that composer's "The Abduction from the Seraglio" from the standpoint of well-placed musical flow as well as the admitted superiority of the score itself.

★ ★ ★

"COSI FAN TUTTI," composed after "The marriage of Figaro" and "Don Giovanni" had the same librettist, Lorenzo Da Ponte, and is considered the most perfectly constructed of all Mozart's operas. The music is Mozart at his best with elegance, sparkling vitality and some of his most beautiful and moving ensembles whether duets, trios, quintets or sectets.

The splendid group of artists assembled for this performance included Phyllis Curtin, soprano, no stranger to the Tanglewood scene, mezzo Rosalind Elias, Teresa Startas, soprano, George Shirley, tenor, Tom Krause, baritone, and Ezio Flagello, baritone. There was also the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, The Boston Symphony Orchestra reduced in size to Mozartian proportions, and last but far from least, the conductor, Seiji Ozawa.

Mr. Ozawa conducted with a paritcular feeling for the elegance in this music. The melodic line was always apparent and there was due regard for the ornamentation inherent in this music.

PHYLLIS CURTIN

All of the singers were at home in this difficult music, Miss Curtin displaying the same aristocratic command of vocal style she has shown in her recital appearances. Rosalind Elias as Dorabella had a warmth that was well suited to the character of her music.

★ ★ ★

THE SHOW-STEALER of the evening, however, was diminutive Teresa Stratas, who milked the last ounce of effectiveness from the music assigned to Despina. The men were all in good voice, George Shirley showing why he is considered one of the better Mozart singers of the day, and Tom Krause and Ezio Flagello singing with the authority and style expected from world renowned opera stars.

It was a splendid musical presentation of a Mozart masterwork.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Monday, July 13, 1970

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

JUL 13 1970 New England Newsclip

Met Visits Tanglewood

By GEORGE W. STOWE

Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte" was the attraction Saturday night at Tanglewood when several Metropolitan Opera stars appeared there in a concert version of this famous comic masterpiece.

With the wonderful ensembles that Mozart wrote for this delightful work Seiji Ozawa was particularly fortunate in his cast, for everyone (except Ezio Flagello, who kept his music in front of him) was apparently very familiar with his role.

Ozawa did not strike me as an outstanding Mozartean, for he had a tendency to drive the music a little too hard and in the First Act the Boston Symphony (which had been somewhat reduced) tended to overpower the singers, notably in the concerted ensembles.

Phyllis Curtin was the Fiordiligi on this occasion and her cultured approach was commendable, although she no longer has the tonal richness for "Come scoglio." However, her ensemble work was first-rate.

As Dorabella Rosalind Elias had pitch difficulties with "Smanie implacabili." However, she handled the recitatives with more authority and her ensemble also was excellent. She made a very attractive figure onstage.

Tom Krause, as Guglielmo, and George Shirley, as Ferrando, were outstanding members of the cast Saturday night. While "Un aura amorosa" lacked some of the suavity that George Shirley usually brings to this famous aria, the tenor settled down to give a stylish account of the role.

Certainly the duets between the baritone and tenor were highlights of this performance. And the two singers interjected a great deal of comic byplay into the opera to make it more than ordinarily amusing.

In all honesty, perhaps the most successful Mozartean on the stage was Teresa Stratas, as the comic Despina. She's a great comedienne and her imitation to end all imitations of comprimario tenors was delightful. And she was in excellent voice all evening.

Ezio Flagello brought his huge voice to the role of Don Alfonso but, as mentioned earlier, he read from the score and was not as much at ease as the rest of his colleagues.

A small chorus, under the direction of John Oliver, took part in the production and had obviously been well-prepared for the assignment. And I am happy to say that this performance dispensed with the unctuous type of narrator that often mars operas in concert form.

Although there was no official count of the crowd, the Shed held a great many listeners and there was the usual assemblage on the lawn. Fortunately, the rain held off until the end of the performance.

Stratas' Performance Tanglewood Highlight

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — The highlight of the Berkshire Music Festival's second weekend at Tanglewood was Teresa Stratas' performance Saturday night of Despina, a secondary role in Mozart's opera, "Cosi Fan Tutte."

What makes it additionally impressive is that the five featured roles also were sung by members of the Metropolitan Opera.

Not lagging far behind in audience appeal was Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band leading the Boston Symphony down the jazz path yesterday afternoon with William Russo's Pieces for Blues Band and Symphony Orchestra, Opus 50.

Corky blew a mighty electric harmonica that must have been heard in nearby Pittsfield and doubled on electric piano. Jim Schwall and Al Radford were on electric and bass guitars. Shelly Plotkin was the drummer.

Weekend attendance was 17,900, a few hundred less than The Who brought to Tanglewood last Tuesday night.

Ozawa Conducts

Seiji Ozawa conducted the Boston Symphony in the Mozart opera and yesterday's orchestral program at which 23-year-old pianist Peter Serkin was also a soloist.

Once Ozawa had rushed the orchestra through Mozart's "Cosi" overture and the opening trio for male principals, he gave participants their freedom.

Presented in concert form, the roles were sung from an elevated platform behind the orchestra with a chorus of 25 mixed voices to the right.

Action and situations in this farce about female infidelity are so obvious that the Italian language was scarcely a drawback.

Miss Stratas did the role of the maid and impersonations with infectious flair. Her arias brought salvos and her cackling in the doctor's part was a howl.

Rosalind Elias sparkled vocally and dramatically as one of the love-smitten sisters. Dorabella. Tom Krause and George Shirley was equally dashing as the swains who put the sisters' purity of purpose to a test.

Ezio Flagello sang well enough as Don Alfonso, the old plotster, but he was the only one who used his music. and his head was buried in the score.

Phyllis Curtin was limitedly effective as the other sister, Fiordiligi.

Enter Serkin

Tanglewood's serious platform has rarely seen such a sight as Serkin engaging himself with the Schoenberg Piano Concerto. He wore a knee length white blouse. His little beard was balanced with long hair drawn tightly back and fastened with a clasp. On the other end were sandals.

When not playing, he did a bit of choreography during orchestral interludes. Most of his keyboard contributions was pummeled exclamations and nonmelodic caresses.

The orchestra seemed to go along for the ride and Ozawa gave willingly of his effort.

The work itself is an intellectual bore. But one could hardly deny the earnestness with which it was attacked or the fringe benefit of a fashion show.

Russo's Blues Band Pieces is a real ear stimulant. Although completed just two years ago, it helps itself to big jazz servings of the 50's. Some is square and a little bit is corny.

Count Basie's piano creeps into the score, along with traces of Gershwin and a second movement that tacks a "Mission Impossible" rhythm to pizzicato cellos.

The explosive encore was identified to us as a Schubert Variation.

Ozawa conducted a highly emotional performance of Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" Suite. It was a masterful piece of work, exerting instantaneous changes of style from equally prompt cueing.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUL 13 1970 New England Newsclip

'Cosi fan Tutte' sung by Tanglewood cast

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Seiji Ozawa had decided to continue the pleasing tradition of having the Boston Symphony's programs at Tanglewood include a semi-staged concert performance of an opera. The work he chose was Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte," and the performance was given Saturday evening with Phyllis Curtin (Fiordiligi), Rosalind Elias (Dorabella), Teresa Stratas (Despina), George Shirley (Ferrando), Tom Krause (Guglielmo), and Ezio Flagello (Don Alfonso), in the cast.

Reactions to Osawa's first "Cosi" at Salzburg last summer were mixed, as one politely says: I found, though, that what he did Saturday was purposeful, authoritative, and in most respects understanding. The performance, that is to say, was unfailingly lively, it was for the most part elegantly played, and it established sufficient, if not profound, distinctions between the comic and the serious moments of a work in which the blurring of the two is exceedingly subtle.

It all seemed a little breathless. The tempi were unusually quick, but that is not what I mean — in fact, they were often right and stylish where the Austrian and German Mozart specialist drag. At the very same speeds that Osawa chose could be used to more effect in the performance with more inner repose; one, that is, in which they seem to be less anxiety to push ahead, and a correspondingly greater willingness to allow some breathing spaces between phrases, paragraphs, and even entire numbers. For example, the impulse to move swiftly from aria to recitative and back to aria is right; it was only the execution that had something hectic about it, and that slightly fevered quality, like the occasional ensemble lapses between singers and orchestra, is surely in part to be put down to the fact that the performance had, in a manner of speaking, to be thrown together with little rehearsal.

My one serious complaint about Ozawa concerns cuts: certainly not those in the recitatives, nor even the customary, if regrettable, omissions of both of Ferrando's second-act arias, but the ugly, damaging abbreviations, also in Act II, of Dorabella's aria. the Fiordiligi - Ferrando duet, and especially the finale.

The singers were rather a mixed lot. Phyllis Curtin, for all her good voice, good looks, and good intentions, was quite wrong for Fiordiligi, technically inadequate in a famously taxing part, cold and humorless. Rosalind Elias was also vocally erratic, but at least she was spirited, even if in a manner that came closer to Carmen and Annie Oakley than to giddy but elegant Dorabella. Teresa Stratas, however, actually stopped the show with her first aria, "In uomini, in soldati," and, with superb musicianship and voice, firecracker diction, and consuming temperament, she gave a performance that was a joy from beginning to end.

The three men, George Shirley, Tom Krause, and Ezio Flagello, were gifted, intelligent, and sensitive dealing with Mozartean high comedy, and their work was musically and vocally attractive. Andrew Raeburn devised appropriate and charming activity for the singers who were on the platform behind the orchestra.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 14 1970 New England Newsclip

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

JUL 14 1970 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Festival

OPERA: 'Cosi fan Tutte'

By HARRY NEVILLE
HT Music Critic

Opera of any kind is apt to be an unsatisfying experience in the Tanglewood Music Shed, where the Berkshire Festival presented Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" on Saturday night. The semi-outdoor setting presents singers with ansoluble acoustical problems and—in weather as oppressively humid as Saturday's—with the possibility of vocal problems as well.

"Cosi," whose charm and delicacy come across best in a smallish opera house, doesn't benefit at all from the cavernous size of the Shed. And when the singers are placed at the back of the stage, with the orchestra sprawling between them and the audience, then any sense of immediacy and directness becomes even more remote for the listener.

Yet the Tanglewood audience did seem to get huge enjoyment form this presentation, a fact which probably had something to do with the characteristic generosity and good will of festival audiences and, not least, with the prodigious beauty and inventiveness of Mazart's score.

ANDREW RAEBURN had devised modest, unpretentious staging which undoubtedly heightened one's enjoyment, but which with further economies of movement might have been transplanted to the front of the stage, where one could have heard the singers better. As it was, Ezio Flagello (Don Alfonso) rather spoiled things anyway by walking through his part with score in hand.

LILI KRAUS, pianist, who will make her initial Tanglewood appearance July 18 in a Boston Symphony concert conducted by Seiji Ozawa.

The singing was pleasant and acceptable without ever being brilliant, moving or otherwise memorable. Phyllis Curtin lacks a secure enough low register to be effective in some of the music assigned to Fiordiligi—the aria "Come scoglio," for example—and Rosalind Elias (Dorabella), though vocally sumptuous, had a few problems with intonation. Teresa Stratas (Despina), Tom Krause (Guglielmo) and George Shirley (Ferrando) all sang agreeably enough but, as with everyone else, seemed incapable of anything that rose above basic professional competence.

SEIJI OZAWA got very beautiful playing from the BSO strings. The woodwinds, however, seemed utterly uninspired and the horns absolutely frightened by the treasures Mozart thew their ways.

Ozawa also conducted yesterday afternoon's concert, which opened with a reading of Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet Suite that was forceful and dramatic but which, to be odiously comparative, didn't begin to equal Erich Leinsdorf's gleaming, sensuous performance of last summer.

Peter Serkin then appeared as soloist in the Schoenberg Piano Concerto. Serkin, who has recorded the same work with Ozawa and the Chicago Symphony, is an eloquent exponent of this music and there is probably no one who makes a more persuasive case for the Concerto. It is a work, however, that requires a great deal more acoustical clarity and audience concentration than the Shed permits, and it seemed a miscalculation to present it in those surrounding-

CONCLUDING the program was William Russo's "Threee Pieces for Blues Band and Symphony Orchestera," a kind of concerto grosso in which Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band functioned as concertino with the BSO performing the role of ripieno. If the work did nothing more than to turn on a straight audience to the excitement of good blues playing, then it served a useful purpose. But this listener would have much preferred to hear Corky's Siegel's band without the encumbrance of this dreadfully banal alliance with a symphony orchestra, whose contribution was like one of those embarrassing symphonic arrangements Negro spirituals.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 13 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood/Marlboro

Ozawa's 'Cosi'/Casals' Bach

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass., and Marlboro, Vt.

Quite a musical weekend to be two places or more at once, especially in western New England. On Friday night, Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, who has experienced a busy season being on hand when others suddenly can't be, took over at Tanglewood for an indisposed Raphael Frühbeck de Burgos, and among other things, conducted his first "Sacre du Printemps" with the BSO.

In Marlboro, Vt., there was an informal celebration on Friday, and an official one on Saturday evening, when Marlboro Music began its 20th year with a program which had among its features (Marlboro's programs aren't announced in advance) a Beethoven piano quartet with Rudolf Serkin, its artistic director, participating; and the "Egmont" Overture conducted by Pablo Casals.

Meanwhile, back at Tanglewood, Seiji Ozawa was giving the first demonstration here of his prowess as an operatic conductor in a concert version of Mozart's "Così fan tutte," which he will soon be doing for the second season at the Salzburg Festival. Of the Berkshire cast, three — Rosalind Elias (Dorabella), Teresa Stratas (Despina), and Tom Krause (Guglielmo) — will be in the staged performances abroad. Phyllis Curtin (Fiordiligi), George Shirley (Ferrando), and Ezio Flagello (Don Alfonso) completed the BSO's sextet of principals.

What seemed quite apparent from this rather unsatisfactory quasi-opera arrangement was Mr. Ozawa's ready rapport with his singers, on their elevated shelf above and beyond the orchestra onstage, and his responsiveness to the quicksilver shifts of mood that course through this continuously enchanting score. For unless you've been brought up with "Così" live, or done your homework well and used your imagination, the acting feints and the "funny" props (Albanian headdresses, Mesmer's magnet, Despina "disguised" vocally and optically) hardly add up to a first-rate realization of the subtle charm and gentle satire intended by Mozart-da Ponte.

Mr. Flagello, with score in hand, despite in-character winks and congenially misanthropic sounds, scarcely helped his five practiced colleagues further a comic illusion that, under these circumstances, is tenuous at best. And all the singers, well known Mozartians, occasionally encountered difficulties of projection or pitch to which a fully staged or a straight-out-in-front-of-the-orchestra performance would never have subjected them.

Vermont matinee

On Sunday afternoon, there was another demonstration at the Marlboro Music Festival of the concept, almost unique in contemporary musical history, which permits music-loving musicians (yes, Virginia, there are others) to convert their noncommercial performing hopes and ideas into thoroughly rehearsed reality.

A Beethoven Trio, in B-flat major, Op. 11, for clarinet (Richard Stoltzman), piano (Mieczyslaw Horszowski), and cello (Miklos Perenyi) represented a vigorously conceived approach in which the veteran pianist and his two youthful musicianly colleagues combined forces to strong effect. Another Beethoven Trio (G major, Op. 9, No. 1) brought an energetic reading from Isidore Cohen (violin) and two talented young string players, Nobuko Imai (viola) and Nathaniel Rosen (cello).

The appearances of Casals, although associated for 10 years with the festival, are invariably events deriving not only from the respect in which he is held but from the evergreen vigor of his performances. On Sunday, he led the festival orchestra in Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 6 (B-flat major) replete with the kind of insistent tonal stimuli that animated the tips of one's fingers and toes. Two batteries of violas, 12 strong, poured their richness into a mixture that listed four violas da gamba (played instead by cellos), two cellos, bass, and continuo (piano, in this case). Casals, directing with an electric precision, marshaled his forces into total involvement, and gave a contented audience something strikingly unlike it had ever heard before, a lovely way to end a Sunday afternoon.

Stratas' Performance Tanglewood Highlight

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — The highlight of the Berkshire Music Festival's second weekend at Tanglewood was Teresa Stratas' performance Saturday night of Despina, a secondary role in Mozart's opera, "Cosi Fan Tutte."

What makes it additionally impressive is that the five featured roles also were sung by members of the Metropolitan Opera.

Not lagging far behind in audience appeal was Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band leading the Boston Symphony down the jazz path yesterday afternoon with William Russo's Pieces for Blues Band and Symphony Orchestra, Opus 50.

Corky blew a mighty electric harmonica that must have been heard in nearby Pittsfield and doubled on electric piano. Jim Schwall and Al Radford were on electric and bass guitars. Shelly Plotkin was the drummer.

Weekend attendance was 17,956, a few hundred less than The Who brought to Tanglewood last Tuesday night.

Ozawa Conducts

Seiji Ozawa conducted the Boston Symphony in the Mozart opera and yesterday's orchestral program at which 23-year-old pianist Peter Serkin was also a soloist.

Once Ozawa had rushed the orchestra through Mozart's "Cosi" overture and the opening trio for male principals, he gave participants their freedom.

Presented in concert form, the roles were sung from an elevated platform behind the orchestra with a chorus of 25 mixed voices to the right.

Action and situations in this farce about female infidelity are so obvious that the Italian language was scarcely a drawback.

Miss Stratas did the role of the maid and impersonations with infectious flair. Her arias brought salvos and her cackling in the doctor's part was a howl.

Rosalind Elias sparkled vocally and dramatically as one of the love-smitten sisters, Dorabella. Tom Krause and George Shirley was equally dashing as the swains who put the sisters' purity of purpose to a test.

Ezio Flagello sang well enough as Don Alfonso, the old plotster, but he was the only one who used his music, and his head was buried in the score.

Phyllis Curtin was limitedly effective as the other sister, Fiordiligi.

Enter Serkin

Tanglewood's serious platform has rarely seen such a sight as Serkin engaging himself with the Schoenberg Piano Concerto. He wore a knee length white blouse. His little beard was balanced with long hair drawn tightly back and fastened with a clasp. On the other end were sandals.

When not playing, he did a bit of choreography during orchestral interludes. Most of his keyboard contributions was pummeled exclamations and nonmelodic caresses.

The orchestra seemed to go along for the ride and Ozawa gave willingly of his effort.

The work itself is an intellectual bore. But one could hardly deny the earnestness with which it was attacked or the fringe benefit of a fashion show.

Russo's Blues Band Pieces is a real ear stimulant. Although completed just two years ago, it helps itself to big jazz servings of the 50's. Some is square and a little bit is corny.

Count Basie's piano creeps into the score, along with traces of Gershwin and a second movement that tacks a "Mission Impossible" rhythm to pizzicato cellos.

The explosive encore was identified to us as a Schubert Variation.

Ozawa conducted a highly emotional performance of Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" Suite. It was a masterful piece of work, exerting instantaneous changes of style from equally prompt cueing.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUL 13 1970 New England Newsclip

'Cosi fan Tutte' sung by Tanglewood cast

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Seiji Ozawa had decided to continue the pleasing tradition of having the Boston Symphony's programs at Tanglewood include a semi-staged concert performance of an opera. The work he chose was Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte," and the performance was given Saturday evening with Phyllis Curtin (Fiordiligi), Rosalind Elias (Dorabella), Teresa Stratas (Despina), George Shirley (Ferrando), Tom Krause (Guglielmo), and Ezio Flagello (Don Alfonso), in the cast.

Reactions to Osawa's first "Cosi" at Salzburg last summer were mixed, as one politely says: I found, though, that what he did Saturday was purposeful, authoritative, and in most respects understanding. The performance, that is to say, was unfailingly lively, it was for the most part elegantly played, and it established sufficient, if not profound, distinctions between the comic and the serious moments of a work in which the blurring of the two is exceedingly subtle.

It all seemed a little breathless. The tempi were unusually quick, but that is not what I mean — in fact, they were often right and stylish where the Austrian and German Mozart specialist drag. At the very same speeds that Osawa chose could be used to more effect in the performance with more inner repose; one, that is, in which they seem to be less anxiety to push ahead, and a correspondingly greater willingness to allow some breathing spaces between phrases, paragraphs, and even entire numbers. For example, the impulse to move swiftly from aria to recitative and back to aria is right; it was only the execution that had something hectic about it, and that slightly fevered quality, like the occasional ensemble lapses between singers and orchestra, is surely in part to be put down to the fact that the performance had, in a manner of speaking, to be thrown together with little rehearsal.

My one serious complaint about Ozawa concerns cuts: certainly not those in the recitatives, nor even the customary, if regrettable, omissions of both of Ferrando's second-act arias, but the ugly, damaging abbreviations, also in Act II, of Dorabella's aria, the Fiordiligi - Ferrando duet, and especially the finale.

The singers were rather a mixed lot. Phyllis Curtin, for all her good voice, good looks, and good intentions, was quite wrong for Fiordiligi, technically inadequate in a famously taxing part, cold and humorless. Rosalind Elias was also vocally erratic, but at least she was spirited, even if in a manner that came closer to Carmen and Annie Oakley than to giddy but elegant Dorabella. Teresa Stratas, however, actually stopped the show with her first aria, "In uomini, in soldati," and, with superb musicianship and voice, firecracker diction, and consuming temperament, she gave a performance that was a joy from beginning to end.

The three men, George Shirley, Tom Krause, and Ezio Flagello, were gifted, intelligent, and sensitive dealing with Mozartean high comedy, and their work was musically and vocally attractive. Andrew Raeburn devised appropriate and charming activity for the singers who were on the platform behind the orchestra.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 14 1970 New England Newsclip

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

JUL 14 1970 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Festival

OPERA: 'Cosi fan Tutte'

By HARRY NEVILLE
HT Music Critic

Opera of any kind is apt to be an unsatisfying experience in the Tanglewood Music Shed, where the Berkshire Festival presented Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" on Saturday night. The semi-outdoor setting presents singers with ansoluble acoustical problems and—in weather as oppressively humid as Saturday's—with the possibility of vocal problems as well.

"Cosi," whose charm and delicacy come across best in a smallish opera house, doesn't benefit at all from the cavernous size of the Shed. And when the singers are placed at the back of the stage, with the orchestra sprawling between them and the audience, then any sense of immediacy and directness becomes even more remote for the listener.

Yet the Tanglewood audience did seem to get huge enjoyment form this presentation, a fact which probably had something to do with the characteristic generosity and good will of festival audiences and, not least, with the prodigious beauty and inventiveness of Mazart's score.

ANDREW RAEBURN had devised modest, unpretentious staging which undoubtedly heightened one's enjoyment, but which with further economies of movement might have been transplanted to the front of the stage, where one could have heard the singers better. As it was, Ezio Flagello (Don Alfonso) rather spoiled things anyway by walking through his part with score in hand.

LILI KRAUS, pianist, who will make her initial Tanglewood appearance July 18 in a Boston Symphony concert conducted by Seiji Ozawa.

The singing was pleasant and acceptable without ever being brilliant, moving or otherwise memorable. Phyllis Curtin lacks a secure enough low register to be effective in some of the music assigned to Fiordiligi—the aria "Come scoglio," for example—and Rosalind Elias (Dorabella), though vocally sumptuous, had a few problems with intonation. Teresa Stratas (Despina), Tom Krause (Guglielmo) and George Shirley (Ferrando) all sang agreeably enough but, as with everyone else, seemed incapable of anything that rose above basic professional competence.

SEIJI OZAWA got very beautiful playing from the BSO strings. The woodwinds, however, seemed utterly uninspired and the horns absolutely frightened by the treasures Mozart thew their ways.

Ozawa also conducted yesterday afternoon's concert, which opened with a reading of Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet Suite that was forceful and dramatic but which, to be odiously comparative, didn't begin to equal Erich Leinsdorf's gleaming, sensuous performance of last summer.

Peter Serkin then appeared as soloist in the Schoenberg Piano Concerto. Serkin, who has recorded the same work with Ozawa and the Chicago Symphony, is an eloquent exponent of this music and there is probably no one who makes a more persuasive case for the Concerto. It is a work, however, that requires a great deal more acoustical clarity and audience concentration than the Shed permits, and it seemed a miscalculation to present it in those surrounding-

CONCLUDING the program was William Russo's "Threee Pieces for Blues Band and Symphony Orchestera," a kind of concerto grosso in which Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band functioned as concertino with the BSO performing the role of ripieno. If the work did nothing more than to turn on a straight audience to the excitement of good blues playing, then it served a useful purpose. But this listener would have much preferred to hear Corky's Siegel's band without the encumbrance of this dreadfully banal alliance with a symphony orchestra, whose contribution was like one of those embarrassing symphonic arrangements of Negro spirituals.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 13 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood/Marlboro

Ozawa's 'Cosi'/Casals' Bach

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass., and Marlboro, Vt.

Quite a musical weekend to be two places or more at once, especially in western New England. On Friday night, Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, who has experienced a busy season being on hand when others suddenly can't be, took over at Tanglewood for an indisposed Raphael Frühbeck de Burgos, and among other things, conducted his first "Sacre du Printemps" with the BSO.

In Marlboro, Vt., there was an informal celebration on Friday, and an official one on Saturday evening, when Marlboro Music began its 20th year with a program which had among its features (Marlboro's programs aren't announced in advance) a Beethoven piano quartet with Rudolf Serkin, its artistic director, participating; and the "Egmont" Overture conducted by Pablo Casals.

Meanwhile, back at Tanglewood, Seiji Ozawa was giving the first demonstration here of his prowess as an operatic conductor in a concert version of Mozart's "Così fan tutte," which he will soon be doing for the second season at the Salzburg Festival. Of the Berkshire cast, three — Rosalind Elias (Dorabella), Teresa Stratas (Despina), and Tom Krause (Guglielmo) — will be in the staged performances abroad. Phyllis Curtin (Fiordiligi), George Shirley (Ferrando), and Ezio Flagello (Don Alfonso) completed the BSO's sextet of principals.

What seemed quite apparent from this rather unsatisfactory quasi-opera arrangement was Mr. Ozawa's ready rapport with his singers, on their elevated shelf above and beyond the orchestra onstage, and his responsiveness to the quicksilver shifts of mood that course through this continuously enchanting score. For unless you've been brought up with "Cosi" live, or done your homework well and used your imagination, the acting feints and the "funny" props (Albanian headdresses, Mesmer's magnet, Despina "disguised" vocally and optically) hardly add up to a first-rate realization of the subtle charm and gentle satire intended by Mozart-da Ponte.

Mr. Flagello, with score in hand, despite in-character winks and congenially misanthropic sounds, scarcely helped his five practiced colleagues further a comic illusion that, under these circumstances, is tenuous at best. And all the singers, well known Mozartians, occasionally encountered difficulties of projection or pitch to which a fully staged or a straight-out-in-front-of-the-orchestra performance would never have subjected them.

Vermont matinee

On Sunday afternoon, there was another demonstration at the Marlboro Music Festival of the concept, almost unique in contemporary musical history, which permits music-loving musicians (yes, Virginia, there are others) to convert their noncommercial performing hopes and ideas into thoroughly rehearsed reality.

A Beethoven Trio, in B-flat major, Op. 11, for clarinet (Richard Stoltzman), piano (Mieczyslaw Horszowski), and cello (Miklos Perenyi) represented a vigorously conceived approach in which the veteran pianist and his two youthful musicianly colleagues combined forces to strong effect. Another Beethoven Trio (G major, Op. 9, No. 1) brought an energetic reading from Isidore Cohen (violin) and two talented young string players, Nobuko Imai (viola) and Nathaniel Rosen (cello).

The appearances of Casals, although associated for 10 years with the festival, are invariably events deriving not only from the respect in which he is held but from the evergreen vigor of his performances. On Sunday, he led the festival orchestra in Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 6 (B-flat major) replete with the kind of insistent tonal stimuli that animated the tips of one's fingers and toes. Two batteries of violas, 12 strong, poured their richness into a mixture that listed four violas da gamba (played instead by cellos), two cellos, bass, and continuo (piano, in this case). Casals, directing with an electric precision, marshaled his forces into total involvement, and gave a contented audience something strikingly unlike it had ever heard before, a lovely way to end a Sunday afternoon.

Ozawa Conducts Prokofiev's 'Romeo'

By JOHN F. KYES
Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — Youth scored the biggest successes of this past week at Tanglewood, as the 33rd Berkshire Festival offered its second group of programs.

Unfavorable weather restricted attendance at the Friday concert of Spanish and Russian music, conducted by Rafael Frubbeck de Burgos, and the Saturday concert version of Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte," conducted by Seiji Ozawa.

Gazette Review

Fine weather yesterday drew 7,019 to another Ozawa concert, including a suite from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet," Peter Serkin in the Schoenberg Piano Concerto, and Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band cooperating gloriously with the full Boston ensemble in Russo's "Three Pieces for Blues Band and Symphony Orchestra."

The Schoenberg work received its first Tanglewood performance yesterday, and the Russo pieces their first performance by the Boston Symphony.

Ozawa Conducts

Ozawa was in his element, as he conducted three different types of 20th century music. He drove the brilliant Boston percussion and brasses to exciting heights of sound in four movements from the second "Romeo and Juliet" suite and one from the first.

Sonorities and crisp attacks and releases were the rule in three sections, "The Montagues and the Capulets," "Romeo at Juliet's Tomb" and "The Death of Tybalt." Gaiety pervaded the "Dance of the Five Couples" and daintiness the "Dance of the Young Girls with the lilies."

Schoenberg

After this forthright and appealing music, Schoenberg's Piano Concerto came as an excercise in modern calisthenics. It made exacting demands on the conductor, skilled soloist and orchestra, but conveyed little to the average listener.

Serkin's appearance, in front of the white-jacketed orchestra, was unique. He had his long hair pulled back to the nape of his neck with a large barrette. He was clad, nearly down to the knees of his dark trousers, in a loose white garment, long-sleeved but otherwise rather shapeless, and somewhat suggesting a familiar item of hospital garb.

The net result was extremely unflattering to the tall and earnest young artist.

His work was full of vim and alertness, and Ozawa gave him close cooperation.

'Blues' Is Hit

The real hit of the afternoon came in the Russo "blues" music, where a valid background was provided by the symphony orchestra and the band's drummer and bass guitarist, Shelly Plotkin and Al Radford, while Siegel, on electric harmonica or electric piano, and Jim Schwall on electric guitar, improvised delightfully.

Everything from pizzicato to thunder came in the three pieces, with especially effective solos for the sliding wail of the harmonica. The orchestra sat with real respect while the four young players gave an encore of their own which had the shed and grounds jumping.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUL 13 1970

New England Newsclip

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 13 1970

New England Newsclip

JOHNSON CITY, TENN.
PRESS CHRONICLE
D. 19,000 (EVENING)

JUL 9 1970

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Sunday, July 19, 1970

Capable Casting In Mozart Opera

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — One of the great virtues of opera is its ability to be enjoyed without knowing or caring about the story.

Abstract Enjoyment

This is especially true of concert versions such as that presented at Tanglewood Saturday night. The music can be enjoyed abstractly, and if the listener knows the details of the story, so much the better.

The opera at Tanglewood Saturday was Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte," a foolish singspiel with a comic-strip plot about female inconstancy and male trickery enhanced by music of sublime wit.

There are six characters: two couples who get mixed up, a conniving friend and a sly maid. They were portrayed with professional polish as follows: Fiordiligi by Phyllis Curtin, Dorabella by Rosalind Elias, Guglielmo by Tom Krause, Ferrando by George Shirley, Despina by Teresa Stratas and Don Alfonso by Ezio Flagello.

Orchestra Reduced

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was reduced to half strength as befits Mozart's music, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus numbered 22. Conductor was Seiji Ozawa. The first act ran 90 minutes, the second 75, plus interruptilons for applause.

There are always a great many things to be said about an opera performance, many points to check, and it is easy to run on too far; so let us tick off a few observations without details.

It took the orchestra a while to warm to its work; there were signs of an imprecision with Mozart's crystaline craftsmanship that were not evident in Boston's orchestra a year ago.

Ozawa's best work is not with Mozart.

The opening scene with Krause, Shirley and Flagello got the opera off to a rousing, robust start. It was full of manly high spirits and braggadocio.

Duets Set High Standard

The soprano duet by Curtin and Elias in the second scene also set a high standard for its followers.

The cast members are all highly experienced, first-class opera stars well schooled in the niceties of ensemble singing, which is the key to the success of any Cosi performance.

The opera is packed with ensembles; the solo work is almost entirely confined to passages sandwiched by duets, trios, quartets, quintets and sextets.

Five of the six soloists sang, and acted, from memory and the sixth carried the score only as an occasional reminder, a circumstance which gave them all an exuberant freedom of movement.

The ensembles ran off like clockwork — smooth, easy, neatly balanced, and nicely tailored and funny, melodramatic, pompous, burlesqued or simply beautiful as the occasion demanded.

Acting Accurate

The acting was confined to platforms above and behind the orchestra, modified, of course, because of limited circumstances, but apt and accurate enough to enlist the imagination of the audience which contributed much laughter at the antics, especially those of little Despina, a clever gamin.

"Cosi" is not usually taken seriously because it is such fluffy stuff, but it is one of the best examples of its style, and is pure, frivolous entertainment.

Off hand, it doesn't seem as if a better cast could be assembled — equally good, yes, and different, but not better. It was a good

Summer concerts lack preparation

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — The second weekend of Boston Symphony concerts at Tanglewood, though livelier and on a higher plane generally than the first, nevertheless drew attention to the problems that a shortage of rehearsal time causes here.

With three different programs to be prepared for each weekend, available rehearsal time per program amounts to something like half of what is considered adequate, or at least normal, during the Winter season.

That used to work reasonably well as long as the winter and summer conductors were the same, so that much of what was played at Tanglewood was repeated from the Boston season, requiring only a brushup.

Now, with the winter and summer seasons under separate regimes, the proportion of such carryovers from Boston to Tanglewood is reduced from a generous half to something a little less than one-fifth.

Moreover, the problem is aggravated by something in itself good, namely Seiji Ozawa's determination to make the Tanglewood programs interesting, in contrast to the pedestrian or, if you like, commercial ones played by the Philadelphia Orchestra at Saratoga or the Cleveland at Blossom.

It means that at Tanglewood we get music which would be considered remarkable even in the winter season, things like Ligeti's "Atmosphere" the first weekend, Schoenberg's Piano Concerto is the one just past, and the works of Krenek, Lutolawski, Scriabin, and other that are on the schedule for later on.

From their RCA recording, we know that Peter Serkin and Seiji Ozawa can play the Schoenberg Concerto excellently. With respect to tempi, which were quicker, their performance Sunday afternoon was even better than their recorded one, and there were many moments at which it was more fluid, free, and lively.

In spite of those valuable qualities, and for all of Ozawa's impressive efficiency in rehearsal, there was no getting away from the fact that the richly inventive, highly detailed piece, had had less ensemble preparation than it needed, that too often the strands of the texture were not sorted out enough for clarity.

The Schoenberg was preceded by five movements from Prokofiev's score for the ballet "Romeo and Juliet." It was followed by William Russo's stunningly sill ythree pieces for blues band and symphony orchestra, in which the Boston Symphony was joined by Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band, a skillful group.

Returning to the rehearsal problem, it struck me that the certain sense of cautiousness rather reduced the impact of Michael Tilson Thomases' performance Friday evening of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

Thomas, who had worked on the score with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, who has recorded the composer's forehand version and played it at Tanglewood, but who had never conducted it with a professional orchestra, had asked to do it this summer at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony.

No, he was told, it had been given to Rafael Fruehbeck de Burgos. What about the 1970-71 season in Boston then? No, it was on one of William Steinberg's programs.

But the gods in charge of bring germs and viruses to conductors were once again on Michael Thomas's side. Fruehbeck de Burgos got hit with something and Thomas, the Boston Symphony's associate conductor and rescue wagon, got his "rite" after all.

Obviously he knows the piece, and he knows how to conduct it. He was determined not to goof in a piece that orchestras relish as a conductor trap, and he did not (some of the wind and percussion players did not do quite as well), but the performance never cut loose as it should have.

Friday's concert began with a raucus charge through Glinka's "Ruslam and Ludmila" overture.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 13 1970

New England Newsclip

Music

The Way Mozart Must Be Done . . .

By RICHARD VINCENT

"Cosi Fan Tutte". Literally this is translated as "Thus They All Do." In Italian, however, "Tutte" with the final "e" is feminine exclusively. If it were "Tutti" with a final "I" it would be masculine. So now what do we have?

"Thus All the Women Do"? Too clumsy. "Girls Will be Girls"? Better, succinct and apothegematic at least. "All Women are Like That"? Worse again. Fearless and insensitive as always, I offer, "All Women Are Alike". This is more appealing to me because I believe it is essentially true. (never look back, somebody might be gaining on you — Satchel Paige).

This conceit in pendantry is simply a device to open a consideration of this Mozart opera which was performed a week ago in the shed at Tanglewood under the direction of Seiji Ozawa.

THIS WAS SURELY ONE of the finest performances that will be heard anywhere around here this summer and when one considers the great mountains and peaceful valleys of music available to us this is a considerable point of view.

There were many reasons for this outstanding performance, but the one premier factor was the tremendous spirit and drive that permeated the music and which never flagged.

Earlier in the week Ozawa had conducted a proper but lackluster reading of the Mozart's Symphony No. 36. Looking ahead to "Cosi Fan Tutte" then, one might be excused his apprehensions. These reservations were a waste of precious psychic energy because, as last week's program proved, it was a temporary aberration.

This was a labor of love by all concerned, the Boston Symphony, Ozawa, the soloists, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, and Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart.

Mozart vocal ensembles are certainly among the music world's greatest. They are graceful, dignified, humorous and musically impeccable. But all of this must come out, must be realized by the performers, and in these essential respects there is no way to fault the performance.

THE APPROACH WAS ORATORIO style, but this is not a sufficient description. The singers were dressed in evening clothes and stood high above and behind the orchestra. It was staged to the extent that entrances and exits were made and the actors interacted. When the two male lovers enter disguised as Albanians (not from Albany, the other place) they achieved the disguise by the simple device of wearing exotic Oriental headdresses. There was no scenery and there were no props on stage and believe me it worked. These minimal suggestions as to setting were just fine and everyone believed them. With Mozart anything simple and subtle in tandem is entirely in order and so they proved.

The Summer Circuit

TANGLEWOOD/BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL—At Lenox, Mass. The old order may pass. But Mozart, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the Tanglewood Festival abide—all safely and joyously in the hands of a most today young conductor named Seiji Ozawa. For his first major special program as Artistic Director of this dowager queen mother of American music festivals, Mr. Ozawa provided a lovely, sparkling reading of Mozart's comic opera "Cosi Fan Tutte." The orchestra was in its usual fine form, except for a horn player who kept succumbing to the humidity. On the vocal side, it was ladies' night all the way. Phyllis Curtin, despite being miscast, and Rosalind Elias, most perfectly cast, were splendid as the straying sisters. And Teresa Stratas as their scheming maid stole every scene she was in; she is surely opera's soubrette supreme. The men, unfortunately, weren't really worth all the fussing. George Shirley and Tom Krause made vocally adequate, but stolid, lovers; and Ezio Flagello might have been more effective if he'd prepared better and not had to keep his head buried in a score. One thing Mr. Ozawa should change right away is the Tanglewood tradition of incredibly coy attempts to "stage" concert opera performances. All the gestures and flouncings that go on could most kindly be called "summer camp."

—STANLEY NEWMAN

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000

JUL 25 1970

Ozawa Conducts Prokofiev's 'Romeo'

By JOHN F. KYES

Gazette Music Critic

LENOX — Youth scored the biggest successes of this past week at Tanglewood, as the 33rd Berkshire Festival offered its second group of programs.

Unfavorable weather restricted attendance at the Friday concert of Spanish and Russian music, conducted by Rafael Frubbeck de Burgos, and the Saturday concert version of Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte," conducted by Seiji Ozawa.

Gazette Review

Fine weather yesterday drew 7,019 to another Ozawa concert, including a suite from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet," Peter Serkin in the Schoenberg Piano Concerto, and Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band cooperating gloriously with the full Boston ensemble in Russo's "Three Pieces for Blues Band and Symphony Orchestra."

The Schoenberg work received its first Tanglewood performance yesterday, and the Russo pieces their first performance by the Boston Symphony.

Ozawa Conducts

Ozawa was in his element, as he conducted three different types of 20th century music. He drove the brilliant Boston percussion and brasses to exciting heights of sound in four movements from the second "Romeo and Juliet" suite and one from the first.

Sonorities and crisp attacks and releases were the rule in three sections, "The Montagues and the Capulets," "Romeo at Juliet's Tomb" and "The Death of Tybalt." Gaiety pervaded the "Dance of the Five Couples" and daintiness the "Dance of the Young Girls with the lilies."

Schoenberg

After this forthright and appealing music, Schoenberg's Piano Concerto came as an excercise in modern calisthenics. It made exacting demands on the conductor, skilled soloist and orchestra, but conveyed little to the average listener.

Serkin's appearance, in front of the white-jacketed orchestra, was unique. He had his long hair pulled back to the nape of his neck with a large barrette. He was clad, nearly down to the knees of his dark trousers, in a loose white garment, long-sleeved but otherwise rather shapeless, and somewhat suggesting a familiar item of hospital garb.

The net result was extremely unflattering to the tall and earnest young artist.

His work was full of vim and alertness, and Ozawa gave him close cooperation.

'Blues' Is Hit

The real hit of the afternoon came in the Russo "blues" music, where a valid background was provided by the symphony orchestra and the band's drummer and bass guitarist, Shelly Plotkin and Al Radford, while Siegel, on electric harmonica or electric piano, and Jim Schwall on electric guitar, improvised delightfully.

Everything from pizzicato to thunder came in the three pieces, with especially effective solos for the sliding wail of the harmonica. The orchestra sat with real respect while the four young players gave an encore of their own which had the shed and grounds jumping.

GAZETTE
WORCESTER, MASS.
(E) 94,901

JUL 13 1970 New England Newsclip

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 13 1970 New England Newsclip

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

TIMES UNION
Sunday, July 19, 1970

JOHNSON CITY, TENN.
PRESS CHRONICLE
D. 19,000 (EVENING)

JUL 9 1970

Summer concerts lack preparation

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — The second weekend of Boston Symphony concerts at Tanglewood, though livelier and on a higher plane generally than the first, nevertheless drew attention to the problems that a shortage of rehearsal time causes here.

With three different programs to be prepared for each weekend, available rehearsal time per program amounts to something like half of what is considered adequate, or at least normal, during the Winter season.

That used to work reasonably well as long as the winter and summer conductors were the same, so that much of what was played at Tanglewood was repeated from the Boston season, requiring only a brushup.

Now, with the winter and summer seasons under separate regimes, the proportion of such carryovers from Boston to Tanglewood is reduced from a generous half to something a little less than one-fifth.

Moreover, the problem is aggravated by something in itself good, namely Seiji Ozawa's determination to make the Tanglewood programs interesting, in contrast to the pedestrian or, if you like, commercial ones played by the Philadelphia Orchestra at Saratoga or the Cleveland at Blossom.

It means that at Tanglewood we get music which would be considered remarkable even in the winter season, things like Ligeti's "Atmosphere" the first weekend, Schoenberg's Piano Concerto is the one just past, and the works of Krenek, Lutolawski, Scriabin, and other that are on the schedule for later on.

From their RCA recording, we know that Peter Serkin and Seiji Ozawa can play the Schoenberg Concerto excellently. With respect to tempi, which were quicker, their performance Sunday afternoon was even better than their recorded one, and there were many moments at which it was more fluid, free, and lively.

In spite of those valuable qualities, and for all of Ozawa's impressive efficiency in rehearsal, there was no getting away from the fact that the richly inventive, highly detailed piece, had had less ensemble preparation than it needed, that too often the strands of the texture were not sorted out enough for clarity.

The Schoenberg was preceded by five movements from Prokofiev's score for the ballet "Romeo and Juliet." It was followed by William Russo's stunningly sill ythree pieces for blues band and symphony orchestra, in which the Boston Symphony was joined by Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band, a skillful group.

Returning to the rehearsal problem, it struck me that the certain sense of cautiousness rather reduced the impact of Michael Tilson Thomases' performance Friday evening of Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring."

Thomas, who had worked on the score with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, who has recorded the composer's forehand version and played it at Tanglewood, but who had never conducted it with a professional orchestra, had asked to do it this summer at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony.

No, he was told, it had been given to Rafael Fruehbeck de Burgos. What about the 1970-71 season in Boston then? No, it was on one of William Steinberg's programs.

But the gods in charge of bring germs and viruses to conductors were once again on Michael Thomas's side. Fruebeck de Burgos got hit with something and Thomas, the Boston Symphony's associate conductor and rescue wagon, got his "rite" after all.

Obviously he knows the piece, and he knows how to conduct it. He was determined not to goof in a piece that orchestras relish as a conductor trap, and he did not (some of the wind and percussion players did not do quite as well), but the performance never cut loose as it should have.

Friday's concert began with a raucus charge through Glinka's "Ruslam and Ludmila" overture.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 13 1970 New England Newsclip

Music

The Way Mozart Must Be Done . . .

By RICHARD VINCENT

"Cosi Fan Tutte". Literally this is translated as "Thus They All Do." In Italian, however, "Tutte" with the final "e" is feminine exclusively. If it were "Tutti" with a final "i" it would be masculine. So now what do we have?

"Thus All the Women Do"? Too clumsy. "Girls Will be Girls"? Better, succinct and apothegematic at least. "All Women are Like That"? Worse again. Fearless and insensitive as always, I offer, "All Women Are Alike". This is more appealing to me because I believe it is essentially true. (never look back, somebody might be gaining on you — Satchel Paige).

This conceit in pendantry is simply a device to open a consideration of this Mozart opera which was performed a week ago in the shed at Tanglewood under the direction of Seiji Ozawa.

THIS WAS SURELY ONE of the finest performances that will be heard anywhere around here this summer and when one considers the great mountains and peaceful valleys of music available to us this is a considerable point of view.

There were many reasons for this outstanding performance, but the one premier factor was the tremendous spirit and drive that permeated the music and which never flagged.

Earlier in the week Ozawa had conducted a proper but lackluster reading of the Mozart's Symphony No. 36. Looking ahead to "Cosi Fan Tutte" then, one might be excused his apprehensions. These reservations were a waste of precious psychic energy because, as last week's program proved, it was a temporary aberration.

This was a labor of love by all concerned, the Boston Symphony, Ozawa, the soloists, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, and Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart.

Mozart vocal ensembles are certainly among the music world's greatest. They are graceful, dignified, humorous and musically impeccable. But all of this must come out, must be realized by the performers, and in these essential respects there is no way to fault the performance.

THE APPROACH WAS ORATORIO style, but this is not a sufficient description. The singers were dressed in evening clothes and stood high above and behind the orchestra. It was staged to the extent that entrances and exits were made and the actors interacted. When the two male lovers enter disguised as Albanians (not from Albany, the other place) they achieved the disguise by the simple device of wearing exotic Oriental headdresses. There was no scenery and there were no props on stage and believe me it worked. These minimal suggestions as to setting were just fine and everyone believed them. With Mozart anything simple and subtle in tandem is entirely in order and so they proved.

Capable Casting In Mozart Opera

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — One of the great virtues of opera is its ability to be enjoyed without knowing or caring about the story.

Abstract Enjoyment

This is especially true of concert versions such as that presented at Tanglewood Saturday night. The music can be enjoyed abstractly, and if the listener knows the details of the story, so much the better.

The opera at Tanglewood Saturday was Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte," a foolish singspiel with a comic-strip plot about female inconstancy and male trickery enhanced by music of sublime wit.

There are six characters: two couples who get mixed up, a coniving friend and a sly maid. They were portrayed with professional polish as follows: Fiordiligi by Phyllis Curtin, Dorabella by Rosalind Elias, Guglielmo by Tom Krause, Ferrando by George Shirley, Despina by Teresa Stratas and Don Alfonso by Ezio Flagello.

Orchestra Reduced

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was reduced to half strength as befits Mozart's music, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus numbered 22. Conductor was Seiji Ozawa. The first act ran 90 minutes, the second 75, plus interruptilons for applause.

There are always a great many things to be said about an opera performance, many points to check, and it is easy to run on too far; so let us tick off a few observations without details.

It took the orchestra a while to warm to its work; there were signs of an imprecision with Mozart's crystaline craftsmanship that were not evident in Boston's orchestra a year ago.

Ozawa's best work is not with Mozart.

The opening scene with Krause, Shirley and Flagello got the opera off to a rousing, robust start. It was full of manly high spirits and braggadocio.

Duets Set High Standard

The soprano duet by Curtin and Elias in the second scene also set a high standard for its followers.

The cast members are all highly experienced, first-class opera stars well schooled in the niceties of ensemble singing, which is the key to the success of any Cosi performance.

The opera is packed with ensembles; the solo work is almost entirely confined to passages sandwiched by duets, trios, quartets, quintets and sextets.

Five of the six soloists sang, and acted, from memory and the sixth carried the score only as an occasional reminder, a circumstance which gave them all an exuberant freedom of movement.

The ensembles ran off like clockwork — smooth, easy, neatly balanced, and nicely tailored and funny, melodramatic, pompous, burlesqued or simply beautiful as the occasion demanded.

Acting Accurate

The acting was confined to platforms above and behind the orchestra, modified, of course, because of limited circumstances, but apt and accurate enough to enlist the imagination of the audience which contributed much laughter at the antics, especially those of little Despina, a clever gamin.

"Cosi" is not usually taken seriously because it is such fluffy stuff, but it is one of the best examples of its style, and is pure, frivolous entertainment.

Off hand, it doesn't seem as if a better cast could be assembled — equally good, yes, and different, but not better. It was a good

The Summer Circuit

TANGLEWOOD/BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL—At Lenox, Mass. The old order may pass. But Mozart, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the Tanglewood Festival abide—all safely and joyously in the hands of a most today young conductor named Seiji Ozawa. For his first major special program as Artistic Director of this dowager queen mother of American music festivals, Mr. Ozawa provided a lovely, sparkling reading of Mozart's comic opera "Cosi Fan Tutte." The orchestra was in its usual fine form, except for a horn player who kept succumbing to the humidity. On the vocal side, it was ladies' night all the way. Phyllis Curtin, despite being miscast, and Rosalind Elias, most perfectly cast, were splendid as the straying sisters. And Teresa Stratas as their scheming maid stole every scene she was in; she is surely opera's soubrette supreme. The men, unfortunately, weren't really worth all the fussing. George Shirley and Tom Krause made vocally adequate, but stolid, lovers; and Ezio Flagello might have been more effective if he'd prepared better and not had to keep his head buried in a score. One thing Mr. Ozawa should change right away is the Tanglewood tradition of incredibly coy attempts to "stage" concert opera performances. All the gestures and flouncings that go on could most kindly be called "summer camp."

—STANLEY NEWMAN

CUE
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 231,000

JUL 25 1970

46

Music Review

Potpourri Weekend at Tanglewood

By JAY ROSENFELD

YESTERDAY afternoon's concert at Tanglewood was a potpourri from which no one in the over 7,000 audience went away hungry. Seiji Ozawa started with a suite from Prokofieff's ballet "Romeo and Juliet." Every one of the five exceprts he chose was gratifying, although he played "the Montagues and Capulets" much less pesante than Nureyev and Fonteyn dance it.

As a matter of record, this suite was played last year on July 20 and at that performance Erich Leinsdorf took a moment out to announce that Armstrong and Aldrin had just set foot on the moon.

The novelties of yesterday's program, two first performances, were the exciting parts of the afternoon. The young pianist Peter Serkin was soloist in the Schoenberg concerto, Opus 42, and Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band, a quartet, played three pieces for blues band and symphony orchestra, Opus 50, of William Russo.

* * *

Schoenberg is the most controversial composer of the age. He died 19 years ago at the age of 77, and his music refuses to be accepted or rejected. There is dispute whether he or Josef Hauer originated a system of atonal, or 12-tone music. It has many appellations.

Yesterday the young Serkin played with conviction and total immersion in the opaque score. Ozawa gave him excellent collaboration and the resultant production was moving. This type of fine performance does much to proselytize musical conservatives.

The afternoon ended with Halloween hoopla. The Happy Year Band played with abandon and release from all pain and infected the audience with its spontaneous ecstasy and copious imagination. In decibels, they rate high; in contagion, not much lower. They play harmonica, guitars, drums, electric piano (everything is hooked up for amplification) and make instrument extensions of their own arms and mouths. They improvise most of the time, rarely following a set course. It is ear-splitting, but extermely exciting.

Whether this type of talented but undisciplined and untrained performer belongs alongside the musicians of the Boston Symphony, all of whom have devoted years to their studies, is a moot question. Everybody enjoyed the band. The insistence of the audience pressing forward to the platform was rewarded by an encore, a very, very, rare occurence at Tanglewood.

* * *

THE CONCERT PERFORMANCE of Mozart's opera "Cosi fan tutte" Saturday night was the big moment of the Berkshire Festival's second weekend at Tanglewood. Major credit should go to the conductor, Seiji Ozawa, who sensed the light, frivolous spirit and chose exactly the right ebullient tempos.

"Cosi" can not possibly be identified with any kind of Welt-Schmerz, but the early starts of Tanglewood have tended to endow everything with bursting emotion of one kind or another. It was exhilarating and high good fun to see Ozawa take command at every instant without any false imputation of romantic pessimism. An aching void would have been painful.

Whitestone

The Happy Year Band played a happy concert for the Sunday afternoon audience.

Ozawa was aided by a sextet of vocalists which never descended below thrilling performances. Fiordiligi and Dorabella, the fairly giddy sisters who are besieged by their suitors in or out of disguise, were sung with superb vocal opulence by soprano Phyllis Curtin and mezzo-soprano Rosalind Elias. The two suitors of matching salience were bass Tom Krause as Guglielmo and tenor George Shirley as Ferrando. Baritone Ezio Flagello was the tongue-in-cheek, cynical old hexer Don Alfonso, and soprano Teresa Stratas was the sisters' maid Despina, who executed her farcical escapades with absolutely devastating wit. She travestied her burlesque disguises with inimitable mimicry, even pretended a rhinolalla by nasalizing her delightful voice with bold amnesty.

* * *

MANY OF the solo arias and concerted pieces were showstoppers. It was not quite decided at the start whether it was proper and fitting to show appreciation in mid-performance, but audience spontaneity resolved that dilemma in short order. After Don Alfonso has made a wager with Ferrando and Guglielmo that their fiancees are no better than any others, the scene changes to a garden (there was no scenery, of course) where Fiordiligi and Dorabella rhapsodize over the charms of their suitors. This duet introduces the focused power of the ladies' voices as an ensuing quintet exposes the sonority of the voices of Ferrando and Guglielmo.

The soloists were placed on a platform behind and high above the reduced orchestra, and made their entrances and exits as the action required. The meager opportunities for a chorus were sung with sprightly vigor by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus prepared by John Oliver. The effective stage direction was by Andrew Raeburn, but Ozawa was the supremely competent but humble commander. He kept his instrumental forces always in discreet and considerate balance and desisted completely when the harpsichord accompanied the recitatives.

* * *

DUE TO THE illness of the announced guest conductor, Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, the associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas, was called in at the last moment. Thomas retained the Stravinsky "Le Sacre du Printemps" which Burgos had listed, but substituted his own choices to start. He did Glinka's overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla" and the Tchaikovsky First Symphony.

Thomas conducts with great security and immense vitality but, at this early point of his career, he overconducts. It isn't quite necessary to indicate every eighth note to musicians of the caliber of the Boston Symphony. He oscillates from violins to cellos like a pendulum. The young conductor attempts to inflate every phrase with throbbing emotion, not an undesirable factor, but the introduction, for instance, of the last movement of the Tchaikovsky hardly warrants all that effusion. In the homestretch of the Stravinsky, "The Chosen Victim," he gave all the throttle there was, utterly disregarding any meno forte admonitions and piling Pelion on Ossa.

* * *

RITE OF SPRING, first performed in 1913, has always had a rather special relationship with the Boston orchestra. It was Pierre Monteux who conducted the original performance in Paris when it was danced by the Diaghilev ballet, and it was still Monteux who conducted its first concert performance a year later. He became conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1920, and it was during his regime then that he introduced the "Sacre" to Boston. When the orchestra made its first European tour in 1952, Monteux again conducted the same work in the original Champs-Elysees Theatre, where he had played it 39 years before.

The excitement the first performance aroused is well-known. Monteux's wife sat in a box and, at the beginning of the concert, the hall manager came to her and in a flustered voice whispered, "Le vieux est en bas." (Le vieux was Saint-Saens.)

What to do? The hall was filled to the last inch. But one doesn't keep a 78-year-old maitre outside. Madame Monteux somehow found room for the venerated French composer in her box. As the Stravinsky piece started, he kept turning to her, "Vous aimez ca? Vous aimez ca?"

It is not difficult to imagine the reaction of such a man to the harmonically uncouth and barbaric, the rhythmically primitive and frenzied, and the stark Russian paganism which was unfolding on stage.

A performance of "Le Sacre" invariably excites a tremendous audience response, provided the orchestra and the conductor finish together. There was not much question of that factor Friday night.

In that original 1913 performance, the first oboe was Louis Speyer, later the highly respected English horn of the Boston orchestra. He is now retired and lives summers in Stockbridge.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 13 1970

New England Newsclip

Berkshire Festival Exciting And Lively

There were several exciting and lively surprises during the second weekend series of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Friday evening had scheduled the famed Spanish conductor, Rafael Fruhbeck DeBurgos, but he unfortunately came down with the flu and, on four days' notice, the gifted young Boston Symphony's associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas took over the podium with a change of program for the first half.

He substituted Glinka's Overture to the Opera Russland and Ludmila, and Tchaikovsky's First Symphony, a little-known and seldom heard work of this popular romanticist composer. Conductor Thomas and the orchestra performed this work with considerable flair and dramatic emphasis, quite surprising since Thomas has been associated with avant garde music, a far cry from Tchaikovsky.

He conducted with considerable control and demonstrated that he is quite capable of taking over in an emergency. He is scheduled to conduct the Boston Symphony Sunday and Aug. 8, during the Festival season. The last half of the program was devoted to a most exciting and popular work, Stravinsky's Rites of Spring, and the audience of 4,277 gave the conductor and the orchestra a most enthusiastic response.

Friday night's Prelude Concert presented the famous Choir of St. John's College of Cambridge, England, in a superb and exquisite a capalle performance of nine church work pieces from the 16th and 17th Century, three delightful motets by Bruckner of the 19th Century and a 20th Century piece by Walton.

The choir consists of 16 boy and young adult music students, directed by George Guest, who has a notable career as a talented organist and was the first director of the Berkshire Boy Choir. The St. John's Choir gives many recitals in the main centers of Europe, on radio and has recorded some 25 albums.

Saturday evening was devoted to the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Mozart's spirited Comic Op-

Sunday afternoon's concert held more surprises for the audience of 7,019, since the concert brought not only Peter Serkin as piano soloist in Schoenberg's Piano Concerto op.42, a first performance at the Festival, but also Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Symphony Orchestra, op.50, with Corky Siegel's Happy Year Round Band joining the orchestra.

Two firsts at the festival that attempted to bring to Tanglewood audiences truly contemporary music of our time. The concert began with a sensitive and beautiful reading of Prokofiev's Suite from Romeo and Juliet op.64, a most descriptive and dramatic work, followed by Peter Serkin's brilliant rendition of the technically difficult and fascinating atonal Piano Concerto by Schoenberg. The young Serkin is a most gifted and sensitive musician.

The concert finale introduced Russo's 3 Pieces for Blues Band, a piece that was commissioned by the Illinois Arts Council for the Chicago Symphony Orchestra's 1968 summer season at Ravinia. It is dedicated to Jan Swan, the poet, and consists of electric piano (alternating with harmonica), electric guitar, base guitar and drums. Some of the orchestral structure is most complex and the work also employs some exciting improvisational segments that make this work a fascinating exploration and blending of the blues idiom and tempo with the background of the traditional orchestral passages.

The composer has freed the blues band players so that they are doing their own thing and in this way improvise and communicate to the audience free of hackneyed impediments. This work should be heard more than once in order to appreciate its sheer brilliance and integration of a blues band and an orchestra.

It was given a thunderous ovation, and in response to the enthusiasm, the Blues Happy Year Round Band gave an encore sans orchestra, in the familiar rock idiom of loud music and song. It was a thrilling surprise for the regular Boston Symphony audience. Credit must be given to the conductor, Ozawa, in bringing such innovative performances of contemporary works, which are technically difficult yet most interesting. He is bringing a new awareness and musical spirit to the festival.

Corky Siegel's Blues Band communicated especially to the large audience of young people who were in evidence everywhere at Tanglewood this beautiful Sunday afternoon.

SSM

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,040 (S) 56,127

JUL 17 1970

New England Newsclip

Siegel Sensation Eclipses Serkin At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Peter Serkin, the son of a famous father, which is partly why he caused a sensation when he walked out on the stage at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon.

It wasn't his music that caused the stir in the audience: it was his appearance. The musical sensation of the afternoon was caused after intermission when Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play 'Three Pieces for Blues Band and a Symphony Orchestra,' Opus 50, by William Russo.

Sensational

Siegel's little group was sensational. It played a powerful, electrically amplified, blues-based wailing jazz improvization in front of a pattern of fully symphonic orchestrations.

The composer gave the big orchestra little to do, and there were times when those 105 musicians sounded a bit ineffectual under the over-amplified harmonica and guitars, but the structure of the pieces worked well.

The jazz quartet was given ample opportunity by the composer to invent what it could from the harmonic germs in the orchestrations, and the dramatic variety of rock-jazz it invented was highly effective.

It drew shouts of approval from the under-30 segment of the audience and prolonged applause from the smiling parents.

The enthusiasm generated by Siegel's little group pushed the memory of Serkin into the background.

Pony Tail

He appeared with his shoulder-length hair pinned back in a pony tail with a silver clip and wearing moccasins and a long, loose, rumpled, white, collarless tunic that looked like a near-eastern nightshirt.

He played the solo part for Arnold Schoenberg's "Piano Concerto, Opus 42," composed using the 12-tone method in 1942. It is a dense, demanding, forbidding work and Serkins entered its dark interior with high intensity.

He is as emotional and complete in his commitment to his work as his father, the internationally famous pianist, Rudolf Serkin, and he showed his involvement effectively Sunday.

But the music is not easy for casual concertgoers on a sweet, sunny, Sunday afternoon.

Earlier, Seiji Ozawa led the Boston Orchestra through five excerpts from two of the suites Prokofiev drew from the ballet he composed based on Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet."

Entertaining

It is colorful and entertaining music, more entertaining and less academic than the Schoenberg concerto, but less entertaining than the somewhat experimental attempt by Russo and Siegel to combine jazz and symphonic sounds.

There have been hints during the last two weekends (some showed up during the Prokofiev piece) that the Boston orchestra is relaxing and is losing the sparkling precision of ensemble unity it had with Erich Leinsdorf.

Sunday morning the sun was warm and pleasant for the 10 a.m. chamber music program presented by the Berkshire Music Center in the theater-concert hall.

There was a Mozart serenade (K-375) played by oboes, clarinets, bassoons and horns in pairs, a three-movement piece for brass quintet written in 1961 by Gunther Schuller (codirector of the festival) and Beethoven's Trio for Piano, Violin and Cello, Opus 1, No. 3.

All were nicely presented, the Beethoven taking the edge of preference for its slight element of freedom; the others, although neat enough, carried an overlay of tension probably not intended by the composers.

17,958 Attend

Weekend gate counts were 4277 Friday night, 2040 at the open rehearsal Saturday morning, 4622 Saturday night and 7019 Sunday afternoon; total, 17,958.

Next weekend's programs will include Yuji Takahashi as soloist for Mozart's K-488 Piano Concerto Friday night, Lili Kraus as soloist for Mozart's K-466 Piano Concerto Saturday night, both with Ozawa as conductor, and a program of Haydn, Bach, Krenek and Stravinsky conducted Sunday afternoon by Michael Tilson Thomas.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 13 1970

New England Newsclip

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245.100

AUG 1970

Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band performed Bill Russo's "Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, July 12. Seiji Ozawa conducted this Tanglewood (Massachusetts) presentation. . . . Clarinetist Pete Fountain and trumpeter Jonah Jones joined tenor saxophonist Boots Randolph on his recent TV special, "The Nashville Sound of Boots Randolph." The show was produced and shown in Nashville (WLAC-TV).

Music Review

Potpourri Weekend at Tanglewood

By JAY ROSENFELD

YESTERDAY afternoon's concert at Tanglewood was a potpourri from which no one in the over 7,000 audience went away hungry. Seiji Ozawa started with a suite from Prokofieff's ballet "Romeo and Juliet." Every one of the five exceprts he chose was gratifying, although he played "the Montagues and Capulets" much less pesante than Nureyev and Fonteyn dance it.

As a matter of record, this suite was played last year on July 20 and at that performance Erich Leinsdorf took a moment out to announce that Armstrong and Aldrin had just set foot on the moon.

The novelties of yesterday's program, two first performances, were the exciting parts of the afternoon. The young pianist Peter Serkin was soloist in the Schoenberg concerto, Opus 42, and Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band, a quartet, played three pieces for blues band and symphony orchestra, Opus 50, of William Russo.

* * *

Schoenberg is the most controversial composer of the age. He died 19 years ago at the age of 77, and his music refuses to be accepted or rejected. There is dispute whether he or Josef Hauer originated a system of atonal, or 12-tone music. It has many appellations.

Yesterday the young Serkin played with conviction and total immersion in the opaque score. Ozawa gave him excellent collaboration and the resultant production was moving. This type of fine performance does much to proselytize musical conservatives.

The afternoon ended with Halloween hoopla. The Happy Year Band played with abandon and release from all pain and infected the audience with its spontaneous ecstasy and copious imagination. In decibels, they rate high; in contagion, not much lower. They play harmonica, guitars, drums, electric piano (everything is hooked up for amplification) and make instrument extensions of their own arms and mouths. They improvise most of the time, rarely following a set course. It is ear-splitting, but extermely exciting.

Whether this type of talented but undisciplined and untrained performer belongs alongside the musicians of the Boston Symphony, all of whom have devoted years to their studies, is a moot question. Everybody enjoyed the band. The insistence of the audience pressing forward to the platform was rewarded by an encore, a very, very, rare occurence at Tanglewood.

* * *

THE CONCERT PERFORMANCE of Mozart's opera "Cosi fan tutte" Saturday night was the big moment of the Berkshire Festival's second weekend at Tanglewood. Major credit should go to the conductor, Seiji Ozawa, who sensed the light, frivolous spirit and chose exactly the right ebullient tempos.

"Cosi" can not possibly be identified with any kind of Welt-Schmerz, but the early starts of Tanglewood have tended to endow everything with bursting emotion of one kind or another. It was exhilarating and high good fun to see Ozawa take command at every instant without any false imputation of romantic pessimism. An aching void would have been painful.

Whitestone

The Happy Year Band played a happy concert for the Sunday afternoon audience.

Ozawa was aided by a sextet of vocalists which never descended below thrilling performances. Fiordiligi and Dorabella, the fairly giddy sisters who are besieged by their suitors in or out of disguise, were sung with superb vocal opulence by soprano Phyllis Curtin and mezzo-soprano Rosalind Elias. The two suitors of matching salience were bass Tom Krause as Guglielmo and tenor George Shirley as Ferrando. Baritone Ezio Flagello was the tongue-in-cheek, cynical old hexer Don Alfonso, and soprano Teresa Stratas was the sisters' maid Despina, who executed her farcical escapades with absolutely devastating wit. She travestied her burlesque disguises with inimitable mimicry, even pretended a rhinolalla by nasalizing her delightful voice with bold amnesty.

* * *

MANY OF the solo arias and concerted pieces were showstoppers. It was not quite decided at the start whether it was proper and fitting to show appreciation in mid-performance, but audience spontaneity resolved that dilemma in short order. After Don Alfonso has made a wager with Ferrando and Guglielmo that their fiancees are no better than any others, the scene changes to a garden (there was no scenery, of course) where Fiordiligi and Dorabella rhapsodize over the charms of their suitors. This duet introduces the focused power of the ladies' voices as an ensuing quintet exposes the sonority of the voices of Ferrando and Guglielmo.

The soloists were placed on a platform behind and high above the reduced orchestra, and made their entrances and exits as the action required. The meager opportunities for a chorus were sung with sprightly vigor by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus prepared by John Oliver. The effective stage direction was by Andrew Raeburn, but Ozawa was the supremely competent but humble commander. He kept his instrumental forces always in discreet and considerate balance and desisted completely when the harpsichord accompanied the recitatives.

* * *

DUE TO THE illness of the announced guest conductor, Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, the associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, Michael Tilson Thomas, was called in at the last moment. Thomas retained the Stravinsky "Le Sacre du Printemps" which Burgos had listed, but substituted his own choices to start. He did Glinka's overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla" and the Tchaikovsky First Symphony.

Thomas conducts with great security and immense vitality but, at this early point of his career, he overconducts. It isn't quite necessary to indicate every eighth note to musicians of the caliber of the Boston Symphony. He oscillates from violins to cellos like a pendulum. The young conductor attempts to inflate every phrase with throbbing emotion, not an undesirable factor, but the introduction, for instance, of the last movement of the Tchaikovsky hardly warrants all that effusion. In the homestretch of the Stravinsky, "The Chosen Victim," he gave all the throttle there was, utterly disregarding any meno forte admonitions and piling Pelion on Ossa.

* * *

RITE OF SPRING, first performed in 1913, has always had a rather special relationship with the Boston orchestra. It was Pierre Monteux who conducted the original performance in Paris when it was danced by the Diaghilev ballet, and it was still Monteux who conducted its first concert performance a year later. He became conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1920, and it was during his regime then that he introduced the "Sacre" to Boston. When the orchestra made its first European tour in 1952, Monteux again conducted the same work in the original Champs-Elysees Theatre, where he had played it 39 years before.

The excitement the first performance aroused is well-known. Monteux's wife sat in a box and, at the beginning of the concert, the hall manager came to her and in a flustered voice whispered, "Le vieux est en bas." (Le vieux was Saint-Saens.)

What to do? The hall was filled to the last inch. But one doesn't keep a 78-year-old maitre outside. Madame Monteux somehow found room for the venerated French composer in her box. As the Stravinsky piece started, he kept turning to her, "Vous aimez ca? Vous aimez ca?"

It is not difficult to imagine the reaction of such a man to the harmonically uncouth and barbaric, the rhythmically primitive and frenzied, and the stark Russian paganism which was unfolding on stage.

A performance of "Le Sacre" invariably excites a tremendous audience response, provided the orchestra and the conductor finish together. There was not much question of that factor Friday night.

In that original 1913 performance, the first oboe was Louis Speyer, later the highly respected English horn of the Boston orchestra. He is now retired and lives summers in Stockbridge.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 13 1970

New England Newsclip

Berkshire Festival Exciting And Lively

There were several exciting and lively surprises during the second weekend series of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Friday evening had scheduled the famed Spanish conductor, Rafael Fruhbeck DeBurgos, but he unfortunately came down with the flu and, on four days' notice, the gifted young Boston Symphony's associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas took over the podium with a change of program for the first half.

He substituted Glinka's Overture to the Opera Russland and Ludmila, and Tchaikovsky's First Symphony, a little-known and seldom heard work of this popular romanticist composer. Conductor Thomas and the orchestra performed this work with considerable flair and dramatic emphasis, quite surprising since Thomas has been associated with avant garde music, a far cry from Tchaikovsky.

He conducted with considerable control and demonstrated that he is quite capable of taking over in an emergency. He is scheduled to conduct the Boston Symphony Sunday and Aug. 8, during the Festival season. The last half of the program was devoted to a most exciting and popular work, Stravinsky's Rites of Spring, and the audience of 4,277 gave the conductor and the orchestra a most enthusiastic response.

Friday night's Prelude Concert presented the famous Choir of St. John's College of Cambridge, England, in a superb and exquisite a capalle performance of nine church work pieces from the 16th and 17th Century, three delightful motets by Bruckner of the 19th Century and a 20th Century piece by Walton.

The choir consists of 16 boy and young adult music students, directed by George Guest, who has a notable career as a talented organist and was the first director of the Berkshire Boy Choir. The St. John's Choir gives many recitals in the main centers of Europe, on radio and has recorded some 25 albums.

Saturday evening was devoted to the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Mozart's spirited Comic Op-

Sunday afternoon's concert held more surprises for the audience of 7,019, since the concert brought not only Peter Serkin as piano soloist in Schoenberg's Piano Concerto op.42, a first performance at the Festival, but also Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Symphony Orchestra, op.50, with Corky Siegel's Happy Year Round Band joining the orchestra.

Two firsts at the festival that attempted to bring to Tanglewood audiences truly contemporary music of our time. The concert began with a sensitive and beautiful reading of Prokofiev's Suite from Romeo and Juliet op.64, a most descriptive and dramatic work, followed by Peter Serkin's brilliant rendition of the technically difficult and fascinating atonal Piano Concerto by Schoenberg. The young Serkin is a most gifted and sensitive musician.

The concert finale introduced Russo's 3 Pieces for Blues Band, a piece that was commissioned by the Illinois Arts Council for the Chicago Symphony Orchestra's 1968 summer season at Ravinia. It is dedicated to Jan Swan, the poet, and consists of electric piano (alternating with harmonica), electric guitar, base guitar and drums. Some of the orchestral structure is most complex and the work also employs some exciting improvisational segments that make this work a fascinating exploration and blending of the blues idiom and tempo with the background of the traditional orchestral passages.

The composer has freed the blues band players so that they are doing their own thing and in this way improvise and communicate to the audience free of hackneyed impediments. This work should be heard more than once in order to appreciate its sheer brilliance and integration of a blues band and an orchestra.

It was given a thunderous ovation, and in response to the enthusiasm, the Blues Happy Year Round Band gave an encore sans orchestra, in the familiar rock idiom of loud music and song. It was a thrilling surprise for the regular Boston Symphony audience. Credit must be given to the conductor, Ozawa, in bringing such innovative performances of contemporary works, which are technically difficult yet most interesting. He is bringing a new awareness and musical spirit to the festival.

Corky Siegel's Blues Band communicated especially to the large audience of young people who were in evidence everywhere at Tanglewood this beautiful Sunday afternoon.

SSM

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,040 (S) 56,127

JUL 17 1970

New England Newsclip

Siegel Sensation Eclipses Serkin At Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Peter Serkin, the son of a famous father, which is partly why he caused a sensation when he walked out on the stage at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon.

It wasn't his music that caused the stir in the audience: it was his appearance. The musical sensation of the afternoon was caused after intermission when Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play 'Three Pieces for Blues Band and a Symphony Orchestra,' Opus 50, by William Russo.

Sensational

Siegel's little group was sensational. It played a powerful, electrically amplified, blues-based wailing jazz improvization in front of a pattern of fully symphonic orchestrations.

The composer gave the big orchestra little to do, and there were times when those 105 musicians sounded a bit ineffectual under the over-amplified harmonica and guitars, but the structure of the pieces worked well.

The jazz quartet was given ample opportunity by the composer to invent what it could from the harmonic germs in the orchestrations, and the dramatic variety of rock-jazz it invented was highly effective.

It drew shouts of approval from the under-30 segment of the audience and prolonged applause from the smiling parents.

The enthusiasm generated by Siegel's little group pushed the memory of Serkin into the background.

Pony Tail

He appeared with his shoulder-length hair pinned back in a pony tail with a silver clip and wearing moccasins and a long, loose, rumpled, white, collarless tunic that looked like a near-eastern nightshirt.

He played the solo part for Arnold Schoenberg's "Piano Concerto, Opus 42," composed using the 12-tone method in 1942. It is a dense, demanding, forbidding work and Serkins entered its dark interior with high intensity.

He is as emotional and complete in his commitment to his work as his father, the internationally famous pianist, Rudolf Serkin, and he showed his involvement effectively Sunday.

But the music is not easy for casual concertgoers on a sweet, sunny, Sunday afternoon.

Earlier, Seiji Ozawa led the Boston Orchestra through five excerpts from two of the suites Prokofiev drew from the ballet he composed based on Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet."

Entertaining

It is colorful and entertaining music, more entertaining and less academic than the Schoenberg concerto, but less entertaining than the somewhat experimental attempt by Russo and Siegel to combine jazz and symphonic sounds.

There have been hints during the last two weekends (some showed up during the Prokofiev piece) that the Boston orchestra is relaxing and is losing the sparkling precision of ensemble unity it had with Erich Leinsdorf.

Sunday morning the sun was warm and pleasant for the 10 a.m. chamber music program presented by the Berkshire Music Center in the theater-concert hall.

There was a Mozart serenade (K-375) played by oboes, clarinets, bassoons and horns in pairs, a three-movement piece for brass quintet written in 1961 by Gunther Schuller (codirector of the festival) and Beethoven's Trio for Piano, Violin and Cello, Opus 1, No. 3.

All were nicely presented, the Beethoven taking the edge of preference for its slight element of freedom; the others, although neat enough, carried an overlay of tension probably not intended by the composers.

17,958 Attend

Weekend gate counts were 4277 Friday night, 2040 at the open rehearsal Saturday morning, 4622 Saturday night and 7019 Sunday afternoon; total, 17,958.

Next weekend's programs will include Yuji Takahashi as soloist for Mozart's K-488 Piano Concerto Friday night, Lili Kraus as soloist for Mozart's K-466 Piano Concerto Saturday night, both with Ozawa as conductor, and a program of Haydn, Bach, Krenek and Stravinsky conducted Sunday afternoon by Michael Tilson Thomas.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 13 1970

New England Newsclip

INTERNATIONAL MUSICIAN
NEWARK, N. J.
MONTHLY 245,100

AUG 1970

Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band performed Bill Russo's "Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra" with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, July 12. Seiji Ozawa conducted this Tanglewood (Massachusetts) presentation. . . . Clarinetist Pete Fountain and trumpeter Jonah Jones joined tenor saxophonist Boots Randolph on his recent TV special, "The Nashville Sound of Boots Randolph." The show was produced and shown in Nashville (WLAC-TV).

Lively Surprises Highlight Concert

785

The second weekend series of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., came off with several exciting and lively surprises. Friday evening had scheduled the famed Spanish conductor, Rafael Fruhbeck De Burgos, but he unfortunately came down with the flu and, on four days' notice, the gifted young Boston Symphony's associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas took over the podium with a change of program for the first half.

He substituted Glinka's Overture to the Opera Russland and Ludmila, and Tchaikovsky's First Symphony, a little-known and seldom heard work of this popular romanticist composer. Conductor Thomas and the orchestra performed this work with considerable flair and dramatic emphasis, quite surprising since Thomas has been associated with avant garde music, a far cry from Tchaikovsky.

He conducted with considerable control and demonstrated that he is quite capable of taking over in an emergency. He is scheduled to conduct the Boston Symphony Sunday and Aug. 8, during the Festival season. The last half of the program was devoted to a most exciting and popular work, Stravinsky's Rites of Spring, and the audience of 4,277 gave the conductor and the orchestra a most enthusiastic response.

Friday night's Prelude Concert presented the famous Choir of St. John's College of Cambridge, England, in a superb and exquisite a capalle performance of nine church work pieces from the 16th and 17th Century, three delightful motets by Bruckner of the 19th Century and a 20th Century piece by Walton.

The choir consists of 16 boy and young adult music students, directed by George Guest, who has a notable career as a talented organist and was the first director of the Berkshire Boy Choir. The St. John's Choir gives many recitals in the main centers of Europe, on radio and has recorded some 25 albums.

Saturday evening was devoted to the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Mozart's spirited Comic Opera "Cosi fan Tutte," with the Tanglewood Chorus directed by John Oliver, and several famed Metropolitan Opera Stars, including Phyllis Curtin (Fiordiligi), Rosalind Elias (Dorabella), Tom Krause (Guglielmo), George Shirley (Ferrando), Teresa Stratos (Despina), and Ezio Flagello (Don Alfonso).

The semi-staged concert performance was technically interesting because certain props, costumes and dramatic gestures were employed that emphasized the personality of the operatic characters, enhancing the presentation. Even those in the audience of 4,622 who were not particularly opera buffs were amused by the delightful and polished performances and lively acting, with the chief applause going to Miss Stratos, who proved herself quite a comic actress. Her performance was joy from beginning to end.

The duets between the baritone and tenor were also highlights of this performance. The two singers enjoyed considerable comic byplay as did the entire cast, displaying beautiful ensemble work throughout on the part of all six singers. Seiji Ozawa was most fortunate in the slection of his cast, especially for the recitatives by Miss Curtin and Miss Elias. All with the exception of Ezio Flagello (who sang from a musical score), appeared to be very familiar with their roles, but did seem a bit breathless at times and it was quite a feverished performance. Despite the inclement weather, the large audience gave the conductor and performers a standing ovation, calling the conductor and the singers back again and again for their well-deserved bows. Fortunately, the rain held off until the end of the performance.

Sunday afternoon's concert held more surprises for the audience of 7,019, since the concert brought not only Peter Serkin as piano soloist in Schoenberg's Piano Concerto op.42, a first performance at the Festival, but also Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Symphony Orchestra, op.50, with Corky Siegel's Happy Year Round Band joining the orchestra.

Two firsts at the festival that attempted to bring to Tanglewood audiences truly contemporary music of our time. The concert began with a sensitive and beautiful reading of Prokofiev's Suite from Romeo and Juliet op.64, a most descriptive and dramatic work, followed by Peter Serkin's brilliant rendition of the technically difficult and fascinating atonal Piano Concerto by Schoenberg. The young Serkin is a most gifted and sensitive musician.

The concert finale introduced Russo's 3 Pieces for Blues Band, a piece that was commissioned by the Illinois Arts Council for the Chicago Symphony Orchestra's 1968 summer season at Ravinia. It is dedicated to Jan Swan, the poet, and consists of electric piano (alternating with harmonica), electric guitar, base guitar and drums. Some of the orchestral structure is most complex and the work also employs some exciting improvisational segments that make this work a fascinating exploration and blending of the blues idiom and tempo with the background of the traditional orchestral passages.

The composer has freed the blues band players so that they are doing their own thing and in this way improvise and communicate to the audience free of hackneyed impediments. This work should be heard more than once in order to appreciate its sheer brilliance and integration of a blues band and an orchestra.

It was given a thunderous ovation, and in response to the enthusiasm, the Blues Happy Year Round Band gave an encore sans orchestra, in the familiar rock idiom of loud music and song. It was a thrilling surprise for the regular Boston Symphony audience. Credit must be given to the conductor, Ozawa, in bringing such innovative performances of contemporary works, which are technically difficult yet most interesting. He is bringing a new awareness and musical spirit to the festival.

Corky Siegel's Blues Band communicated especially to the large audience of young people who were in evidence everywhere at Tanglewood this beautiful Sunday afternoon.

SSM

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,934
JUL 15 1970

AMERICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(E) 42,315
JUL 15 1970
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony's Concert At Tanglewood 'Explosive'

By STEVEN A. COLE

When a Japanese, a Russian, an Austrian, and an American get together, something explosive must take place. Explosive is the best explanation for the Boston Symphony's concert Sunday at Tanglewood.

* * *

The young Japanese conductor Seiji Ozawa confidently led the Boston Symphony through four movements including the second suite of Prokoviev's "Romeo and Juliet," Schoenberg's Piano Concerto op. 42, and William Russo's "Three pieces for blues band and symphony orchestra op. 50.

As a ballet in four acts and nine tableaus, Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet" was first produced by the Bolshoi Theater in Moscow in 1935. There is indeed much controversy surrounding the work. First, the intelligensia argue that it blasphemous to present Shakespeare's tragedy on the ballet stage. But most emphatic of the complaints come from the effect of the composition.

Prokofiev is often criticized for describing a love story "as if it were an algebraic problem." The followers of such an argument are peeved at the lack of sensuousness and emotionalism. They feel that the "cold, cheerless, dreary music" is definitely not love music.

The work does lack what is commonly called melody. One should not expect to come away humming. This is exactly what Prokofiev wants. He is very interested in the creation of "new melody." In other words, a fundamental sort of simplicity that will represent melody through the design of tone and color.

* * *

This reviewer has seen the ballet performed in Sweden with the Royal Swedish Ballet and the effect is quite exciting.

I was quite able to imagine what was going on through Ozawa's interpretation. To portray, satirically, the proud, pompous entrance of the nobilities, Ozawa took "The Montagues and Capulets" (from the second suite) at an allegro pesante that sort of painted a marvelous picture of these men in their bright robes and dazzling jewelry as they enter court.

The most exciting of the four movements was "The Death of Tybalt." Both street duels are depicted in this section. Tybalt slays Mercutio, and Romeo, in revenge, slays Tybalt. Prokofiev assigns each character an instrument and the orchestration works around these instruments.

The effect is very fast (Ozawa's precipitato had a spinning effect) and bouyant. The drums are assigned the task of depicting Lady Capulet's discovery of the death of her nephew Tybalt. The profound staccato rythmic effect that Ozawa aims for allows the listener to imagine the proud lady losing all control, running down the court steps to throw herself upon her nephew and perform the dance of death and revenge.

Peter Serkin, 23-year-old son of Rudolf Serkin, is the pianist for the extremely difficult, but fascinating Schoenberg piano concerto. The reviewer got exactly what he expected: a very intelligent and "clean" interpretation of this work. Serkin and Ozawa have had lots of practice since they recorded the work together for RCA with the Chicago Symphony. One is at wits end trying to decide which of the two S's to discuss first.

As Louis Lane indicated in the program notes, Schoenberg is probably the first composer of world prominance whose music is more talked about than performed. In the same breath, one could discuss young Serkin whose appearance is more talked about than his performances.

Serkin appeared wearing his hair in a pony-tail. He was wearing wire-rimmed eleglasses and a white "Neru-type" shirt with black bell-bottoms and sandals. The high frequency of the humming in the audience with his appearance on the stage could have been used as the A for the concertmaster. One could be safe by saying that the two S's are indeed radical (no political connotations intended).

Schoenberg's work utilizes a method of composing called "twelve-tone." We are dealing here with what could be labelled revolutionary and evolutionary.

* * *

Twelve-tone music (N. B. Webster's) is music based on the 12 chromatic tones used in an arbitrary but fixed order without regard for traditional tonality. In connection with this methodology, we have music with some wild harmonies, rhythms, and new heights for the various instruments to reach.

For example, the muted brass, the incredibly extreme registers assigned to the woodwinds, and the striking passages of strings playing col legno with the wood of the bow. The pianist is definitely the intended star for the work. Serkin must tackle some very difficult passages.

The conceto is one large structure, sub-divided into four short movements. Serkin gets his "real" chance to shine in the third movement, when his cadenza leads directly into the fourth movement. The listener is confronted thoughout the work with new and unfamiliar sonorousness; especially in the first movement where Brahmsian-type effects reign. Serkin appears to have control at all times.

The work requires a certain sophistication and musicianship of which Serkin has enough to give away. Entering the Curtis Institute at 11, he has often proved himself to be one of the most talented artists in America.

Wiliam Russo's "Three Pieces for Blues Band and Symphony Orchestra" was a clever conclusion for an enjoyable afternoon. The work was just completed on May 24, 1968, and was commissioned by the Illinois Arts Council for the Chicago Symphony Orchestra's 1968 summer season at Ravinia. The work is one of style, excitement and "sass."

Russo uses the blues band in the basic blues dialect. Implicit in this idea of "basic blues dialect" is the idea of improvisation. The solo instruments do their thing of constructing a melodic line of their own choice, but guided by an underlying harmonic framework that the orchestra works at. The result is "funky sophistication."

Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band handles the "blues." Corky is coming out of Chicago's Roosevelt University where he studied music for five years. While he plays solo harmonica in the group (and this work), the other members of the group bring credentials from the Chicago production of "Hair" to accompany Dinah Washington.

The Boston Symphony was beautiful. They do a good job of playing second string. For Corky's band was definitely the highlight. The audience showed their firm approval by demanding an encore. This can speak for the effect that the work had upon the audience.

This weekend at Tanglewood will be exciting. As far as this reviewer is concerned the following shouldn't be missed: John Alexander, tenor, singing the "Serenade for tenor, horn and strings" of Benjamin Britten on Friday, at 9 p.m.; a Haydn symphony, a Mozart piano concerto, and the Ibert Divertissement (1930) will appear on the same program with Ozawa conducting. Saturday at 8:30 p.m., there will be the Mozart Piano Concerto in d-minor and the Serenade no. 10 in B-flat. Sunday is a must. Bethany Beardslee, soprano, will tackle the gorgeous, but difficult "Jauchzet Gott" from J. S. Bach's Cantata No. 51. The young genius Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the Bach plus Haydn's Symphony no. 98, Krenek's "Die Nachtigall" and Stravinsky's Pulchinella Suite.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055
JUL 18 1970
New England Newsclip

Concert Going Becomes 'Something Else'; It Really Swings at Tanglewood

By RICHARD CONWAY

It ain't like what is used to be, folk. At least, it's not what millions of people were always led to believe concert going was like. But up at the Tanglewood Music Shed, things are really swingin', man!

Take Sunday's concert — or program — or session — or happening — whatever you want to call it. It was really somethin' else.

When all was in readiness for the first work, out bounded the young and brilliant Oriental conductor, Seiji Ozawa. He is of the new breed, dressed in the latest mod fashion. Would you believe flare - bottomed tux trousers, double - breasted white coat, and black turtle - necked sweater? His conducting style is reminiscent of Leonard Bernstein. He is physically active, literally drawing the music out of his orchestra. And he gets exciting results.

The first work was music from Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet." Originally written for a ballet which was never entirely successful, the composer later arranged the music into two orchestral suites.

Although in a modern idiom, the work is not at all hard to listen to. Under Ozawa's conducting, the Boston Orchestra caught the tragedy of Romeo at Juliet's tomb and the tragi - comedy of the death of Tybalt.

Schoenberg's "Piano Concerto," Op. 42, was next, with Peter Serkin as guest artist. It is difficult to say which was more way out, the music or Serkin's concert attire. Actually, considering Schoenberg's non - tonal style, which many people find hard to take, the music was really rather mild.

The Concerto is in one long movement, divided into four sections. The driving spirit of the second section and the eloquent passion of the third are perhaps the two most appealing parts of the work.

As for Serkin's attire, he, too, wore the flare - bottomed tux trousers — capped off with a knee - length white night - shirt looking affair that created some interesting and varied audience reaction. So did the way he wore his hair — pulled back in a pony - tail fashion and held in place with a shiny barrette (?).

But make no mistake, the young man can play. He is sensitive to the Schoenberg idiom, and through his technique and musicianship is able to give this music a meaningful reading. The audience called him for several bows.

But all of this was just warm - up for what was to come. After the intermission came a work called "Three pieces for blues band and symphony orchestra," composed in 1968 by William Russo. This, of course, is one of the 'in' things — having a popular music organization play with a symphony orchestra. It had to happen. Both groups have much to teach each other. Yesterday afternoon showed that both are learning.

Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band were the guest performers. These young men are highly skilled musicians. They thoroughly understand the melodic, harmonic, and rhythmic language of their particular idiom. Their instrumental technique is sure. The sounds that Corky Siegel is able to get out of a harmonica are incredible — and terribly haunting.

Ozawa, too, seems to relate well to the style — which is as American as the hot dog. He was able to call from the orchestra no small degree of the spirit of the "blues."

In brief, the Music Shed really swung. Russo's work will be heard many times again throughout the country, I'm sure. The audience yesterday loved it. It is certainly not a great work, but it is a very useful one.

No, concert going may not be what it used to be; but it may be becoming what it will be.

AT TANGLEWOOD

The second weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra features Conductors Seiji Ozawa and Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, and a concert version of Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte."

The weekend begins Friday, July 10 at 7 p.m. with St. John's College Choir featured in the Weekend Prelude. Weekend Prelude concerts are free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert. At 9 p.m. Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos conducts the Boston Symphony in two works by Falla, "El amor brujo," and Suite from "The Three-cornered Hat." The second half of the program features Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

Fruhbeck de Burgos, Spain's most important conductor, currently holds the title of Music Director of the National Orchestra in Madrid. He has conducted most of Europe's leading orchestras, including the London Symphony, London Philharmonic, the National Orchestra, the Orchestra of the Conservatoire de Paris, and the Vienna Philharmonic. In this country, he has appeared with the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and the Chicago Symphony. His appearance at Tanglewood this summer marks his debut with the Boston Symphony.

On Saturday, July 11 at 8:30 p.m., Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa devotes the entire evening to Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" with soloists Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause, and Ezio Flagello. Ozawa conducts on Sunday, July 12 at 2:30 p.m. with soloists Peter Serkin and the Corky Siegel Blues Band. Works performed will be Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet," Schoenberg's Piano Concerto with Serkin as soloist, and Russo's "Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra" with the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

Each Saturday at 10:30 a.m. there is an open rehearsal in the Shed which benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund. Seats are unreserved and are on sale at $2.50 each the morning of the rehearsal.

Thursday, July 9 at 8:30 p.m., Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller conducts the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in an open rehearsal in the Theatre-Concert Hall. There will be a Berkshire Music Center chamber music concert Sunday, July 12 at 10:00 a.m. in the Chamber Music Hall and a Faculty Recital at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall.

ROSALIND ELIAS . . . is one of the soloists in the concert performance of Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" at Tanglewood Saturday, July 11, at 8:30 p.m.

CONDUCTOR . . . At Tanglewood on Friday, July 10 at 9 p.m., Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two works by Falla and Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring." Mr. de Burgos is, at 35, Spain's most important conductor. At present, he holds the post of musical director of the National Orchestra in Madrid.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 16 1970

New England Newsclip

As I Hear It

Mozart's Librettos

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

OPERA in concert form has some favorable aspects, and Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte," to be performed tonight at Tanglewood with a galaxy of vocal soloists, should be a thrilling evening. There are some factors which necessarily will be obscured, indeed effaced, except possibly for a gesture or a grimace here and there. The "Cosi" libretto is a sort of series of fairly incredible episodes. Its author deserves more of the spotlight than tonight's version will expose.

* * * *

LORENZO DA PONTE was born in 1749, seven years before Mozart, whom he outlived by 47 years. He was a character in his own right and might have stepped into (or out of) any one of several roles in the books he wrote for Mozart without altering his appearance or his nature.

Born in the Venetian ghetto to Geremia Conegliano and Rachel Pincherle, the little Emmanuele was befriended by the bishop of Ceneda, a district in Venetia. He took his benefactor's name at the age of 14. Da Ponte studied for the priesthood but led a life of amorous adventure. After teaching rhetoric in Treviso, a town a few miles from Venice, and then later at Dresden, he settled in Vienna as poet to the Imperial Theatre and Latin secretary under Joseph II.

The success of the three operas by Mozart ("Don Giovanni," "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Cosi") for which Da Ponte produced the librettos made him famous, but on the emperor's death in 1790, he had to leave the city, being out of favor with Leopold II. From then on Da Ponte led the life of a mild mountebank and was obliged to try his fortune in all the large cities of Europe. He finally emigrated to America, where on June 4, 1805, he passed through the customs house at Philadelphia. He remained in America for the remaining 33 years of his life.

HIS ADVENTURES, his contacts with individuals of importance in many fields, his travels (usually made to escape creditors), and his many escapades read more like fiction than fact. To place him in perspective, it is pertinent to notice what events were taking place in the whole Western world.

The American colonies had just wrenched themselves free of the mother country when Da Ponte started to collaborate with Mozart. Meanwhile, the French Revolution was heating up. A doctor in Vienna, Franz Anton Mesmer, began to hold seances in which he practiced his newfangled theory of animal magnetism. This was to be a significant factor in Da Ponte's portfolio. A French dramatist of nearly the same generation, Pierre Beaumarchais (whose age terminals did exactly coincide with those of George Washington), was employing a fleet of some 40 vessels to provide help for the American insurgents. During the same period, Beaumarchais was producing his two famous comedies, "The Barber of Seville" and "The Marriage of Figaro," another event of significance to our late Venetian.

* * * *

IN "COSI," the two male protagonists want to test the fidelity of their fiancees. They resort to all sorts of artifices to tempt them. In one situation in the final act, the two gentlemen, having assumed disguises as "nobles from Albania" whose suits were rejected, take "poison" to end their feigned despair.

Despina, the maid of the two Ferrara ladies, disguised as a distinguished doctor, puts into practice the latest scientific discovery, mesmerism. She pompously applies the infallible cure by means of a huge magnet which makes the "suicides" heave. The orchestral accompaniment heaves and writhes, but the real lovers are restored to life.

It should be mentioned at this point that Da Ponte was also a disciple of Casanova and took advantage of his teachings, both in his personal affairs and in his literary efforts. Beaumarchais' great dramatic success, Figaro, which had been censured by Louis XVI for several years for fear of its possible offense to the nobility and the public morals, was ideally malleable for Da Ponte's purposes. Especially the incident of the placing of the marriage-bed of the servants Figaro and Susanna in a room adjacent to that of their master, the Count Almaviva.

* * * *

POOR DA PONTE was near wit's end when he arrived in America. He tried everything—a distillery, tobacco shop, book store—and finally landed as a teacher of Italian at Columbia College in New York. The late Harvard professor Perry Miller in his book "The Raven and the Whale" introduces a man whom he identified as one of New York's foremost citizens, Dr. John Wakefield Francis. Among other things, Francis stood at the deathbed of Da Ponte in 1838 with the entire Italian community kneeling at the foot.

This was not a unique experience for Francis, Miller goes on to tell, for he also performed the same function for another patient, an actress by the name of Mrs. Jordan, reputed to have been a natural daughter of George IV. Francis is reported to have sent the bill to Buckingham Palace.

Finally, still via Miller, Francis related that in 1781, Benjamin Franklin had been appointed a member of the commission to negotiate a treaty of peace between England and the United States. The treaty was signed at Versailles in 1783. Louis XVI made him one of the commissioners to report on Mesmer and animal magnetism in 1784 when the Viennese doctor moved over to Paris. The King eventually became jealous of Franklin and "caused certain pots de chambre to be painted at Sevres with the philosopher's head at the bottom and had them sent to the ladies."

Music at Tanglewood and Music Mt.

Tanglewood
Friday, July 10

By J.W.H.

785

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, did a remarkable job of replacing the ailing Rafael De Burgos at Friday night's concert at Tanglewood. Even with some revision of the program, it seems almost miraculous that a conductor can take over at the last minute and produce a clean-cut and lively performance.

Thomas chose Glinka's, "Overture to Russian and Ludmila" as a bright and melodic opener, and followed it with an expert reading of Tchaikovsky's "Symphony no. 1 in G Minor." We note that this was the first performance of this work at the Festival concerts, and it might as well be the last. Tchaikovsky's first attempt at a symphony is not worthy of Thomas' considerable talent.

Stravinsky's "Le sacre du printemps" provided the closing half of the evening and was on De Burgos' original program. The orchestra was full of enthusiasm for the work, and the substitute conductor directed with dash and verve. The dissonances and elaborate orchestration of "Le Sacre," which confused many listeners a generation ago are familiar enough today, and the audience responded with an extended ovation. Spring was never like that in Salisbury.

Saturday, July 11
By A.C.S.

In recent seasons it has become customary to present an opera in concert form at Tanglewood. Tonight Seiji Ozawa gave a spirited reading of Mozart's delightful "Cosi fan tutti" on which he cut his operatic teeth last summer in Salzburg. It is a work with which he seems completely "at home." For the occasion he assembled a group of Metropolitan artists whose singing and histrionics gave him as much evident pleasure as it did the audience.

Top honors (and laughs) went to Teresa Stratas as Despina. The role is rewarding for anyone who will throw herself into it, and Miss Stratas did just that with great effect. Happily, she has rejoined the opera world and was a joy to hear as well as see.

Phyllis Curtin was superb as Fiordiligi. A commanding presence on the stage, even in the limited confines of Tanglewood, she handled the almost pointillistic arias with her accustomed control. Tom Krause seemed more comfortable in the Shed than in previous years. His Guglielmo was great fun as well as vocally gratifying. George Shirley has developed a larger and darker voice in recent years which he used to great effect as Ferrando. Ezio Flagello was a competent Don Alfonso. Rosalind Elias was unfortunately not at her best vocally. She is a fine actress, but pitch problems severely marred her presentation.

Hopefully, in any future performance, Ozawa will give a little more breathing time between the set numbers and the recitatives.

Sunday, July 12
By J.B.

On Sunday, under the direction of Tanglewood's Artistic Director, Seiji Ozawa, the BSO turned in a superb performance of excerpts from Prokofiev's ballet suite "Romeo and Juliet." Ozawa's precise sense of rhythm was well suited to this music, parts of which have an almost martial air; his restrained handling of passages loaded with emotion seemed almost to heighten the intensity of the music.

The second work on the program, Schoenberg's Piano Concerto, with Peter Serkin as soloist, aroused the least audience enthusiasm of the afternoon. It is a difficult piece to appreciate with an ear trained to hear music written in the classical key system. Schoenberg wrote the concerto after he had established a style almost divorced from keys, but it would be a mistake to apply the misnomer "atonal" to this piece. It was apparently a difficult piece to conduct as well as hear, because Ozawa had to keep a score in front of him.

The third work, William Russo's Three Pieces For Blues Band and Symphony Orchestra (1968), received the most enthusiastic response from the audience. Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band, a four-man group with one man on both electric piano and harmonica and the other three on electric guitar, bass guitar and drums, joined the BSO for the piece. This combination posed an occasional problem in acoustical balance, but it is an interesting musical idea and comes off very well.

Music Mountain

By J.H.

This week, the Berkshire four were in full command of their ensemble from the first note of the opening selection, Haydn's Quartet in D Major, Opus 20, No. 4. In this work, Haydn realized that each instrument could carry equal weight in combination or alone, and contrapuntal and imitative writing were used. Also characteristic of the piece is a wide range of moods. It is a pleasure to hear the Berkshire group handle music like this; they make it seem so easy. A singing cello convincingly tossing a line back to the first violin iis no small accomplishment.

The Adagio theme and variations, in which each instrument dominates a variation, was particularly satisfying. The dynamics of the accompaniment in the second variation were scaled a shade too high against the cello, but otherwise the entire quartet was performed masterfully.

The premiere of Anis Fuleihan's setting for Mezzo Soprano and String Quartet of Pierre Louys' song cycle "Bilitis" was the featured event of the afternoon. Zelda Manacher demonstrated that she not only has a rich, well-controlled voice, but musicianship as well.

The song cycle has an appropriate French flavor, but any further catagorizing would be a disservice to Mr. Fuleihan. The first two songs, "Pastoral" and "Roses in the Night," tend to be episodic, and the relation between vocal line and string writing seems strained. "The Lost Letter" is a delightful flurry with a good touch of humor. "Berceuse" is cohesive and beautiful, building to a remarkable climax in the vocal line which is set against an always restrained, dreamy accompaniment. The prophetic chant in "The Oath" tied the cycle together in a most moving way.

In general, those parts of the cycle which either emphasized the contrast in quality between the mezzo voice and strings or bent the voice to blend with the strings were the most successful.

The second Rasoumowsky Quartet (E Minor, Opus 59) continued the Beethoven series and crowned a fine afternoon. The performance captured the irony and impulsiveness of his big work.

9/4/70

Channel '71

Insights and Sightings on Today's Scene

Rock music invaded the Establishment in a big way this summer. The Who gave two sold-out performances of their rock opera "Tommy" at New York's Metropolitan Opera House (we'll have a special report in our Sept. 28 issue). Corky Siegel's Blues Band teamed up with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a Tanglewood (Mass.) concert that had an audience of nearly 8,000 cheering. In Greensboro, N.C., the youthful Eastern Music Festival premiered a significant new work by 31-year-old Robert Selig, combining improvised rock and jazz with symphonic music. Senior's Roy Hemming reports: "It's the first major concert piece to sound like the 1970's, not reworked '30's or '50's."

AT TANGLEWOOD

The second weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra features Conductors Seiji Ozawa and Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos and a concert version of Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte."

The weekend begins Friday, July 10 at 7 p.m. with St. John's College Choir featured in the Weekend Prelude. Weekend Prelude concerts are free to ticket-holders for the 8 p.m. Boston Symphony concert at 8 p.m. Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos conducts the Boston Symphony in two works by Falla: "El amor brujo," and Suite from "The Three-cornered Hat." The second half of the program features Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

Fruhbeck de Burgos, Spain's most important conductor, currently holds the title of Music Director of the National Orchestra in Madrid. He has conducted most of Europe's leading orchestras including the London Symphony, London Philharmonic, the National Orchestra, the Orchestra of the Conservatoire de Paris, and the Vienna Philharmonic. In this country, he has appeared with the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and the Chicago Symphony. His appearance at Tanglewood this summer marks his debut with the Boston Symphony.

On Saturday, July 11 at 8:30 p.m., Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa devotes the entire evening to Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" with soloists Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause, and Ezio Flagello. Ozawa conducts on Sunday, July 12 at 2:30 p.m. with soloists Peter Serkin and the Corky Siegel Blues Band. Works performed will be Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet," Schoenberg's Piano Concerto with Serkin as soloist, and Russo's "Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra," with the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

Each Saturday at 10:30 a.m. there is an open rehearsal in the Shed, which benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund. Seats are unreserved and are on sale at 8:30 each the morning of the rehearsal.

Thursday, July 9 at 8:30 p.m., Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller conducts the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in an open rehearsal in the Theatre-Concert Hall. "Pan," will be a Berkshire Music Center chamber music concert Sunday, July 12 at 10:00 a.m. in the Chamber Music Hall and a Faculty Recital at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall.

ROSALIND ELIAS ... is one of the soloists in the concert performance of Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" at Tanglewood Saturday, July 11, at 8:30 p.m.

CONDUCTOR ... At Tanglewood on Friday, July 10 at 9 p.m., Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two works by Falla and Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring." Mr. de Burgos is, at 35, Spain's most important conductor. At present, he holds the post of musical director of the National Orchestra in Madrid.

As I Hear It

Mozart's Librettos

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

OPERA in concert form has some favorable aspects, and Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte," to be performed tonight at Tanglewood with a galaxy of vocal soloists, should be a thrilling evening. There are some factors which necessarily will be obscured, indeed effaced, except possibly for a gesture or a grimace here and there. The "Cosi" libretto is a sort of series of fairly incredible episodes. Its author deserves more of the spotlight than tonight's version will expose.

* * * *

LORENZO DA PONTE was born in 1749, seven years before Mozart, whom he outlived by 47 years. He was a character in his own right and might have stepped into (or out of) any one of several roles in the books he wrote for Mozart without altering his appearance or his nature.

Born in the Venetian ghetto to Geremia Conegliano and Rachel Pincherle, the little Emmanuele was befriended by the bishop of Ceneda, a district in Venetia. He took his benefactor's name at the age of 14. Da Ponte studied for the priesthood but led a life of amorous adventure. After teaching rhetoric in Treviso, a town a few miles from Venice, and then later at Dresden, he settled in Vienna as poet to the Imperial Theatre and Latin secretary under Joseph II.

The success of the three operas by Mozart ("Don Giovanni," "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Cosi") for which Da Ponte produced the librettos made him famous, but on the emperor's death in 1790, he had to leave the city, being out of favor with Leopold II. From then on Da Ponte led the life of a mild mountebank and was obliged to try his fortune in all the large cities of Europe. He finally emigrated to America, where on June 4, 1805, he passed through the customs house at Philadelphia. He remained in America for the remaining 33 years of his life.

HIS ADVENTURES, his contacts with individuals of importance in many fields, his travels (usually made to escape creditors), and his many escapades read more like fiction than fact. To place him in perspective, it is pertinent to notice what events were taking place in the whole Western world.

The American colonies had just wrenched themselves free of the mother country when Da Ponte started to collaborate with Mozart. Meanwhile, the French Revolution was heating up. A doctor in Vienna, Franz Anton Mesmer, began to hold seances in which he practiced his newfangled theory of animal magnetism. This was to be a significant factor in Da Ponte's portfolio. A French dramatist of nearly the same generation, Pierre Beaumarchais (whose age terminals did exactly coincide with those of George Washington), was employing a fleet of some 40 vessels to provide help for the American insurgents. During the same period, Beaumarchais was producing his two famous comedies, "The Barber of Seville" and "The Marriage of Figaro," another event of significance to our late Venetian.

* * * *

IN "COSI," the two male protagonists want to test the fidelity of their fiancees. They resort to all sorts of artifices to tempt them. In one situation in the final act, the two gentlemen, having assumed disguises as "nobles from Albania" whose suits were rejected, take "poison" to end their feigned despair.

Despina, the maid of the two Ferrara ladies, disguised as a distinguished doctor, puts into practice the latest scientific discovery, mesmerism. She pompously applies the infallible cure by means of a huge magnet which makes the "suicides" heave. The orchestral accompaniment heaves and writhes, but the real lovers are restored to life.

It should be mentioned at this point that Da Ponte was also a disciple of Casanova and took advantage of his teachings, both in his personal affairs and in his literary efforts. Beaumarchais' great dramatic success, Figaro, which had been censured by Louis XVI for several years for fear of its possible offense to the nobility and the public morals, was ideally malleable for Da Ponte's purposes. Especially the incident of the placing of the marriage-bed of the servants Figaro and Susanna in a room adjacent to that of their master, the Count Almaviva.

* * * *

POOR DA PONTE was near wit's end when he arrived in America. He tried everything—a distillery, tobacco shop, book store—and finally landed as a teacher of Italian at Columbia College in New York. The late Harvard professor Perry Miller in his book "The Raven and the Whale" introduces a man whom he identified as one of New York's foremost citizens, Dr. John Wakefield Francis. Among other things, Francis stood at the deathbed of Da Ponte in 1838 with the entire Italian community kneeling at the foot.

This was not a unique experience for Francis, Miller goes on to tell, for he also performed the same function for another patient, an actress by the name of Mrs. Jordan, reputed to have been a natural daughter of George IV. Francis is reported to have sent the bill to Buckingham Palace.

Finally, still via Miller, Francis related that in 1781, Benjamin Franklin had been appointed a member of the commission to negotiate a treaty of peace between England and the United States. The treaty was signed at Versailles in 1783. Louis XVI made him one of the commissioners to report on Mesmer and animal magnetism in 1784 when the Viennese doctor moved over to Paris. The King eventually became jealous of Franklin and "caused certain pots de chambre to be painted at Sevres with the philosopher's head at the bottom and had them sent to the ladies."

Music at Tanglewood and Music Mt.

Tanglewood
Friday, July 10

By J.W.H.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, did a remarkable job of replacing the ailing Rafael De Burgos at Friday night's concert at Tanglewood. Even with some revision of the program, it seems almost miraculous that a conductor can take over at the last minute and produce a clean-cut and lively performance.

Thomas chose Glinka's, "Overture to Russian and Ludmila" as a bright and melodic opener, and followed it with an expert reading of Tchaikovsky's "Symphony no. 1 in G Minor." We note that this was the first performance of this work at the Festival concerts, and it might as well be the last. Tchaikovsky's first attempt at a symphony is not worthy of Thomas' considerable talent.

Stravinsky's "Le sacre du printemps" provided the closing half of the evening and was on De Burgos' original program. The orchestra was full of enthusiasm for the work, and the substitute conductor directed with dash and verve. The dissonances and elaborate orchestration of "Le Sacre," which confused many listeners a generation ago, are familiar enough today, and the audience responded with an extended ovation. Spring was never like that in Salisbury.

Saturday, July 11
By A.C.S.

In recent seasons it has become customary to present an opera in concert form at Tanglewood. Tonight Seiji Ozawa gave a spirited reading of Mozart's delightful "Cosi fan tutti" on which he cut his operatic teeth last summer in Salzburg. It is a work with which he seems completely "at home." For the occasion he assembled a group of Metropolitan artists whose singing and histrionics gave him as much evident pleasure as it did the audience.

Top honors (and laughs) went to Teresa Stratas as Despina. The role is rewarding for anyone who will throw herself into it, and Miss Stratas did just that with great effect. Happily, she has rejoined the opera world and was a joy to hear as well as see.

Phyllis Curtin was superb as Fiordiligi. A commanding presence on the stage, even in the limited confines of Tanglewood, she handled the almost pointilistic arias with her accustomed control. Tom Krause seemed more comfortable in the Shed than in previous years. His Guglielmo was great fun as well as vocally gratifying. George Shirley has developed a larger and darker voice in recent years which he used to great effect as Ferrando. Ezio Flagello was a competent Don Alfonso. Rosalind Elias was unfortunately not at her best vocally. She is a fine actress, but pitch problems severely marred her presentation.

Hopefully, in any future performance Ozawa will give a little more breathing time between the set numbers and the recitatives.

Sunday, July 12
By J.B.

On Sunday, under the direction of Tanglewood's Artistic Director, Seiji Ozawa, the BSO turned in a superb performance of excerpts from Prokofiev's ballet suite "Romeo and Juliet." Ozawa's precise sense of rhythm was well suited to this music, parts of which have an almost martial air, his restrained handling of passages loaded with emotion seemed almost to heighten the intensity of the music.

The second work on the program, Schoenberg's Piano Concerto, with Peter Serkin as soloist, aroused the least audience enthusiasm of the afternoon. It is a difficult piece to appreciate with an ear trained to hear music written in the classical key system. Schoenberg wrote the concerto after he had established a style almost divorced from keys, but it would be a mistake to apply the misnomer "atonal" to this piece. It was apparently a difficult piece to conduct as well as hear, because Ozawa had to keep a score in front of him.

The third work, William Russo's Three Pieces For Blues Band and Symphony Orchestra (1968), received the most enthusiastic response from the audience. Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band, a four-man group with one man on both electric piano and harmonica and the other three on electric guitar, bass guitar and drums, joined the BSO for the piece. This combination posed an occasional problem in acoustical balance, but it is an interesting musical idea and comes off very well.

Music Mountain

By J.H.

This week, the Berkshire forces were in full command of their ensemble from the first note of the opening selection, Haydn's Quartet in D Major, Opus 20, No. 4. In this work, Haydn realized that each instrument could carry equal weight in combination or alone, and contrapuntal and imitative writing were used. Also characteristic of the piece is a wide range of moods. It is a pleasure to hear the Berkshire group handle music like this; they make it seem so easy. A singing cello convincingly tossing a line back to the first violin is no small accomplishment.

The Adagio theme and variations, in which each instrument dominates a variation, was particularly satisfying. The dynamics of the accompaniment in the second variation were scaled a shade too high against the cello, but otherwise the entire quartet was performed masterfully.

The premiere of Anis Fuleihan's setting for Mezzo Soprano and String Quartet of Pierre Louys' song cycle "Bilitis" was the featured event of the afternoon. Zelda Manacher demonstrated that she not only has a rich, well-controlled voice, but musicianship as well.

The song cycle has an appropriate French flavor, but any further catagorizing would be a disservice to Mr. Fuleihan. The first two songs, "Pastoral" and "Roses in the Night," tend to be episodic, and the relation between vocal line and string writing seems strained. "The Lost Letter" is a delightful flurry with a good touch of humor. "Berceuse" is cohesive and beautiful, building to a remarkable climax in the vocal line which is set against an always restrained, dreamy accompaniment. The prophetic chant in "The Oath" tied the cycle together in a most moving way.

In general, those parts of the cycle which either emphasized the contrast in quality between the mezzo voice and strings or bent the voice to blend with the strings were the most successful.

The second Rasoumowsky Quartet (E Minor, Opus 59) continued the Beethoven series and crowned a fine afternoon. The performance captured the irony and impulsiveness of his big work.

Channel'71

Insights and Sightings on Today's Scene

Rock music invaded the Establishment in a big way this summer. The Who gave two sold-out performances of their rock opera "Tommy" at New York's Metropolitan Opera House (we'll have a special report in our Sept. 28 issue). Corky Siegel's Blues Band teamed up with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a Tanglewood (Mass.) concert that had an audience of nearly 8,000 cheering. In Greensboro, N.C., the youthful Eastern Music Festival premiered a significant new work by 31-year-old Robert Selig, combining improvised rock and jazz with symphonic music. Senior's Roy Hemming reports: "It's the first major concert piece to sound like the 1970's, not reworked '30's or '50's."

At Tanglewood

Ozawa and Fruhbeck de Burgos to conduct weekend of July 13

The second weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, Lenox, feature Conductors Seiji Ozawa and Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, and a concert version of Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte."

The weekend begins Friday, July 10 at 7 p.m. with St. John's College Choir featured in the Weekend Prelude. Weekend Prelude concerts are free to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert. At 9 p.m., Fruhbeck de Burgos conducts the Boston Symphony in two works by Falla "El amor brujo," and suite from "The Three-cornered Hat." The second half of the program features Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

Fruhbeck de Burgos, Spain's most important conductor, holds the title of Music Director of the National Orchestra in Madrid. He has conducted most of Europe's leading orchestras, including the London Symphony, London Philharmonic, the National Orchestra, the Orchestra of the Conservatoire de Paris, and the Vienna Philharmonic. In this country, he has appeared with the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and the Chicago Symphony. His appearance at Tanglewood this summer marks his debut with the Boston Symphony.

On Saturday, July 11 at 8.30 p.m. Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa devotes the entire evening to Mozart's 'Cosi fan tutte" with soloists Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause, and Ezio Flagello. Ozawa conducts on Sunday, July 12 at 2.30 p.m. with soloists Peter Serkin and the Corky Siegel Blues Band. Works performed will be Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet," Schoenberg's "Piano Concerto" with Serkin as soloist, and Russo's "Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra" with the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

Each Saturday at 10.30 a.m. there is an open rehearsal in the Shed which benefits the orchestra's pension fund. Seats are unreserved and are on sale the morning of the rehearsal.

Tanglewood, in collaboration with Bill Graham's Fillmore East, presents the first of three Contemporary Trends Concerts Tuesday, July 7. Features will be The Who, Jethro Tull, and It's A Beautiful Day. Music beings at 6 p.m.

The Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's unique summer academy at Tanglewood, presents a faculty recital on Wednesday, July 8 at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Thursday, July 9 at 8.30 p.m., Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller conducts the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in an open rehearsal in the Theatre-Concert Hall. There will be a Berkshire Music Center chamber music concert Sunday July 12 at 10 a.m. in the Chamber Music Hall and a Faculty Recital at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

JUL 1 1970 New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

Spanish conductor to perform this week

LENOX, MASSACHUSETTS—The second weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra feature Conductors Seiji Ozawa and Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, and a concert version of Mozart's Cosi fan tutte.

The weekend begins Friday, July 10 at 7 p.m. with St. John's College Choir featured in the Weekend Prelude. Weekend Prelude concerts are free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert. At 9 p.m., Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos conducts the Boston Symphony in two works by Falla, El amor brujo, and Suite from The Three-cornered Hat. The second half of the program features Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring.

Fruhbeck de Burgos, Spain's most important conductor, currently holds the title of Music Director of the National Orchestra in Madrid. He has conducted most of Europe's leading orchestras, including the London Symphony, London Philharmonic, the National Orchestra, the Orchestra of the Conservatoire de Paris, and the Vienna Philharmonic. In this country, he has appeared with the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and the Chicago Symphony. His appearance at Tanglewood this summer marks his debut with the Boston Symphony.

On Saturday, July 11 at 8.30 p.m., Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa devotes the entire evening to Mozart's Cosi fan tutte with soloists Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause, and Ezio Flagello. Ozawa conducts on Sunday, July 12 at 2.30 p.m. with soloists Peter Serkin and the Corky Siegel Blues Band. Works performed will be Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet, Schoenberg's Piano Concerto with Serkin as soloist, and Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra with the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

Each Saturday at 10.30 a.m. there is an open rehearsal in the Shed which benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund. Seats are unreserved and are on sale each the morning of the rehearsal.

There will be a Berkshire Music Center chamber music concert Sunday July 12 at 10.00 a.m. in the Chamber Music Hall and a Faculty Recital at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

JUL 10 1970 New England Newsclip

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,040 (S) 56,127

JUL 5 1970 New England Newsclip

Noted Conductors Due At Tanglewood Concert

Second weekend at Tanglewood features Fruhbeck De Burgos, Peter Serkin, and the Corky Siegel Blues Band. Concert Version of Mozart's Cosi Fan Tutte conducted by Ozawa with soloists Curtin, Stratas, Elias, Shirley, Krause, and Flagello.

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS. — The second weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra feature Conductors Seiji Ozawa and Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, and a concert version of Mozart's Cosi Fan Tutte.

The weekend begins Friday, July 10 at 7 p.m. with St. John's College Choir fratured in the weekend prelude. Weekend prelude concerts are free to ticket holders of the 9 a.m. Boston Symphony concert. At 9, Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos conducts the Boston Symphony in two works by Falla, El Amor Brujo, and Suite from The Three-cornered Hat. The second half of the program features Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring.

Frubbeck de Burgos, Spain's most important conductor, currently holds the title of music director of the National Orchestra in Madrid. He has conducted most of Europe's leading orchestras, including the London Symphony, London Philharmocic, the National Orchestra, the Orchestra of the Conservatoire de Paris, and the Vienna Philharmonic. In this country, he has appeared with the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and the Chicago Symphony. His appearance at Tanglewood this summer marks his debut with the Boston Symphony

On Saturday, July 11 at 8:30 p.m., Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa devotes the entire evening to Mozart's Cosi Fan Tutte with soloists Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause, and Ezio Flagello. Ozawa conducts July 12 at 2:30 p.m. with soloists Peter Serkin and the Corky Siegel Blues Band. Works performed will be Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet, Schoenberg's Piano Concerto with Serkin as soloist, and Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra with the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

Each Saturday at 10:30 a.m. there is an open rehearsal in the shed which benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund. Seats are unreserved and are on sale at $2.50 each the morning of the rehearsal.

Tanglewood, in collaboration with Bill Graham's Fillmore East, presents the first of three Contemporary Trends Concerts Tuesday. Featured will be The Who, Jethro Tull, and It's A Beautiful Day. Music begins at 6 p.m.

The Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's unique summer academy at Tanglewood presents a faculty recital Wednesday, at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Thursday at 8:30 p.m., Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller conducts the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in an open rehearsal in the Theatre-Concert Hall. There will be a Berkshire Music Center chamber music concert July 12 at 10 a.m. in the Chamber-Music Hall and a faculty recital at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, July 5, 1970

GUESTS AT FESTIVAL. Conductor Rafael Frubeck de Burgos and soprano Phyllis Curtain will be guests at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., this week. De Burgos, 35 and Spain's most important conductor, will direct two Stravinsky works for the Friday 9 p.m. concert. Miss Curtain will perform in Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" under the baton of Seiji Ozawa Saturday at 8:30 p.m.

Tanglewood

Frühbeck de Burgos To Conduct

The second weekend of Tanglewood's Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra features Conductors Seiji Ozawa and Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos, and a concert version of Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte."

The weekend begins Friday, July 10, at 7 p.m. with St. John's College Choir featured in the Weekend Prelude. Weekend Prelude concerts are free to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert. At 9, Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos conducts the Boston Symphony in two works by Falla, "El Amor Brujo," and Suite from "The Three-cornered Hat." The second half of the program features Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring."

Frühbeck de Burgos, Spain's most important conductor, holds the title of music director of the National Orchestra in Madrid. He has conducted most of Europe's leading orchestras, including the London Symphony, London Philharmonic, the National Orchestra, the Orchestra of the Conservatoire de Paris and the Vienna Philharmonic. In this country, he has appeared with the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Los Angeles Philharmonic and the Chicago Symphony. His appearance at Tanglewood this summer marks his debut with the Boston Symphony.

On Saturday, July 11, at 8:30 p.m. Seiji Ozawa will devote the entire evening to Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" with soloists Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause and Ezio Flagello. Ozawa will conduct on Sunday, July 12, at 2:30 p.m. with soloists Peter Serkin and the Corky Siegel Blues Band. Works performed will be Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet," Schoenberg's Piano Concerto with Serkin as soloist, and Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra with Corky Siegel Blues Band.

Each Saturday at 10:30 a.m. there is an open rehearsal in the Shed which benefits the orchestra's pension fund. Seats are unreserved and are on sale at $2.50 each the morning of the rehearsal.

Tanglewood, in collaboration with Bill Graham's Fillmore East, will present the first of three Contemporary Trends Concerts Tuesday, July 7. Featured will be the Who, Jethro Tull, and It's a Beautiful Day. Music begins at 6 p.m.

The Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy at Tanglewood will present a faculty recital on Wednesday, July 8, at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. On Thursday, July 9, at 8:30 p.m., Gunther Schuller will conduct the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in an open rehearsal in the Theatre-Concert Hall. There will be a chamber music concert at 10:00 a.m. Sunday, July 12, in the Chamber Music Hall and a faculty recital at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall.

Ozawa To Conduct Mozart Program At Tanglewood

Serji Ozawa, Tanglewood artistic director, will conduct an all-Mozart program this Saturday evening at 8:30 in the Tanglewood music shed. The program will feature Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" with soloists Phyllis Curtain, Teresa Stratas Rosalind Elias, George Shirley Tom Krause and Ezio Flagello

Paul Serkin

Ozawa will also conduct the Sunday afternoon concert of Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet," and Schoenberg's "Piano Concerto" with artist Paul Serkin as soloist. Corky Siegel Blues Band is slated for the Sunday performance which begins at 2:30 p.m. The group will do Russo's "Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra."

Rafael Fruhbeck De Burgos music director of the National Orchestra in Madrid, will conduct the Friday evening concert. The De Burgos program features Stravinsky's "The Rite of Spring," and two works by Falla, "El Amor Brujo," and suite from "The Three-Cornered Hat." The weekend prelude, which begins Friday at 7 p.m., will highlight St. John's College Choir.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 4 1970 New England Newsclip

Weekend Program At Tanglewood

The second weekend of Berkshire Festival events at Tanglewood begins July 10, at 7 p.m., with a Prelude concert by the St. John's College Choir. This event is free to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert, which features two works of de Falla, "El Amor Brujo" and Suite from "The Three-Cornered Hat," and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." Rafael Frubeck de Burgos, Music Director of the National Orchestra in Madrid, will make his conducting debut with the Boston Symphony at this concert.

Saturday, July 11, will be devoted to a performance of Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte," which begins at 8:30 p.m. Seiji Ozawa conducts, with soloists Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause and Ezio Flagello.

Ozawa also conducts the Sunday afternoon concert, at 2:30 p.m., which features pianist Peter Serkin and the Corky Siegel Blues Band. Works to be performed include Prokofiev's "Romeo and Juliet," Schoenberg's Piano Concerto and Russo's "Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra."

50

R. F. deBURGOS

PHYLLIS CURTIN

ROSALIND ELIAS

GEORGE SHIRLEY

JULY 10-12

Weekend Activities At Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — The second weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra feature Conductors Seiji Ozawa and Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, and a concert version of Mozart's Cosi fan tutte.

Weekend Prelude

The weekend begins this Friday at 7 p.m. with St. John's College Choir featured in the Weekend Prelude. Weekend Prelude concerts are free to ticket - holders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert. At 9 p.m., Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos conducts the Boston Symphony in two works by Falla, El amor brujo, and Suite from The Three - cornered Hat. The second half of the program features Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring.

On Saturday at 8.30 p.m., Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa devotes the entire evening to Mozart's Cosi fan tutte with soloists Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause, and Ezio Flagello. Ozawa conducts next Sunday at 2.30 p.m. with soloists Peter Serkin and the Corky Siegel Blues Band. Works performed will be Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet, Schoenberg's Piano Concerto with Serkin as soloist, and Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra with the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

Each Saturday at 10.30 a.m. there is an open rehearsal in the shed which benefits the orchestra's pension fund. Seats are unreserved and are on sale the morning of the rehearsal.

Contemporary Concert

Tanglewood, in collaboration with Bill Graham's Fillmore East, presents the first of three Contemporary Trends Concerts Tuesday. Featured will be The Who, Jerthro Tull, and It's A Beautiful Day. Music begins at 6 p.m.

The Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's unique summer academy at Tanglewood presents a Faculty Recital on Wednesday at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre - Concert Hall. Thursday at 8.30 p.m., Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller conducts the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in an open rehearsal in the Theatre - Concert Hall. There will be a Berkshire Music Center chamber music concert next Sunday at 10 a.m. in the Chamber Music Hall and a faculty Recital at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre - Concert Hall.

BERKSHIRE NATIONAL CONCERTS

Friday, July 10
7 p.m. Shed
Weekend Prelude
ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE CHOIR

9 p.m. Shed
RAFAEL FRUHBECK DE BURGOS
Falla: El amor brujo
Falla: Two suites from "The Three - cornered hat"
Stravinsky: The Rite of Spring

Saturday, July 11
10.30 a.m. Shed
Open Rehearsal
8.30 p.m. Shed
SEIJI OZAWA
Mozart: Cosi fan tutte
PHYLLIS CURTIN, TERESA STRATAS, ROSALIND ELIAS
GEORGE SHIRLEY, TOM KRAUSE
EZIO FLAGELLO

Sunday July 12
2.30 p.m. Shed
SEIJI OZAWA
Prokofiev: Romeo and Juliet
Schoenberg: Piano Concerto
PETER SERKIN
Russo: Three Pieces for Blues and Orchestra
CORKY SIEGEL BLUES BA

PETER SERKIN

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUL 5 1970 New England Newsclip

17,958 Attend Weekend Concerts

A total audience of 17,958 attended the weekend concerts at Tanglewood. Friday night's concert drew 4,277, the Saturday morning rehearsal 2,040, Saturday night 4,622 and Sunday afternoon 7,019.

Attendance was down 410 from the number of people attending the second weekend of Tanglewood concerts in 1969.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 13 1970 New England Newsclip

AT TANGLEWOOD on Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Peter Serkin will perform Schoenberg's Piano Concerto under the baton of Seiji Ozawa. Serkin has made frequent guest appearances with the major symphony orchestras, as recitalist, chamber music performer, and recording artist.

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,040 (S) 56,127

JUL 11 1970 New England Newsclip

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600

JUL 2 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood concert features Mozart

The second weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra feature Conductors Seiji Ozawa and Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, and a concert version of Mozart's Cosi fan tutte.

The weekend begins Friday, July 10 at 7 p.m. with St. John's College Choir featured in the Weekend Prelude. Weekend Prelude concerts are free to ticket holders of the 9 p.m. Poston Symphony concert. At 9 p.m. Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos conducts the Boston Symphony in two works by Falla, El amor brujo, and Suite from The Three-cornered Hat. The second half of the program features Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring.

Fruhbeck de Burgos, Spain's most important conductor, currently holds the title of Music Director of the National Orchestra in Madrid. He has conducted most of Europe's leading orchestras, including the London Symphony, London Philharmonic, the National Orchestra, the Orchestra of the Conservatoire de Paris, and the Vienna Philharmonic. In this country, he has appeared with the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and the Chicago Symphony. His appearance at Tanglewood this summer marks his debut with the Boston Symphony.

On Saturday, July 11 at 8:30 p.m., Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa devotes the entire evening to Mozart's Cosi fan tutte with soloists Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause, and Ezio Flagello. Ozawa conducts on Sunday, July 12 at 2:30 p.m. with soloists Peter Serkin and the Corky Siegel Blues Band. Works performed will be Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet, Schoenberg's Piano Concerto with Serkin as soloist, and Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra with the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

Each Saturday at 10:30 a.m. there is an open rehearsal in the Shed which benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund. Seats are unreserved and are on sale at $2.50 each the morning of the rehearsal.

Tanglewood, in collaboration with Bill Graham's Fillmore East, presents the first of three Contemporary Trends Concerts Tuesday, July 7. Featured will be The Who, Jethro Tull, and It's A Beautiful Day. Music begins at 6 p.m.

The Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's unique summer academy at Tanglewood presents a Faculty Recital on Wednesday, July 8 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Thursday, July 9 at 8:30 p.m., Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller conducts the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in an open rehearsal in the Theatre-Concert Hall. There will be a Berkshire Music Center chamber music concert Sunday July 12 at 10:00 a.m. in the Chamber Music Hall and a Faculty Recital at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall

FLUSHING, N. Y.
FRESH MEADOWS
TOWNSMAN
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 24,000

JUL 2 1970

OPERA AT TANGLEWOOD

Rosalind Elias

Metropolitan Opera mezzo-soprano ROSALIND ELIAS, who will be the Dorabella for the Berkshire Festival's performance of Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte" under the baton of Seiji Ozawa in the Tanglewood Music Shed on Saturday evening, July 11th.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 10 1970 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 8 1970 New England Newsclip

Michael Thomas To Conduct Friday

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the orchestra for the first time at Tanglewood Friday evening at 9. Thomas, who was not scheduled to make his debut until July 19, replaces Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, bedridden with flu.

The program will feature Glinka's overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 1 in G minor (Winter Dreams), and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." Thomas is well acquainted with all these works, having played the Stravinsky piece three times previously at Tanglewood. He will conduct the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in an open rehearsal of the work tomorrow evening at 8:30.

Thomas will appear with the Chicago Symphony on Sunday.

DOWN BEAT
CHICAGO, ILL.
E. O. WEEK 67,000

JUL 23 1970

William Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra will be performed at Tanglewood July 12 by Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band and the Boston Symphony. Siegel has previously done the work with the Chicago Symphony and the New York Philharmonic.

R. F. deBURGOS

PHYLLIS CURTIN

ROSALIND ELIAS

GEORGE SHIRLEY

JULY 10-12

Weekend Activities At Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — The second weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra feature Conductors Seiji Ozawa and Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, and a concert version of Mozart's Cosi fan tutte.

Weekend Prelude

The weekend begins this Friday at 7 p.m. with St. John's College Choir featured in the Weekend Prelude. Weekend Prelude concerts are free to ticket - holders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert. At 9 p.m., Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos conducts the Boston Symphony in two works by Falla, El amor brujo, and Suite from The Three - cornered Hat. The second half of the program features Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring.

On Saturday at 8.30 p.m., Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa devotes the entire evening to Mozart's Cosi fan tutte with soloists Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause, and Ezio Flagello. Ozawa conducts next Sunday at 2.30 p.m. with soloists Peter Serkin and the Corky Siegel Blues Band. Works performed will be Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet, Schoenberg's Piano Concerto with Serkin as soloist, and Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra with the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

Each Saturday at 10.30 a.m. there is an open rehearsal in the shed which benefits the orchestra's pension fund. Seats are unreserved and are on sale the morning of the rehearsal.

Contemporary Concert

Tanglewood, in collaboration with Bill Graham's Fillmore East, presents the first of three Contemporary Trends Concerts Tuesday. Featured will be The Who, Jerthro Tull, and It's A Beautiful Day. Music begins at 6 p.m.

The Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's unique summer academy at Tanglewood presents a Faculty Recital on Wednesday at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre - Concert Hall. Thursday at 8.30 p.m., Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller conducts the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in an open rehearsal in the Theatre - Concert Hall. There will be a Berkshire Music Center chamber music concert next Sunday at 10 a.m. in the Chamber Music Hall and a faculty Recital at 8.30 p.m. in the Theatre - Concert Hall.

BERKSHIRE NATIONAL CONCERTS

Friday, July 10
7 p.m. Shed
Weekend Prelude
ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE CHOIR

9 p.m. Shed
RAFAEL FRUHBECK DE BURGOS
Falla: El amor brujo
Falla: Two suites from 'The Three - cornered hat'
Stravinsky: The Rite of Spring

Saturday, July 11
10.30 a.m. Shed
Open Rehearsal
8.30 p.m. Shed
SEIJI OZAWA
Mozart: Cosi fan tutte
PHYLLIS CURTIN, TERESA STRATAS, ROSALIND ELIAS
GEORGE SHIRLEY, TOM KRAUSE
EZIO FLAGELLO

Sunday July 12
2.30 p.m. Shed
SEIJI OZAWA
Prokofiev: Romeo and Juliet
Schoenberg: Piano Concerto
PETER SERKIN
Russo: Three Pieces for Blues and Orchestra
CORKY SIEGEL BLUES BA

PETER SERKIN

AT TANGLEWOOD on Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Peter Serkin will perform Schoenberg's Piano Concerto under the baton of Seiji Ozawa. Serkin has made frequent guest appearances with the major symphony orchestras, as recitalist, chamber music performer, and recording artist.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUL 5 1970 New England Newsclip

17,958 Attend Weekend Concerts

A total audience of 17,958 attended the weekend concerts at Tanglewood. Friday night's concert drew 4,277, the Saturday morning rehearsal 2,040, Saturday night 4,622 and Sunday afternoon 7,019.

Attendance was down 410 from the number of people attending the second weekend of Tanglewood concerts in 1969.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 13 1970 New England Newsclip

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,040 (S) 56,127

JUL 11 1970 New England Newsclip

CITIZEN ITEM
ALLSTON-BRIGHTON
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY CIRC. 7,600

JUL 2 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood concert features Mozart

The second weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra feature Conductors Seiji Ozawa and Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, and a concert version of Mozart's Cosi fan tutte.

The weekend begins Friday, July 10 at 7 p.m. with St. John's College Choir featured in the Weekend Prelude. Weekend Prelude concerts are free to ticket holders of the 9 p.m. Poston Symphony concert. At 9 p.m. Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos conducts the Boston Symphony in two works by Falla, El amor brujo, and Suite from The Three-cornered Hat. The second half of the program features Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring.

Fruhbeck de Burgos, Spain's most important conductor, currently holds the title of Music Director of the National Orchestra in Madrid. He has conducted most of Europe's leading orchestras, including the London Symphony, London Philharmonic, the National Orchestra, the Orchestra of the Conservatoire de Paris, and the Vienna Philharmonic. In this country, he has appeared with the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, and the Chicago Symphony. His appearance at Tanglewood this summer marks his debut with the Boston Symphony.

On Saturday, July 11 at 8:30 p.m., Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa devotes the entire evening to Mozart's Cosi fan tutte with soloists Phyllis Curtin, Teresa Stratas, Rosalind Elias, George Shirley, Tom Krause, and Ezio Flagello. Ozawa conducts on Sunday, July 12 at 2:30 p.m. with soloists Peter Serkin and the Corky Siegel Blues Band. Works performed will be Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet, Schoenberg's Piano Concerto with Serkin as soloist, and Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra with the Corky Siegel Blues Band.

Each Saturday at 10:30 a.m. there is an open rehearsal in the Shed which benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund. Seats are unreserved and are on sale at $2.50 each the morning of the rehearsal.

Tanglewood, in collaboration with Bill Graham's Fillmore East, presents the first of three Contemporary Trends Concerts Tuesday, July 7. Featured will be The Who, Jethro Tull, and It's A Beautiful Day. Music begins at 6 p.m.

The Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's unique summer academy at Tanglewood presents a Faculty Recital on Wednesday, July 8 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Thursday, July 9 at 8:30 p.m., Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller conducts the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in an open rehearsal in the Theatre-Concert Hall. There will be a Berkshire Music Center chamber music concert Sunday July 12 at 10:00 a.m. in the Chamber Music Hall and a Faculty Recital at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall

FLUSHING, N. Y.
FRESH MEADOWS
TOWNSMAN
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 24,000

JUL 2 1970

OPERA AT TANGLEWOOD

Rosalind Elias

Metropolitan Opera mezzo-soprano ROSALIND ELIAS, who will be the Dorabella for the Berkshire Festival's performance of Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte" under the baton of Seiji Ozawa in the Tanglewood Music Shed on Saturday evening, July 11th.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 10 1970 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 8 1970 New England Newsclip

Michael Thomas To Conduct Friday

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the orchestra for the first time at Tanglewood Friday evening at 9. Thomas, who was not scheduled to make his debut until July 19, replaces Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, bedridden with flu.

The program will feature Glinka's overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla," the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 1 in G minor (Winter Dreams), and Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring." Thomas is well acquainted with all these works, having played the Stravinsky piece three times previously at Tanglewood. He will conduct the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in an open rehearsal of the work tomorrow evening at 8:30.

Thomas will appear with the Chicago Symphony on Sunday.

DAILY NEWS
CHICAGO, ILL.
E. O. WEEK 67,000

JUL 23 1970

William Russo's Three Pieces for Blues Band and Orchestra will be performed at Tanglewood July 12 by Corky Siegel's Happy Year Band and the Boston Symphony. Siegel has previously done the work with the Chicago Symphony and the New York Philharmonic.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JUL 23 1970 New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

OZAWA AND THOMAS CONDUCT

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

During the third weekend of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tanglewood series at Lenox, Mozart came in for expert attention with the Piano concerto in A (K488), the Serenade no. 10 in B flat for thirteen winds and the Piano Concerto in D minor (K466). The first was played by Yuji Takahashi, who at 32 is especially valued for his performances of contemporary music. He demonstrated an equal virtuosity with Mozart, brilliant but not showy, concentrated so that the piano kept within the framework of the orchestra and itself shone from within. Rabatto, as in the Adagio, was delicately controlled to free the poignant singing line. Ensemble, thanks to Seije Ozawa, the conductor, was perfect except for one tiny spot when the pianist forgot to listen to the orchestra.

The Concerto was preceded by Haydn's Symphony No. 86 in D, spirited with dynamic variety and formal invention, and when development is most predictable, always a surprise, even in the Minuetto.

After intermission, John Alexander, Metropolitan tenor, and James Stagliano, first French horn of the Symphony, soloed in Britten's Serenade for tenor, horn and strings. The five poems of the cycle came from differing periods of English literature but are all treated musically as if contemporary. The horn-calls at beginning and end set and reaffirm the mood of distance—of loveliness lost. But there is great variety, too, and Mr. Alexander did full justice to the expressive aptness of the text-settings. For me, the thrill comes when an anonymous Dirge of the fifteenth century begins with a soft, high keening in the voice ("This ae nighte, this ae nighte, every nighte and alle—") Or in the wide quiet of chord progressions that create a troubled acceptance for the Keats' sonnet ("O soft embalmer of the still midnight—").

Ibert called his work of 1930 Divertissement. It is high burlesque carried by marches that sound like those of a circus band studded with irrelevant allusions: Mendelssohn's Wedding March, a Strauss waltz, etc. including the violent interruption of a piano cadenza of fashionable tone - cluster fury. The conclusion, an Offenbachish can-can, punctured by the wild piano, brought down the house and sent us home happy.

Saturday night Ozawa concentrated on two Mozarts—The Wind Serenade and the D minor Concerto made a good balance and a satisfying sufficiency as a program. Mozart's hunch—that he could get more value out of the then unusual clarinets without flutes in the way—proved successful. Two clarinets cooling singing, with the alto clarinet (basset horn) for bass, made contrast to the double - reeds, sometimes a mixture with oboes as pepper —and both groups stood out against the chordal glow of the horns. It is glorified outdoor music and was gloriously played by the Boston men, quite right for the open spaces of Tanglewood shed and lawns.

The D minor Concerto is something else and so is Lili Kraus. The Hungarian pianist has been famous for many years as an interpreter of Mozart. She has the air and authority of the big time. She, of course, plays with intelligent and expressive virtuosity and we know Mozart as a most dramatically expressive composer. But for me there was a kind of egotistic exploitation of both piano and Mozart—a personalizing by a personality that took the piano away from its intimate relationship, a chamber-relationship, with the orchestra and made the performance a star-turn.

The over-phrasing in the first allegro seemed at the expense of the dramatic line and not matchable by the orchestra. The Romance was romantic alright, but more self-conscious than drama should be. It can be this way—like Don Giovanni—but I suspect a deeper intention, closer to the string quartets. Along with the dramatic directness of Mozart goes also his disinclination to wear his heart on his sleeve. Characteristically Lili Kraus used Beethoven's assertive cadenzas —good fantasies in themselves but a different world of sensibility.

Not all great performers are stage-struck. There was Kreisler and Szegeti, Huberman, Casals, Schnabel — and, I'd guess, the mature Mozart.

Ozawa Conducts BSO In Haydn, Mozart Works

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Nearly all the romantic warmth there is in a Haydn symphony and a Mozart piano concerto was laid out for inspection Friday night at Tanglewood.

Seiji Ozawa conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of Haydn's 86th Symphony and Mozart's K.488 Piano Concerto with Yuji Takahashi as soloist.

It was graceful music, gentle and kind...pleasing, but without the exactness of precision a discriminating listener has reason to expect from 18th century classics in the hands of such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was, of course, neat. But a knifelike sharpness was lacking. Perhaps it was unwanted. Perhaps Ozawa was willing to accept a few fuzzy starts in exchange for a generally benign atmosphere.

Yuji Takahashi, a young Japanese composer widely known in avant garde musical circles, was soloist for the piano concerto.

He is 32, looks like a 15-year-old boy and plays with the delicacy of expression one might expect from a girl.

His middle-strength touch on the keyboard was appropriate to Mozart, however, and although he seemed a bit cool, even for Mozart, the romantic freedom he had shown with Bach in recital before the full orchestral concert was not as evident.

It was a nicely played, chamber-sized concerto; not inspiring, but nice. The slow middle movement was beautifully liquid and lyrical, easily the best passage of the piece.

After intermission John Alexander, tenor, and James Staglian, French horn player, were soloists for a performance of Benjamin Britten's Serenade for Tenor, Horn and Strings, Opus 31.

The most interesting, academic aspect of the piece is the composer's use of untempered scales, a technical procedure resulting in some fascinating, odd harmonies.

The piece consists of a 24-minute setting of six poems from as disparate sources as 15th Century anonymous and William Blake composed almost 300 years ago.

The music unifies them abstractly and the unusual harmonies and tonal juxtapositions (horn and tenor) made them a welcome change from the usual concept fare.

Stagliano is the orchestra's regular, first chair horn player. Some fans consider him one of the best in the nation.

He handled this extremely difficult piece with sensitivity as well as finesse Friday. We should hear his solo horn more often.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 18 1970 New England Newsclip

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

JUL 19 1970

Seiji Ozawa Blends the Modern With the Classic at Tanglewood

By ALLEN HUGHES
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., July 18—The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Festival, founded in 1934, is the country's oldest major music festival. From the very beginning, its idyllic setting here at Tanglewood and its high level of artistic excellence have made it a focal point in the summer musical life of the nation and the world. Its past programing under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, Charles Munch and Erich Leinsdorf usually followed a safely conservative line, and its generous offerings of familiar symphonic fare kept the public coming back in great numbers summer after summer.

This year, a new musical breeze is sweeping through the lofty trees that shade Tanglewood's superb lawns. Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller are sharing the artistic direction of the festival, with Leonard Bernstein as adviser, and the programs they have devised are liberally sprinkled with 20th-century works, several of which have never been performed previously by the Boston Symphony.

Last night, for example, in a concert conducted by Mr. Ozawa, the second half of the program was given over to Britten's Serenade for Tenor, Horn and Strings and Ibert's Divertissement. The first half was originally to have included Iannis Xenakis's "Eonta," with Yuji Takahashi as piano soloist, but for some reason Mr. Takahashi ended up playing Mozart's Piano Concerto in A (K. 488). The opening work was Haydn's Symphony No. 86 in D.

Britten's Serenade, which dates from 1943 and incorporates poems by Ben Jonson, Blake, Keats and Tennyson, among others, was the high point of the evening. The felicity of the composer's vocal writing and his imaginative and atmospheric scoring for the instruments combine to make a work that lingers hauntingly in the memory. John Alexander was the tenor soloist and James Stagliano the horn player. Both performed with noteworthy sensitivity in an interpretation carefully shaped and balanced by Mr. Ozawa.

Ibert's Divertissement with its kidding of the Mendelssohn Wedding March and Strauss's "Blue Danube Waltz" and other bits of nonsense, was a fun piece, and Mr. Ozawa did it to a turn.

The disappointment of the concert was Mr. Takahashi's performance of the Mozart Concerto. Since this young pianist is known for his expertise with contemporary (including avant-garde) Music, it was a pity that he let himself in for Mozart, which made him seem ineffectual in every way. In the brief "Weekend Prelude" recital, which he played before the main concert, he showed how impressive he can be in an authoritative account of Messiaen's "Canteyodjaya."

In that same program, however, he included two Bach's Partitas that were so perfunctory in execution that the listener could only wonder why he bothered to play them. If it is Mr. Takahashi's wish to break out of the confines of contemporary music, he will surely have to do a lot of hard thinking and hard work in the areas of interpretation and projection to make the transition.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 21 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood / Thomas conducts Hadyn, Bach

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Like most others here, Michael Tilson Thomas' concert with the Boston Symphony on Sunday afternoon suffered from under-rehearsal; still, there is something so with it about Thomas' conducting, such vigilance, and so lively a concern for every stage for the unfolding of musical events, as to make the encounter with his kind of music an enormous pleasure, and the more so in contrast with Seiji Ozawa's inattentive drifting through so much of the music at Friday's and Saturday's concerts.

Thomas began with Haydn's Symphony 98 in B flat, which he had conducted in Boston several times last season, and ended with Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" Suite. In between came Bach's Cantata 51, "Jauchzet Gott in Allen Landen," and Ernst Krenek's concert aria, "Die Nachtigall," (The Nightengale), both with the soprano Bethany Beardsle as soloist.

Krenek's name called to mind 12-tone music of a particularly severe sort or, to the historically-minded, his 1927 opera, "Jonny Spielt Auf," one of the first attempts at a serious liaison between jazz and "classical" music, and a stunning, though passing, success. "Die Nichigall" is from another of Krenek's lives. Written in 1931, it is one of the last works from a neo-Romantic phase that had begun about six years earlier. The text is the passage from "The Birds" by Aristophanes in an ardent German paraphrase by Karl Kraus. It begins with a lush curtain of string and flute tone, madly chromatic. Krenek sets the words in a soaring vocal line which evokes more than anything the world of Richard Strauss, the Presentation of the Rose, Daphne's Transformation, "Bor den Schlafengehen," and so forth.

Seductively pretty, "Die Nichtigall" is an amorphous piece.

Effectively supported by Thomas and the orchestra, Bethany Beardsle sang Krenek's aria beautifully. One might ask whether something as chamber-musical as Bach's Cantata can really be made to work in the huge Tanglewood shed at all. In any case, Beardsle is not the right singer for it. Singing fast is not what she does best and she is also a bit non-verbal for such music. Her singing was admirably musical, but strained; the surrounding instrumental texture was delivered in a rather mutual manner, though the trumpet obbligatos at the beginning and end were elegantly played by Armando Ghitalla.

The Haydn symphony was vigorous, serious and amusing, each in its proper place. The "Pulcinella" performance started well, but lost some of its high spirits after the gavotte went to pieces in a way that evidently unnerved both conductor and players.

52

Ozawa, Thomas Conduct at Festival

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — It was a fascinating combination of youth and the more experienced at the Berkshire Music Festival's third weekend at Tanglewood.

Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the Boston Symphony. The orchestra was reduced to about 50 players so that the rest could perform the Esplanade concerts in Boston.

Ozawa's soloist Saturday night was the revered Hungarian pianist Lili Kraus, who achieved fame in the early 30s before the birth of either conductor.

Yesterday's soloist, under Thomas, was Bethany Beardslee, soprano. In Bach's cantata No. 51 she was assisted by Armando Ghitala, first trumpeter with the Boston Symphony.

Attendance for the weekend was 20,439.

Sheer Delight

Saturday night's Mozart program was sheer delight. Ozawa's efficiency and craft were at a peak. The entire evening was one of unadulterated melody and unfettered classic style.

Orchestral work was Serenade No. 10 in B flat for 13 wind instruments, K.361. Mme. Kraus was soloist in Piano Concerto in D minor K.466.

After the long parade of young pianists who try to transform Mozart piano concertos into "hoopla" epics, it was refreshing to experience Mme. Kraus' experiency in achieving more impressive results with half the effort.

Even though she's a human encyclopedia of Mozart's piano music, her performance of the D minor Concerto fell somewhat short of perfection.

Her tempos and the orchestra's were not always compatible. There were a few technical strains in the first movement cadenza.

But rarely have we heard Mozart interpreted more truthfully. No pressure to get the notes played, exaggerations of volume or speed, and enough lacework to cover the Tanglewood Music Shed.

Music Review

Rapid, rippling passages flowed. Every phrase was thoroughly sharpened and polished. The slow movement was a broad spectrum of hues from the most delicate to deep sonority.

Much the same standard emanated from the Serenade for Winds. It was light sound without frailty. Ozawa gave painstaking attention to every detail.

In short, the group sounded like an ensemble but played like soloists.

If one were to select which would survive among the young podium giants, there would be little risk in including Thomas.

The orchestra was with him yesterday, every note of the way. The men responded precisely to his incisive beat in Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B flat. He, in turn, spelled out every detail. His style was vigorous but not wasteful.

Even with Thomas fine cooperation and Ghitala's bright trumpeting, Miss Beardlee struggled to encompass Bach's cantata, "Praise God in All Lands."

It was a courageous and laborouis undertaking. Her voice remained with a light lyricism and she was generally loyal to pitch.

But the dominating impression was a difficult vocal exercise which explored Miss Beardslee's high range to best advantage.

Dance Contrast

Her performance of Krenek's "The Nightingale" was, on the other hand, utterly beautiful. She negotiated the work's soaring range with ease, always engaging the resplendent phrases with a voice of commensurate beauty.

Stravinsky's highly conservative and modestly endowed ballet music, "Pulcinella," received a highly respectful performance by Thomas and the orchestra.

The dances were graphically contrasted — from sparkling humor to piquant, sentimental and folkish.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 20 1970 New England Newsclip

Seiji Ozawa at Tanglewood

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Tanglewood's new artistic director, Seiji Ozawa, is undependable. He can give considered performances and sometimes beautiful ones, as his work this summer at Tanglewood with Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" and Schoenberg's piano concerto has been a reminder. What happens, however, is that Ozawa's responsible performances alternate bewilderingly with others that are, at best, casual and, at times, some that can lead only to the inference that he is not prepared.

The Boston Symphony concerts Friday and Saturday evening that Ozawa conducted at Tanglewood's third weekend were of a musical thoughtlessness that is to be deplored. With the possible exception of a prformance Friday of Ibert's "Divertissement," which I did not hear, only the performance Saturday of Mozart's D minor piano concerto was at a level important to an import festival and a major orchestra, and that's thanks chiefly to the contribution of the soloist, Lili Kraus.

Kraus's playing was warm, free, impulsive, with a nice sense of the operatic element in Mozart's instrumental music, and with a refreshing touch of something inventively improvisational through it. Though liable occasionally to bolting, she played with stimulating rhythmic energy, and she is someone who can really make you feel syncopations, not just count them. Ozawa's strong characterization of the concerto's tense beginning promised a more distinguished collaboration than was delivered, but his work was at least awake and punctual.

The vague, indifferent level of performance was represented Saturday by Mozart's Serenade for 13 wind instruments and Friday by Hadyn's Symphony 86 in D. Both went well enough, though without much sense of character when the going was sufficiently obvious.

Both came to grief in their slow movements, in the one because of the elaborate texture, the other because of a witty capriciousness of rhetoric, both being there for music that required a stronger conductor and active intervention for which Ozawa seemed too indolent and too uncommitted. The wind playing of the serenade, though in tune, was unattractive by being limited to unsubstantial and extreme piano and shrill and extreme forte.

The week-end's other Mozart concerto was the A Major, K. 488, done Friday with Yugi Takahashi as soloist. The 32-year-old Japanese pianist, who has a reputation as a performer of avant-garde music, had, in fact, first been scheduled to play a "Eonta" by Xenakis. Why the switch to Mozart was made I do not know, but it was a mistake. Takahaski and Ozawa lurched through the concerto on separate and not quite parallel paths, the pianist producing a tone which, when audible at all, suggested the beating of wooden spoons in bowls of oatmeal, and generally showing few musical or even technical qualifications for his assignment.

Benjamin Britten's poetic serenade for tenor, horn and strings, also on Friday's program, never had a chance. The tenor had an Eartha Kitt flutter, the manner of a Las Vegas entertainer, and he sang flat; the hornist played mostly wrong notes — and sometimes none at all — at the wrong times and with the wrong dynamics; the panicked and unsure conductor took flight in pushing things along as quickly as he dared. In no concert by a professional orchestra have I experienced such a void between the composition and its performance.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUL 19 1970 New England Newsclip

Exactness Dulled In Haydn, Mozart

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Nearly all the romantic warmth there is in a Haydn symphony and a Mozart piano concerto was laid out for inspection Friday night at Tanglewood.

Seiji Ozawa conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of Haydn's 86th Symphony and Mozart's K.488 Piano Concerto with Yuji Takahashi as soloist.

It was graceful music, gentle and kind . . . pleasing, but without the exactness of precision a discriminating listener has reason to expect from 18th century classics in the hands of such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was, of course, neat. But a knifelike sharpness was lacking. Perhaps it was unwanted. Perhaps Ozawa was willing to accept a few fuzzy starts in exchange for a generally benign atmosphere.

Yuji Takahashi, a young Japanese composer widely known in avant garde musical circles, was soloist for the piano concerto.

He is 32, looks like a 15-year-old boy and plays with the delicacy of expression one might expect from a girl.

His middle-strength touch on the keyboard was appropriate to Mozart, however, and although he seemed a bit cool, even for Mozart, the romantic freedom he had shown with Bach in recital before the full orchestral concert was not as evident.

It was a nicely played, chamber-sized concerto; not inspiring, but nice. The slow middle movement was beautifully liquid and lyrical, easily the best passage of the piece.

After intermission John Alexander, tenor, and James Staglian, French horn player, were soloists for a performance of Benjamin Britten's Serenade for Tenor, Horn and Strings, Opus 31.

The most interesting, academic aspect of the piece is the composer's use of untempered scales, a technical procedure resulting in some fascinating, odd harmonies.

The piece consists of a 24-minute setting of six poems from a disparate source as 15th Century anonymous and William Blake composed almost 300 years ago.

The music unifies them abstractly and the unusual harmonies and tonal juxtapositions (horn and tenor) made them a welcome change from the usual concert fare.

Stagliano is the orchestra's regular, first chair horn player. Some fans consider him one of the best in the nation.

He handled this extremely difficult piece with sensitivity as weel as finesse Friday. We should hear his solo horn more often.

AMERICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(E) 42,315

JUL 22 1970 New England Newsclip

Pianist Lacked Emotional Depth

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in their third weekend of the Tanglewood Festival Series, presented a combination of classic and modern music Friday evening with Seiji Ozawa conducting Haydn's Symphony No. 86 in D and Mozart's Piano Concerto in A K. 488.

Yuji Takahashi, a young Japanese pianist, was originally scheduled to play Iannis Xenakis's "Eonta," but performed Mozart's Piano Concerto instead. This beautiful and melodic work was not given its best interpretation, however, as this noted artist fumbled his runs and seemed very tense and nervous, especially in the first movement.

He did not bring any emotional depth and did not demonstrate a good command of the music. Conductor Ozawa has directed several Mozart works this season, with none of the efferescence and sparkle this great composer deserves. Friday's Mozart Concerto was not too successful and Ozawa's Mozartean performances have been quite disappointing to this reviewer.

The second half of the concert was devoted to Benjamin Britten's Serenade for tenor, horn and strings, op. 31, a first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. John Alexander, tenor, who shared the solos with James Stagliano, horn, gave a fine performance of this contemporary composer's sensitive and hauntingly poignant work. Britten composed this piece in 1934 and based his music on the poems of Ben Johnson, Blake, Keats and Tennyson, among others, and the result was a sheer magical delight.

Friday's concert ended with Jacques Ibert's "Divertissement," which was completed in 1930 and first performed in Paris Nov. 30 of that year. This fun piece reflects the influence of the impressionist and neo-classical composers of the early decades of this century. The composer's intertwining bits of the Mendelssohn's Wedding March and Strauss' Blue Danube Valse, and other bits of amusing interpolations delighted the audience of 4,648. The Weekend Prelude Recital which preceded the main concert, was attended by a few thousand and was not particularly inspiring, but did demonstrate Takahahashi's virtuoso command of the piano in his performance of Messiaen's "Canteyodjaya". His two Bach Partitas were most perfunctory and dull. He is primarily noted in the area of contemporary, avant garde and electronic music and his interpretation and playing of both Bach and Mozart came off rather badly.

Heavy Downpour

Saturday evening, despite a heavy downpour before the concert, brought the largest audience tournout of the weekend with 7,407 in attendance. Understandably, the large audience came to hear the eminent Mozartean pianist Lili Kraus, who performed the Mozart's Piano Concerto in D minor K.466, during the last half of the concert. The first half was devoted to Mozart's Serenade No. 10 in B flat for thirteen wind instruments K.361.

Since a large segment of the Boston Symphony players are still up in Boston performing in the Esplanade Concerts, this chamber work was most convenient and economic in terms of instrumentation. The virtuoso quality of this work was magnificent, and gave these instrumentalists an opportunity to perform their own specialty and was a rare musical experience for the audience. Especially noteworthy was the Mozart genius in composing for the flutes and clarinets.

The highlight of the weekend to this reviewer, was the performance of Lili Kraus' Piano Concerto in D minor K.466. Her command of the emotional and dynamic quality that is Mozart's genius was clearly felt during her entire performance. Her tone was lyrical, sensitive yet powerful, her technique brilliant and her manner gracious and disarming.

Sunny weather Sunday brought an audience of 6,268 to hear soprano Bethany Beardslee in Bach's Cantata No. 51. "Jauchzet Gott in allen Landed" for soprano and orchestra with trumpet obligato, a most difficult work which poses almost a formidable challenge to vocalists.

Miss Beardslee seemed to be somewhat nervous and rushed at the beginning aria and recitative, but sang the beautiful "Alleluia" with much more freedom and assurance. Her voice, though small, is clear and bell-like in tone. She received a most enthusiastic ovation. Praise is also due Armando Ghitalla, trumpet soloist, for his true virtuoso performance.

Sunday's concert was conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, 26-year-old associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He chose Haydn's Symphony 98 in B flat for the opening work, which the small, reduced orchestra played with verve and spirit. Thomas appeared to be in command of the orchestra and conducted with assurance and a brisk, aggressive tempo.

The second half brought Miss Beardslee back to perform Ernst Krenek's "Die Nachtigall", Concert Aria for coloratura, two flutes and strings op.68, a first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Miss Beardslee sang with much more assurance, sensitivity and expression. This neo-romantic work, was sung with beautiful feeling. The conductor controlled the orchestral accompaniment, to give the singer free reign. Miss Beardslee was given a standing ovation.

Ozawa, Thomas Conduct at Festival

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — It was a fascinating combination of youth and the more experienced at the Berkshire Music Festival's third weekend at Tanglewood.

Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the Boston Symphony. The orchestra was reduced to about 50 players so that the rest could perform the Esplanade concerts in Boston.

Ozawa's soloist Saturday night was the revered Hungarian pianist Lili Kraus, who achieved fame in the early 30s before the birth of either conductor.

Yesterday's soloist, under Thomas, was Bethany Beardslee, soprano. In Bach's cantata No. 51 she was assisted by Armando Ghitala, first trumpeter with the Boston Symphony.

Attendance for the weekend was 20,439.

Sheer Delight

Saturday night's Mozart program was sheer delight. Ozawa's efficiency and craft were at a peak. The entire evening was one of unadulterated melody and unfettered classic style.

Orchestral work was Serenade No. 10 in B flat for 13 wind instruments, K.361. Mme. Kraus was soloist in Piano Concerto in D minor K.466.

After the long parade of young pianists who try to transform Mozart piano concertos into "hoopla" epics, it was refreshing to experience Mme. Kraus' experiency in achieving more impressive results with half the effort.

Even though she's a human encyclopedia of Mozart's piano music, her performance of the D minor Concerto fell somewhat short of perfection.

Her tempos and the orchestra's were not always compatible. There were a few technical strains in the first movement cadenza.

But rarely have we heard Mozart interpreted more truthfully. No pressure to get the notes played, exaggerations of volume or speed, and enough lacework to cover the Tanglewood Music Shed.

Music Review

Rapid, rippling passages flowed. Every phrase was thoroughly sharpened and polished. The slow movement was a broad spectrum of hues from the most delicate to deep sonority.

Much the same standard emanated from the Serenade for Winds. It was light sound without frailty. Ozawa gave painstaking attention to every detail.

In short, the group sounded like an ensemble but played like soloists.

If one were to select which would survive among the young podium giants, there would be little risk in including Thomas.

The orchestra was with him yesterday, every note of the way. The men responded precisely to his incisive beat in Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B flat. He, in turn, spelled out every detail. His style was vigorous but not wasteful.

Even with Thomas fine cooperation and Ghitala's bright trumpeting, Miss Beardlee struggled to encompass Bach's cantata, "Praise God in All Lands."

It was a courageous and laborouis undertaking. Her voice remained with a light lyricism and she was generally loyal to pitch.

But the dominating impression was a difficult vocal exercise which explored Miss Beardslee's high range to best advantage.

Dance Contrast

Her performance of Krenek's "The Nightingale" was, on the other hand, utterly beautiful. She negotiated the work's soaring range with ease, always engaging the resplendent phrases with a voice of commensurate beauty.

Stravinsky's highly conservative and modestly endowed ballet music, "Pulcinella," received a highly respectful performance by Thomas and the orchestra.

The dances were graphically contrasted — from sparkling humor to piquant, sentimental and folkish.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 20 1970 New England Newsclip

Seiji Ozawa at Tanglewood

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Tanglewood's new artistic director, Seiji Ozawa, is undependable. He can give considered performances and sometimes beautiful ones, as his work this summer at Tanglewood with Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" and Schoenberg's piano concerto has been a reminder. What happens, however, is that Ozawa's responsible performances alternate bewilderingly with others that are, at best, casual and, at times, some that can lead only to the inference that he is not prepared.

The Boston Symphony concerts Friday and Saturday evening that Ozawa conducted at Tanglewood's third weekend were of a musical thoughtlessness that is to be deplored. With the possible exception of a prformance Friday of Ibert's "Divertissement," which I did not hear, only the performance Saturday of Mozart's D minor piano concerto was at a level important to an import festival and a major orchestra, and that's thanks chiefly to the contribution of the soloist, Lili Kraus.

Kraus's playing was warm, free, impulsive, with a nice sense of the operatic element in Mozart's instrumental music, and with a refreshing touch of something inventively improvisational through it. Though liable occasionally to bolting, she played with stimulating rhythmic energy, and she is someone who can really make you feel syncopations, not just count them. Ozawa's strong characterization of the concerto's tense beginning promised a more distinguished collaboration than was delivered, but his work was at least awake and punctual.

The vague, indifferent level of performance was represented Saturday by Mozart's Serenade for 13 wind instruments and Friday by Hadyn's Symphony 86 in D. Both went well enough, though without much sense of character when the going was sufficiently obvious.

Both came to grief in their slow movements, in the one because of the elaborate texture, the other because of a witty capriciousness of rhetoric, both being there for music that required a stronger conductor and active intervention for which Ozawa seemed too indolent and too uncommitted. The wind playing of the serenade, though in tune, was unattractive by being limited to unsubstantial and extreme piano and shrill and extreme forte.

The week-end's other Mozart concerto was the A Major, K. 488, done Friday with Yugi Takahashi as soloist. The 32-year-old Japanese pianist, who has a reputation as a performer of avant-garde music, had, in fact, first been scheduled to play a "Eonta" by Xenakis. Why the switch to Mozart was made I do not know, but it was a mistake. Takahaski and Ozawa lurched through the concerto on separate and not quite parallel paths, the pianist producing a tone which, when audible at all, suggested the beating of wooden spoons in bowls of oatmeal, and generally showing few musical or even technical qualifications for his assignment.

Benjamin Britten's poetic serenade for tenor, horn and strings, also on Friday's program, never had a chance. The tenor had an Eartha Kitt flutter, the manner of a Las Vegas entertainer, and he sang flat; the hornist played mostly wrong notes — and sometimes none at all — at the wrong times and with the wrong dynamics; the panicked and unsure conductor took flight in pushing things along as quickly as he dared. In no concert by a professional orchestra have I experienced such a void between the composition and its performance.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUL 19 1970 New England Newsclip

Exactness Dulled In Haydn, Mozart

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Nearly all the romantic warmth there is in a Haydn symphony and a Mozart piano concerto was laid out for inspection Friday night at Tanglewood.

Seiji Ozawa conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of Haydn's 86th Symphony and Mozart's K.488 Piano Concerto with Yuji Takahashi as soloist.

It was graceful music, gentle and kind . . . pleasing, but without the exactness of precision a discriminating listener has reason to expect from 18th century classics in the hands of such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was, of course, neat. But a knifelike sharpness was lacking. Perhaps it was unwanted. Perhaps Ozawa was willing to accept a few fuzzy starts in exchange for a generally benign atmosphere.

Yuji Takahashi, a young Japanese composer widely known in avant garde musical circles, was soloist for the piano concerto.

He is 32, looks like a 15-year-old boy and plays with the delicacy of expression one might expect from a girl.

His middle-strength touch on the keyboard was appropriate to Mozart, however, and although he seemed a bit cool, even for Mozart, the romantic freedom he had shown with Bach in recital before the full orchestral concert was not as evident.

It was a nicely played, chamber-sized concerto; not inspiring, but nice. The slow middle movement was beautifully liquid and lyrical, easily the best passage of the piece.

After intermission John Alexander, tenor, and James Staglian, French horn player, were soloists for a performance of Benjamin Britten's Serenade for Tenor, Horn and Strings, Opus 31.

The most interesting, academic aspect of the piece is the composer's use of untempered scales, a technical procedure resulting in some fascinating, odd harmonies.

The piece consists of a 24-minute setting of six poems from a disparate source as 15th Century anonymous and William Blake composed almost 300 years ago.

The music unifies them abstractly and the unusual harmonies and tonal juxtapositions (horn and tenor) made them a welcome change from the usual concert fare.

Stagliano is the orchestra's regular, first chair horn player. Some fans consider him one of the best in the nation.

He handled this extremely difficult piece with sensitivity as weel as finesse Friday. We should hear his solo horn more often.

AMERICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(E) 42,315

JUL 22 1970 New England Newsclip

Pianist Lacked Emotional Depth

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in their third weekend of the Tanglewood Festival Series, presented a combination of classic and modern music Friday evening with Seiji Ozawa conducting Haydn's Symphony No. 86 in D and Mozart's Piano Concerto in A K. 488.

Yuji Takahashi, a young Japanese pianist, was originally scheduled to play Iannis Xenakis's "Eonta," but performed Mozart's Piano Concerto instead. This beautiful and melodic work was not given its best interpretation, however, as this noted artist fumbled his runs and seemed very tense and nervous, especially in the first movement.

He did not bring any emotional depth and did not demonstrate a good command of the music. Conductor Ozawa has directed several Mozart works this season, with none of the efferescence and sparkle this great composer deserves. Friday's Mozart Concerto was not too successful and Ozawa's Mozartean performances have been quite disappointing to this reviewer.

The second half of the concert was devoted to Benjamin Britten's Serenade for tenor, horn and strings, op. 31, a first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. John Alexander, tenor, who shared the solos with James Stagliano, horn, gave a fine performance of this contemporary composer's sensitive and hauntingly poignant work. Britten composed this piece in 1934 and based his music on the poems of Ben Johnson, Blake, Keats and Tennyson, among others, and the result was a sheer magical delight.

Friday's concert ended with Jacques Ibert's "Divertissement," which was completed in 1930 and first performed in Paris Nov. 30 of that year. This fun piece reflects the influence of the impressionist and neo-classical composers of the early decades of this century. The composer's intertwining bits of the Mendelssohn's Wedding March and Strauss' Blue Danube Valse, and other bits of amusing interpolations delighted the audience of 4,648. The Weekend Prelude Recital which preceded the main concert, was attended by a few thousand and was not particularly inspiring, but did demonstrate Takahahashi's virtuoso command of the piano in his performance of Messiaen's "Canteyodjaya". His two Bach Partitas were most perfunctory and dull. He is primarily noted in the area of contemporary, avant garde and electronic music and his interpretation and playing of both Bach and Mozart came off rather badly.

Heavy Downpour

Saturday evening, despite a heavy downpour before the concert, brought the largest audience tournout of the weekend with 7,407 in attendance. Understandably, the large audience came to hear the eminent Mozartean pianist Lili Kraus, who performed the Mozart's Piano Concerto in D minor K.466, during the last half of the concert. The first half was devoted to Mozart's Serenade No. 10 in B flat for thirteen wind instruments K.361.

Since a large segment of the Boston Symphony players are still up in Boston performing in the Esplanade Concerts, this chamber work was most convenient and economic in terms of instrumentation. The virtuoso quality of this work was magnificent, and gave these instrumentalists an opportunity to perform their own specialty and was a rare musical experience for the audience. Especially noteworthy was the Mozart genius in composing for the flutes and clarinets.

The highlight of the weekend to this reviewer, was the performance of Lili Kraus' Piano Concerto in D minor K.466. Her command of the emotional and dynamic quality that is Mozart's genius was clearly felt during her entire performance. Her tone was lyrical, sensitive yet powerful, her technique brilliant and her manner gracious and disarming.

Sunny weather Sunday brought an audience of 6,268 to hear soprano Bethany Beardslee in Bach's Cantata No. 51. "Jauchzet Gott in allen Landed" for soprano and orchestra with trumpet obligato, a most difficult work which poses almost a formidable challenge to vocalists.

Miss Beardslee seemed to be somewhat nervous and rushed at the beginning aria and recitative, but sang the beautiful "Alleluia" with much more freedom and assurance. Her voice, though small, is clear and bell-like in tone. She received a most enthusiastic ovation. Praise is also due Armando Ghitalla, trumpet soloist, for his true virtuoso performance.

Sunday's concert was conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, 26-year-old associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He chose Haydn's Symphony 98 in B flat for the opening work, which the small, reduced orchestra played with verve and spirit. Thomas appeared to be in command of the orchestra and conducted with assurance and a brisk, aggressive tempo.

The second half brought Miss Beardslee back to perform Ernst Krenek's "Die Nachtigall", Concert Aria for coloratura, two flutes and strings op.68, a first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Miss Beardslee sang with much more assurance, sensitivity and expression. This neo-romantic work, was sung with beautiful feeling. The conductor controlled the orchestral accompaniment, to give the singer free reign. Miss Beardslee was given a standing ovation.

Tension Afflicts Piano Recital

LENO X — The first few moments of the short piano recital offered by Yuji Takahashi at Tanglewood Friday night were uncomfortable. The music gradually smoothed out however.

Attended by 1500

Takahashi played two Bach partitas and Messiaen's "Canteyodjaya," a program of about 43 minutes attended by about 1500 early arrivals for the 9 p.m. performance.

His recital was the regularly scheduled prelude program. Later he played the solo part with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Mozart's K.488 piano concerto.

Takahashi is a delicate pianist, apparently very sensitive to his surroundings as well as his music. The early moments of the recital were afflicted by fumbles during rapid passages apparently a product of tension because they gradually diminished and were virtually gone after 10 minutes. Also, the horrendously difficult Messiaen piece seemed to give him no finger trouble.

Volatile Rendition

Takahashi's view of Bach is volatile. He kept the basic tempos and meters steady and introduced a wealth (some might say excessive amount) of dynamic variety, and rhythmic stretching and contracting.

The Messiaen piece is 11 minutes of disjunct, spasmodic, non-metric, non-melodic, thickly chromatic piano music.

It was played, very likely, with high skill and accuracy because Takahashi is especially expert with contemporary styles.

Tonight Seiji Ozawa will conduct Mozart's Serenade for 13 Wind Instruments, K.361, and the same composer's Piano Concerto K.466 with Lili Kraus as soloist.

Sunday afternoon Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the orchestra in a program of music by Haydn, Bach, Krenek and Stravinsky.

R.C.H.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 18 1970

New England Newsclip

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUL 19 1970

New England Newsclip

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638

JUL 20 1970

Lili Kraus Puts Thunder Into Mozart Concerto

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Lili Kraus is beautiful. She is perhaps in her early 60s and Saturday night at Tanglewood she filled the great shed with her beauty and sent it floating across the lawn.

Happy Grandmother

She played the solo part of Mozart's D Minor Piano Concerto (K.466) with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa.

It was Ozawa's sixth appearance on the Tanglewood podium this summer. His last is scheduled for Aug. 22.

Mrs. Kraus, a happy grandmother, is known the world over for her skill and sensitivity with Mozart's piano concertos (she has recorded all of them).

She is slender, has a demurely aristocratic manner personally as well as musically and shows a glimpse of inner steel now and then.

She played exquisitely Saturday, which, of course, is the way Mozart ought to be heard.

Thunder, Lightning

And in this case, with this particular concerto, she played occasionally with a fair amount of thunder and lightning. This particular concerto is probably as close to an imitation of Beethoven as Mozart could get, considering the number of years he preceded Beethoven.

In fact, Mrs. Kraus played the cadenzas Beethoven wrote for this concerto. He had a special liking for it. It was his kind of Mozart.

The codenzas and Mrs. Kraus sounded wonderful.

It was a distinct pleasure to hear Mozart's Serenade for 13 Wind Instruments again Saturday night. It s seven movements filled 40 minutes before intermission. Leinsdorf conducted it here in 1964.

Written on Commission

It is one of those amiable pieces of party music Mozart wrote on commission, one of his best and probably the longest. The score calls for two oboes, two clarients, two basset horns, four french horns , two bassoons and a bass instrument, probably doublebass since the contrabassoon was rare in those days (so a more proper name for it might be Serenade for 12 Winds and Unidentified Bass).

The basset horns were low register, single-reed instruments whose parts nowadays are taken by alto clarinets, and the bass is played by contrabassoon.

The core of the sound of this piece, therefore, comes from a quartet of clarinets, a dulcet, outdoors sound. Mozart probably would be astounded to see it controlled by a conductor and played for a few thousand listeners sitting stilll.

Perform Impeccably

Boston's 13 players performed it impeccably an with a good amount flexibility within the rathe deliberate tempos set b Ozawa.

The slow movements, as frequent with Mozart, offere the best opportunities fo breadth of expression. The weren't overlooked.

There was no serious fau to find, either, with th balance or tonal blend, nor with the unity. Most of Boston Orchestra's key members have become widely experienced in recent years with the discipline of small - ensemble chamber music.

This afternoon at 2.30 Michael Tilson Thomas will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Symphony No. 98, Bach's Cantata No. 51 with Bethany Beardslee as soloist, Krenek's "Die Nachtigall," also with Miss Beardslee, and Stravinsky's suite from "Pulcinella."

Whitestone

LILI KRAUS, accomplished pianist, was featured soloist in an all-Mozart program conducted Saturday evening by Seiji Ozawa in the Tanglewood Music Shed. Some 7,407 people attended the performance. A review of the concert is found on Page 4.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 20 1970

New England Newsclip

Lili Kraus Plays Exquisite Mozart

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Lili Kraus is beautiful. She is perhaps in her early 60s and Saturday night at Tanglewood she filled the great shed with her beauty and sent if floating across the lawn.

Happy Grandmother

She played the solo part of Mozart's D Minor Piano Concerto (K.466) with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa.

It was Ozawa's sixth appearance on the Tanglewood podium this summer. His last is scheduled for Aug. 22.

Mrs. Kraus, a happy grandmother, is known the world over for her skill and sensitivity with Mozart's piano concertos (she has recorded all of them).

She is slender, has a demurely aristocratic manner personally as well as musically and shows a glimpse of inner steel now and then.

She played exquisitely Saturday, which, of course, is the way Mozart ought to be heard.

Thunder, Lightning

And in this case, with this particular concerto, she played occasionally with a fair amount of thunder and lightning. This particular concerto is probably as close to an imitation of Beethoven as Mozart could get, considering the number of years he preceded Beethoven.

In fact, Mrs. Kraus played the cadenzas Beethoven wrote for this concerto. He had a special liking for it. It was his kind of Mozart.

The codenzas and Mrs. Kraus sounded wonderful.

It was a distinct pleasure to hear Mozart's Serenade for 13 Wind Instruments again Saturday night. It s seven movements filled 40 minutes before intermission. Leinsdorf conducted it here in 1964.

It is one of those amiable pieces of party music Mozart wrote on commission, one of his best and probably the longest. The score calls for two oboes, two clarients, two basset horns, four french horns , two bassoons and a bass instrument, probably doublebass since the contrabassoon was rare in those days (so a more proper name for it might be Serenade for 12 Winds and Unidentified Bass).

The basset horns were low register, single-reed instruments whose parts nowadays are taken by alto clarinets, and the bass is played by contrabassoon.

The core of the sound of this piece, therefore, comes from a quartet of clarinets, a dulcet, outdoors sound. Mozart probably would be astounded to see it controlled by a conductor and played for a few thousand listeners sitting stilll.

Boston's 13 players performed it impeccably and with a good amount of flexibility within the rather deliberate tempos set by Ozawa.

The slow movements, as is frequent with Mozart, offered the best opportunities for breadth of expression. They weren't overlooked.

There was no serious fault to find, either, with the balance or tonal blend, nor with the unity. Most of Boston Orchestra's key members have become widely experienced in recent years with the discipline of small - ensemble chamber music.

Springfield Republican July 20, 1970

At the Concert

Boston Symphony Salutes Mozart

By EDWARD FRENCH

LENOX, Mass.—Saturday night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Seija Ozawa conducting, was an all-Mozart affair, with the Serenade in B Flat for 13 Wind instruments and the better known Concerto in D minor for Piano and Orchestra with Lili Kraus as soloist.

THE PLAYING in the Serenade was distinguished by the technical assurance and polish that one expects from the wind players of this major orchestra. Mr. Ozawa's choice of tempi, his regard for the structure of the work and his feeling for dynamic contrasts seemed just right.

Outstanding were the terraced dynamics of the first Menuetto and the melodic feeling of the Adagio. The Theme and Variations movement was presented with great clarity of detail while the concluding Rondo was a joyous romp for all concerned.

LILI KRAUS has long had a reputation as one of the leading Mozart players of our time, ranking with Rudolf Serkin and Jose Iturbi in that respect. She has recorded all of the Mozart piano concertos, has given frequent recitals of Mozart's piano solo music, appeared on education TV and performed in practically every country of the world.

With this background a rather special performance was expected and we are happy to say was given. There was full realization of the dark beauty in the first movement of this rather brooding concerto with its emphasis on the minor tonality.

THE SLOW MOVEMENT was projected with a beautifully line and the Rondo received a superbly rhythmic performance with good variety of color.

It speaks well for the drawing power of both Mozart and Miss Kraus that the audience was large and enthusiastic.

The next weekend at Tanglewood will feature Aaron Copland as conductor and composer on Friday, Jorge Mester will conduct Saturday night's program and another guest conductor, Kenneth Schermerhorn will be on the podium Sunday afternoon.

LILI KRAUS
Mozart Interpreter

A Mozartean Treat at Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. — Over the weekend a large and enthusiastic audience were served a delicious portion from the prodigious Mozartean pie in the shed at Tanglewood.

Seiji Ozawa was the conductor and for his opening he chose the limped and unusual Serenade No. 10 in B flat for 13 wind instruments K, 361.

The voicing of this work shows again the extraordinary perceptions in the teeming Mozartean brain. The instruments he chose excluded anything higher than clarinets and included oboes, alto clarinets bassoons and contra bassoon, and horns. The range of all these instruments is close and the result in terms of sound is extremely warm and sensual.

THE SERENADE is in seven movements and runs the gamut of the composer's considerable imagination.

The players were all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, first and second chair men. It goes without saying that this automatically makes this ensemble one of the best in terms of personnel and talent. There many movements of really fine ensemble playing, but the proceedings had some inexplicable rough moments. Inexplicable considering the men at work. There were brief periods of muddy meter and one or two technical misplays. These imperfections were compensated to a great degree by the inherent beauty of the music and the compact ensemble work in other areas.

Lili Kraus, then played an absolutely impeccable performance of Mozart's Piano Concerto in D Minor, K. 466.

OZAWA was just fine in his accompaniment and the result was a most felicitious and graceful exercise in synergy.

It was a thriling performance and at the end Miss Kraus leaped from the piano and embraced Ozawa. It was a remarkable demonstration of the old truism that Art transcends other more secular bounds if one considers the fact that Miss Kraus spent three years in a Japanese concentration camp. Ozawa, a Japanese born in Manchuria paid his debt to Miss Krause with a most thoughtful and sensitive reading that both aided and abetted Miss Karus' truthful concep of the concerto.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Tuesday, July 21, 1970

Tension Afflicts Piano Recital

LENO X — The first few moments of the short piano recital offered by Yuji Takahashi at Tanglewood Friday night were uncomfortable. The music gradually smoothed out however.

Attended by 1500

Takahashi played two Bach partitas and Messiaen's "Canteyodjaya," a program of about 43 minutes attended by about 1500 early arrivals for the 9 p.m. performance.

His recital was the regularly scheduled prelude program. Later he played the solo part with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for Mozart's K.488 piano concerto.

Takahashi is a delicate pianist, apparently very sensitive to his surroundings as well as his music. The early moments of the recital were afflicted by fumbles during rapid passages apparently a product of tension because they gradually diminished and were virtually gone after 10 minutes. Also, the horrendously difficult Messiaen piece seemed to give him no finger trouble.

Volatile Rendition

Takahashi's view of Bach is volatile. He kept the basic tempos and meters steady and introduced a wealth (some might say excessive amount) of dynamic variety. and rhythmic stretching and contracting.

The Messiaen piece is 11 minutes of disjunct, spasmodic, non-metric, non-melodic, thickly chromatic piano music.

It was played, very likely, with high skill and accuracy because Takahashi is especially expert with contemporary styles.

Tonight Seiji Ozawa will conduct Mozart's Serenade for 13 Wind Instruments, K.361, and the same composer's Piano Concerto K.466 with Lili Kraus as soloist.

Sunday afternoon Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the orchestra in a program of music by Haydn, Bach, Krenek and Stravinsky.

R.C.H.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 18 1970

New England Newsclip

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUL 19 1970

New England Newsclip

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 56,638

JUL 20 1970

Lili Kraus Puts Thunder Into Mozart Concerto

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Lili Kraus is beautiful. She is perhaps in her early 60s and Saturday night at Tanglewood she filled the great shed with her beauty and sent if floating across the lawn.

Happy Grandmother

She played the solo part of Mozart's D Minor Piano Concerto (K.466) with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa.

It was Ozawa's sixth appearance on the Tanglewood podium this summer. His last is scheduled for Aug. 22.

Mrs. Kraus, a happy grandmother, is known the world over for her skill and sensitivity with Mozart's piano concertos (she has recorded all of them).

She is slender, has a demurely aristocratic manner personally as well as musically and shows a glimpse of inner steel now and then.

She played exquisitely Saturday, which, of course, is the way Mozart ought to be heard.

Thunder, Lightning

And in this case, with this particular concerto, she played occasionally with a fair amount of thunder and lightning. This particular concerto is probably as close to an imitation of Beethoven as Mozart could get, considering the number of years he preceded Beethoven.

In fact, Mrs. Kraus played the cadenzas Beethoven wrote for this concerto. He had a special liking for it. It was his kind of Mozart.

The codenzas and Mrs. Kraus sounded wonderful.

It was a distinct pleasure to hear Mozart's Serenade for 13 Wind Instruments again Saturday night. It s seven movements filled 40 minutes before intermission. Leinsdorf conducted it here in 1964.

Written on Commission

It is one of those amiable pieces of party music Mozart wrote on commission, one of his best and probably the longest. The score calls for two oboes, two clarients, two basset horns, four french horns, two bassoons and a bass instrument, probably doublebass since the contrabassoon was rare in those days (so a more proper name for it might be Serenade for 12 Winds and Unidentified Bass).

The basset horns were low register, single-reed instruments whose parts nowadays are taken by alto clarinets, and the bass is played by contrabassoon.

The core of the sound of this piece, therefore, comes from a quartet of clarinets, a dulcet, outdoors sound. Mozart probably would be astounded to see it controlled by a conductor and played for a few thousand listeners sitting stilll.

Perform Impeccably

Boston's 13 players performed it impeccably an with a good amount of flexibility within the rathe deliberate tempos set b Ozawa.

The slow movements, as frequent with Mozart, offere the best opportunities fo breadth of expression. The weren't overlooked.

There was no serious fau to find, either, with th balance or tonal blend, nor with the unity. Most of Boston Orchestra's key members have become widely experienced in recent years with the discipline of small - ensemble chamber music.

This afternoon at 2.30 Michael Tilson Thomas will lead the orchestra through Haydn's Symphony No. 98, Bach's Cantata No. 51 with Bethany Beardslee as soloist, Krenek's "Die Nachtigall," also with Miss Beardslee, and Stravinsky's suite from "Pulcinella."

Whitestone

LILI KRAUS, accomplished pianist, was featured soloist in an all-Mozart program conducted Saturday evening by Seiji Ozawa in the Tanglewood Music Shed. Some 7,407 people attended the performance. A review of the concert is found on Page 4.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 20 1970

New England Newsclip

Lili Kraus Plays Exquisite Mozart

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Lili Kraus is beautiful. She is perhaps in her early 60s and Saturday night at Tanglewood she filled the great shed with her beauty and sent if floating across the lawn.

Happy Grandmother

She played the solo part of Mozart's D Minor Piano Concerto (K.466) with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa.

It was Ozawa's sixth appearance on the Tanglewood podium this summer. His last is scheduled for Aug. 22.

Mrs. Kraus, a happy grandmother, is known the world over for her skill and sensitivity with Mozart's piano concertos (she has recorded all of them).

She is slender, has a demurely aristocratic manner personally as well as musically and shows a glimpse of inner steel now and then.

She played exquisitely Saturday, which, of course, is the way Mozart ought to be heard.

Thunder, Lightning

And in this case, with this particular concerto, she played occasionally with a fair amount of thunder and lightning. This particular concerto is probably as close to an imitation of Beethoven as Mozart could get, considering the number of years he preceded Beethoven.

In fact, Mrs. Kraus played the cadenzas Beethoven wrote for this concerto. He had a special liking for it. It was his kind of Mozart.

The codenzas and Mrs. Kraus sounded wonderful.

It was a distinct pleasure to hear Mozart's Serenade for 13 Wind Instruments again Saturday night. It s seven movements filled 40 minutes before intermission. Leinsdorf conducted it here in 1964.

It is one of those amiable pieces of party music Mozart wrote on commission, one of his best and probably the longest. The score calls for two oboes, two clarients, two basset horns, four french horns, two bassoons and a bass instrument, probably doublebass since the contrabassoon was rare in those days (so a more proper name for it might be Serenade for 12 Winds and Unidentified Bass).

The basset horns were low register, single-reed instruments whose parts nowadays are taken by alto clarinets, and the bass is played by contrabassoon.

The core of the sound of this piece, therefore, comes from a quartet of clarinets, a dulcet, outdoors sound. Mozart probably would be astounded to see it controlled by a conductor and played for a few thousand listeners sitting stilll.

Boston's 13 players performed it impeccably and with a good amount of flexibility within the rather deliberate tempos set by Ozawa.

The slow movements, as is frequent with Mozart, offered the best opportunities for breadth of expression. They weren't overlooked.

There was no serious fault to find, either, with the balance or tonal blend, nor with the unity. Most of Boston Orchestra's key members have become widely experienced in recent years with the discipline of small - ensemble chamber music.

Springfield Republican July 20, 1970

At the Concert

Boston Symphony Salutes Mozart

By EDWARD FRENCH

LENOX, Mass.—Saturday night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Seija Ozawa conducting, was an all-Mozart affair, with the Serenade in B Flat for 13 Wind instruments and the better known Concerto in D minor for Piano and Orchestra with Lili Kraus as soloist.

THE PLAYING in the Serenade was distinguished by the technical assurance and polish that one expects from the wind players of this major orchestra. Mr. Ozawa's choice of tempi, his regard for the structure of the work and his feeling for dynamic contrasts seemed just right.

Outstanding were the terraced dynamics of the first Menuetto and the melodic feeling of the Adagio. The Theme and Variations movement was presented with great clarity of detail while the concluding Rondo was a joyous romp for all concerned.

LILI KRAUS has long had a reputation as one of the leading Mozart players of our time, ranking with Rudolf Serkin and Jose Iturbi in that respect. She has recorded all of the Mozart piano concertos, has given frequent recitals of Mozart's piano solo music, appeared on education TV and performed in practically every country of the world.

With this background a rather special performance was expected and we are happy to say was given. There was full realization of the dark beauty in the first movement of this rather brooding concerto with its emphasis on the minor tonality.

THE SLOW MOVEMENT was projected with a beautifully line and the Rondo received a superbly rhythmic performance with good variety of color.

It speaks well for the drawing power of both Mozart and Miss Kraus that the audience was large and enthusiastic.

The next weekend at Tanglewood will feature Aaron Copland as conductor and composer on Friday, Jorge Mester will conduct Saturday night's program and another guest conductor, Kenneth Schermerhorn will be on the podium Sunday afternoon.

LILI KRAUS
Mozart Interpreter

A Mozartean Treat at Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. — Over the weekend a large and enthusiastic audience were served a delicious portion from the prodigious Mozartean pie in the shed at Tanglewood.

Seiji Ozawa was the conductor and for his opening he chose the limped and unusual Serenade No. 10 in B flat for 13 wind instruments K, 361.

The voicing of this work shows again the extraordinary perceptions in the teeming Mozartean brain. The instruments he chose excluded anything higher than clarinets and included oboes, alto clarinets bassoons and contra bassoon, and horns. The range of all these instruments is close and the result in terms of sound is extremely warm and sensual.

THE SERENADE is in seven movements and runs the gamut of the composer's considerable imagination.

The players were all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, first and second chair men. It goes without saying that this automatically makes this ensemble one of the best in terms of personnel and talent. There many movements of really fine ensemble playing, but the proceedings had some inexplicable rough moments. Inexplicable considering the men at work. There were brief periods of muddy meter and one or two technical misplays. These imperfections were compensated to a great degree by the inherent beauty of the music and the compact ensemble work in other areas.

Lili Kraus, then played an absolutely impeccable performance of Mozart's Piano Concerto in D Minor, K. 466.

OZAWA was just fine in his accompaniment and the result was a most felicitious and graceful exercise in synergy.

It was a thriling performance and at the end Miss Kraus leaped from the piano and embraced Ozawa. It was a remarkable demonstration of the old truism that Art transcends other more secular bounds if one considers the fact that Miss Kraus spent three years in a Japanese concentration camp. Ozawa, a Japanese born in Manchuria paid his debt to Miss Krause with a most thoughtful and sensitive reading that both aided and abetted Miss Karus' truthful concep of the concerto.

CAPITAL DISTRICT PRESS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

TIMES UNION
Tuesday, July 21, 1970

54

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 20 1970

New England Newsclip

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

JUL 21 1970

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood features

BSO firsts, Kraus bow

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

The third week of the Boston Symphony's Tanglewood season revealed, among other things, an adventurous spirit under its new management (i.e., Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller as artistic directors, and Leonard Bernstein as adviser), which resulted in three first performances by the orchestra (Britten's Serenade for tenor, horn and strings; Ibert's Divertissement; and Ernst Krenek's concert aria, "Die Nachtigall"); the long-overdue debut with the BSO of pianist Lili Kraus; and the reappearance of pianist-composer Yuji Takahashi with the orchestra in a regrettable out-of-his-element context.

During the past and the coming week, part of the orchestra personnel is in Boston playing the Esplanade concerts, hence Tanglewood programs necessarily have taken on the abbreviated character of the previous Bach-Mozart series (not now thus limited), which in other years introduced the BSO's Berkshire Festival.

Exit Xenakis

With a very conscious attempt to instill new life into the summer operation and not offer merely warmed-over winter fare (which is a common criticism of festivals), the BSO has inherited new problems, for instance, insufficient rehearsal time. Although the "Eonta" of Iannis Xenakis had originally been listed for Friday, it would seem apparent that, with a first-time Britten and Ibert scheduled for the same program, something had to go. So it was the Xenakis, and its designated exponent, Mr. Takahashi, played instead the Mozart Piano Concerto in A (K. 488). It was a musicianly performance in a far-off way, but definitely not his cup of tea as an interpreter or a technician.

Things picked up as Mr. Ozawa conducted strings, tenor John Alexander, and the horn of Joseph Stagliano (specified by the composer to be played without valves like an early hand horn), in the delectable Britten Serenade. Verses by Charles Cotton, Tennyson, Blake, Ben Jonson, and Keats, and an anonymous dirge were delivered by Mr. Alexander in a distinctive and moving union of note and word, with Mr. Stagliano's rustic basic sound to reinforce them and help attain an eerie, disembodied effect.

The Ibert Divertissement proved to be sophisticated fun, obviously relished by Mr. Ozawa, musicians, and audience. The important ingredient of taste, in composition and performance, was present to permit us to enjoy something so seemingly frivolous—in case there were misgivings.

Kraus-Ozawa Mozart

The event of Saturday evening, which drew more than 7,400, was the appearance of Lili Kraus, the pianist who has become something of a legend through recordings and has had an active career seemingly everywhere else but in this neighborhood. Sweeping on in a billowy golden dress, she was soon at work, in close alliance with Mr. Ozawa, on Mozart's Piano Concerto in D minor (K. 466), a work with a difference in emotional and technical content from the brighter, lighter-than-air major-key conceptions.

It was limpid, graceful, elegant playing—full of color and character, but not romanticized; strongly projected, but never percussive or out of the orchestral frame. It was not Mozart of the crystalline sort, the don't-touch, 18th-century drawing-room variety. With almost architectural precision, the soloist, Mr. Ozawa, and the orchestra had put together a taut construction which bore a distinctive Mozartian stamp, despite the use of Beethoven's stolid cadenzas. At the end, there was an enthusiastic demonstration in which performers and audience figuratively took one another in loving embrace.

The evening had begun with Mr. Ozawa conducting Mozart's B flat Serenade (No. 10) for 13 winds, a seven-movement display of BSO virtuosity in this department. These are heady, filling sounds— to take them with only a breathing space between was like rushing through a seven-course dinner, without time to savor what had gone before. It would be too bad not to hear them in concert; on the other hand, the Serenade was obviously designed to provide a leisurely evening's entertainment, with suitable intervals between movements. What to do, adviser?

Michael Tilson Thomas was the conductor on Sunday afternoon, when the program included the Krenek first performance, "Die Nachtigall," sung by soprano Bethany Beardslee, who first was soloist in Bach's Cantata No. 51 ("Jauchzet Gott"). Orchestral works by Haydn and Stravinsky were also heard.

Saturday Night Concert

By ELSBET WAYNE

THE SATURDAY NIGHT concert at Tanglewood constituted the season's ~~only all~~ Mozart program. Two works, utterly dissimilar, but each unique in its own right, were well placed opposite one another by Seiji Ozawa.

Lili Kraus, featured soloist, performed the Piano Concerto No. 20 in D Minor, K 466, one of Mozart's finest expressions in this form, and one wrought with extreme emotional intensity throughout its three movements.

Madame Kraus, well-known for her annotated lecture recitals, including all 27 of Mozart's piano concerti, brings to her playing a poise and gentility firmly rooted in her traditional background. The graciousness of her entrance on stage purports a performance completely in keeping with the composer's style of profound depth and delicacy. With a simplicity born of her technical mastery and complete emotional absorbtion in the music, Lili Kraus involves her audience in every nuance of tension, every moment of respite.

In her playing she surpasses the usual position of the soloist, that of being an object to behold and to evaluate. She has reached that ultimate stage beyond bravado, that of identifying the listener with the composer by voicing his thoughts and feelings through her fingers. One does not judge a master. One marvels at the ability to convey. Her subtle nuances of touch fill her melodic lines, sometimes even a single note, with a singing lyricism. Without once opening her dynamic range to its full extent, she voiced the troubled intensities of the first and last movements and the final, cheerful, release in the major mode which concludes the concerto.

The effect of her playing was felt equally by listener and orchestra which was straining to make the continuous interplay meaningful dialogue. The Saturday night audience was witness to a truly memorable performance of Mozart at its best.

* * *

IN A DEPARTURE from precedent, the concert opened with bona fide chamber music, Serenade No. 10 in B-flat Major, K 361, for 13 winds. Oboes, clarinets and bassoons in pairs are augmented with two alto clarinets, basset horns, contrabassoon and four French horns.

Mozart, being one of the first composers to score for the clarinet, made this serenade a vehicle for exploring its timbres and extended the lower register through use of the alto instrument. The absence of flutes further enhances the clarinet tone. Musical interest is maintained through the many tuneful solo passages for the various instruments which were executed in their accustomed brilliance by the wind players of the Boston Symphony. In its seven movements Mozart has employed all structural patterns in vogue during his time.

Whitestone

Lili Kraus

* * *

A LIGHTHEARTEDNESS prevails throughout the serenade. This is entertainment music which frequently was considered a suitable background for chatting with friends or strolling in a garden. Seiji Ozawa's phenomenal musicianship is very much in evidence these days. With a vocabulary of expressive motions seemingly endless and an unfailing sense of timing, he plays his instrument, the orchestra, with tremendous virtuosity.

The hectic pace of the Tanglewood season and the overwhelming rapidity of the parade of soloists result in understandably limited rehearsal time. Wherever the polish of a final studio performance is lacking, there is the freshness of Ozawa's ingratiating personality and the assurance that he knows what he would like to achieve in a performance. And when he does, he delights the audience in a way very few young conductors can emulate.

Lili Kraus Plays Mozart

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Lili Kraus is beautiful. She is perhaps in her early 60s and Saturday night at Tanglewood she filled the great ~~shed with~~ her beauty and sent if floating across the lawn.

Happy Grandmother

She played the solo part of Mozart's D Minor Piano Concerto (K.466) with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa.

It was Ozawa's sixth appearance on the Tanglewood podium this summer. His last is scheduled for Aug. 22.

Mrs. Kraus, a happy grandmother, is known the world over for her skill and sensitivity with Mozart's piano concertos (she has recorded all of them).

She is slender, has a demurely aristocratic manner personally as well as musically and shows a glimpse of inner steel now and then.

She played exquisitely Saturday, which, of course, is the way Mozart ought to be heard.

Thunder, Lightning

And in this case, with this particular concerto, she played occasionally with a fair amount of thunder and lightning. This particular concerto is probably as close to an imitation of Beethoven as Mozart could get, considering the number of years he preceded Beethoven.

In fact, Mrs. Kraus played the cadenzas Beethoven wrote for this concerto. He had a special liking for it. It was his kind of Mozart.

The codenzas and Mrs. Kraus sounded wonderful.

It was a distinct pleasure to hear Mozart's Serenade for 13 Wind Instruments again Saturday night. It's seven movements filled 40 minutes before intermission. Leinsdorf conducted it here in 1964.

It is one of those amiable pieces of party music Mozart wrote on commission, one of his best and probably the longest. The score calls for two oboes, two clarients, two basset horns, four french horns, two bassoons and a bass instrument, probably doublebass since the contrabassoon was rare in those days (so a more proper name for it might be Serenade for 12 Winds and Unidentified Bass).

The basset horns were low register, single-reed instruments whose parts nowadays are taken by alto clarinets, and the bass is played by contrabassoon.

The core of the sound of this piece, therefore, comes from a quartet of clarinets, a dulcet, outdoors sound. Mozart probably would be astounded to see it controlled by a conductor and played for a few thousand listeners sitting stilll.

Boston's 13 players performed it impeccably and with a good amount of flexibility within the rather deliberate tempos set by Ozawa.

The slow movements, as is frequent with Mozart, offered the best opportunities for breadth of expression. They weren't overlooked.

There was no serious fault to find, either, with the balance or tonal blend, nor with the unity. Most of Boston Orchestra's key members have become widely experienced in recent years with the discipline of small ensemble chamber music.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 20 1970

New England Newsclip

MUSIC

Visit to Tanglewood

By JERROLD ROSS

You meet half of Greenwich Village at Tanglewood (the other half is at Saratoga or Marlboro). But everyone should get to Tanglewood at least once. Last weekend Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas conducted two concerts, the first of which featured Lili Kraus as piano soloist in Mozart's D minor concerto. Mr. Ozawa is an exciting stage personality. He gives the audience its money's worth by seeming to shape each phrase with his body as well as his baton. And although some may argue that movement is not always necessary, the results are artistically gratifying. Miss Kraus, on the other hand, is a bit too "electric," with a tendency to swoop through phrases, overarticulating and forgetting to match the beginning of each with its end. Thus, the first movement of the concerto was a disjointed series of sections, few of which led into each other, and the majesty of the second movement was lost because of her lack of understanding of the dynamic implications in the harmonic progressions. Mr. Ozawa followed her well, but there were differences in his treatment of several of the lines (he was correct).

Saturday's program opened with Mozart's "Serenade for 13 Wind Instruments" K.361. It is one of the few masterpieces for winds, on the style of the Piano "Fantasies"—more cerebral than emotional. The performers played with great precision, particularly in the well-known final movement.

Sunday saw Mr. Thomas assume the podium. At twenty-five he is an exceptional talent and when he restricts his movement (does this run in the Boston family?) he is authoritative and in good command, musically. Haydn's "Symphony No. 98" was first on the program, and, in general, the tempi were well paced and each movement hung together. Bethany Beardslee was soloist in both Bach's "Cantata No. 51—Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen" and Krenek's Concert aria "Die Nachtigall." Both are extraordinarily difficult works and Miss Beardslee was clear, expressive, and accurate in every detail. The Krenek was especially lovely, and the soprano's negotiation of the almost impossible upward vocal lines created a stunning mood, in line with the neo-Impressionist style. Mr. Thomas and the orchestra concluded with Stravinsky's Concert suite from the Ballet "Pulcinella." In spite of the fact that this needed a bit more work it provided a charming and virtuoso-like finish to a weekend of music.

The Berkshires are beautiful now and the new seats in the Tanglewood shed are very comfortable. There is hardly a better way to spend a weekend!

The Villager
July 23, 1970

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

JUL 21 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood features

BSO firsts, Kraus bow

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

The third week of the Boston Symphony's Tanglewood season revealed, among other things, an adventurous spirit under its new management (i.e., Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller as artistic directors, and Leonard Bernstein as adviser), which resulted in three first performances by the orchestra (Britten's Serenade for tenor, horn and strings; Ibert's Divertissement; and Ernst Krenek's concert aria, "Die Nachtigall"); the long-overdue debut with the BSO of pianist Lili Kraus; and the reappearance of pianist-composer Yuji Takahashi with the orchestra in a regrettable out-of-his-element context.

During the past and the coming week, part of the orchestra personnel is in Boston playing the Esplanade concerts, hence Tanglewood programs necessarily have taken on the abbreviated character of the previous Bach-Mozart series (not now thus limited), which in other years introduced the BSO's Berkshire Festival.

Exit Xenakis

With a very conscious attempt to instill new life into the summer operation and not offer merely warmed-over winter fare (which is a common criticism of festivals), the BSO has inherited new problems, for instance, insufficient rehearsal time. Although the "Eonta" of Iannis Xenakis had originally been listed for Friday, it would seem apparent that, with a first-time Britten and Ibert scheduled for the same program, something had to go. So it was the Xenakis, and its designated exponent, Mr. Takahashi, played instead the Mozart Piano Concerto in A (K. 488). It was a musicianly performance in a far-off way, but definitely not his cup of tea as an interpreter or a technician.

Things picked up as Mr. Ozawa conducted strings, tenor John Alexander, and the horn of Joseph Stagliano (specified by the composer to be played without valves like an early hand horn), in the delectable Britten Serenade. Verses by Charles Cotton, Tennyson, Blake, Ben Jonson, and Keats, and an anonymous dirge were delivered by Mr. Alexander in a distinctive and moving union of note and word, with Mr. Stagliano's rustic basic sound to reinforce them and help attain an eerie, disembodied effect.

The Ibert Divertissement proved to be sophisticated fun, obviously relished by Mr. Ozawa, musicians, and audience. The important ingredient of taste, in composition and performance, was present to permit us to enjoy something so seemingly frivolous—in case there were misgivings.

Kraus-Ozawa Mozart

The event of Saturday evening, which drew more than 7,400, was the appearance of Lili Kraus, the pianist who has become something of a legend through recordings and has had an active career seemingly everywhere else but in this neighborhood. Sweeping on in a billowy golden dress, she was soon at work, in close alliance with Mr. Ozawa, on Mozart's Piano Concerto in D minor (K. 466), a work with a difference in emotional and technical content from the brighter, lighter-than-air major-key conceptions.

It was limpid, graceful, elegant playing —full of color and character, but not romanticized; strongly projected, but never percussive or out of the orchestral frame. It was not Mozart of the crystalline sort, the don't-touch, 18th-century drawing-room variety. With almost architectural precision, the soloist, Mr. Ozawa, and the orchestra had put together a taut construction which bore a distinctive Mozartian stamp, despite the use of Beethoven's stolid cadenzas. At the end, there was an enthusiastic demonstration in which performers and audience figuratively took one another in loving embrace.

The evening had begun with Mr. Ozawa conducting Mozart's B flat Serenade (No. 10) for 13 winds, a seven-movement display of BSO virtuosity in this department. These are heady, filling sounds— to take them with only a breathing space between was like rushing through a seven-course dinner, without time to savor what had gone before. It would be too bad not to hear them in concert; on the other hand, the Serenade was obviously designed to provide a leisurely evening's entertainment, with suitable intervals between movements. What to do, adviser?

Michael Tilson Thomas was the conductor on Sunday afternoon, when the program included the Krenek first performance, "Die Nachtigall," sung by soprano Bethany Beardslee, who first was soloist in Bach's Cantata No. 51 ("Jauchzet Gott"). Orchestral works by Haydn and Stravinsky were also heard.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 20 1970 New England Newsclip

Saturday Night Concert

By ELSBET WAYNE

THE SATURDAY NIGHT concert at Tanglewood constituted the season's ~~only all~~-Mozart program. Two works, utterly dissimilar, but each unique in its own right, were well placed opposite one another by Seiji Ozawa.

Lili Kraus, featured soloist, performed the Piano Concerto No. 20 in D Minor, K 466, one of Mozart's finest expressions in this form, and one wrought with extreme emotional intensity throughout its three movements.

Madame Kraus, well-known for her annotated lecture recitals, including all 27 of Mozart's piano concerti, brings to her playing a poise and gentility firmly rooted in her traditional background. The graciousness of her entrance on stage purports a performance completely in keeping with the composer's style of profound depth and delicacy. With a simplicity born of her technical mastery and complete emotional absorbtion in the music, Lili Kraus involves her audience in every nuance of tension, every moment of respite.

In her playing she surpasses the usual position of the soloist, that of being an object to behold and to evaluate. She has reached that ultimate stage beyond bravado, that of identifying the listener with the composer by voicing his thoughts and feelings through her fingers. One does not judge a master. One marvels at the ability to convey. Her subtle nuances of touch fill her melodic lines, sometimes even a single note, with a singing lyricism. Without once opening her dynamic range to its full extent, she voiced the troubled intensities of the first and last movements and the final, cheerful, release in the major mode which concludes the concerto.

The effect of her playing was felt equally by listener and orchestra which was straining to make the continuous interplay meaningful dialogue. The Saturday night audience was witness to a truly memorable performance of Mozart at its best.

* * *

IN A DEPARTURE from precedent, the concert opened with bona fide chamber music, Serenade No. 10 in B-flat Major, K 361, for 13 winds. Oboes, clarinets and bassoons in pairs are augmented with two alto clarinets, basset horns, contrabassoon and four French horns.

Mozart, being one of the first composers to score for the clarinet, made this serenade a vehicle for exploring its timbres and extended the lower register through use of the alto instrument. The absence of flutes further enhances the clarinet tone. Musical interest is maintained through the many tuneful solo passages for the various instruments which were executed in their accustomed brilliance by the wind players of the Boston Symphony. In its seven movements Mozart has employed all structural patterns in vogue during his time.

Whitestone

Lili Kraus

* * *

A LIGHTHEARTEDNESS prevails throughout the serenade. This is entertainment music which frequently was considered a suitable background for chatting with friends or strolling in a garden. Seiji Ozawa's phenomenal musicianship is very much in evidence these days. With a vocabulary of expressive motions seemingly endless and an unfailing sense of timing, he plays his instrument, the orchestra, with tremendous virtuosity.

The hectic pace of the Tanglewood season and the overwhelming rapidity of the parade of soloists result in understandably limited rehearsal time. Wherever the polish of a final studio performance is lacking, there is the freshness of Ozawa's ingratiating personality and the assurance that he knows what he would like to achieve in a performance. And when he does, he delights the audience in a way very few young conductors can emulate.

Lili Kraus Plays Mozart

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Lili Kraus is beautiful. She is perhaps in her early 60s and Saturday night at Tanglewood she filled the great ~~shed with~~ her beauty and sent if floating across the lawn.

Happy Grandmother

She played the solo part of Mozart's D Minor Piano Concerto (K.466) with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Seiji Ozawa.

It was Ozawa's sixth appearance on the Tanglewood podium this summer. His last is scheduled for Aug. 22.

Mrs. Kraus, a happy grandmother, is known the world over for her skill and sensitivity with Mozart's piano concertos (she has recorded all of them).

She is slender, has a demurely aristocratic manner personally as well as musically and shows a glimpse of inner steel now and then.

She played exquisitely Saturday, which, of course, is the way Mozart ought to be heard.

Thunder, Lightning

And in this case, with this particular concerto, she played occasionally with a fair amount of thunder and lightning. This particular concerto is probably as close to an imitation of Beethoven as Mozart could get, considering the number of years he preceded Beethoven.

In fact, Mrs. Kraus played the cadenzas Beethoven wrote for this concerto. He had a special liking for it. It was his kind of Mozart.

The codenzas and Mrs. Kraus sounded wonderful.

It was a distinct pleasure to hear Mozart's Serenade for 13 Wind Instruments again Saturday night. It s seven movements filled 40 minutes before intermission. Leinsdorf conducted it here in 1964.

It is one of those amiable pieces of party music Mozart wrote on commission, one of his best and probably the longest. The score calls for two oboes, two clarients, two basset horns, four french horns, two bassoons and a bass instrument, probably doublebass since the contrabassoon was rare in those days (so a more proper name for it might be Serenade for 12 Winds and Unidentified Bass).

The basset horns were low register, single-reed instruments whose parts nowadays are taken by alto clarinets, and the bass is played by contrabassoon.

The core of the sound of this piece, therefore, comes from a quartet of clarinets, a dulcet, outdoors sound. Mozart probably would be astounded to see it controlled by a conductor and played for a few thousand listeners sitting stilll.

Boston's 13 players performed it impeccably and with a good amount of flexibility within the rather deliberate tempos set by Ozawa.

The slow movements, as is frequent with Mozart, offered the best opportunities for breadth of expression. They weren't overlooked.

There was no serious fault to find, either, with the balance or tonal blend, nor with the unity. Most of Boston Orchestra's key members have become widely experienced in recent years with the discipline of small - ensemble chamber music.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 20 1970 New England Newsclip

MUSIC

Visit to Tanglewood

By JERROLD ROSS

You meet half of Greenwich Village at Tanglewood (the other half is at Saratoga or Marlboro). But everyone should get to Tanglewood at least once. Last weekend Seiji Ozawa and Michael Tilson Thomas conducted two concerts, the first of which featured Lili Kraus as piano soloist in Mozart's D minor concerto. Mr. Ozawa is an exciting stage personality. He gives the audience its money's worth by seeming to shape each phrase with his body as well as his baton. And although some may argue that movement is not always necessary, the results are artistically gratifying. Miss Kraus, on the other hand, is a bit too "electric," with a tendency to sweep through phrases, overarticulating and forgetting to match the beginning of each with its end. Thus, the first movement of the concerto was a disjointed series of sections, few of which led into each other, and the majesty of the second movement was lost because of her lack of understanding of the dynamic implications in the harmonic progressions. Mr. Ozawa followed her well, but there were differences in his treatment of several of the lines (he was correct).

Saturday's program opened with Mozart's "Serenade for 13 Wind Instruments" K.361. It is one of the few masterpieces for winds, on the style of the Piano "Fantasies"—more cerebral than emotional. The performers played with great precision, particularly in the well-known final movement.

Sunday saw Mr. Thomas assume the podium. At twenty-five he is an exceptional talent and when he restricts his movement (does this run in the Boston family?) he is authoritative and in good command, musically. Haydn's "Symphony No. 93" was first on the program, and, in general, the tempi were well paced and each movement hung together. Bethany Beardslee was soloist in both Bach's "Cantata No. 51—Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen" and Krenek's Concert aria "Die Nachtigall." Both are extraordinarily difficult works and Miss Beardslee was clear, expressive, and accurate in every detail. The Krenek was especially lovely, and the soprano's negotiation of the almost impossible upward vocal lines created a stunning mood, in line with the neo-Impressionist style. Mr. Thomas and the orchestra concluded with Stravinsky's Concert suite from the Ballet "Pulcinella." In spite of the fact that this needed a bit more work it provided a charming and virtuoso-like finish to a weekend of music.

The Berkshires are beautiful now and the new seats in the Tanglewood shed are very comfortable. There is hardly a better way to spend a weekend!

The Villager
July 23, 1970

Music Review

Weekend at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE FRIDAY evening and Sunday afternoon programs at Tanglewood this weekend followed the exact same pattern: two works from the 18th century for the first half and two from this century for the second half.

Michael Thomas played the B Flat Haydn Symphony (No. 98) and a Bach Cantata (No. 51), "Praise God in All Lands," to start his program Sunday. For the remainder he played Ernst Krenek's "The Nightingale," a concert aria for contralto, two flutes and strings, and Stravinsky's concert suite from the ballet "Pulcinella." The most excellent soprano, Bethany Beardslee, sang both the Bach and Krenek.

* * *

THOMAS SET the stage uncomfortably for Miss Beardslee at the outset of the Bach cantata, choosing a tempo she had to combat. Once established satisfactorily, she proceeded to proclaim the long, tenuous lines with remarkable discipline and vocal control. It was in the Krenek that she soared, actually and figuratively. Krenek reaches to Alpine peaks of range and makes jumps which demand the surefootedness of a chamois. Miss Beardslee's voice and competence achieved both requirements with remarkable ease and security, never allowing her voice to depart from its mellifluous fluidity.

Krenek wrote his music to a paraphrase of a poem by the Viennese poet, Karl Kraus, much as Benjamin Britten Friday night had written his music to the poems of his renowned English forbears. Both composers create atmospheric backgrounds rather than accompaniments to the vocal solos and both are eminently successful.

* * *

THERE ARISES a question of semantics when one refers to contemporary music if one insists that the qualification refers to music of our time, that is, written by composers still alive. It so happens that Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" was written in 1920 while Ibert's "Divertissement," which was played Friday, was written in 1930. But Stravinsky happily is still alive at age 88 while Ibert died at age 72 eight years ago.

* * *

THOMAS AUGUSTINE Arne, an English composer, is credited with having given a performance in London at the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, on Sept. 28, 1745, of his patriotic song, "God Save the King." The Haydn symphony, which Thomas played yesterday, was one of a set written in London in 1792. Whether Haydn had heard Arne's little song musical history does not discover, but the first two bars of the adagio cantabile from the symphony start out exactly as the national anthem.

* * *

YESTERDAY'S PROGRAM afforded concertmaster Joseph Silverstein three opportunities for solos which he executed admirably. He deserved more recognition than the conductor seemed willing to spare and share with his outstanding soloists all the afternoon.

* * *

FRIDAY NIGHT the conductor was Seiji Ozawa. The delightful D Major Symphony No. 86 of Haydn was followed by the touchingly beautiful A Major Piano Concerto (K.488) of Mozart with Yuji Takahashi as the soloist. The young, appealing Japanese artist gave the concerto a poetic reading but one not distinguished in any other way.

The second half of the evening was the more interesting, with Britten's Serenade for Tenor, Horn and Strings (Opus 31) and Jacques Ibert's Divertissement, both first performances for the Boston Orchestra.

* * *

BRITTEN has written incidental music to six poems, by Charles Cotton, Tennyson, Blake, Ben Jonson and Keats. Tenor John Alexander gave a virtuoso rendition of Britten's permeating realization of the poetry whose nature can best be conveyed by their titles: Pastoral, Nocturne, Dirge, Elegy and Hymn. His easily produced, powerful voice depicted the sentiments with striking independence. Britten allows the voice little direct support but sustains the mood with thorough infiltration of the poetic fiber. James Stagliano's horn solos were executed with gratifying sonority and inflection. Britten gives the horn a preliminary, unaccompanied fanfare, which is a sort of ceremonial introduction and ends with the same role, but this time played in the distance (offstage) as a courteous envoi and congee.

Ozawa played the Ibert for exactly what it is: A carnival. Ibert made the round of the sideshows and retained a gay memory of several. There were quotations from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" wedding march which escaped as soon as it was recognized; an allusion to the Johann Strauss "Blue Danube"; an Offenbach can-can; all joined by the composer's fluent, facile style.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 20 1970

New England Newsclip

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 20 1970

New England Newsclip

AT TANGLEWOOD

Beardslee Voice Adapts Well to Opposing Roles

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Bethany Beardslee is a highly-skilled soprano, as agile among the oddities of the avant garde as she is with the convoluted undulations of the Baroque.

Bach, Krenek

She was on the stage of the shed at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon to present one of Bach's most difficult and effective cantatas and Ernst Krenek's nine-minute concert aria, "The Nightingale."

Miss Beardslee is known as a specialist in the contemporary field and is especially known among the inner circle as one whose sense of pitch is reliable enough to handle even the most disjunct and atonal music with accuracy.

But she is also a musician of deep feeling and Sunday her performance of "The Nightingale" sent chills up the spine.

It is not a beautiful aria, but it is pure emotion, an anguished cry in the dark (the way she does it), and although it doesn't qualify as avant garde, having been composed in 1931 it is obviously of the 20th Century.

Change to Calm

Miss Beardslee's Bach on Sunday, Cantata No. 51, was more beautiful and equally effective in its way, which is to say, quietly, warmly, melodically. The middle aria, especially, was comforting and calming.

Michael Tilson Thomas was the conducter He reduced the size of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (to 26 for the Bach and to about half for the rest of the program) and provided secure support for his soloist and for Armando Ghitalla, who played the clarino trumpet part for the cantata with fine precision.

Thomas opened the program with Haydn's Symphony No. 98 (the fifth he wrote for the London series) and closed it with Stravinsky's concert suite from the ballet, "Pulcinella."

He is 25, the orchestra's associate conductor, a young man of promise who is very busy on the podium. His manner tends to be somewhat more flamboyant than the music he draws from the musicians, a circumstance which can mislead the unwary.

Sunday he endured a couple of small accidents during the Haydn symphony: his baton flew out of his hand toward the harpsihord five minutes after the music began and was returned to him by the worthy worker who was turning the pages for the harpsichordist, and not long before the symphony ended his wide-sweeping arms opened a split in the side of his jacket, which was repaired during intermission.

Limber, Tidy

In the meantme, he conducted a nicely-styled Haydn symphony. It was limber as well as tidy, well-paced and balanced and spirited. The Stravinsky, also, was neatly ordered and kept moving at a lively bounce.

Both works are happy pieces, and Thomas helped them spread joy among the 6268 listeners in attendance. He is scheduled to appear on the Tanglewood podium once more this summer, Aug. 8, when his program will include Debussy's "La Mer" and Gary Graffman as soloist for Prokofiev's Third Piano Concerto.

The gate counts this weekend: Friday night, 4648; Saturday morning, 2415; Saturday night, 7407; Sunday afternoon, 6268; total, 20,739.

The approaching programs: Tuesday at 6, Chicago, John Sebastian (Rock), Preservation Hall Jazz Band (New Orleans traditional); Friday at 7, Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Friday at 9, BSO conducted by Aaron Copland; Saturday at 8:30, BSO conducted by Jorge Mester; Sunday at 2:30, BSO conducted by Kenneth Schermerhorn with Christoph Eschenbach as piano soloist.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Thursday, July 23, 1970

Tanglewood Adventures Rife With Precision and Diversity

By STEVEN A. COLE

Excitement, sophistication and diversity are the words that best describe the Sunday afternoon musical adventures with the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood. This past Sunday was no exception.

The young genius Michael Tilson Thomas gallantly lead this country's most exciting example of teamwork through Haydn Symphony No. 98, the Bach Cantata 51, 'Jauchzet Gott,' Krenek's concert aria 'Die Nachtigall,' and Stravinsky's Suite from Pulcinella.

The Boston Symphony's ability to execute clean phrasing through an impeccible sense of style can most be evident in a Haydn. Symphony No. 98 is typical. His works are characterized by a firmness of phrasing, a lucidity of centent, and a richness that are the products of a dedicated and talented musician. If it were not for fear of boring the reviewer's audience, one could discuss all of Haydn's Symphonies and enjoy seeing this man constantly creating new melodies and delicate structures.

When the work was first performed, Haydn himself was at the keyboard accompanying the orchestra in the continuo fashion that was so prevalent in the baroque period, but often omitted in today's performances.

* * *

Most interesting of the movements is the second. Here we have the theme that sounds very much like "God Save the King." Although of Austrian birth, Haydn wrote symphonies 93-98 while in London. Authorities on Haydn feel that the second movement is Haydn's requiem for the December, 1971 death of his dear friend and fellow composer Mozart.

The final movement is grandiose and brilliant, requiring full orchestration. It is felt that the Boston Symphony shines even brighter when the demands upon teamwork are increased.

* * *

Bethany Beardslee is a sopranique required for coloratura no who has mastered the techsinging and has gone on to new heights: musicanship par excellence and originally in approach. Like a large majority of America's finest, she is coming uot of Julliard. She is internationally famous for interpreting the so called more diffecult composers: Stravinsky, Berg, Webern, Krenek.

The Bach Cantata 51 is treacherous. The soprano is constantly on the move establishing a feeling of joy for the wonders of God. Bach gives the coloratura the opportunity to prove her title. For the Italian phrase means repid passages, runs, trills, and pure virtuosity.

Miss Beardslee's abilities can not be praised enough. Most singers fear going into that top register where breathing, intonation, and establishment of the lines are the most difficult. Hers is a voice of crystal-like quality which can attempt Bach's devilishment with audacity.

This reviewer is familar with Maria Stader's interpretation on the Archive label of this work and highly recommends it for the listener who wants to add it to a collection.

* * *

Miss Beardslee gains her reputation from interpreting the words of the Stravinskyians or 12-tone advocates. Krenek is often considered the first important composer to advocate the 12-tone technique outside of, say, Schoenberg, Twelve-tone music is the idea of 12 chromatic tones used in an arbitrary but fixed order without regard for traditional tonality.

The conert aria 'Die Nachtigall' was composed in 1931 and is indeed a work of wild harmonies, rhythms and colors.

This reviewer is really unable to comment upon the work except to say that Miss Beardslee is bold.

* * *

The final piece scheduled for Sunday's program was an interesting follow up for Krenek. Stravinsky's ballet Pulcinella of 1920 is often considered his introduction of the neo-classical idea.

The theme of the Suite is based upon the four Punchinellos for which Picasso devised scenery and costumes. There is no doubt that this work is a product of the man Stravinsky: it oozes with cleverness and boldness.

Stravinsky will long remain a controversy. He is new. He is different. We are traditionalist.

But there is no doubt in the minds of the 20th centurians that Igor Stravinsky's star has become fixed in the firmament of the master composers.

As far as a comment concerning how the Boston Symphony would interpret such a work, enough praise has been given in one article to warrant no more. C'est tout.

And this weekend? Phyllis Curtain, the energetic soprano from the New York City Opera and Metropolitan who is artist-in-resident at Tanglewood this summer, will open Friday's program with songs of Copland, Faura, and Schubert.

She is a clever woman who will bring, no doubt, orginally to the songs of these men. She will sing at 7. At 9 Schubert's Symphony No. 5 really shouldn't be missed.

Two Copland numbers and the Busoni Arlacchinesco will appear with them. Saturday, CPE Bach's Sinfornia in D will lead the morning. Strauss' delightful Suite 'Le bourgeois gentilhomme' and Mozart's Jupiter symphony will follow.

* * *

On Sunday, this reviewer's favorite day, at 2:30, Stravinsky's wild Conceto in D for strings can be looked forward to.

On the same program will appear Haydn's "Hen" Symphony, Mozart's Piano concerto K. 459, and Tchaikovsky's "Mozartiana."

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600

JUL 21 1970

New England Newsclip

Music: Mixed Elements

Bach, Mozart, Moderns and Haydn Are Combined on Berkshire Program

By ALLEN HUGHES

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., July 20 — One of the most interesting aspects of the concerts given by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood this weekend has been the way in which the artistic directors of the Berkshire Festival have dealt with a reduced orchestra. This is that part of the summer during which a sizable segment of the Boston Symphony has to be in Boston to play the Esplanade Concerts.

●

In years past, the festival has gotten around this limitation by presenting Bach and Mozart weekends that got by easily with a small orchestra. This time, Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, the artistic directors, decided to combine works by Bach and Mozart with small-scale 20th-century items and to add some Haydn for good measure.

The modern works were certainly welcome, but the Friday and Sunday programs that mixed these elements had a needlessly hodge-podge nature that kept them from making the cohesive artistic impact they might have had with astute planning and arrangement.

The Saturday-night concert, which was devoted entirely to Mozart and conducted by Mr. Ozawa, posed a problem of another sort. It ended delightfully with an eloquent interpretation of the Piano Concert in D minor (K. 466) played by the radiant Lili Kraus, but the price for enjoying this was sitting through the long and tedious Serenade No. 10 in B flat for 13 Wind Instruments (K. 361). This is an interesting work in regard to its scoring, but it is not lovable Mozart, and it wears out its welcome for the general listener long before it tootles to its final cadence.

The Sunday concert, led by Michael Tilston Thomas, the 25-year-old associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, offered Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B flat, Bach's Solo Cantata No. 51, "Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen," Krenek's Die Nachtigall" (a concert aria), and the concert suite from Stravinsky's "Pulcinella."

The Krenek work impressed this listener as a little gem. It dates from 1931 and is described by the composer as being of his last compositions in the neo-romantic vein. The text is Karl Kraus's German paraphrase of a passage from Aristophanes's "The Birds." Krenek's scoring for coloratura soprano, two flutes and strings is wondrously delicate and sensitive and evokes in sound the mystery and magic of the forest at night.

●

Bethany Beardslee sang it so beautifully that it would be a treat to hear her do it again. She did a good job with the difficult Bach cantata, too, but in this her voice seemed a bit small for the Tanglewood Shed.

Young Mr. Thomas conducted everything with the authority of a seasoned professional. The Haydn was warm, energetic, supple in phrasing, and the Stravinsky had the jauntiness, pungency and precision that make it a constant joy.

56

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

JUL 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Review

Third Weekend Of The Berkshire Festival

By Martha deB Beaver

First performances seemed to be the order of the third weekend Berkshire Festival programs at Tanglewood in Lenox. Friday evening two were presented, the enchanting Serenade for tenor (John Alexander), horn, played by James Stagliano without valves like an early hand horn, as the composer directs, and strings. The other permiere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the titillating Divertissement of Jacques Ibert, a delight for both musicians and audience obviously.

The first half of the program included Haydn's Symphony No. 86 in D, and unfortunately, replacing the "Eonta" of Iannis Xenakis scheduled for performance by pianist-composer Yuji Takahashi, Mozart's Piano Concerto in A, K. 488, for which Takahashi was less attuned, or perhaps it was the combination of the pianist and Ozawa's always individual interpretation.

But Saturday's concert was another story. Mozart again, with the woodwinds and brass sections displayed in their almost matchless perfection, through the Serenade No. 10 in B flat for thirteen wind instruments K.361. There was something about the work that didn't quite satisfy, though. The overall dark color (no flutes to lighten it) provided by masterful writing for clarinets masterfully played, naturally pervaded the seven movements. But interest in compositional mood and instrumental combinations was constant...the first minuet given to graceful tunes on the oboes and horns after being introduced by the clarinets with a march-like effect...the adagio's clean long lines taken first by bassoons, then clarinets and oboes...another Minuet: allegretto having a bucolic feeling reminiscent of Beethoven, but more lugubrious..the Roanze: adagio (French horns were silent) with more varied color and wider use of registers. Thema mit variationen, its theme presented in triplet ornamentation, lilting 16th, and delightful canon, the slow section fragmented, and ending with a quick flourish..the final Rondo: allegro molto, a speedy flash of still dark coloring. Interesting yes, but not stirring, although each movement in itself might present a quite different reaction, heard separately, or a few at a time.

Contained excitement was engendered by the next performance, that of Hungarian-born Lili Kraus, in her first, and we hope, not last, appearance at Tanglewood, serving Mozart's unique Piano Concerto in D minor, K 466. Gowned in a stunning long-sleeved silvery brocade creation, from the beginning the pianist breathed complete mastery over her instrument and a forcefully individual interpretation of the composer's work. We must confess again that the fast-paced tempo of the first movement disturbed us, but such was the fascination of Miss Kraus' chameleon-like change from diamond-hard to limpid-soft tone, that the cool clarity of runs and broken octaves being muffled was soon overlooked. Perhaps these effects were intended to create the inherent feeling of tragic unrest and gloomy despair of this allegro, but we don't think Mozart would have agreed with the unbridled tempo; he often warned against undue speed. The whole was quite devoid, and purposely we think, of elegant emotionalism, the rubatos were beautifully achieved by Miss Kraus, however, and all moved quickly in development to a stunning (Beethoven) cadenza.

Sometimes decried, we're delighted that Mozart employed a romantic outlook for this movingly tender second movement in B flat major, which he designated with the German word Romanze. But tenderness was not Miss Kraus' interest; shaping seemed uppermost, with a new and different coloring each time the poetic theme recurred. Every statement was molded to perfection, including those brief melting phrases echoed by the orchestra, and that delicious second theme. A sudden and wild episode in G minor involving piano and woodwinds following the main theme's return which could suggest a kind of despair, was brilliantly presented, and pointed up once more the wealth of contrasts with which Mozart imbued this magnificent concerto.

In complete accord, at a prestissimo tempo, Ozawa led pianist and chamber unit of musicians through the final Rondo: allegro assai, Miss Kraus noticeably absorbing the orchestral beauty with a delicate hunch of her shoulders, delighting in each striking change of melodious mood, from major to minor key, and the final impassioned freshet of joy after restless unhappiness Mozart achieved with the cheery clarity of D major. The Beethoven cadenza was richly varied and prompted one to wonder about Mozart's impromptu cadenzas in which it was said he "scattered even greater beauties than left in his great work." The premiere of this concerto was performed by Mozart without rehearsal, Feb. 11, 1785, at the Mehlgrube (flour pit) hall, which was to become the Hotel Meunch, and realized an unusual sum for the young genius.

Another first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given Sunday, Krenek's neo-romantic Concert aria "Die Nachtigall" for coloratura, two flutes, and strings, with Bethany Beardslee as soloist. We heard the seldom-played Haydn Symphony No. 98 in B flat, its slow movement perhaps "a requiem for Mozart, the news of whose death had deeply shocked Haydn during his London stay." The Minuet is one of his most appealing and flowing, the Presto a tripping enchantment.

Bach's Cantata No. 51 for soprano and orchestra with trumpet obligato proved highly interesting, particularly the modulatory wealth of the first aria, mostly set in a high register, the second aria with cello and cembalo continuo, and final Alleluja with trumpet used almost as a second voice. Stravinsky's always fascinating concert suite from the ballet "Pulcinella" closed the program, which was conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, with strong musicianship.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 23 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood In Review

Friday, July 17
By J.B.

On Friday night Seiji Ozawa led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of music ranging from the 18th to the 20th centuries and from solemnity to comedy.

He began the first work, Haydn's Symphony no. 86 in D, with a tempo that seemed a little slow compared to many recorded performances of the later Haydn symphonies, but this conductor's control of rhythm is so sure that he must have had good reason to proceed as he did. The minuet was paced beautifully (and more conventionally). Ozawa is good at bringing out intensity, as he illustrated in his handling of the lively finale.

Yuji Takahashi was the soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in A (K. 488). His playing did not have the clarity one expects at Tanglewood.

The third work on the program, Benjamin Britten's Serenade for Tenor, Horn, and Strings, featured John Alexander as the vocalist and James Stagliano on the horn. It was a cycle of six songs based on poems by Tennyson, Blake, Jonson, Keats, and others. Stagliano's control of pitch and intensity on the horn was superb, especially in his crescendoes. After hearing Alexander sing, it is possible to understand why he dropped out of medical school to pursue a singing career.

Divertissement, by Jacques Ibert, was fun — a spoof of Mendelssohn, Debussy, and himself.

Saturday, July 18
By J.B.

Saturday's program was devoted to two works by Mozart: the Serenade for Thirteen Wind Instruments (K. 361) and the Piano Concerto in D Minor (K. 466). It is encouraging that Ozawa had the courage to present at least one piece this year for a chamber sized group instead of the full orchestral pieces that are the staple at Tanglewood. The Serenade took a full hour to play, including pauses between each of the seven sections, but Ozawa refused to let himself be rushed, either by the length of the work or by the impatience of the audience, which seemed almost bored by this beautiful and reflective but unspectacular music.

Another reviewer for this paper has criticized Ozawa's treatment of Mozart as correct but uninspired. I had not heard Ozawa conduct Mozart before Friday night, but I found his feeling for Mozart as inspired as that of any conductor I have heard, and rather more inspired than most. Ozawa's handling on Saturday night of the K. 466 Piano Concerto, with Lili Kraus as soloist, was excellent and showed a great amount of feeling for the music. His practice of leading the orchestra through the piece without pause between movements is unusual and effective.

The rule at Tanglewood against the seating of latecomers before the end of a movement apparently is not enforced for everyone. On Friday night, in the middle of a song, six people with drinks in hand walked through the audience to their box seats.

Sunday, July 19
By A.C.S.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the BSO, was on the podium this afternoon. The program, like others in the season, contained a first performance by the orchestra. It was Ernst Krenek's concert aria, "The Nightingale," with Bethany Beardslee as soloist. Both she and the orchestra gave an impassioned presentation of this neo-romantic work. Earlier she had sung the Bach Cantata No. 51, "Jauchzet Gott," an exciting and extremely difficult work with a trumpet obbligato which was played to perfection by Armando Ghitalla. Miss Beardslee has a large and well-controlled voice which, despite some rhythmic lapses in the Bach, was eminently suitable for the works at hand.

Haydn's "Symphony No. 98" provided a delightful opening to the concert. The "Adagio cantabile" and the final "Presto" (with its charming interludes for violin and cembalo) were especially effective. The "Pulcinella Suite" of Stravinsky, which brought the afternoon to a close, was generally attractive but suffered at times from lack of coordination.

Michael Tilson Thomas, for all his youth, is a commanding conductor.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

JUL 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Review

Third Weekend Of The Berkshire Festival

By Martha deB Beaver

First performances seemed to be the order of the third weekend Berkshire Festival programs at Tanglewood in Lenox. Friday evening two were presented, the enchanting Serenade for tenor (John Alexander), horn, played by James Stagliano without valves like an early hand horn, as the composer directs, and strings. The other permiere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the titillating Divertissement of Jacques Ibert, a delight for both musicians and audience obviously.

The first half of the program included Haydn's Symphony No. 86 in D, and unfortunately, replacing the "Eonta" of Iannis Xenakis scheduled for performance by pianist-composer Yuji Takahashi, Mozart's Piano Concerto in A, K. 488, for which Takahashi was less attuned, or perhaps it was the combination of the pianist and Ozawa's always individual interpretation.

But Saturday's concert was another story. Mozart again, with the woodwinds and brass sections displayed in their almost matchless perfection, through the Serenade No. 10 in B flat for thirteen wind instruments K.361. There was something about the work that didn't quite satisfy, though. The overall dark color (no flutes to lighten it) provided by masterful writing for clarinets masterfully played, naturally pervaded the seven movements. But interest in compositional mood and instrumental combinations was constant...the first minuet given to graceful tunes on the oboes and horns after being introduced by the clarinets with a march-like effect...the adagio's clean long lines taken first by bassoons, then clarinets and oboes...another Minuet: allegretto having a bucolic feeling reminiscent of Beethoven, but more lugubrious..the Roanze: adagio (French horns were silent) with more varied color and wider use of registers. Thema mit variationen, its theme presented in triplet ornamentation, lilting 16th, and delightful canon, the slow section fragmented, and ending with a quick flourish..the final Rondo: allegro molto, a speedy flash of still dark coloring. Interesting yes, but not stirring, although each movement in itself might present a quite different reaction, heard separately, or a few at a time.

Contained excitement was engendered by the next performance, that of Hungarian-born Lili Kraus, in her first, and we hope, not last, appearance at Tanglewood, serving Mozart's unique Piano Concerto in D minor, K 466. Gowned in a stunning long-sleeved silvery brocade creation, from the beginning the pianist breathed complete mastery over her instrument and a forcefully individual interpretation of the composer's work. We must confess again that the fast-paced tempo of the first movement disturbed us, but such was the fascination of Miss Kraus' chameleon-like change from diamond-hard to limpid-soft tone, that the cool clarity of runs and broken octaves being muffled was soon overlooked. Perhaps these effects were intended to create the inherent feeling of tragic unrest and gloomy despair of this allegro, but we don't think Mozart would have agreed with the unbridled tempo; he often warned against undue speed. The whole was quite devoid, and purposely we think, of elegant emotionalism, the rubatos were beautifully achieved by Miss Kraus, however, and all moved quickly in development to a stunning (Beethoven) cadenza.

Sometimes decried, we're delighted that Mozart employed a romantic outlook for this movingly tender second movement in B flat major, which he designated with the German word Romanze. But tenderness was not Miss Kraus' interest; shaping seemed uppermost, with a new and different coloring each time the poetic theme recurred. Every statement was molded to perfection, including those brief melting phrases echoed by the orchestra, and that delicious second theme. A sudden and wild episode in G minor involving piano and woodwinds following the main theme's return which could suggest a kind of despair, was brilliantly presented, and pointed up once more the wealth of contrasts with which Mozart imbued this magnificent concerto.

In complete accord, at a prestissimo tempo, Ozawa led pianist and chamber unit of musicians through the final Rondo: allegro assai, Miss Kraus noticeably absorbing the orchestral beauty with a delicate hunch of her shoulders, delighting in each striking change of melodious mood, from major to minor key, and the final impassioned freshet of joy after restless unhappiness Mozart achieved with the cheery clarity of D major. The Beethoven cadenza was richly varied and prompted one to wonder about Mozart's impromptu cadenzas in which it was said he "scattered even greater beauties than left in his great work." The premiere of this concerto was performed by Mozart without rehearsal, Feb. 11, 1785, at the Mehlgrube (flour pit) hall, which was to become the Hotel Meunch, and realized an unusual sum for the young genius.

Another first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given Sunday, Krenek's neo-romantic Concert aria "Die Nachtigall" for coloratura, two flutes, and strings, with Bethany Beardslee as soloist. We heard the seldom-played Haydn Symphony No. 98 in B flat, its slow movement perhaps "a requiem for Mozart, the news of whose death had deeply shocked Haydn during his London stay." The Minuet is one of his most appealing and flowing, the Presto a tripping enchantment.

Bach's Cantata No. 51 for soprano and orchestra with trumpet obligato proved highly interesting, particularly the modulatory wealth of the first aria, mostly set in a high register, the second aria with cello and cembalo continuo, and final Alleluja with trumpet used almost as a second voice. Stravinsky's always fascinating concert suite from the ballet "Pulcinella" closed the program, which was conducted by Michael Tilson Thomas, with strong musicianship.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 23 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood In Review

Friday, July 17
By J.B.

On Friday night Seiji Ozawa led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of music ranging from the 18th to the 20th centuries and from solemnity to comedy.

He began the first work, Haydn's Symphony no. 86 in D, with a tempo that seemed a little slow compared to many recorded performances of the later Haydn symphonies, but this conductor's control of rhythm is so sure that he must have had good reason to proceed as he did. The minuet was paced beautifully (and more conventionally). Ozawa is good at bringing out intensity, as he illustrated in his handling of the lively finale.

Yuji Takahashi was the soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in A (K. 488). His playing did not have the clarity one expects at Tanglewood.

The third work on the program, Benjamin Britten's Serenade for Tenor, Horn, and Strings, featured John Alexander as the vocalist and James Stagliano on the horn. It was a cycle of six songs based on poems by Tennyson, Blake, Jonson, Keats, and others. Stagliano's control of pitch and intensity on the horn was superb, especially in his crescendoes. After hearing Alexander sing, it is possible to understand why he dropped out of medical school to pursue a singing career.

Divertissement, by Jacques Ibert, was fun — a spoof of Mendelssohn, Debussy, and himself.

Saturday, July 18
By J.B.

Saturday's program was devoted to two works by Mozart: the Serenade for Thirteen Wind Instruments (K. 361) and the Piano Concerto in D Minor (K. 466). It is encouraging that Ozawa had the courage to present at least one piece this year for a chamber sized group instead of the full orchestral pieces that are the staple at Tanglewood. The Serenade took a full hour to play, including pauses between each of the seven sections, but Ozawa refused to let himself be rushed, either by the length of the work or by the impatience of the audience, which seemed almost bored by this beautiful and reflective but unspectacular music.

Another reviewer for this paper has criticized Ozawa's treatment of Mozart as correct but uninspired. I had not heard Ozawa conduct Mozart before Friday night, but I found his feeling for Mozart as inspired as that of any conductor I have heard, and rather more inspired than most. Ozawa's handling on Saturday night of the K. 466 Piano Concerto, with Lili Kraus as soloist, was excellent and showed a great amount of feeling for the music. His practice of leading the orchestra through the piece without pause between movements is unusual and effective.

The rule at Tanglewood against the seating of latecomers before the end of a movement apparently is not enforced for everyone. On Friday night, in the middle of a song, six people with drinks in hand walked through the audience to their box seats.

Sunday, July 19
By A.C.S.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the BSO, was on the podium this afternoon. The program, like others in the season, contained a first performance by the orchestra. It was Ernst Krenek's concert aria, "The Nightingale," with Bethany Beardslee as soloist. Both she and the orchestra gave an impassioned presentation of this neo-romantic work. Earlier she had sung the Bach Cantata No. 51, "Jauchzet Gott," an exciting and extremely difficult work with a trumpet obbligato which was played to perfection by Armando Ghitalla. Miss Beardslee has a large and well-controlled voice which, despite some rhythmic lapses in the Bach, was eminently suitable for the works at hand.

Haydn's "Symphony No. 98" provided a delightful opening to the concert. The "Adagio cantabile" and the final "Presto" (with its charming interludes for violin and cembalo) were especially effective. The "Pulcinella Suite" of Stravinsky, which brought the afternoon to a close, was generally attractive but suffered at times from lack of coordination.

Michael Tilson Thomas, for all his youth, is a commanding conductor.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 13 1970 New England Newsclip

Third Weekend At Tanglewood Is Coming Up

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa opens the third weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, July 17 at 9 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood in Lenox. Soloists for the evening are pianist Yuji Takahashi, tenor John Alexander, and Boston Symphony principal horn player James Stagliano. The program opens with Haydn's Symphony no. 86 in D followed by the Mozart piano concerto in A, K. 488 with Mr. Takahashi as piano soloist. Benjamin Britten's Serenade for tenor, horn, and strings features Mr. Alexander and Mr. Stagliano. The program concludes with Ibert's Divertissement.

Preceding the 9 p.m. Orchestra concert is the Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in the Shed. Pianist Yuji Takahashi plays music by Bach and Messiaen. Mr. Takahashi has been a Teaching Fellow in Piano and Contemporary Music at the Berkshire Music Center and is the only student of composer Yannis Xenakis. Admission to these recitals is free to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. concert.

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducts the weekly Open Rehearsal on Saturday morning, July 18 at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed. Tickets are on sale the morning of the rehearsal at $2.50 and benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. These rehearsals offer a relaxed look at the Orchestra, conductor, and soloists preparing the Berkshire Festival music.

Lili Kraus is piano soloist with Mr. Ozawa in an all-Mozart program Saturday evening, July 18 at 8:30 p.m. The program opens with the Serenade no. 10 in B-flat for 13 wind instruments, K. 361. Mme Kraus then plays the Pian concerto in d minor, K. 466.

Sunday, July 19 at 2:30 p.m Michael Tilson Thomas conduct his first Tanglewood concer with the Boston Symphony, opening his program with the Symphony no. 98 in B-flat by Haydn. Soprano Bethany Beardslee is soloist in Bach's Cantata no. 51, Jauchzet Gott, and in Kreneck's concert aria Die Nachtigall. Stravinsky's Pulchinella suite concludes the concert.

Mr. Thomas was a conducting fellow of the Berkshire Music Center during 1968, and was awarded the Koussevitzky Prize in conducting. On October 22, 1970, barely a month after assuming the position of Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony, he replaced William Steinberg at the mid-point of a Philharmonic Hall concert at Lincoln Center when Mr. Steinberg became ill. Since then, his audience and critical success have been enormous.

Odetta, the Gary Burton Quartet, and the Crayton Family Gospel Singers are featured artists in the second Contemporary Trends Concert at Tanglewood Tuesday, July 14 at 8:30 p.m. The concert will be given in Tanglewood's Theatre-Concert Hall. Tickets are $4 (reserved) and $3 for admission to the lawn and may be purchased at the Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

JUL 15 1970 New England Newsclip

Haydn Symphony No. 86 on Tanglewood program

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa opens the third weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, July 17 at 9 p.m. in the shed at Lenox.

Soloists for the evening are pianist Yuji Takahashi, tenor John Alexander, and Boston Symphony principal horn player James Stagliano. The program opens with Haydn's Symphony No. 86 in D followed by the Mozart piano concerto in A, K. 488 with Mr. Takahashi as piano soloist. Benjamin Britten's "Serenade for tenor, horn, and strings" features Mr. Alexander and Mr. Stagliano. The program concludes with Ibert's "Divertissement."

Preceding the 9 p.m. orchestra concert is the Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in the shed. Pianist Yuji Takahashi plays music by Bach and Messiaen. Mr. Takahashi has been a Teaching Fellow in Piano and Contemporary Music at the Berkshire Music Center and is the only student of composer Yannis Xenakis. Admission to these recitals is free to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. concert.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducts the weekly Open Rehearsal on Saturday morning at 10.30 a.m. in the shed.

Lili Kraus is piano soloist with Mr. Ozawa in an all-Mozart program Saturday evening, July 18 at 8.30 p.m. The program opens with the Serenade no. 10 in B-flat for 13 wind instruments, K. 361. Mme. Kraus then plays the Piano concerto in d minor, K. 466.

Sunday at 2.30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts his first Tanglewood concert with the Boston Symphony, opening his program with the Symphony No. 98 in B-flat by Haydn. Soprano Bethany Beardslee is soloist in Bach's Cantata No. 51, "Jauchzet Gott," and in Kreneck's concert aria "Die Nachtigall." Stravinsky's "Pulchinella" suite concludes the concert.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 12 1970 New England Newsclip

3rd weekend at Tanglewood

The third weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts begins this Friday at 7 p.m. with a piano recital of works of Bach and Messien by Yuji Takahashi. A teaching fellow in piano and contemporary music at the Berkshire Music Center, Takahashi is the only student of composer Yannis Xenakis. His concert is free to ticketholders of the Friday 9 p.m. concert.

Seiji Ozawa will conduct the Friday evening concert, which features tenor John Alexander and hornist James Stagliano in Britten's "Serenade for Tenor, Horn and Strings." The program opens with Haydn's Symphony No. 86, followed by Mozart's Piano Concerto in A, K. 488, with Takahashi as soloist. Ibert's "Divertissement" concludes the program.

Lili Kraus is piano soloist in an all-Mozart concert Saturday, July 18, at 8:30 p.m. The program opens with the Serenade No. 10, in B-flat, for 13 wind instruments, K. 361. Mme Kraus then plays the Concerto in D minor, K. 466.

Michael Tilson Thomas conducts his first Tanglewood concert Sunday, July 19, at 2:30 p.m., opening with Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B-flat. Soprano Bethany Beardslee is soloist in Bach's Cantata No. 51, "Jauchzet Gott," and in Kreneck's concert aria "Die Nachtigall." Stravinsky's "Pulcinella Suite" concludes the concert.

Odetta, the Gary Burton Quartet, and the Crayton Family Gospel Singers are featured artists in the second Contemporary Trends Concert to be given Tuesday, July 14, at 8:30 p.m., in Tanglewood's Theatre-Concert Hall.

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
WEEKLY 11,000

JUL 3 1970 New England Newsclip

In Britten's "Serenade" At Tanglewood

At Tanglewood on Friday, July 17 at 9 pm, John Alexander, above left, will perform Britten's Serenade for tenor, horn, and strings. Mr Alexander appeared for the first time with the Metropolitan Opera in 1961, and since that time has been one of the Company's leading tenors.

James Stagliano, right above, principal horn of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1946, will play with the orchestra. Mr Stagliano has played in the Detroit Orchestra, and as principal in the orchestras of St. Louis, Chicago, Cleveland and Los Angeles.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 16 1970 New England Newsclip

Weekend At Tanglewood

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa opens the third weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening, July 17 at 9 p.m. in the Shed. Soloists for the evening are pianist Yuji Takahashi, tenor John Alexander, and Boston Symphony principal horn player James Stagliano. The program will open with Haydn's Symphony no. 86 in D followed by the Mozart piano concerto in A, K. 488 with Mr. Takahashi as piano soloist. Benjamin Britten's "Serenade for tenor, horn, and strings" will feature Mr. Alexander and Mr. Stagliano. The program concludes with Ibert's "Divertissement."

Preceding the 9 p.m. Orchestra concert is the Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in the Shed. Pianist Yuji Takahashi plays music by Bach and Messiaen. Mr. Takahashi has been a Teaching Fellow in Piano and Contemporary Music at the Berkshire Music Center and is the only student of composer Yannis Xenakis. Admission to these recitals is free to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. concert.

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducts the weekly Open Rehearsal on Saturday morning, July 18 at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed. Tickets are on sale the morning of the rehearsal and benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. These rehearsals offer a relaxed look at the Orchestra, conductor, and soloists preparing the Berkshire Festival music.

Lili Kraus is piano soloist with Mr. Ozawa in an all-Mozart program Saturday evening, July 18 at 8:30 p.m. The program opens with the Serenade no. 10 in B-flat for 13 wind instruments, K. 361. Mme. Kraus then plays the Piano concerto in D minor, K. 466.

Sunday, July 19 at 2:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts his first Tanglewood concert with the Boston Symphony, opening his program with the Sumphony no. 98 in B-flat by Haydn. Soprano Bethany Beardslee is soloist in Bach's Cantata no. 51, "Jauchzet Gott," and in Kreneck's concert aria "Die Nachtigall." Stravinsky's "Pulchinella" suite concludes the concert.

Mr. Thomas was a conducting fellow of the Berkshire Music Center during 1968, and was awarded the Koussevitsky Prize in conducting. On October 22, 1970, barely a month after assuming the position of Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony, he replaced William Steinberg at the mid-point of a Philharmonic Hall concert at Lincoln Center when Mr. Steinberg became ill. Since then, his audience and critical success have been enormous.

Odetta, the Gary Burton Quartet, and the Crayton Family Gospel Singers are featured artists in the second Contemporary Trends Concert at Tanglewood Tuesday, July 14 at 8:30 p.m. The concert will be given in Tanglewood's Theatre-Concert Hall.

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO
D. 176,688 SUN. 200,492

JUL 15 1970

Tanglewood Mass: Friday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have as its guest soloists pianists Yuji Takahashi, John Alexander, and James Stagliano, under the baton of Seji Ozawa.

Pianist Lili Kraus will play in all-Mozart program Saturday. Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct, with Bethany Beardslee as soloist, Sunday at 2:30 p.m.

Saratoga, N.Y.: The New York City Ballet is in residence July 26 at Saratoga Performance Arts Center.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 13 1970 New England Newsclip

Third Weekend At Tanglewood Is Coming Up

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa opens the third weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, July 17 at 9 p.m. in the Shed at Tanglewood in Lenox. Soloists for the evening are pianist Yuji Takahashi, tenor John Alexander, and Boston Symphony principal horn player James Stagliano. The program opens with Haydn's Symphony no. 86 in D followed by the Mozart piano concerto in A, K. 488 with Mr. Takahashi as piano soloist. Benjamin Britten's Serenade for tenor, horn, and strings features Mr. Alexander and Mr. Stagliano. The program concludes with Ibert's Divertissement.

Preceding the 9 p.m. Orchestra concert is the Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in the Shed. Pianist Yuji Takahashi plays music by Bach and Messiaen. Mr. Takahashi has been a Teaching Fellow in Piano and Contemporary Music at the Berkshire Music Center and is the only student of composer Yannis Xenakis. Admission to these recitals is free to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. concert.

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducts the weekly Open Rehearsal on Saturday morning, July 18 at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed. Tickets are on sale the morning of the rehearsal at $2.50 and benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. These rehearsals offer a relaxed look at the Orchestra, conductor, and soloists preparing the Berkshire Festival music.

Lili Kraus is piano soloist with Mr. Ozawa in an all-Mozart program Saturday evening, July 18 at 8:30 p.m. The program opens with the Serenade no. 10 in B-flat for 13 wind instruments, K. 361. Mm Kraus then plays the Pian concerto in d minor, K. 466.

Sunday, July 19 at 2;30 p.m Michael Tilson Thomas conduct his first Tanglewood concer with the Boston Symphony, opening his program with the Symphony no. 98 in B-flat by Haydn. Soprano Bethany Beardslee is soloist in Bach's Cantata no. 51, Jauchzet Gott, and in Kreneck's concert aria Die Nachtigall. Stravinsky's Pulchinella suite concludes the concert.

Mr. Thomas was a conducting fellow of the Berkshire Music Center during 1968, and was awarded the Koussevitzky Prize in conducting. On October 22, 1970, barely a month after assuming the position of Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony, he replaced William Steinberg at the mid-point of a Philharmonic Hall concert at Lincoln Center when Mr. Steinberg became ill. Since then, his audience and critical success have been enormous.

Odetta, the Gary Burton Quartet, and the Crayton Family Gospel Singers are featured artists in the second Contemporary Trends Concert at Tanglewood Tuesday, July 14 at 8:30 p.m. The concert will be given in Tanglewood's Theatre-Concert Hall. Tickets are $4 (reserved) and $3 for admission to the lawn and may be purchased at the Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

JUL 15 1970 New England Newsclip

Haydn Symphony No. 86 on Tanglewood program

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa opens the third weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening, July 17 at 9 p.m. in the shed at Lenox.

Soloists for the evening are pianist Yuji Takahashi, tenor John Alexander, and Boston Symphony principal horn player James Stagliano. The program opens with Haydn's Symphony No. 86 in D followed by the Mozart piano concerto in A, K. 488 with Mr. Takahashi as piano soloist. Benjamin Britten's "Serenade for tenor, horn, and strings" features Mr. Alexander and Mr. Stagliano. The program concludes with Ibert's "Divertissement."

Preceding the 9 p.m. orchestra concert is the Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in the shed. Pianist Yuji Takahashi plays music by Bach and Messiaen. Mr. Takahashi has been a Teaching Fellow in Piano and Contemporary Music at the Berkshire Music Center and is the only student of composer Yannis Xenakis. Admission to these recitals is free to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. concert.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducts the weekly Open Rehearsal on Saturday morning at 10.30 a.m. in the shed.

Lili Kraus is piano soloist with Mr. Ozawa in an all-Mozart program Saturday evening, July 18 at 8.30 p.m. The program opens with the Serenade no. 10 in B-flat for 13 wind instruments, K. 361. Mme. Kraus then plays the Piano concerto in d minor, K. 466.

Sunday at 2.30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts his first Tanglewood concert with the Boston Symphony, opening his program with the Symphony No. 98 in B-flat by Haydn. Soprano Bethany Beardslee is soloist in Bach's Cantata No. 51, "Jauchzet Gott," and in Kreneck's concert aria "Die Nachtigall." Stravinsky's "Pulchinella" suite concludes the concert.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 12 1970 New England Newsclip

3rd weekend at Tanglewood

The third weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts begins this Friday at 7 p.m. with a piano recital of works of Bach and Messien by Yuji Takahashi. A teaching fellow in piano and contemporary music at the Berkshire Music Center, Takahashi is the only student of composer Yannis Xenakis. His concert is free to ticketholders of the Friday 9 p.m. concert.

Seiji Ozawa will conduct the Friday evening concert, which features tenor John Alexander and hornist James Stagliano in Britten's "Serenade for Tenor, Horn and Strings." The program opens with Haydn's Symphony No. 86, followed by Mozart's Piano Concerto in A, K. 488, with Takahashi as soloist. Ibert's "Divertissement" concludes the program.

Lili Kraus is piano soloist in an all-Mozart concert Saturday, July 18, at 8:30 p.m. The program opens with the Serenade No. 10, in B-flat, for 13 wind instruments, K. 361. Mme Kraus then plays the Concerto in D minor, K. 466.

Michael Tilson Thomas conducts his first Tanglewood concert Sunday, July 19, at 2:30 p.m., opening with Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B-flat. Soprano Bethany Beardslee is soloist in Bach's Cantata No. 51, "Jauchzet Gott," and in Kreneck's concert aria "Die Nachtigall." Stravinsky's "Pulcinella Suite" concludes the concert.

Odetta, the Gary Burton Quartet, and the Crayton Family Gospel Singers are featured artists in the second Contemporary Trends Concert to be given Tuesday, July 14, at 8:30 p.m., in Tanglewood's Theatre-Concert Hall.

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
WEEKLY 11,000

JUL 3 1970 New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 16 1970 New England Newsclip

Weekend At Tanglewood

Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa opens the third weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow evening, July 17 at 9 p.m. in the Shed. Soloists for the evening are pianist Yuji Takahashi, tenor John Alexander, and Boston Symphony principal horn player James Stagliano. The program will open with Haydn's Symphony no. 86 in D followed by the Mozart piano concerto in A, K. 488 with Mr. Takahashi as piano soloist. Benjamin Britten's "Serenade for tenor, horn, and strings" will feature Mr. Alexander and Mr. Stagliano. The program concludes with Ibert's "Divertissement."

Preceding the 9 p.m. Orchestra concert is the Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in the Shed. Pianist Yuji Takahashi plays music by Bach and Messiaen. Mr. Takahashi has been a Teaching Fellow in Piano and Contemporary Music at the Berkshire Music Center and is the only student of composer Yannis Xenakis. Admission to these recitals is free to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. concert.

Michael Tilson Thomas, Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducts the weekly Open Rehearsal on Saturday morning, July 18 at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed. Tickets are on sale the morning of the rehearsal and benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund. These rehearsals offer a relaxed look at the Orchestra, conductor, and soloists preparing the Berkshire Festival music.

Lili Kraus is piano soloist with Mr. Ozawa in an all-Mozart program Saturday evening, July 18 at 8:30 p.m. The program opens with the Serenade no. 10 in B-flat for 13 wind instruments, K. 361. Mme. Kraus then plays the Piano concerto in D minor, K. 466.

Sunday, July 19 at 2:30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts his first Tanglewood concert with the Boston Symphony, opening his program with the Sumphony no. 98 in B-flat by Haydn. Soprano Bethany Beardslee is soloist in Bach's Cantata no. 51, "Jauchzet Gott," and in Kreneck's concert aria "Die Nachtigall." Stravinsky's "Pulchinella" suite concludes the concert.

Mr. Thomas was a conducting fellow of the Berkshire Music Center during 1968, and was awarded the Koussevitsky Prize in conducting. On October 22, 1970, barely a month after assuming the position of Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony, he replaced William Steinberg at the mid-point of a Philharmonic Hall concert at Lincoln Center when Mr. Steinberg became ill. Since then, his audience and critical success have been enormous.

Odetta, the Gary Burton Quartet, and the Crayton Family Gospel Singers are featured artists in the second Contemporary Trends Concert at Tanglewood Tuesday, July 14 at 8:30 p.m. The concert will be given in Tanglewood's Theatre-Concert Hall.

In Britten's "Serenade" At Tanglewood

At Tanglewood on Friday, July 17 at 9 pm, John Alexander, above left, will perform Britten's Serenade for tenor, horn, and strings. Mr Alexander appeared for the first time with the Metropolitan Opera in 1961, and since that time has been one of the Company's leading tenors.

James Stagliano, right above, principal horn of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1946, will play with the orchestra. Mr Stagliano has played in the Detroit Orchestra, and as principal in the orchestras of St. Louis, Chicago, Cleveland and Los Angeles.

THE BLADE
TOLEDO, OHIO
D. 176,688 SUN. 200,492

JUL 15 1970

evening.

Tanglewood Mass: Friday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have as its guest soloists pianists Yuji Takahashi, John Alexander, and James Stagliano, under the baton of Seji Ozawa.

Pianist Lili Kraus will play in all-Mozart program Saturday. Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct, with Bethany Beardslee as soloist, Sunday at 2:30 p.m.

Saratoga, N.Y.: The New York City Ballet is in residence July 26 at Saratoga Performance Arts Center.

Soloists Tanglewood Feature

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, — Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa opens the third weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening at 9 in the Shed. Soloists for the evening are pianist Yuji Takahashi, tenor John Alexander, and Boston Symphony principal horn player James Stagliano. The program with Haydn's serenade for tenor, (horn and strings)
Symphony no. 86 in D followed by the Mozart piano concerto in A, K. 488 with Takahashi as piano soloist. Benjamin Britten's features Alexander and Stagliano. The program concludes with Ibert's divertissement.

Weekend Prelude

Preceding the 9 p.m. orchestra concert is the Weekend Prelude at 7 in the Shed. Pianist Yuji Takahashi plays music by Bach and Messiaen. Takahashi has been a teaching fellow in piano and contemporary music at the Berkshire Music Center and is the only student of composer Yannis Xenakis.

* * *

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducts the weekly open rehearsal on Saturday morning at 10.30 in the Shed. These rehearsals offer a relaxed look at the orchestra, conductor, and soloists preparing the Berkshire Festival music.

* * *

Lili Kraus is piano soloist with Ozawa in an all-Mozart program Saturday evening at 8.30. The program opens with the Serenade no. 10 in B-flat for 13 wind instruments, K. 361. Mme. Kraus then plays the Piano concerto in d minor, K. 466.

* * *

Next Sunday at 2.30 p.m., Michael Tilson Thomas conducts his first Tanglewood concert with the Boston Symphony, opening his program with the Symphony no. 98 in B-flat by Haydn. Soprano Bethany Beardslee is soloist in Bach's Cantata No. 51, Jauchzet Gott, and in Kreneck's concert aria Die Nachtigall. Stravinsky's Pulchinella suite concludes the concert.

Thomas was a conducting fellow of the Berkshire Music Center during 1968, and was awarded the Koussevitzky Prize in conducting. On Oct. 22, 1970, barely a month after assuming the position of assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, he replaced William Steinberg at the mid-point of a Philharmonic Hall concert at Lincoln Center when Steinberg became ill. Since then, his audience and critical success have been enormous.

* * *

Odetta, the Gary Burton Quartet, and the Crayton Family Gospel Singers are featured artists in the second Contemporary Trends Concert at Tanglewood Tuesday at 8.30 p.m. The concert will be given in Tanglewood's Theatre-Concert Hall.

THIRD WEEKEND
BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL CONCERTS

Friday, July 17
7 P.m. Shed
Weekend Prelude
YUJI TAKAHASKI pianist
Music of Bach and Messiaen

* * *

9 p.m. Shed
SEIJI OZAWA conductor
YUJI TAKAHASHI pianist
JOHN ALEXANDER tenor
JAMES STAGLIANO horn
Haydn+ Symphony no. 86 in D
Mozart: Piano Concerto in A, K. 488
Britten: Serenade for tenor, horn and strings
Ibert: Divertissement (1930)

* * *

Saturday, July 18
10.30 A.m. Shed
Open Rehearsal

* * *

8.30 p.m. Shed
MOZART PROGRAM
SEIJI OZAWA conductor
LILI KRAUS pianist
Serenade no. 10 in B-flat for 13 wind instruments, K. 361
Piano Concerto in d minor, K. 466

* * *

Sunday, July 19
2.30 P.m. Shed
MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS conductor
BETHANY BEARDSLEE soprano
Haydn: Symphony no. 98 in B-flat
J.S. Bach: Cantata no. 51 "Jauchzet Gott"
Krenek: "Die Nachtigall"
Stravinsky: Pulchinella Suite

LILI KRAUS

JOHN ALEXANDER

Whitestone Photo

Lili Kraus with Seiji Ozawa, conductor, at Tanglewood

Applause from four continents

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

Lili Kraus is one of those extraordinary people to whom nothing inconsequential ever seems to happen. A pianist, Hungarian-born, and revered on four continents, she has played at wedding festivities for the Shah of Iran; in the first program ever of secular music heard in England's Canterbury Cathedral; in the inaugural concert arranged for Brazil's pristine new capital, Brasilia; in ornate Moroccan palaces, and with the late Dr. Albert Schweitzer as audience in the bare mess hall of his hospital in French Equatorial Africa (now Gabon). On the darker side, she spent three years (one of them at hard labor) in Japanese concentration camps in Java during World War II, a test of the inner self as unremitting as it was unexpected.

Chatting with Mme Kraus (as she is called by everyone) while she rocked in a comfortable wicker chair on a wide, shaded hotel veranda near Tanglewood — she returned to the Boston Symphony there in July — one wondered where to begin to probe such an unusual career.

The smiling, healthy-complexioned woman in a smart white pant-suit, hair piled high, unostentatious but richly handsome earrings of clusters of small green dangling stones, and a ring or two of subdued heirloom quality, was very much the unquenchably reassured star performer. She told of a full schedule of television appearances and radio interviews in New York, wondered how anyone could be a music critic, admitted to enjoying interviews (careful, she's about to interview you), and quite sincerely said the right things in praise of the lush green countryside in which she was a first-time guest.

Time to break the summer Berkshire ice. Would she consider it rude to be asked, not about her triumphs and honors, but about those dark days when her younger career was seemingly destroyed, her family—husband and two children—taken from her, and her daily diet a form of primitive slavery?

Mme Kraus, surprisingly, laughed rather whimsically. "I never think of it any more," she said. "So long ago — it was another Lili Kraus. So much has happened since then. . . ." But her eyes and her expression told that she was slipping back to those days.

Once she and her late husband, Dr. Otto Mandl, a professor of philosophy, had made a world tour without their two young children, and missed them so that they vowed never to be away from them so long again. So, when a concert tour of the East Indies was proposed, the family went together. They took a house in Bandung, where it was cooler, and Mme Kraus planned to move out to her recitals from the Javanese capital, Batavia.

It was 1940, and despite general disbelief, the Japanese did move in. As a British citizen, Mme Kraus—along with the American wife of the Dutch governor of the island, and a French woman—was seized on a false conspiracy charge, imprisoned without recourse in a small subterranean cell with 12 other women, and without knowing the fate of her husband and children, consigned to hard labor.

The fanatic tensions of the time, her husband's futile efforts to serve in her stead, the extremes to which one human's treatment of another were carried are still unfathomable parts of the story. Caught in this trap, Mme Kraus admits to realizing two choices—to allow herself to be broken by the circumstances, or to survive on the basic ingredients of her musical training, her discipline, sensitivity, and toughness. Of the two, she chose the latter.

"I am one who dreams all the time—fantastic dreams," said Mme Kraus. "But the whole time I was there, I never dreamed once about my husband or my children. The other women use to say 'Why are you so cheerful? You never tell us about your family' 'No,' I reply, 'I don't.' And that was all. I had put them away in my subconscious mind, where we could be together in spirit, safe from my fears and uncertainties for them. Instead, I concentrated on the work I had to do. And as I worked, I played music in my mind. Although there was a piano in the prison office, I had no access to it, of course."

"Work" varied every fortnight. "The other women would say 'Let us do it, you must save your hands,' but as it turned out I was the only one who finally would reach into the street gutters and take out the filth with my hands to unclog the drains. It had to be done. It took strong inner reasoning, I must say, but I was not in a position to argue. After all, hands can be washed. The next week, I'd carry patients and their bedding on my back in the hospital. I weighed less than 100 pounds by then, but thanks to the Lord's mercy and to music — and they are the same — I was able to do this and more and come out alive."

The rest of the story reads like a wildly unrealistic film script. Being summoned by the prison commandant to be told that the charge under which she had been imprisoned had been found to be false; that she would join her husband and children in a family detention camp (where they spent two more years); that she had learned to believe nothing that she was told by her captors.

Little by little, it came true. "How is the piano?" the Japanese interpreter asked who had committed her and was on hand before she was released. "Have you been playing?" Mme Kraus, in the remnants of the dress she was wearing when she was seized a year before, plus some torn pajama pants, gazed at him speechless. "There's a piano here, come in and play."

"Do I remember what I played?" she exclaimed in an exuberant crescendo. "The 'Wanderer Fantasy,' some Mozart, of course. . . . Then I was put on an army truck, with an armed guard—all 90 pounds of me—and yes, there was a bag of cement, and I was taken to another part of the partitioned city. There were bananas on a table in the house where I was delivered. They couldn't believe that I hadn't seen one or eaten anything but a cup of rice a day for a year."

When freedom finally came, Mme Kraus found that manual labor had made her fingers unusually strong, but without suppleness or sensitivity of touch. It meant a long road back, of practice and conditioning, and recouping not only her broken career but shattered family fortunes. Soon she was playing in Australia and New Zealand, and for her "unrelenting efforts" in the postwar era, she was granted honorary citizenship by the latter country.

Mme Kraus — the "now" Lili Kraus — is back on the concert stages of the world, with an enhanced reputation on four continents. She tours ceaselessly. "Next year I am playing from September 29 to May 20 in the United States, with four weeks abroad. I tell myself, only three years more. Besides, my son-in-law, Dr. Fergus Pope, and I are partners in a 700-acre farm in the mountains of North Carolina. He is the only obstetrician in four counties. There is to be a center for communal planning and vocational guidance, and a clinic for retarded children. Around my house I am building a center for music — 'Music in the Mountains' — where those people who have never had anything like that before, can come to hear and to perform. If one has a gift, one must develop the generosity to share it."

In retrospect, it seemed like a heartless thing to have done, on a shining Berkshire afternoon, to dig into a nightmarish past, particularly when there were so many more dazzling aspects of this second independently triumphant career to explore.

Perhaps it was the serenity of the time and place, and the fact that Mme Kraus had had a day or two away from a grinding schedule. But she still had a few more things to say about that unthinkable year: "I became convinced," she said, "that whatever happened. . . . I was a vessel through which God was speaking.

"I tell you," said this handsome woman who has thrilled countless thousands with the keyboard touch of the same fingers that dredged filthy gutters in Batavia, "It was an invaluable experience."

All editions

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR Thursday, August 20, 1970

JAMES STAGLIANO

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS

JACKSON HEIGHTS, N. Y.
QUEENS OBSERVER
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W - CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JUL 16 1970

Mozart At Tanglewood

Pianist LILI KRAUS will make her Befkshire Festival bow Saturday evening, July 18th, playing the Mozart K. 466 Piano Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Seiji Ozawa in the Tanglewood Music Shed.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 16 1970

New England Newsclip

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, July 12, 1970

BRILLIANT YOUNG CONDUCTOR . . . Michael Tilson Thomas who will conduct the Sunday afternoon concert, July 19, at 2:30. Mr. Thomas assumed the position of Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony and barely a month later replaced William Steinberg at the mid-point of a Philharmonic Hall concert at Lincoln Center when Mr. Steinberg became ill. His audience and critical success was enormous. In 1968, as a conducting fellow, at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, he conducted the premiere of the controversial "occult opera," Elephant Steps, and was awarded the Koussevitsky prize in conducting. He became Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1970. Sunday's concert is one of two he will conduct this summer.

Festival events

Boston Symphony at Berkshire

TANGLEWOO, LENOX, Mass — Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa opens the third weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening at 9 p.m. in The Shed.

Soloists for the evening are pianist Yuji Takashashi, tenor John Alexander, and Boston Symphony principal horn player James Stagliano. The program opens with Haydn's Symphony No. 86 in D followed by the Mozart piano concerto in A, K. 488, with Takahashi as piano soloist. Benjamin Britten's "Serenade for Tenor, Horn, and Strings" features Alexander and Stagliano. The program concludes with Ibert's "Divertissement."

Preceding the 9 p.m. orchstra concert is the Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in The Shed. Pianist Takahashi plays music by Bach and Messiaen. Takahashi has been a teaching fellow in piano and contemporary music at the Berkshire Music Center and is the only student of composer Yannis Xenakis.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducts the weekly Open Rehearsal on Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m. in The Shed.

Lili Kraus is piano soloist with Ozawa in an all-Mozart program Saturday at 8:30 p.m. The program opens with the Serenade No. 10 in B-flat for 13 wind instruments, K. 361. Mme. Kraus then plays the Piano Concerto in D Minor, K. 466.

Next Sunday at 2:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts his first Tanglewood cocert with the Boston Symphony, opening his program with the Symphony No. 98 in E

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS . . . Tanglewood Debut

Flat by Hydn. Soprano Bethany Beardslee is soloist in Bach's Cantata No. 51, "Jauchzet Gott," and in Kreneck's concert areia "Die Nachtigall." Stravinsky "Pulchinella Suite" conclude the concert.

Thomas was conducting fellow of the Berkshire Music Center during 1968, and was awarded the Koussevitzky Prize in conducting. Barely a month after assuming the position of assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, he replaced William Steinberg at the mid-point of a Philharmonic Hall concert at Lincoln Center when Steinberg became ill. Since then, his audience and critical success have been enormous.

Odetta, the Gary Burton Quartet, and the Crayton Family Gospel Singers are featured artists in the second Contemporary Trends Concert at Tanglewood Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. The concert will be given in Tanglewood's Theatre Concert Hall.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

JUL 12 1970

New England Newsclip

Young Conductor Wields Tanglewood Baton July 19

Michael Tilson Thomas, the brilliant young assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct his first Tanglewood concert with the Symphony next Sunday (July 19) at 2:30 p.m.

He will open with Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B-flat, continuing with Bach's Cantata No. 51 and Kreneck's "Die Nachtigall," with soprano Bethany Beardslee soloist in both. Stravinsky's "Pulchinella" suite will conclude the concert.

A conducting fellow of the Berkshire Music Center during 1968, the young Boston conductor was awarded the Koussevitzky Prize in conducting. Barely a month after assuming the position of assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony last fall, he replaced William Steinberg at the mid-point of a Philharmonic Hall concert at New York City's Lincoln Center, when Mr. Steinberg became ill. Since then his audience and critical success have been enormous.

Next weekend will be the third festival weekend this season and will open at 7 p. m. Friday with a weekend prelude concert by pianist Yuji Takahashi. Seiji Ozawa, artistic director at Tanglewood this year, will conduct evening concerts at 9 Friday and at 8:30 Saturday. There will be an open rehearsal of the Saturday night concert at 10:30 a. m. Saturday in the Shed.

Thomas Conducts Sunday

Michael Tilson Thomas, 25-year-old associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the Sunday afternoon concert at Tanglewood.

Thomas, who conducted his first concert at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony last Friday when he replaced ailing Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, will direct the orchrestra in Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B-flat, Bach's Cantata No. 51 ("Jauchzet Gott"), Krenek's "Die Nachtigall," and Stravinsky's Pulcinella Suite. Bethany Beardslee will be soprano in the Bach work.

Seiji Ozawa will conduct the Friday concert at 9 p.m. Soloists will be pianist Yuji Takahashi, tenor John Alexander and horn player James Stagliano. The program features the Haydn Symphony No. 86 in D, the Mozart piano concerto in A, K. 488, Britten's serenade for tenor, horn and strings and Ibert's Divertissement

Takahashi will play music from Bach and Messiaen for the Weekend prelude at 7 p.m.

Lili Kraus will be piano soloist with Ozawa conducting an all-Mozart program for the Saturday evening concert at 8:30. Works to be played include Serenade No. 10 in B-flat for 13 wind instruments, K. 361, and piano concerto in D-minor, K. 466.

Thomas will conduct the open rehearsal Saturday morning at 10:30.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 16 1970

New England Newsclip

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, July 12, 1970

BRILLIANT YOUNG CONDUCTOR . . . Michael Tilson Thomas who will conduct the Sunday afternoon concert, July 19. at 2:30. Mr. Thomas assumed the position of Assistant Conductor of the Boston Symphony and barely a month later replaced William Steinberg at the mid-point of a Philharmonic Hall concert at Lincoln Center when Mr. Steinberg became ill. His audience and critical success was enormous. In 1968, as a conducting fellow, at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, he conducted the premiere of the controversial "occult opera," Elephant Steps, and was awarded the Koussevitsky prize in conducting. He became Associate Conductor of the Boston Symphony in 1970. Sunday's concert is one of two he will conduct this summer.

Festival events

Boston Symphony at Berkshire

TANGLEWOO, LENOX, Mass — Tanglewood Artistic Director Seiji Ozawa opens the third weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening at 9 p.m. in The Shed.

Soloists for the evening are pianist Yuji Takashashi, tenor John Alexander, and Boston Symphony principal horn player James Stagliano. The program opens with Haydn's Symphony No. 86 in D followed by the Mozart piano concerto in A, K. 488, with Takahashi as piano soloist. Benjamin Britten's "Serenade for Tenor, Horn, and Strings" features Alexander and Stagliano. The program concludes with Ibert's "Divertissement."

Preceding the 9 p.m. orchstra concert is the Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in The Shed.Pianist Takahashi plays music by Bach and Messiaen. Takahashi has been a teaching fellow in piano and contemporary music at the Berkshire Music Center and is the only student of composer Yannis Xenakis.

Michael Tilson Thomas, associate conductor of the Boston Symphony, conducts the weekly Open Rehearsal on Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m. in The Shed.

Lili Kraus is piano soloist with Ozawa in an all-Mozart program Saturday at 8:30 p.m. The program opens with the Serenade No. 10 in B-flat for 13 wind instruments, K. 361. Mme. Kraus then plays the Piano Concerto in D Minor, K. 466.

Next Sunday at 2:30 p.m. Michael Tilson Thomas conducts his first Tanglewood cocert with the Boston Symphony, opening his program with the Symphony No. 98 in E Flat by Hydn. Soprano Bethany Beardslee is soloist in Bach's Cantata No. 51, "Jauchzet Gott," and in Kreneck's concert areia "Die Nachtigall." Stravinsky "Pulchinella Suite" conclude the concert.

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS . . . Tanglewood Debut

Thomas was conducting fellow of the Berkshire Music Center during 1968, and was awarded the Koussevitzky Prize in conducting. Barely a month after assuming the position of assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, he replaced William Steinberg at the mid-point of a Philharmonic Hall concert at Lincoln Center when Steinberg became ill. Since then, his audience and critical success have been enormous.

Odetta, the Gary Burton Quartet, and the Crayton Family Gospel Singers are featured artists in the second Contemporary Trends Concert at Tanglewood Tuesday at 8:30 p.m. The concert will be given in Tanglewood's Theatre-Concert Hall.

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

JUL 12 1970

New England Newsclip

Young Conductor Wields Tanglewood Baton July 19

Michael Tilson Thomas, the brilliant young assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, will conduct his first Tanglewood concert with the Symphony next Sunday (July 19) at 2:30 p.m.

He will open with Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B-flat, continuing with Bach's Cantata No. 51 and Kreneck's "Die Nachtigall," with soprano Bethany Beardslee soloist in both. Stravinsky's "Pulchinella" suite will conclude the concert.

A conducting fellow of the Berkshire Music Center during 1968, the young Boston conductor was awarded the Koussevitzky Prize in conducting. Barely a month after assuming the position of assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony last fall, he replaced William Steinberg at the mid-point of a Philharmonic Hall concert at New York City's Lincoln Center, when Mr. Steinberg became ill. Since then his audience and critical success have been enormous.

Next weekend will be the third festival weekend this season and will open at 7 p. m. Friday with a weekend prelude concert by pianist Yuji Takahashi. Seiji Ozawa, artistic director at Tanglewood this year, will conduct evening concerts at 9 Friday and at 8:30 Saturday. There will be an open rehearsal of the Saturday night concert at 10:30 a. m. Saturday in the Shed.

Thomas Conducts Sunday

Michael Tilson Thomas, 25-year-old associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the Sunday afternoon concert at Tanglewood.

Thomas, who conducted his first concert at Tanglewood with the Boston Symphony last Friday when he replaced ailing Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, will direct the orchrestra in Haydn's Symphony No. 98 in B-flat, Bach's Cantata No. 51 ("Jauchzet Gott"), Krenek's "Die Nachtigall," and Stravinsky's Pulcinella Suite. Bethany Beardslee will be soprano in the Bach work.

Seiji Ozawa will conduct the Friday concert at 9 p.m. Soloists will be pianist Yuji Takahashi, tenor John Alexander and horn player James Stagliano. The program features the Haydn Symphony No. 86 in D, the Mozart piano concerto in A, K. 488, Britten's serenade for tenor, horn and strings and Ibert's Divertissement

Takahashi will play music from Bach and Messiaen for the Weekend prelude at 7 p.m.

Lili Kraus will be piano soloist with Ozawa conducting an all-Mozart program for the Saturday evening concert at 8:30. Works to be played include Serenade No. 10 in B-flat for 13 wind instruments, K. 361, and piano concerto in D-minor, K. 466.

Thomas will conduct the open rehearsal Saturday morning at 10:30.

BLANK PAGE

Tanglewood Salutes Copland

By RUTHANNE DEVLIN
Times Staff Writer

LENOX, Mass. — Tanglewood — a leading U.S. music festival — Tuesday celebrated its own 30th anniversary, the 70th birthday of American conductor-composer Aaron Copland, and trotted out its finest musical performers for an entire afternoon and evening of showcase music, saluting both.

In all it was a day when seemingly nothing could go wrong — parents and intereted adults crowded in numbers approaching 6,000 the green lawns sloping between several music barns where concerts were continuously underway. Kids by the busloads played and picnicked under the trees, absorbing a little music along the way by osmosis. Great conductors and budding young composers, some proven, some not, strolled from building to building answering students questions or arguing merits of composers.

Festivities were heralded by a Strauss fanfare for brass instruments at 2 p. m., opening the day's events, and another flourish with Copland's "Fanfare for the common man" before the concert at 8:30 p. m. In between, student orchestras performed in rehearsals which were typical except for one thing; at these sessions, the public was invited, often to the consternation of student conductors who suddenly found themselves with restless audiences. Bits of Mozart, Schumann, Mussorgsky's infrequently performed "Khovanshchina" overture Haydn, Debussy, Stravinsky, and Beethoven (Fidelio overture) were performed in shifts by the Berkshire Music Center Chamber Orchestra or the Boston University Tanglewood Institute Young Artist Symphony Orchestra.

Tanglewood's latest innovation, a composers' forum featuring works by composer-conductors in residence, introduced many of the peripatetic visitors to the shapes of music to come. It was sometimes dissonant, sometimes lyric, always innovative and written and performed by persons under 27.

The Berkshire Center vocal department offered a recital of Debussy, Wolf and Wagner songs, while the Institute Recital Program sampled a Piston Quintet, Mozart string quartet, a vocal quartet from Act II of Verdi's "Don Carlos," and a Brass Sonatina by Parris.

For the public, it was a heady revelation of the work going on at Tanglewood which since the days of its founder and guiding spirit, Serge Koussevitzky, has been attempting to produce "real music for real people." Those who attended immersed themselves, if ony for a few vicarious hours, in the musically saturated atmosphere of the men who make or will make music. And they found it exciting.

All was prelude, however, to the gala pops birthday concert in the shed. Aaron Copland, an American composer who has been circling the world "celebrating" his 70th birthday, gave an enthusiastic reading to his own "Suite from 'The Tender Land'" and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture. He had begun the concert a bit erratically, inexplicably dragging Leonard Bernstein's "Candide" overture then rushing the Andantino movement of Hindemith's "Symphonic Metamorphosis of Themes by Weber."

When he arrived at his own piece, however, Copland again became the master musician. With a passion this season hitherto undisplayed, he painted the broad, rolling canopy of the American west — a land confident, bountiful and yielding riches to honest work. His unfailing emphasis on a huge brass sound here was especially appropriate.

Lukas Foss, who has been associated with the Boston Symphony since the opening of Berkshire Center, returned to conduct and be piano soloist in an exceptionally well-crafted performance of Bach's Piano Concerto in D.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

JUL 29 1970 New England Newsclip

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 26 1970 New England Newsclip

Copland Saluted at Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — This is Aaron Copland Week at Tanglewood. He is celebrating his 70th birthday and 30 years of close association with the Berkshire Music Center.

Friday night he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of a couple of his works and Tuesday he will conduct the Boston Orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra combined, as well as separately, during the evening concert scheduled to wind up the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade program which begins at 2.

The two works Friday were "Dance Panels," a seven-movement ballet begun in 1959 and completed in 1962, and his Concerto for Clarinet and String Orchestra with Harp and Piano, composed in 1947 and 1948.

On the podium, Copland is an angular, hawklike figure who exhibits a strange combination of professionalism and amateurism His manner is amateurish and his attitude is professional. He shows absolute knowledge of the music, of course, and appears able to establish a strong control over the orchestra with non-professional techniques.

The important thing, however, is the music, and the "Dance Panels" Friday drew only a tepid response from the audience. It is nearly a half hour long and seems to include all of the stylistic sounds Copland is famous for, not only the austere dissonance of his "serious" works, but also the bubbly, sharp-edged bounce and flowing sweetness of such as "Bill the Kid" and Appalachian Spring."

There were some interestingly colorful passages here and there, but in the end it didn't hold the interest and probably is best confined to its original intention as accompaniment for a ballet troupe.

More Fun

The old romantic "Rondo Arlechinesco," Opus 46 which preceded it had more entertainment in it.

The Copland clarinet concerto which followed intermission with Gervase de Peyer as soloist probably has more lasting substance than the Dance Panels. The opening movement was beautifully plaintive (haunting is the usual term).

The closing movement (they are connected without pause by a virtuosic unaccompanied cadenza for the clarinett)was characterized by jumpy rhythms, truncated phrases, sudden changes of direction, eccentricity, virtuosity . . . much more musical material, but not necessarily more value than the first movement.

It was followed by Schuberts symphony No 5, a really nifty little symphony.

Phyllis Curtin, artist in residence at Tanglewood this summer and member of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, planned her program for the weekend prelude concert at 7 Friday night to augment this weeks observations of Coplands' birthday.

Sings Poems 't

She sang Copland's "Twelve Poems by Emily Dickinson" and, after singing Faure's "Six Poems of Paul Verlaine," added a couple of Copland songs for encores.

Miss Curtin is a soprano who gives the impression of perfection. Everything she does . . . diction and tone control and phrasing and all that . . . seems to be faultless.

But somehow her music is cold, intellectually expressive but emotionless. Her craftsmanship is beautiful.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

JUL 26 1970

COPLAND PREVAILS AT TANGLEWOOD

Conducts His 'Dance Panels' and Clarinet Concerto

By THEODORE STRONGIN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., July 25—Aaron Copland will reach his 70th birthday on Nov. 14. Although his 70th may not open the floodgates to music by Copland as Beethoven's 200th (on Dec. 16) will to music by Beethoven, there will be a respectable supply of Copland around this year, especially at Tanglewood.

The composer has been very close to the Boston Symphony at its summer home. He taught at the Berkshire Music Center here for 25 years, retiring as chairman of the faculty in 1964. And so it was fitting that he should not only conduct last night's Boston Symphony concert in the shed but also present two of his own works—"Dance Panels" and the Concerto for Clarinet and String Orchestra with Harp and Piano. And in the weekend prelude, given before the main event each Friday, Phyllis Curtin sang a dozen settings by Copland of Emily Dickinson poems.

Sensitively Scored

"Dance Panels" was written between 1959 and 1962 at the suggestion of the choreographer Jerome Robbins, but it didn't reach this country until 1963, when John Taras choreographed it for the New York City Ballet under the title "Shadowed Ground." It is patently and openly ballet music and suffers without this added medium and although it is typical Copland—sensitively, economically scored with a nice sense of angular fantasy—it is relatively uneventful.

The clarinet concerto (1947-48), originally a commission for Benny Goodman, is solider stuff. It gives the soloist room to produce his fattest and biggest sounds and to be nimble and quick. It is cast in a realm that Mr. Copland handles tastefully and, which is his trademark so often, one in which echos of popular music, both Latin-American and jazz, are reflected. Gervaese De Peyer was the clarinet soloist.

Attuned to Environment

Mr. Copland and the orchestra, appropriately, also offered the "Rondo Arlecchinesco" by Busoni, who was the granddad of so much of Mr. Copland's kind of 20th-century music, and Schubert's Fifth Symphony.

The latter work, although by far the oldest music in the program, is as well-attuned to the Tanglewood outdoor environment as anything can be. The Schubert was as fresh, pure and balmy as the summer air (the weather was perfect), an extraordinary bit of muse-ecology.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 29 1970 New England Newsclip

Music: Miss Curtin Tanglewood Soprano

By HERBERT ALPER
HT Contributing Music Critic

Soprano Phyllis Curtin, with her opulent voice and cultured musicianship, supplied the glorious moments of the fourth week of the Berkshire Festival in the Friday evening Prelude concert.

Gabriel Faure's settings of six poems by Paul Verlaine involved the audience in the composer's long-lined sensitivity to the words through the singer and her participant-accompanist, Ryan Edwards. In "Spleen," the third of the group, Miss Curtin used a dark, covered sound that dramatized the deep emotion of the lines. In contrast, she used a bright, forward sound for "Green," the song immediately following.

PARTICULARLY moving among the opening group, Copland's "Twelve Poems by Emily Dickinson," were "I Felt a Funeral in my Brain" and "I've Heard an Organ Talk Sometimes."

The remainder of the weekend was a grab bag for the Boston Symphony and its audiences. Aaron Copland celebrated 25 years as teacher and faculty chairman at these festivals by conducting some of his own music Friday night. His strength as a theater composer showed in the different moods encompassed by the many timbral, pitch (occasionally marred by out-of-tuneness) and rhythmic devices of which he is master.

Interest in "Dance Panels" occasionally lagged without the visual stimuli that give meaning to the many repeats of ideas. Gervase de Peyer played Copland's Clarinet Concerto in a style reminiscent of Benny Goodman, to whom it is dedicated. This two-movement work reflects the composer's concern with an American inflection to 20th century compositional devices.

Filling out the evening were Busoni's "Rondo Arleccinesco," with a clear off-stage tenor solo by Richard Burke, and a less than lyrical performance of Schubert's Fifth Symphony.

SATURDAY NIGHT, with Jorge Mester conducting, was essentially a small-orchestra night. The program opened with C.P.E. Bach's Symphony in D, of which the opening and major part of the Allegro was played with crisp, shimmering string sounds that reminded this listener of sounds other than the more recent ones of the BSO. Unfortunately, this tonal quality did not last throughout the evening.

Things seemed to tighten up in Strauss' Orchestral Suite from "Der Burger als Edelmann," with the result that two of the orchestra's most dependable men seemed adversely affected. The humidity? In Mozart's "Jupiter" Mester started in a schmaltzy Viennese style, but his tempos fluctuated and the slow movement lagged.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON'S concert was for this listener the least amenable of the weekend. The conductor drowned out what seemed to be a most sensitive pianist, Cristoph Eschenbach, in a Mozart concerto. He confused the orchestra with beat patterns that drew them into playing rests, kept them from making precise attacks, and magnified sonorities without relation to line. As for Stravinsky's Concerto in D, maybe we'll have another chance to hear it this year.

At Tanglewood

A Group of Alumni Conductors

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

For the weekend prelude, July 24, soprano Phyllis Curtin and Ryan Edwards, pianist, did a distinguished performance of two song cycles: Copland's Settings for Twelve Poems by Emily Dickenson and Faure's for Six Poems of Verlaine. It is supposed to be axiomatic that great poetry is impossible to handle musically. Copland, however, did some of his best writing for Emily's deft, clean etchings, the piano dramatizing situations and the voice expressing the curve and tension of the words in the best tradition of modern French song writing.

Like the poetry, the music is self-conscious, condensed, direct, suggestive—a slight monotony of high notes but momentarily justified by Miss Curtin's unfailing intelligence in projecting the inner reason of the melodic line. It is obvious that she can do no wrong and had equipment to match: her voice a clarinet in her lows, vibrant in her forte highs (or softly floating on-the-breath). Her facility with the parlando of syllables within the rhythm was demonstrated even more effectively in the Faure-Verlaine, wherein the composer the French equivalent of Brahms) catches the dream and despair of introspection, and the Curtin vocal color was always right for the word.

Mr. Edwards, who has written for Miss Curtin and collaborated in recordings, did a comparable job at the piano, with authority, and no obsequious accompaniment.

• • •

Aaron Copland, who has worked at Tanglewood for twenty-five years, conducted the orchestra's regular concert. At a mere seventy, he doesn't quite qualify as the grand-old-man of American music but comes pretty close. As composer and teacher he has always been in the van but humanly oriented—may we say? —like Haydn, an adventurer in the market-place. His best inspiration has largely been the dance. For this program he included "Dance Panels", a suite for choreographer Robbins, and 'Concerto for clarinet and string orchestra with harp and piano which has been danced effectively here and abroad.

Both works are alive with rhythmic variety and brio, never pretending too much, the Concerto beginning with a fine melodic song in the clarinet and then, by way of a cadenza that gathers speed, slips into a fast dance which, like the Panels, revels in the off-beats, the clarinet now integrated in the aroused orchestra Copland picks up jazz, tap, folk dance—all kinds of impulse).

Mr. Copland modestly prefaced his own stuff with Busoni's Rondo Arlecchinesco, which might be called aspects of Harlequin, a rich concoction (and one of a few) from a master-mind of early-modern music when the techniques of the past were still part of a total dictionary. (Copland seemed spare after Busoni.) To end with Schubert's Fifth was a bow to another genius of melody and rhythm beyond Copland's own contrivance. No. 5 in B flat is now my favorite Schubert next to the String Quintet). The orchestra played superbly, the woodwinds not quite matching the strings in sensitivity of syncopated accent—that impulsive lift in the rhythm, but the total well paced, exciting and nostalgic.

• • •

Saturday night found Jorge Mester, another Tanglewood alumnus (now St. Louis Philharmonic), conducting the C.P.E. Bach Symphony in D of 1775, a delightful carry-over of Baroque style plus the new sensibility, especially in the lovely romanticism of a flute duet in the Largo. Then it was no great shift of imagination to hear R. Strauss' "Orchestra Suite from 'Der Burger als Edelmann", based on Molier's play: "Le Bourgeois gentilhomme". After that choking mouthful I can only say that the suite is most beguiling—Strauss at his most unpretentious best as in 'Til') quite moving in sonority within the aura of satire.

Mr. Mester, an athlete of 35, controlled with relaxed intensity of musicianship, did his best job on the last symphony of Mozart—the 41 in C. This work, like the preceding G minor, must have cost Mozart some sweat, as the facile composer said of his quartets dedicated to Haydn. Even the Menuetto is rich with development. And with the Finale (molto allegro) all hell breaks loose in fugal fight. (The editorial nickname for the symphony, Jupiter, belies the frenetic fact.)

Sunday afternoon climaxed the weekend with a line-up of Haydn, Mozart, Stravinsky (now modern - classic) and Tchaikovsky, the program expertly aimed at the Sunday mob. All the selections were from the lighter drawer of great composers and played with virtuosity by orchestra and soloist (Christoph Eschenbach in Mozart's Piano Concerto in F). The Haydn no. 83 is good entertainment music—played crisply, strong in contrasts—and as played under Schermerhorn delicately phrased. Kenneth Schermerhorn, the conductor, is another Tanglewood alumnus, now directing the Milwaukee Symphony—a loose-limbed, musically-exacting leader. He controlled the Mozart Piano Concerto in F to allow Eschenbach fine rapport with the orchestra. The young German pianist could probably have done a chamber music job with the orchestra without direction. Like the best of the younger virtuosos, he plays in and out of the orchestra with sensitive balance. Also he uses Mozart's own cadenzas, which have fantasy-in-style.

Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra (1946) is loosely derived from baroque concerto-grosso form but with a multitude of motives and a lovely dose of Viennese-romantic in the Arioso—the violin, viola, cello solos capricious and brief.

Finally, the lesser Tschaikovsky of the Mozartiana Suite No. 4 (let's call it Homage to Mozart once removed—Mozart, the only great classic-romantic German he could understand). The heart of the suite is a colorful and moving orchestration of the choral Ave Verum Corpus only cheapened by a tawdry ending. The last movement Variations on a (silly) theme by Gluck create a variety circus, including a gypsy violin solo played expertly by Silverstein.

As I write, over the hills from Tanglewood, and the only sounds a far-off dog smelling woodchuck, a mourning dove in the woods and moths at my screen, the Tanglewood festival in retrospect sifts out to a rarity in summer music, mainly carried by a new generation.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JUL 30 1970 New England Newsclip

BSO sparkles at Tanglewood

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Saturday night's Boston Symphony concert at Tanglewood was conducted by Jorge Mester, the 35-year-old music director of the Louisville Orchestra and the Aspen Festival. For the first time in a season too much marked by an unpleasing combination of laziness, inattention and glamour, there was an evening of performances at a consistently high level of musical intelligence and responsibility, vitality and polished execution.

Mester's program — a Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach symphony in D Major from the year 1775, a suite from Richard Strauss's "Le bourgeois gentilhomme" and Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony — was meant to delight rather than to excite. The C.P.E. Bach, which the orchestra had not played before, was an excursion for which to be particularly grateful. Philipp Emanuel, as fascinating as he is neglected , was 61 and at the height of his powers when he wrote this symphony, one of a set of four and a work ablaze with wit, intelligence of the most original sort, and convention. The D Major B minor ambiguity of its beginning is delicious, and the sort of the touch in which Haydn and Brahms would have taken great pleasure; later, one of the symphony's most special delights is the scoring of its slow movement, the melody in two flutes, accompanied yia solo quartet of nied by a solo quartet of

But to come back to Mester, what he projected, as it were, to explain the "Jupitar," was very beautiful indeed, the pleasure being the deeper because the intelligence and thorough knowledge that fed the performance were worn unostentatiously and with so much grace. It was interpretation that proceeded from sense, but even more from sensability. It was a performance of rhythmic energy and sweep, not too downbeating, and with minimal subdivisions of metrical units. Mester found a convincing balance of seriousness, high spirits, and Italianate operatic lyricism. He had, as well, a remarkable feeling for musical character and, beyond that, a sense of the how the very diversity of the material and its ordering is one of the prime sources of the symphony's strength and momentum. Not least, the performance was one in which voluptuous pleasure was taken in the sensuous side of Mozart's music.

Mester's conducting is confident, patient and quite gra hically indicative of musical effect. It works: what you hear really sounds just like what you see, and the playing was by miles the best I have heard from the Boston Symphony this Summer: together, transparent, in tune and engaged.

The other two performances went well, too. The Bach was done deftly and with a nice feeling for its surprises, though for my taste it was just a little too cool and chaste in the slow movement. Mester's conducting of Strauss was much like the composer's own, understated and with the lightest possible touch. The playing was alive and virtuosic, and among many well-done solos those of violinist Joseph Silverstein and cellist Jules Eskin were outstanding.

At the Friday evening concert, Aaron Copland lent more by his distinguished presence than by his conducting. The program included his own "Dance Panels" and lovely Clarent Clarinet Concerto, in which Gervase De Peyer was a superb soloist, and also Busoni's "Rondo arlecchinesco" and Schubert's Fifth Symphony.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 27 1970 New England Newsclip

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 26 1970 New England Newsclip

AT TANGLEWOOD

Conductor Mester Makes Music Precise, Compact

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The music in the shed Saturday night at Tanglewood, like the guest conductor on the podium, was small-scaled, compact; precise and smiling.

It was a lighthearted music performed with amiable seriousness — a rarely - heard little symphony by C. P. E. Bach, incidental music by Strauss for a play and Mozart's last symphony.

The conductor was Jorge Mester, music director of the Louisville Orchestra and the Aspen Festival. He was a scholarship student at the Berkshire Music Center and studied conducting at the Juillard School and with Leonard Bernstein.

He has guest conducted many of the leading orchestras of the world and for festivals, dance companies and the Bach concerts in New York.

He reduced the Boston Symphony Orchestra to 29 members Saturday for the Bach symphony and brought it back to about 35 for the Strauss suite.

Both pieces are unpretentious works which make use of much alternating of solo and full orchestra passages, but there the similarity ends . . . except that both the conductor and the orchestra seem thoroughly at home with the widely - different styles.

C. P. E. (or K. P. E., depending upon how you spell Karl) Bach was the son of Johann Sebastian and became the musical leader of Hamburg. His four symphonies were produced about 1775 after the Baroque Concerto Grosso had run its course of development and before Mozart and Haydn had finished inventing the classical symphony.

The three-movement symphony offered Saturday lasted about 10 minutes and was delightful. The Strauss suite was closer to a half hour and was full of varied and lively episodes illustrating the play "Der Burger als Edelmann" which was based on Moliere's play "Le Bourgeois gentilhomme," a comedy about a newly - rich merchant who has ambitions to be aristocratic.

It has seven sections and was presented Saturday with an orchestra which had more wind and percussion than string players.

This orchestra organization was big for a theater pit band, to be sure, but helped make Strauss' tonal brightness even brighter and smoother.

The Mozart symphony, the Jupiter, came after intermission and also reflected Mester's interest in compact precision.

This symphony is one of the really great ones, however, and has too much emotional scope to be simply compact and precise . . . but Mester has a good feel for Mozart, and the second (slowly lyrical) movement came forth with a gentle melancholy.

Mester's Music Reflects His Image

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The music in the shed Saturday night at Tanglewood, like the guest conductor on the podium, was small-scaled, compact; precise and smiling.

It was a lighthearted music performed with amiable seriousness — a rarely - heard little symphony by C. P. E. Bach, incidental music by Strauss for a play and Mozart's last symphony.

The conductor was Jorge Mester, music director of the Louisville Orchestra and the Aspen Festival. He was a scholarship student at the Berkshire Music Center and studied conducting at the Juillard School and with Leonard Bernstein.

He has guest conducted many of the leading orchestras of the world and for festivals, dance companies and the Bach concerts in New York.

He reduced the Boston Symphony Orchestra to 29 members Saturday for the Bach symphony and brought it back to about 35 for the Strauss suite.

Both pieces are unpretentious works which make use of much alternating of solo and full orchestra passages, but there the similarity ends . . . except that both the conductor and the orchestra seem thoroughly at home with the widely - different styles.

C. P. E. (or K. P. E., depending upon how you spell Karl) Bach was the son of Johann Sebastian and became the musical leader of Hamburg. His four symphonies were produced about 1775 after the Baroque Concerto Grosso had run its course of development and before Mozart and Haydn had finished inventing the classical symphony.

The three-movement symphony offered Saturday lasted about 10 minutes and was delightful. The Strauss suite was closer to a half hour and was full of varied and lively episodes illustrating the play "Der Burger als Edelmann" which was based on Moliere's play "Le Bourgeois gentilhomme," a comedy about a newly - rich merchant who has ambitions to be aristocratic.

It has seven sections and was presented Saturday with an orchestra which had more wind and percussion than string players.

This orchestra organization was big for a theater pit band, to be sure, but helped make Strauss' tonal brightness even brighter and smoother.

The Mozart symphony, the Jupiter, came after intermission and also reflected Mester's interest in compact precision.

This symphony is one of the really great ones, however, and has too much emotional scope to be simply compact and precise . . . but Mester has a good feel for Mozart, and the second (slowly lyrical) movement came forth with a gentle melancholy.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 27 1970 New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

A Group of Alumni Conductors

By HAROLD C. SPROUL

For the weekend prelude, July 24, soprano Phyllis Curtin and Ryan Edwards, pianist, did a distinguished performance of two song cycles: Copland's Settings for Twelve Poems by Emily Dickenson and Faure's for Six Poems of Verlaine. It is supposed to be axiomatic that great poetry is impossible to handle musically. Copland, however, did some of his best writing for Emily's deft, clean etchings, the piano dramatizing situations and the voice expressing the curve and tension of the words in the best tradition of modern French song writing.

Like the poetry, the music is self-conscious, condensed, direct, suggestive—a slight monotony of high notes but momentarily justified by Miss Curtin's unfailing intelligence in projecting the inner reason of the melodic line. It is obvious that she can do no wrong and had equipment to match: her voice a clarinet in her lows, vibrant in her forte highs (or softly floating on-the-breath). Her facility with the parlando of syllables within the rhythm was demonstrated even more effectively in the Faure-Verlaine, wherein the composer the French equivalent of Brahms) catches the dream and despair of introspection, and the Curtin vocal color was always right for the word.

Mr. Edwards, who has written for Miss Curtin and collaborated in recordings, did a comparable job at the piano, with authority, and no obsequious accompaniment.

* * *

Aaron Copland, who has worked at Tanglewood for twenty-five years, conducted the orchestra's regular concert. At a mere seventy, he doesn't quite qualify as the grand-old-man of American music but comes pretty close. As composer and teacher he has always been in the van but humanly oriented—may we say? —like Haydn, an adventurer in the market-place. His best inspiration has largely been the dance. For this program he included "Dance Panels", a suite for choreographer Robbins, and 'Concerto for clarinet and string orchestra with harp and piano which has been danced effectively here and abroad.

Both works are alive with rhythmic variety and brio, never pretending too much, the Concerto beginning with a fine melodic song in the clarinet and then, by way of a cadenza that gathers speed, slips into a fast dance which, like the Panels, revels in the off-beats, the clarinet now integrated in the aroused orchestra Copland picks up jazz, tap, folk dance—all kinds of impulse).

Mr. Copland modestly prefaced his own stuff with Busoni's Rondo Arlecchinesco, which might be called aspects of Harlequin, a rich concoction (and one of a few) from a master-mind of early-modern music when the techniques of the past were still part of a total dictionary. (Copland seemed spare after Busoni.) To end with Schubert's Fifth was a bow to another genius of melody and rhythm beyond Copland's own contrivance. No. 5 in B flat is now my favorite Schubert next to the String Quintet). The orchestra played superbly, the woodwinds not quite matching the strings in sensitivity of syncopated accent—that impulsive lift in the rhythm, but the total well paced, exciting and nostalgic.

* * *

Saturday night found Jorge Mester, another Tanglewood alumnus (now St. Louis Philharmonic), conducting the C.P.E. Bach Symphony in D of 1775, a delightful carry-over of Baroque style plus the new sensibility, especially in the lovely romanticism of a flute duet in the Largo. Then it was no great shift of imagination to hear R. Strauss' "Orchestra Suite from 'Der Burger als Edelmann", based on Molier's play: "Le Bourgeois gentilhomme". After that choking mouthful I can only say that the suite is most beguiling—Strauss at his most unpretentious best as in 'Til') quite moving in sonority within the aura of satire.

Mr. Mester, an athlete of 35, controlled with relaxed intensity of musicianship, did his best job on the last symphony of Mozart—the 41 in C. This work, like the preceding G minor, must have cost Mozart some sweat, as the facile composer said of his quartets dedicated to Haydn. Even the Menuetto is rich with development. And with the Finale (molto allegro) all hell breaks loose in fugal fight. (The editorial nickname for the symphony, Jupiter, belies the frenetic fact.)

Sunday afternoon climaxed the weekend with a line-up of Haydn, Mozart, Stravinsky (now modern - classic) and Tchaikovsky, the program expertly aimed at the Sunday mob. All the selections were from the lighter drawer of great composers and played with virtuosity by orchestra and soloist (Christoph Eschenbach in Mozart's Piano Concerto in F). The Haydn no. 83 is good entertainment music—played crisply, strong in contrasts—and as played under Schermerhorn delicately phrased. Kenneth Schermerhorn, the conductor, is another Tanglewood alumnus, now directing the Milwaukee Symphony—a loose-limbed, musically-exacting leader. He controlled the Mozart Piano Concerto in F to allow Eschenbach fine rapport with the orchestra. The young German pianist could probably have done a chamber music job with the orchestra without direction. Like the best of the younger virtuosos, he plays in and out of the orchestra with sensitive balance. Also he uses Mozart's own cadenzas, which have fantasy-in-style.

Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra (1946) is loosely derived from baroque concerto-grosso form but with a multitude of motives and a lovely dose of Viennese-romantic in the Arioso—the violin, viola, cello solos capricious and brief.

Finally, the lesser Tschaikovsky of the Mozartiana Suite No. 4 (let's call it Homage to Mozart once removed—Mozart, the only great classic-romantic German he could understand). The heart of the suite is a colorful and moving orchestration of the choral Ave Verum Corpus only cheapened by a tawdry ending. The last movement Variations on a (silly) theme by Gluck create a variety circus, including a gypsy violin solo played expertly by Silverstein.

As I write, over the hills from Tanglewood, and the only sounds a far-off dog smelling woodchuck, a mourning dove in the woods and moths at my screen, the Tanglewood festival in retrospect sifts out to a rarity in summer music, mainly carried by a new generation.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

JUL 30 1970 New England Newsclip

BSO sparkles at Tanglewood

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Saturday night's Boston Symphony concert at Tanglewood was conducted by Jorge Mester, the 35-year-old music director of the Louisville Orchestra and the Aspen Festival. For the first time in a season too much marked by an unpleasing combination of laziness, inattention and glamour, there was an evening of performances at a consistently high level of musical intelligence and responsibility, vitality and polished execution.

Mester's program — a Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach symphony in D Major from the year 1775, a suite from Richard Strauss's "Le bourgeois gentilhomme" and Mozart's "Jupitar" symphony — was meant to delight rather than to excite. The C.P.E. Bach, which the orchestra had not played before, was an excursion for which to be particularly grateful. Philipp Emanuel, as fascinating as he is neglected , was 61 and at the height of his powers when he wrote this symphony, one of a set of four and a work ablaze with wit, intelligence of the most original sort, and convention. The D Major B minor ambiguity of its beginning is delicious, and the sort of the touch in which Haydn and Brahms would have taken great pleasure; later, one of the symphony's most special delights is the scoring of its slow movement, the melody in two flutes, accompanied yia solo quartet of nied by a solo quartet of

But to come back to Mester, what he projected, as it were, to explain the "Jupitar," was very beautiful indeed, the pleasure being the deeper because the intelligence and thorough knowledge that fed the performance were worn unostentatiously and with so much grace. It was interpretation that proceeded from sense, but even more from sensability. It was a performance of rhythmic energy and sweep, not too downbeating, and with minimal subdivisions of metrical units. Mester found a convincing balance of seriousness, high spirits, and Italianate operatic lyricism. He had, as well, a remarkable feeling for musical character and, beyond that, a sense of the how the very diversity of the material and its ordering is one of the prime sources of the symphony's strength and momentum. Not least, the performance was one in which voluptuous pleasure was taken in the sensuous side of Mozart's music.

Mester's conducting is confident, patient and quite gra hically indicative of musical effect. It works: what you hear really sounds just like what you see, and the playing was by miles the best I have heard from the Boston Symphony this Summer: together, transparent, in tune and engaged.

The other two performances went well, too. The Bach was done deftly and with a nice feeling for its surprises, though for my taste it was just a little too cool and chaste in the slow movement. Mester's conducting of Strauss was much like the composer's own, understated and with the lightest possible touch. The playing was alive and virtuosic, and among many well-done solos those of violinist Joseph Silverstein and cellist Jules Eskin were outstanding.

At the Friday evening concert, Aaron Copland lent more by his distinguished presence than by his conducting. The program included his own "Dance Panels" and lovely Clarent Clarinet Concerto, in which Gervase De Peyer was a superb soloist, and also Busoni's "Rondo arlecchinesco" and Schubert's Fifth Symphony.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 27 1970 New England Newsclip

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 26 1970 New England Newsclip

AT TANGLEWOOD

Conductor Mester Makes Music Precise, Compact

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The music in the shed Saturday night at Tanglewood, like the guest conductor on the podium, was small-scaled, compact; precise and smiling.

It was a lighthearted music performed with amiable seriousness — a rarely - heard little symphony by C. P. E. Bach, incidental music by Strauss for a play and Mozart's last symphony.

The conductor was Jorge Mester, music director of the Louisville Orchestra and the Aspen Festival. He was a scholarship student at the Berkshire Music Center and studied conducting at the Juillard School and with Leonard Bernstein.

He has guest conducted many of the leading orchestras of the world and for festivals, dance companies and the Bach concerts in New York.

He reduced the Boston Symphony Orchestra to 29 members Saturday for the Bach symphony and brought it back to about 35 for the Strauss suite.

Both pieces are unpretentious works which make use of much alternating of solo and full orchestra passages, but there the similarity ends . . . except that both the conductor and the orchestra seem thoroughly at home with the widely - different styles.

C. P. E. (or K. P. E., depending upon how you spell Karl) Bach was the son of Johann Sebastian and became the musical leader of Hamburg. His four symphonies were produced about 1775 after the Baroque Concerto Grosso had run its course of development and before Mozart and Haydn had finished inventing the classical symphony.

The three-movement symphony offered Saturday lasted about 10 minutes and was delightful. The Strauss suite was closer to a half hour and was full of varied and lively episodes illustrating the play "Der Burger als Edelmann" which was based on Moliere's play "Le Bourgeois gentilhomme," a comedy about a newly - rich merchant who has ambitions to be aristocratic.

It has seven sections and was presented Saturday with an orchestra which had more wind and percussion than string players.

This orchestra organization was big for a theater pit band, to be sure, but helped make Strauss' tonal brightness even brighter and smoother.

The Mozart symphony, the Jupiter, came after intermission and also reflected Mester's interest in compact precision.

This symphony is one of the really great ones, however, and has too much emotional scope to be simply compact and precise . . . but Mester has a good feel for Mozart, and the second (slowly lyrical) movement came forth with a gentle melancholy.

Mester's Music Reflects His Image

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The music in the shed Saturday night at Tanglewood, like the guest conductor on the podium, was small-scaled, compact; precise and smiling.

It was a lighthearted music performed with amiable seriousness — a rarely - heard little symphony by C. P. E. Bach, incidental music by Strauss for a play and Mozart's last symphony.

The conductor was Jorge Mester, music director of the Louisville Orchestra and the Aspen Festival. He was a scholarship student at the Berkshire Music Center and studied conducting at the Juillard School and with Leonard Bernstein.

He has guest conducted many of the leading orchestras of the world and for festivals, dance companies and the Bach concerts in New York.

He reduced the Boston Symphony Orchestra to 29 members Saturday for the Bach symphony and brought it back to about 35 for the Strauss suite.

Both pieces are unpretentious works which make use of much alternating of solo and full orchestra passages, but there the similarity ends . . . except that both the conductor and the orchestra seem thoroughly at home with the widely - different styles.

C. P. E. (or K. P. E., depending upon how you spell Karl) Bach was the son of Johann Sebastian and became the musical leader of Hamburg. His four symphonies were produced about 1775 after the Baroque Concerto Grosso had run its course of development and before Mozart and Haydn had finished inventing the classical symphony.

The three-movement symphony offered Saturday lasted about 10 minutes and was delightful. The Strauss suite was closer to a half hour and was full of varied and lively episodes illustrating the play "Der Burger als Edelmann" which was based on Moliere's play "Le Bourgeois gentilhomme," a comedy about a newly - rich merchant who has ambitions to be aristocratic.

It has seven sections and was presented Saturday with an orchestra which had more wind and percussion than string players.

This orchestra organization was big for a theater pit band, to be sure, but helped make Strauss' tonal brightness even brighter and smoother.

The Mozart symphony, the Jupiter, came after intermission and also reflected Mester's interest in compact precision.

This symphony is one of the really great ones, however, and has too much emotional scope to be simply compact and precise . . . but Mester has a good feel for Mozart, and the second (slowly lyrical) movement came forth with a gentle melancholy.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 27 1970 New England Newsclip

BE
8-1

As I Hear It

Three Score and Ten

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

ONE of the best of all bons mots, whether apocryphal or not, is the one attributed to the late Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes near the end of his long and distinguished career. When a pretty girl passed him, he turned and murmured, "Oh, to be 70 again!"

What is the best of all ages? A foolish question, granted, but one which intrigues anyone who wishes to give it any thought and time. It is of unending interest to note at what age a certain piece of music was composed, what year it was first played or what was going on politically, for example, at that time. Program notes have stated millions of times that Beethoven dedicated his third symphony to Napoleon. However, when the French general put the crown of emperor on his head, Beethoven furiously tore up the dedication and simply inscribed it to "A Hero."

We are inclined to fix certain dates in our head—1492, 1776, and so on. Yet, it pleases me to know that Columbus was 41 when he first sighted this continent, almost the same age that George Washington had just passed when our Declaration of Independence was written.

* * * *

AFTER TWO CENTURIES or so, one's sense of pity and regret thins out a bit but we still look back occasionally and wonder what Mozart might have done had he been granted the 35 years of which fate deprived him—the traditional three score and ten—or Schubert who, in the same computing sense, was deprived of 39 years. One might go on, in music, in the arts and in literature.

Happily, many men of eminence not only do reach the scriptural milestone but do so in vigor and with purpose. Such a man was recently honored at Tanglewood. The concerts of last Tuesday and preceding Friday were conducted by a very distinguished American composer, Aaron Copland. He came to the Berkshires on the invitation of Serge Koussevitzky to organize the Berkshire Music Center, the academy the great conductor had long dreamed of establishing, and he stayed 25 years.

The impact of that phase of Tanglewood on world music is not readily appreciated here, as near as we are to the forest, but it is a magic name in the Western World and quickly becoming one in the Far East as well. The roster of students and artists who have passed through the Center's portals is a roll of unexcelled honor and achievement. No little share of it is due to Copland.

* * * *

HIS BIRTHDAY does not come until Nov. 14, but if the Queen of England can arbitrarily set a date for hers to suit the occasion, why not a few commoners? Copland considerately was born at the exact turn of the century, a date much easier to remember and compute than '99 or '03 or some such odd year. For purposes of envisaging his era, it is well to start it at the end of World War I.

There is always a great deal of overlapping in any history of an art. For instance, 88-year-old Stravinsky today is enjoying or observing the 60th and 70th anniversaries of his works. Copland went to Paris early in the '20s to what has been glibly called the "Boulangerie." It was through the kind and wise guidance of Nadia Boulanger that in January, 1925, Copland had his first major performance in America, Walter Damrosch (with Boulanger as soloist) conducted Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra. Damrosch is reported to have silenced the applause with the grumpy comment, "If a young man of 23 can write like this, in five years he will be ready to commit murder."

Instead within five years, Copland, to eke out his modest earnings from music, was lecturing on musical appreciation at the New School for Social Research in New York. He said he found it easier to earn money quickly by talking to a large audience than to a single student at a time. He has filled the ensuing tight years with composing, writing, lecturing and, not least important, championing American music and American composers.

* * * *

A MAN'S MUSIC is as individual as his fingerprints. Anyone familiar with Copland's earliest works will discern in his output of these last years, the personal mark or motto which identified him in the beginning, as different as the means and materials he employs today are. He has always been deeply in love with American folk and dance tunes, as evidenced by the touching core of the music of his "Tender Land" Suite that he played earlier this week.

Indeed his "Appalachian Suite" was not only commissioned by a Pittsfield philanthropist, Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, but the essential tune was borrowed, with permission, from the collection of Shaker tunes. The authority on that subject, the late Edward Deming Andrews, had compiled them in collaboration with a onetime member of the South Mountain String quartet, Conrad Held.

Copland's expatriate years in Paris coincided with that great era which included names to become as widely known as his own: Scott Fitzgerald, Ernest Hemingway, Gertrude Stein and many others. The great ballet tradition established by the meteoric Diaghilev was coming to an end, but it had dragged in its train the names of composers, painters, writers and artists of all manner and means. Is it a fault of my own vision to state that there doesn't seem to be such a generation in sight at this moment?

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 27 1970

New England Newsclip

AT TANGLEWOOD

Boston Symphony, Schermerhorn 'Most Satisfying'

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The elegant guidance of Kenneth Schermerhorn Sunday afternoon helped the Boston Symphony Orchestra give perhaps its most satisfying performance at Tanglewood so far in a season already half gone.

Fine Pianist

And the keyboard performance of Christoph Eschenback during Mozart's Piano Concerto in F, K.459, was perhaps the happiest moment of the afternoon.

In the very strong impression Eschenback made here last summer with another Mozart concerto was at least equaled. He is a very fine pianist.

He has a clear, no-nonsense understanding of Mozart coupled with a highly sensitive feeling for the dynamic and rhythmic subtleties. The result was Sunday (and last year) a Mozart concerto with all its inherent liquid beauty uncluttered either by romantic excesses or by a lacy sweetness that so many musicians believe belongs with the powdered wigs of the 18th century.

Compatibility

Schermerhorn happily was of the same mind, so orchestra and piano were nicely compatible, a circumstance especially important with this concerto because the contributions of soloist and orchestra are so closely interdependent.

The technical demands on Eschenbach's fingers also seemed to be no hurdle. He sailed through the trills and runs with easy speed.

The clean and graceful approach was evident also in Schermerhorn's shaping of the opening Haydn Symphony, No. 83, one of those composed for the Paris series and last heard at Tanglewood last summer.

Contrasts In Haydn

Schermerhorn's strong interest in dynamic accents and contrasting levels was specially evident during the Haydn. It was full of sudden surges, short crescendos, floating pianissimos broken by solid chords, all very carefully controlled and in genteel taste.

The program following intermission was not as impressive. Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra offered a 12-minute, three movement piece of varying interest, difficult to play and sometimes difficult to listen

There were long stretches in the first movement of halting, stumbling rhythms, and the last movement reflected the nervousness of the first. Members of the orchestra (38 strings) indicated an unusual degree of tension.

Resnikoff Memorial

The closing piece, a 25-minute suite by Tchaikovsky, Opus 61, called Mozartiana, offered precious little Mozart but plenty of Tchaikovsky, who claimed to have high admiration for Mozart's music.

The 10 a.m. chamber music program given by the Berkshire Music Center in the Chamber Music Hall was dedicated to Vladimir Resnikoff, who died a couple of weeks ago. He was a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's violin section for 32 years before his retirement in 1964.

The chamber music program offered a Bartok trio for violin, clarinet and piano, a Hindemity wind quintet, and Beethoven's String Quartet, Opus 74, all played by the students with dedication and, this time, with skill a cut above the usual Sunday morning fare.

The weekend gate count: Friday with Copland, 5015; Saturday morning rehearsal, 2350; Saturday night with Mester, 6313; Sunday afternoon with Schermerhorn and Eschenbach, 6237; total 19,917.

Next weekend the full orchestra will be back on the stage (about half has been in Boston two weeks playing the free series on the Esplanade) to play three Beethoven concerts, two conducted by William Steinberg, the third by Antal Dorati; piano soloists will be Claude Frank, Andre Watts, and Vladimir Askenazy.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 29 1970

New England Newsclip

Mixed Reactions Noted At Tanglewood To Direction By Jorge Mester

By DINA VAKIL

An animated Jorge Mester conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood on Saturday, charming a few, leaving some noticeably unmoved, and exciting many more to rise in unison and applaud.

It was a partly moving, partly uninspiring rendition of C.P.E. Bach's Symphony in D, Strauss' Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme Suite, and Mozart's Symphony No. 41 — his last — entitled 'Jupiter."

Mester, who is the music director of the St. Louis Philharmonic Orchestra, is an energetic, though slightly colorless performer, and alas, with a predominantly New York audience attuned to charismatic Nureyevs, Bernsteins and Masals, for whom "personality" has become as indispensable as technical virtuosity, Mester was a lack-lustre figure.

No leonine Bernstein this, who conducts open rehearsals on some mornings in frayed jeans and torn sneakers. No Rudi Nureyev either, who once slapped a fellow dancer full in the face for landing on his (Nureyev's) feet in performance. Just plain old Jorge Mester in a tight blue coat, perspiring profusely in the back, whose good-natured direction, sans flamboyance or tantrums, did nothing towards cultivating the much-needed mystique.

First Performance

This was the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the C.P.E. Bach symphony, a charming and ebullient piece of work in three movements, which was composed by him in 1775. The orchestra played it with sparkle and finesse.

Richard Strauss' orchestral suite, Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme, based on Moliere's play, came next, in a performance which had its high and low moments. A long piece, which was first written as a combination of play and opera, and from which Strauss later extracted the suite, it had a few especially good solo performances.

Perhaps the one item on the program that everyone was waiting for was Mozart's beautiful Symphony No. 41 in C. The final movement of the piece is Mozart's greatest achievement in "counterpoint," and though the orchestral performance varied from adequate to stimulating to quite exciting, there was none of that sweeping brilliance that one longed to hear.

The artistic directors of the Tanglewood Music Festival this year are Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller. Leonard Bernstein is the advisor for the season.

There are still a number of concerts which will be performed at Tanglewood in the coming month, and, if only to sit on the freshly-clipped lawns and to listen to Haydn or Brahms or Debussy — a light blanket and wine bottle in tow — it would be well worth a trip up to the Berkshires.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN, 1,445,507

JUL 28 1970

2 Young American Conductors Display Skills at Tanglewood

By THEODORE STRONGIN

Young American conductors are on the spot today when they lead major American symphony orchestras, because there are so many older European-born conductors around who will not be here forever.

George Szel of the Cleveland Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy of the Philadelphia and William Steinberg, who heads both the Boston and the Pittsburgh, are all in their seventies.

Therefore, Friday and Saturday nights at Tanglewood, when two younger Americans, Jorge Mester and Kenneth Schermerhorn, respectively, led the Boston Symphony, they had eager listeners as potential replacements for their seniors.

Rare Stravinsky Heard

As program-makers, both men were reasonably adventurous, one of them downright daring: Mr. Schermerhorn introduced to Tanglewood Stravinsky's Concerto in D for String Orchestra, a biting, ironic piece that can throw even the venerable Boston symphony off balance. (It did.)

Mr. Mester's Tanglewood first was less problematical: C.P.E. Bach's Symphony in D. The novelty was welcome, since Johann Sebastian Bach's sons are not often found in orchestra repertory. Mr. Mester was crisp and enthusiastic with the Symphony but not very patient. In Strauss's orchestral suite from "Der Burger als Edelmann," and in the Mozart "Jupiter" Symphony, Mr. Mester conducted with a sense of each work's grand span, but here, too, as in the Bach, details were slighted.

Eschenbach Is Soloist

Mr. Schermerhorn opened his concert with Haydn's Symphony No. 83 ("The Hen"), and here as in the accompaniment to the Mozart Piano Concerto in F (K.459), he made the music warm and sunny. Christopher Eschenbach, the soloist in the Mozart, adjusted his tone so beautifully to the orchestra that sometimes piano statements and woodwind answers were almost exactly alike in tone quality. Mr. Eschenbach's sonority sense is very subtle. But in submerging himself in it, he sacrificed incisiveness.

And then the Stravinsky: Even making allowance for the limited time guest conductors have to rehearse at Tanglewood, the work seemed completely out of phase, and it also suffered from flabbiness of impetus. It should move right on forward, digging in all the time, but it didn't.

Mr. Schermerhorn closed the weekend with Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 4, known best here as the music for Balanchine's ballet "Mozartiana."

BE
8-1

As I Hear It

Three Score and Ten

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

ONE of the best of all bons mots, whether apocryphal or not, is the one attributed to the late Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes near the end of his long and distinguished career. When a pretty girl passed him, he turned and murmured, "Oh, to be 70 again!"

What is the best of all ages? A foolish question, granted, but one which intrigues anyone who wishes to give it any thought and time. It is of unending interest to note at what age a certain piece of music was composed, what year it was first played or what was going on politically, for example, at that time. Program notes have stated millions of times that Beethoven dedicated his third symphony to Napoleon. However, when the French general put the crown of emperor on his head, Beethoven furiously tore up the dedication and simply inscribed it to "A Hero."

We are inclined to fix certain dates in our head—1492, 1776, and so on. Yet, it pleases me to know that Columbus was 41 when he first sighted this continent, almost the same age that George Washington had just passed when our Declaration of Independence was written.

* * * *

AFTER TWO CENTURIES or so, one's sense of pity and regret thins out a bit but we still look back occasionally and wonder what Mozart might have done had he been granted the 35 years of which fate deprived him—the traditional three score and ten—or Schubert who, in the same computing sense, was deprived of 39 years. One might go on, in music, in the arts and in literature.

Happily, many men of eminence not only do reach the scriptural milestone but do so in vigor and with purpose. Such a man was recently honored at Tanglewood. The concerts of last Tuesday and preceding Friday were conducted by a very distinguished American composer, Aaron Copland. He came to the Berkshires on the invitation of Serge Koussevitzky to organize the Berkshire Music Center, the academy the great conductor had long dreamed of establishing, and he stayed 25 years.

The impact of that phase of Tanglewood on world music is not readily appreciated here, as near as we are to the forest, but it is a magic name in the Western World and quickly becoming one in the Far East as well. The roster of students and artists who have passed through the Center's portals is a roll of unexcelled honor and achievement. No little share of it is due to Copland.

* * * *

HIS BIRTHDAY does not come until Nov. 14, but if the Queen of England can arbitrarily set a date for hers to suit the occasion, why not a few commoners? Copland considerately was born at the exact turn of the century, a date much easier to remember and compute than '99 or '03 or some such odd year. For purposes of envisaging his era, it is well to start it at the end of World War I.

There is always a great deal of overlapping in any history of an art. For instance, 88-year-old Stravinsky today is enjoying or observing the 60th and 70th anniversaries of his works. Copland went to Paris early in the '20s to what has been glibly called the "Boulangerie." It was through the kind and wise guidance of Nadia Boulanger that in January, 1925, Copland had his first major performance in America, Walter Damrosch (with Boulanger as soloist) conducted Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra. Damrosch is reported to have silenced the applause with the grumpy comment, "If a young man of 23 can write like this, in five years he will be ready to commit murder."

Instead within five years, Copland, to eke out his modest earnings from music, was lecturing on musical appreciation at the New School for Social Research in New York. He said he found it easier to earn money quickly by talking to a large audience than to a single student at a time. He has filled the ensuing tight years with composing, writing, lecturing and, not least important, championing American music and American composers.

* * * *

A MAN'S MUSIC is as individual as his fingerprints. Anyone familiar with Copland's earliest works will discern in his output of these last years, the personal mark or motto which identified him in the beginning, as different as the means and materials he employs today are. He has always been deeply in love with American folk and dance tunes, as evidenced by the touching core of the music of his "Tender Land" Suite that he played earlier this week.

Indeed his "Appalachian Suite" was not only commissioned by a Pittsfield philanthropist, Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, but the essential tune was borrowed, with permission, from the collection of Shaker tunes. The authority on that subject, the late Edward Deming Andrews, had compiled them in collaboration with a onetime member of the South Mountain String quartet, Conrad Held.

Copland's expatriate years in Paris coincided with that great era which included names to become as widely known as his own: Scott Fitzgerald, Ernest Hemingway, Gertrude Stein and many others. The great ballet tradition established by the meteoric Diaghilev was coming to an end, but it had dragged in its train the names of composers, painters, writers and artists of all manner and means. Is it a fault of my own vision to state that there doesn't seem to be such a generation in sight at this moment?

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 29 1970 New England Newsclip

Mixed Reactions Noted At Tanglewood To Direction By Jorge Mester

By DINA VAKIL

An animated Jorge Mester conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood on Saturday, charming a few, leaving some noticeably unmoved, and exciting many more to rise in unison and applaud.

It was a partly moving, partly uninspiring rendition of C.P.E. Bach's Symphony in D, Strauss' Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme suite, and Mozart's Symphony No. 41 — his last — entitled 'Jupiter."

Mester, who is the music director of the St. Louis Philharmonic Orchestra, is an energetic, though slightly colorless performer, and alas, with a predominantly New York audience attuned to charismatic Nureyevs, Bernsteins and Casals, for whom "personality" has become as indispensable as technical virtuosity, Mester was a lack-lustre figure.

No leonine Bernstein this, who conducts open rehearsals on some mornings in frayed jeans and torn sneakers. No Rudi Nureyev either, who once slapped a fellow dancer full in the face for landing on his (Nureyev's) feet in performance. Just plain old Jorge Mester in a tight blue coat, perspiring profusely in the back, whose good-natured direction, sans flamboyance or tantrums, did nothing towards cultivating the much-needed mystique.

First Performance

This was the first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of the C.P.E. Bach symphony, a charming and ebullient piece of work in three movements, which was composed by him in 1775. The orchestra played it with sparkle and finesse.

Richard Strauss' orchestral suite, Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme, based on Moliere's play, came next, in a performance which had its high and low moments. A long piece, which was first written as a combination of play and opera, and from which Strauss later extracted the suite, it had a few especially good solo performances.

Perhaps the one item on the program that everyone was waiting for was Mozart's beautiful Symphony No. 41 in C. The final movement of the piece is Mozart's greatest achievement in "counterpoint," and though the orchestral performance varied from adequate to stimulating to quite exciting, there was none of that sweeping brilliance that one longed to hear.

The artistic directors of the Tanglewood Music Festival this year are Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller. Leonard Bernstein is the advisor for the season.

There are still a number of concerts which will be performed at Tanglewood in the coming month, and, if only to sit on the freshly-clipped lawns and to listen to Haydn or Brahms or Debussy — a light blanket and wine bottle in tow — it would be well worth a trip up to the Berkshires.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 27 1970 New England Newsclip

AT TANGLEWOOD

Boston Symphony, Schermerhorn 'Most Satisfying'

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The elegant guidance of Kenneth Schermerhorn Sunday afternoon helped the Boston Symphony Orchestra give perhaps its most satisfying performance at Tanglewood so far in a season already half gone.

Fine Pianist

And the keyboard performance of Christoph Eschenback during Mozart's Piano Concerto in F, K.459, was perhaps the happiest moment of the afternoon.

In the very strong impression Eschenback made here last summer with another Mozart concerto was at least equaled. He is a very fine pianist.

He has a clear, no-nonsense understanding of Mozart coupled with a highly sensitive feeling for the dynamic and rhythmic subtleties. The result was Sunday (and last year) a Mozart concerto with all its inherent liquid beauty uncluttered either by romantic excesses or by a lacy sweetness that so many musicians believe belongs with the powdered wigs of the 18th century.

Compatibility

Schermerhorn happily was of the same mind, so orchestra and piano were nicely compatible, a circumstance especially important with this concerto because the contributions of soloist and orchestra are so closely interdependent.

The technical demands on Eschenbach's fingers also seemed to be no hurdle. He sailed through the trills and runs with easy speed.

The clean and graceful approach was evident also in Schermerhorn's shaping of the opening Haydn Symphony, No. 83, one of those composed for the Paris series and last heard at Tanglewood last summer.

Contrasts In Haydn

Schermerhorn's strong interest in dynamic accents and contrasting levels was specially evident during the Haydn. It was full of sudden surges, short crescendos, floating pianissimos broken by solid chords, all very carefully controlled and in genteel taste.

The program following intermission was not as impressive. Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra offered a 12-minute, three movement piece of varying interest, difficult to play and sometimes difficult to listen

There were long stretches in the first movement of halting, stumbling rhythms, and the last movement reflected the nervousness of the first. Members of the orchestra (38 strings) indicated an unusual degree of tension.

Resnikoff Memorial

The closing piece, a 25-minute suite by Tchaikovsky, Opus 61, called Mozartiana, offered precious little Mozart but plenty of Tchaikovsky, who claimed to have high admiration for Mozart's music.

The 10 a.m. chamber music program given by the Berkshire Music Center in the Chamber Music Hall was dedicated to Vladimir Resnikoff, who died a couple of weeks ago. He was a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's violin section for 32 years before his retirement in 1964.

The chamber music program offered a Bartok trio for violin, clarinet and piano, a Hindemity wind quintet, and Beethoven's String Quartet, Opus 74, all played by the students with dedication and, this time, with skill a cut above the usual Sunday morning fare.

The weekend gate count: Friday with Copland, 5015; Saturday morning rehearsal, 2350; Saturday night with Mester, 6313; Sunday afternoon with Schermerhorn and Eschenbach, 6237; total 19,917.

Next weekend the full orchestra will be back on the stage (about half has been in Boston two weeks playing the free series on the Esplanade) to play three Beethoven concerts, two conducted by William Steinberg, the third by Antal Dorati; piano soloists will be Claude Frank, Andre Watts, and Vladimir Askenazy.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN, 1,445,507

JUL 28 1970

2 Young American Conductors Display Skills at Tanglewood

By THEODORE STRONGIN

Young American conductors are on the spot today when they lead major American symphony orchestras, because there are so many older European-born conductors around who will not be here forever.

George Szel of the Cleveland Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy of the Philadelphia and William Steinberg, who heads both the Boston and the Pittsburgh, are all in their seventies.

Therefore, Friday and Saturday nights at Tanglewood, when two younger Americans, Jorge Mester and Kenneth Schermerhorn, respectively, led the Boston Symphony, they had eager listeners as potential replacements for their seniors.

Rare Stravinsky Heard

As program-makers, both men were reasonably adventurous, one of them downright daring: Mr. Schermerhorn introduced to Tanglewood Stravinsky's Concerto in D for String Orchestra, a biting, ironic piece that can throw even the venerable Boston Symphony off balance. (It did.)

Mr. Mester's Tanglewood first was less problematical: C.P.E. Bach's Symphony in D. The novelty was welcome, since Johann Sebastian Bach's sons are not often found in orchestra repertory. Mr. Mester was crisp and enthusiastic with the Symphony but not very patient. In Strauss's orchestral suite from "Der Burger als Edelmann," and in the Mozart "Jupiter" Symphony, Mr. Mester conducted with a sense of each work's grand span, but here, too, as in the Bach, details were slighted.

Eschenbach Is Soloist

Mr. Schermerhorn opened his concert with Haydn's Symphony No. 83 ("The Hen"), and here as in the accompaniment to the Mozart Piano Concerto in F (K.459), he made the music warm and sunny. Christopher Eschenbach, the soloist in the Mozart, adjusted his tone so beautifully to the orchestra that sometimes piano statements and woodwind answers were almost exactly alike in tone quality. Mr. Eschenbach's sonority sense is very subtle. But in submerging himself in it, he sacrificed incisiveness.

And then the Stravinsky: Even making allowance for the limited time guest conductors have to rehearse at Tanglewood, the work seemed completely out of phase, and it also suffered from flabbiness of impetus. It should move right on forward, digging in all the time, but it didn't.

Mr. Schermerhorn closed the weekend with Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 4, known best here as the music for Balanchine's ballet "Mozartiana."

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

JUL 28 1970

New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

Coming Home for Some Small Concerts

By Peter M. Knapp

The fourth weekend of the summer's Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood might have been called "alumni weekend." The small orchestra concerts (part of the Boston Symphony was in Boston for the Esplanade concerts) were led by two former Tanglewood students and a long-time faculty member.

Kenneth Schermerhorn, who led Sunday afternoon's program before 6,237, studied here under Leonard Bernstein and received the Koussevitzky Award two years in a row. The tall, dark conductor is now music director of the Milwaukee Symphony, and made his BSO debut with Sunday's program — for which he brought a black-and-white striped baton.

He led an enjoyable program, opening with a vital and shapely reading of Haydn's Symphony No. 83 in g minor, "The Hen" (so named for the chirping figurations in the first movement). Schermerhorn's Haydn had spunk, clarity and wit.

Brilliance For Mozart

His accompaniment for Mozart's Piano Concerto in F, K. 459, seemed by comparison a little stiff, but he had a formidable partner in the pianist Christoph Eschenbach. Eschenbach's Tanglewood debut last year created something of a sensation (also in Mozart), and his playing again was brilliant — a beautiful sense of classical proportions; great articulation, even at the pace of the last movement's rapid passagework; a fine variety of weight and dynamics. The German pianist received the kind of audience response generally reserved for heroic virtuosi.

Also in a small scale, and a contemporary version of concerto grosso, is Igor Stravinsky's 1946 Concerto in D for String Orchestra. The first two movements have a good deal of melodic line, the latter — an arioso — rather reminiscent of Tschaikovsky. There are concertino passages for viola in the first, and solos for viola and violin in the last movement. It ends in a whirring rondo, marvelously played.

Schermerhorn also did a good job with the closing piece, Tschaikovsky's Suite No. 4, called "Mozartiana," though why he bothered to program it is a good question.

It fits, of course, with the basic structure of the program, and one can objectively note Tschaikovsky's skill at orchestration. But I find much of it tasteless, sugary suite — the minuet, originally for piano, engulfed by the orchestration; the sublime "Ave verum corpus" desecrated by Mantovani string-halos, throbbing celli, and even harp — hideous

The variations roam through the orchestra like Benjamin Britten's "Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra," finally winding up in a scries of vaudeville violin and clarinet cadenzas.

Light, But Neat

Saturday night's conductor was Jorge Mester, 35, a Tanglewood alumnus and music director of the Louisville Orchestra and the Aspen Music Festival. Mester, a trim young man with bushy dark hair and poised appearance, led an admirable program of music by Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, Richard Strauss and Mozart. 6,313 attended on a hot evening.

The C.P.E. Bach work, a Symphony in D composed in 1775 by this composer son of Johann Sebastian, is a neat lightweight that barely hints of his melodic gifts, or bolder exercises in chromaticism and modulation. The D major symphony is still largely in the baroque mold with alternating string tutti and wind soli passages. Mester kept it light and quick (though not entirely with a sense of spontaneous freedom) and the finale in particular came through in high spirits.

Strauss' Orchestral Suite from "Der Buerger als Edelmann" — the incidental music to Moliere's "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" on which the composer collaborated with Hugo von Hoffmansthal in the production that was also to have included the opera "Ariadne auf Naxos" — was too fast for comfort or detail. The suite is delightful Strauss (one recalls with pleasure the complete music led by Erich Leinsdorf several seasons ago at Tanglewood), with many delicious details and witty asides from the chamber orchestra.

Jupiter Magnificent

Mester led it quickly lightly, and at least was consistent in its speed. But it was often too fast for clarity, and many details were lost or blurred. One that wasn't lost was Jules Eskin's superb cello solo during the dinner episode.

Mester concluded with a magnificent reading of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, No. 41 in C. Here, the tempi were "right," there was a good sense of proportion, lucid string sound and attention to detail. The andante movement was smooth and flowing, and the finale had bite and impulse without tangling the counterpoint.

Aaron Copland, for many years the chairman of the faculty and head of the composition department at Tanglewood, conducted Friday's program before a gathering of 5,017. Copland is nearly 70, but still vital and enthusiastic.

But he is not an adept conductor, more enthusiastic than effective, erratic in time-beating. Not really the orchestra's fault, the concert was largely spiritless and tedious.

On the program were Busoni's "Rondo arlecchinesco," Copland's own "Dance Panels," a 1962 ballet in seven movements, his Clarinet Concerto, and Schubert's Symphony No. 5, the Copland works receiving their first BSO performances.

Cumulative Disappointments

The Busoni, a musical portrait of Harlequin, "a supple body, a sprightly and darting spirit," was anything but, instead sounding confused and grim. "Dance Panels" is archetypal Copland — direct, built on basic open intervals that convey a sense of loneliness and starkness, much syncopation in faster sections. It probably works better for ballet than in concert, where it sounds thin in content.

In the Clarinet Concerto, the noted British clarinetist Gervase de Peyer wss a disappointing soloist. Apparently pressing for greater volume, Peyer was quite reedy in his top notes and had several embarrassing breaks, marring his nimble passagework.

Schubert's blithe and lovely Symphony No. 5 concluding the program was a triumph of professional musicianship from the orchestra over the hazards of following the baton. Fortunately, the musicians know this well, and Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein helped keep them together with bowing and head cues.

As it was, the performance was uneasy, and it was disconcerting to see downbeats being given as upbeats, or to have such perilous transitions in temp and meter or the drastic retards in the trio of the minuet. The BSO rescued Schubert.

CHRISTOPH ESCHENBACH: a hero's welcome

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 27 1970

New England Newsclip

Music Review

Three Batons at Tanglewood

By JAY ROSENFELD

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY had three conductors for its three programs this weekend, the fourth weekend and halfway mark of the 1970 Tanglewood schedule. The greatest interest was naturally focused on the man, who for 25 years had been such a guiding and inspirational force in the founding and direction of the Berkshire Music Center, Aaron Copland.

This dispersal of responsibility is not the ideal arrangement, yet there is the added audience interest. Adherence or loyalty to one baton in general is the better system. This past week's policy is sort of a cash-and-carry one. All things being equal, the orchestra plays better when there is a mutual understanding by all concerned and the product is delivered to do-mi-sol.

Copland's program Friday night included two of his own compositions played between a new-to-Tanglewood Rondo arlecchinesco of Ferrucio Busoni and the Schubert Fifth Symphony.

The other two conductors were young men, who had once been Berkshire Music Center students and who have gone on to have orchestras of their own, Jorge Jester of the Louisville Orchestra and Kenneth Schermerhorn the Milwaukee Symphony.

* * *

YESTERDAY Schermerhorn adhered to a pattern which has been followed for most of the first dozen concerts so far this season. The classics launch the program and more recent compositions are played after an intermission. The Haydn G Minor Symphony, No. 83 received a vigorous and thoroughly conveyed reading. The beat and its manner were convincing and there was well-achieved flexibility in the performance.

The Boston orchestra delivered some of its most fuzzy playing ever to come from the Tanglewood stage in the Stravinsky Concerto in D for strings only. For most of this the composer can be held responsible, for it is written in the most ungrateful registers of the string quartet in syncopated and irregularly jerky rhythm and idioms.

It was a relief to come upon the "Mozartiana" Suite No. 4, Opus 61 of Tchaikovsky which was popular and ingratiating by comparison. There have already been a few examples on the Tanglewood programs of a suite of this character. It could have been out of the same barrel as the Strauss Suite from the Moliere play "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" which Jester played the previous evening and even the Busoni Rondo of Copland's evening. It was even reminiscent of "Till" and the "Sorcerer."

Aaron Copland

* * *

THE VIOLIN CADENZA was played with stylish flourish by concertmaster Joseph Silverstein and the clarinet solo was equally arresting as played by Peter Hadcock. The final movement, Variations on a Theme of Gluck, sounded very much like an inversion of "Twinkle, Twinkle, Little Star."

The soloist yesterday afternoon was Christoph Eschenbach in the Mozart F Major piano concerto (K.459) and he proved as solid and sensitive an artist as his debut in Beethoven last year promised. His achievements in tonal lines were especially noteworthy. He takes his place as one of the top rank of the younger pianists of the day. Schermerhorn was with him in accuracy as well as in spirit all the way.

* * *

JESTERS placed his Strauss suite between a symphony of C.P.E. Bach, one of the composer sons of Johann Sebastian, and the Jupiter Symphony of Mozart. The whole weekend employed but a small orchestra, the programs being especially chosen for a group of these dimensions. Jester's tempi in the Mozart was solidly reasoned and a balance of more than satisfactory quality pervaded the whole performance.

The Strauss suite is that totally experienced composer looking through the big end of his telescope to a fascinating miniature. He writes for strings without second violins. The trumpet solo of Armando Ghitalla was outstanding and Silverstein again distinguished himself in the several solos which were his lot as did cellist Jules Eskin in his enchanting solo. Jester displayed an excellent baton technique and his podium deportment can be recommended. It was comforting to see a man doing a job well without histrionics.

* * *

COPLAND'S own "Dance Panels" is a struggle. It has the composer's recognizable personal cachet but his avoidance of metric momentum is disturbing. It forces him as conductor to keep turning on the ignition. There is insufficient follow-through and his craftsmanship shows through.

Copland's concerto for clarinet and string orchestra with harp and piano had Gervase de Peyer as soloist. There are two main sections which are played with an unaccompanied cadenza as bridge. The first half is slow and sustained; the second demands virtuoso vigor which de Peyer has in abundance.

19,917 Attend Weekend Concerts

A total of 19,917 people attended the weekend concerts at Tanglewood. This is approximately the same as last year. Friday night's concert drew 5,017; the Saturday rehearsal, 2,350; Saturday night, 6,313; and Sunday afternoon, 6,237.

65

Tanglewood Review

Fourth Weekend Of Festival

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

JUL 31 1970

New England Newsclip

The fourth weekend of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox saw the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing first under the direction of the elder Aaron Copland Friday evening, and two young conductors, Jorge Mester on Saturday, Kenneth Schermerhorn on Sunday afternoon. For a happy change, the weather was warm, dry underfoot, but with increasing humidity which produced intonation problems for the musicians, sensibly jacketless.

A respected and dedicated composer-teacher, Aaron Copland is not always at his best as a conductor; his music simply and openly conceived lacks prolonged interest depth and span, but one admires the man greatly for his achievements in founding and directing the Berkshire Music Center, his sympathetic interest in the various students who have been inspired by his knowledgeable guidance.

Two of his compositions, Dance Panels, and Concerto for clarinet and string orchestra with harp and piano, Gervase de Peyer as soloist, both first performances by the BSO, were offered at Friday's concert, which started with a delightful Rondo arlechinesco by Busoni, a first at Tanglewood, and ending with a pretty uneven projection of Schubert's Fifth Symphony.

Saturday evening, young Mester showed a vigorous interest in (and so did we) C.P.E. Bach's Symphony in D (another first), but not always clear understanding of or careful attention to details. The Strauss Orchestral Suite from "Der Burger als Edelmann", based on Moliere's play "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" lacked an overall clarity of structure, so important to the full enjoyment of this busily unfolding work. What a pleasure it can be to hear each graphic section properly portrayed.

Mester's best interpretation (and orchestra's response) of the evening was the closing Mozart Symphony No. 41 in C, the "Jupiter," K 551, the last of his final three symphonies. There is a tripping melody in C Major in the first movement that Mozart borrowed from his own aria buffa, "Un bacio di mano," that he had composed for an opera by Anfossi, the words of which are "You are a bit dense my dear Pompeo, go and study the ways of the world." But a sense of tragedy and impending doom, pervades the Andante Cantabile, developed with increasing emotional expression, subsiding (Mozartian Style) gradually into a kind of lamentation. The finale with its superb four-part fugue (his only one) and technically skillful elaboration was nonetheless simply conveyed, as is the whole symphony, astonishing and a joy to fathom.

Sunday afternoon, Kenneth Schermerhorn with his black and white-striped baton, presented a more controlled program, opening with Haydn's deliciously contrived Symphony No. 83 in G Minor, "the hen," captivating from beginning to end. A first performance at the Festival concerts didn't fare as well. Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra, which moved rather sluggishly; it could have been the heat or too few rehearsals for reciprocal understanding.

But Christoph Escehnbach's sensitive way with Mozart's Piano Concerto in F, K.459, eclipsed the delectable Haydn and the Tschaikovsky to follow. Tender and loving, tonally and technically, the young artist might have been the composer himself, so completely did he give himself to the music, melding and molding with the orchestra, as Mozart intended. Neither intruded on the other but joined together in a constant and continuing display of themes and developmental material. (There were times when Eschenbach was overshadowed, so intent was he on tonal perfection). Rippling runs cascade from the pianist's fingers, fragmentary in the second movement, extended in the third. The Mozart cadenzas were joyfully integrated, flowing from and into the orchestral parts, with no overt display, again as set forth by the composer. Long after the concerto's glistening treasures had been wafted into the afternoon haze, the radiance of this performance lingered with a glow that outshone the sun and uplifted the spirits.

Another first performance at the Festival Concerts closed the program, in itself a fanciful and inventive tribute to Mozart, Tschaikovsky's Suite No. 4 "Mozartiana" op. 61 Schermerhorn conducted each of the four movements based on a different work of Mozart's with well-disposed directions, bringing out the composer's evident devotion to his inspiration, achieved in true Tschaikovskian fashion. All stops were pulled out with the final "variations on a theme by Gluck", xylophone included, plus extended solos brilliantly espoused by Silverstein, a sterling trumpet solo by Armando Ghitalla, and cello interlude by Eskin.

Attendance for the weekend totalled 17,567. This weekend's programs will be devoted to Beethoven, with William Steinberg conducting Friday and Saturday, Antal Doratti Sunday. The three pianists featured in consecutive concerts are Claude Frank, Andre Watts, and Vladimir Ashkenazy.

Eschenbach plays Mozart

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 28 1970

New England Newsclip

LENOX — There was good Mozart at the fourth Tanglewood weekend. Saturday evening brought Jorge Mester's impressive conducting of the "Jupiter" symphony and then. Sunday afternoon, there was the beautiful playing of the F Major piano concerto, K.459, by Christoph Eschenbach, with Kenneth Schermerhorn conducting the Boston Symphony.

There was at first some constraint about the performance, which reached its highest level of vitality only with the beginning of the finale — at least, I remember the playing of the first movement of Saturday's public rehearsal as looser and more open. Of course that finale itself extends the concerto amazingly after the delicacy and extraordinary economy of the first two movements. The elegant temerity of its runaway inventiveness takes me by surprise every time, and how it must have astounded its first Viennese audience in 1784, totally unprepared to have a finale take over a piece so.

Eschenbach, as he showed in last Summer's opening concert at which he played the C Major concerto, K. 467 is a superb graceful, less warm and subjectively fanciful than some, but with a knack of developing enormous energy and projecting delightful humor within the framewok of a highly disciplined, "classical" manner. Except for a few thrown-away or choked down woodwind phrases, the collaboration of Schermerhorn and the orchestra was satisfyig, and the chamber musical aspects of the work were particularly well-realized.

To the real Mozart there was a rather special postscript in the form of "Mozartiana" orchestrations by Tchaikovsky of three of Mozart's piano pieces, the G. Major Gigue, the Minuet in D, and the Variations on "Unser Dunner Poebelmient," a song in popular style from Singstiel by Gluck, also of the touching choral motet, "Ave Verum Corpus." The "A e Verum," called "Treghiera" (prayer) in the "Mozartiana" suite, comes to us through a double romantic filter in that Tchaikovsky worked, not from Mozart's original, but from a piano tanscription by Liszt, itself called "A la-chapelle Sitine."

Tchaikovsky admitted to "idolizing" Mozart and said he loved him "as a musical Christ." "Mozartiana" is as wrong and as crazy as Mozarts version of Handel's Messiah, though not as beautiful. But our perception Mozart is so different from that of a Moscow audience in 1887 that the business of abducting Mozart and taking him on a voyage into the land of the Sleeping Beauty and the Sugarplum Fairy that glockenspiel variation!) really does not speak to us convinceingly. It is a fascinating document of late Romantic taste nad touching testimony to Tchaikovsky's love and marvelous craft, but its appeal is very special.

Schermerhorn was, I think, essentially right to perform it from a perspective of 80 years ago, that is, at tempi and with inflections he would not commit himself in a piece of straight Mozart; still, "Mozartiana" is a piece that neds to be justified by an elegance in performance that was not always forthcoming.

Sunday's concert, which also included Haydn's Symphony 83 in G minor, and Stravinsky's compact and charming concerto in D for string orchestra, was altogether a bit frustrating in that it was so much of the time on the edge of excellence it could not quite attain. Schermerhorn, music director of the Milwaukee Smphony, is one of the most serious and skilled American musicians of his generation, but together with all the thoughtfulness and clarity he brought to his work, there was on Sunday a tightness that kept the level of vitality generally a bit low.

Schermerhorn was the Koussevitzky Conducting Prize Winner at the Berkshire Music Center when he was a student there in 1955 and 1956. His appropriate, indeed belated engagement by the Boston Symphony might be a precedent for guest engagements of other Koussevitzky prize recipients. Some of them, Claudio Abbado (1958), Seiji Ozawa (1960), and Michael Tilson Thomas (1968), have had opportunites with the Boston Symphony anyway; several others, however, have shown themselves distinguished musicians—Paul Vermel, Wyn Morris, Lawrence Foster, James Paul, for example, and would be worth bringing around. It would be an appropriate extension of the recognition the prize is meant to convey, it would enliven the scene a bit, and besides, the big boys on the Boston Symphony podium haven't really always done all that well.

Tanglewood In Re

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 30 1970

New England Newsclip

Friday, July 24
By A.C.S.

Of the three guest conductors this weekend, all of whom have been associated with the Berkshire Festival, the best known is Aaron Copland. Tonight he was heard both as conductor and composer. Phyllis Curtin sang his twelve beautiful settings of poems by Emily Dickinson at the weekend prelude. Copland took the podium to lead a diverse program which included two of his own works.

The first, entitled "Dance Panels," was completed in 1962. It contains little in the way of new ideas, or even new sounds. More important, however, the music needs the added visual effect of the dancers. Without them, the score was lifeless. More happily received was the Concerto for Clarinet with Gervase de Peyer as soloist. The composition allows the soloist ample opportunity to demonstrate his abilities and shows the composer in one of his more inspired moments.

Rondo Arlecchinesco, by Busoni, opened the evening. The composer is most widely known for his piano transcriptions, but this rarely heard work gives evidence of his creative imagination. A protest against World War I, its language seems none-the-less effective today. Schubert's lovely Symphony No. 5 brought the evening to a close.

Saturday, July 25
By J.E.T.V.D.

Again, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program for July 25 opened with a first performance and a very strange one at that.

It was C.P.E. Bach's Symphony in D (1775) in three movements. Because of the continuously changing tempi, each movement was actually two in itself, revealing the tremendously advanced mind of its composer. It was a moody piece of unexpected character.

This was followed by Strauss' "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" which I feel, with my slight knowledge of music, may have been too complex for the young conductor — Jorge Mester. To begin with, the piece was somewhat disturbing in its disjointed and unbalanced pompousness. Failing to pay any attention to the first violinist, Mester also failed to maintain congruity between his narcissistic movements and the music. It seems to me, that Jorge Mester, often making unnecessary gestures, may be very good in conducting modern music, but has to slow down a bit for the Baroque and Romantic eras.

Finally the Mozart Symphony No. 41 in C was rich and wholesome, flowing and masterful. However, those fine moments in Mozart's music which must be played with elegant delicacy came out heavy and awkward. Following the intermission, Mester paid more attention to the rest of the orchestra in Mozart's piece.

Whether it was the pieces chosen, his own difficulties or the very humid evening that troubled Mester, I could not be certain, but as the night cooled, the music warmed.

Sunday, July 26
By A.C.S.

If Kenneth Schermerhorn conducts the Milwaukee Symphony with as much verve as he did the BSO, it must be SRO in Milwaukee. His programming is interesting, too. Classic German composers for the first half; Russian composers for the second.

Haydn's Symphony No. 83, "The Hen" was a delightful opener for a hot summer afternoon. The final "vivace," especially, was as refreshing as a tall, cool drink. The Mozart Piano Concerto in F, K. 459 presented Christoph Eschenbach as soloist. A formidable pianist, Eschenbach seems wonderfully suited to this music. An impeccable technique combined with musical sensitivity raised this performance far above the pedestrian level.

Stravinsky's Concerto in D for Strings had its first Tanglewood hearing this afternoon. Relatively brief and in the concerto grosso style, it has all the composer's earmarks. The central "Arioso" is amazingly tuneful. The final work, also a newcomer to Tanglewood, was the Suite No. 4, Op 61 by Tchaikovsky. It is an affectionate tribute to his idol, Mozart, and utilizes (via transcription) four of Mozart's piano works. The third movement is a lovely setting of the famous motet, Ave verum corpus. Kenneth Schermerhorn's debut with the BSO was a resounding success.

Tanglewood Review

Fourth Weekend Of Festival

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(T) 14,900
JUL 31 1970
New England Newsclip

The fourth weekend of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox saw the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing first under the direction of the elder Aaron Copland Friday evening, and two young conductors, Jorge Mester on Saturday, Kenneth Schermerhorn on Sunday afternoon. For a happy change, the weather was warm, dry underfoot, but with increasing humidity which produced intonation problems for the musicians, sensibly jacketless.

A respected and dedicated composer-teacher, Aaron Copland is not always at his best as a conductor; his music simply and openly conceived lacks prolonged interest depth and span, but one admires the man greatly for his achievements in founding and directing the Berkshire Music Center, his sympathetic interest in the various students who have been inspired by his knowledgeable guidance.

Two of his compositions, Dance Panels, and Concerto for clarinet and string orchestra with harp and piano, Gervase de Peyer as soloist, both first performances by the BSO, were offered at Friday's concert, which started with a delightful Rondo arlechinesco by Busoni, a first at Tanglewood, and ending with a pretty uneven projection of Schubert's Fifth Symphony.

Saturday evening, young Mester showed a vigorous interest in (and so did we) C.P.E. Bach's Symphony in D (another first), but not always clear understanding of or careful attention to details. The Strauss Orchestral Suite from "Der Burger als Edelmann", based on Moliere's play "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" lacked an overall clarity of structure, so important to the full enjoyment of this busily unfolding work. What a pleasure it can be to hear each graphic section properly portrayed.

Mester's best interpretation (and orchestra's response) of the evening was the closing Mozart Symphony No. 41 in C, the "Jupiter," K 551, the last of his final three symphonies. There is a tripping melody in C Major in the first movement that Mozart borrowed from his own aria buffa, "Un bacio di mano," that he had composed for an opera by Anfossi, the words of which are "You are a bit dense my dear Pompeo, go and study the ways of the world." But a sense of tragedy and impending doom, pervades the Andante Cantabile, developed with increasing emotional expression, subsiding (Mozartian Style) gradually into a kind of lamentation. The finale with its superb four-part fugue (his only one) and technically skillful elaboration was nonetheless simply conveyed, as is the whole symphony, astonishing and a joy to fathom.

Sunday afternoon, Kenneth Schermerhorn with his black and white-striped baton, presented a more controlled program, opening with Haydn's deliciously contrived Symphony No. 83 in G Minor, "the hen," captivating from beginning to end. A first performance at the Festival concerts didn't fare as well. Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra, which moved rather sluggishly; it could have been the heat or too few rehearsals for reciprocal understanding.

But Christoph Escehnbach's sensitive way with Mozart's Piano Concerto in F, K.459, eclipsed the delectable Haydn and the Tschaikovsky to follow. Tender and loving, tonally and technically, the young artist might have been the composer himself, so completely did he give himself to the music, melding and molding with the orchestra, as Mozart intended. Neither intruded on the other but joined together in a constant and continuing display of themes and developmental material. (There were times when Eschenbach was overshadowed, so intent was he on tonal perfection). Rippling runs cascade from the pianist's fingers, fragmentary in the second movement, extended in the third. The Mozart cadenzas were joyfully integrated, flowing from and into the orchestral parts, with no overt display, again as set forth by the composer. Long after the concerto's glistening treasures had been wafted into the afternoon haze, the radiance of this performance lingered with a glow that outshone the sun and uplifted the spirits.

Another first performance at the Festival Concerts closed the program, in itself a fanciful and inventive tribute to Mozart, Tschaikovsky's Suite No. 4 "Mozartiana", op. 61 Schermerhorn conducted each of the four movements based on a different work of Mozart's with well-disposed directions, bringing out the composer's evident devotion to his inspiration, achieved in true Tschaikovskian fashion. All stops were pulled out with the final "variations on a theme by Gluck", xylophone included, plus extended solos brilliantly espoused by Silverstein, a sterling trumpet solo by Armando Ghitalia, and cello interlude by Eskin.

Attendance for the weekend totalled 17,567. This weekend's programs will be devoted to Beethoven, with William Steinberg conducting Friday and Saturday, Antal Doratti Sunday. The three pianists featured in consecutive concerts are Claude Frank, Andre Watts, and Vladimir Ashkenazy.

Eschenbach plays Mozart

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — There was good Mozart at the fourth Tanglewood weekend. Saturday evening brought Jorge Mester's impressive conducting of the "Jupiter" symphony and then. Sunday afternoon, there was the beautiful playing of the F Major piano concerto, K.459, by Christoph Eschenbach, with Kenneth Schermerhorn conducting the Boston Symphony.

There was at first some constraint about the performance, which reached its highest level of vitality only with the beginning of the finale — at least, I remember the playing of the first movement of Saturday's public rehearsal as looser and more open. Of course that finale itself extends the concerto amazingly after the delicacy and extraordinary economy of the first two movements. The elegant temerity of its runaway inventiveness takes me by surprise every time, and how it must have astounded its first Viennese audience in 1784, totally unprepared to have a finale take over a piece so.

Eschenbach, as he showed in last Summer's opening concert at which he played the C Major concerto, K. 467 is a superb graceful, less warm and subjectively fanciful than some, but with a knack of developing enormous energy and projecting delightful humor within the framewok of a highly disciplined, "classical" manner. Except for a few thrown-away or choked down woodwind phrases, the collaboration of Schermerhorn and the orchestra was satisfyig, and the chamber musical aspects of the work were particularly well-realized.

To the real Mozart there was a rather special postscript in the form of "Mozartiana" orchestrations by Tchaikovsky of three of Mozart's piano pieces, the G. Major Gigue, the Minuet in D, and the Variations on "Unser Dunner Poebelmient," a song in popular style from Singstiel by Gluck, also of the touching choral motet, "Ave Verum Corpus." The "A e Verum," called "Treghiera" (prayer) in the "Mozartiana" suite, comes to us through a double romantic filter in that Tchaikovsky worked, not from Mozart's original, but from a piano tanscription by Liszt, itself called "A la-chapelle Sitine."

Tchaikovsky admitted to "idolizing" Mozart and said he loved him "as a musical Christ." "Mozartiana" is as wrong and as crazy as Mozarts version of Handel's Messiah, though not as beautiful. But our perception Mozart is so different from that of a Moscow audience in 1887 that the business of abducting Mozart and taking him on a voyage into the land of the Sleeping Beauty and the Sugarplum Fairy that glockenspiel variation!) really does not speak to us convinceingly. It is a fascinating document of late Romantic taste nad touching testimony to Tchaikovsky's love and marvelous craft, but its appeal is very special.

Schermerhorn was, I think, essentially right to perform it from a perspective of 80 years ago, that is, at tempi and with inflections he would not commit himself in a piece of straight Mozart; still, "Mozartiana" is a piece that neds to be justified by an elegance in performance that was not always forthcoming.

Sunday's concert, which also included Haydn's Symphony 83 in G minor, and Stravinsky's compact and charming concerto in D for string orchestra, was altogether a bit frustrating in that it was so much of the time on the edge of excellence it could not quite attain. Schermerhorn, music director of the Milwaukee Smphony, is one of the most serious and skilled American musicians of his generation, but together with all the thoughtfulness and clarity he brought to his work, there was on Sunday a tightness that kept the level of vitality generally a bit low.

Schermerhorn was the Koussevitzky Conducting Prize Winner at the Berkshire Music Center when he was a student there in 1955 and 1956. His appropriate, indeed belated engagement by the Boston Symphony might be a precedent for guest engagements of other Koussevitzky prize recipients. Some of them, Claudio Abbado (1958), Seiji Ozawa (1960), and Michael Tilson Thomas (1968), have had opportunites with the Boston Symphony anyway; several others, however, have shown themselves distinguished musicians—Paul Vermel, Wyn Morris, Lawrence Foster, James Paul, for example, and would be worth bringing around. It would be an appropriate extension of the recognition the prize is meant to convey, it would enliven the scene a bit, and besides, the big boys on the Boston Symphony podium haven't really always done all that well.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
JUL 28 1970
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood In Re

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813
JUL 30 1970
New England Newsclip

Friday, July 24
By A.C.S.

Of the three guest conductors this weekend, all of whom have been associated with the Berkshire Festival, the best known is Aaron Copland. Tonight he was heard both as conductor and composer. Phyllis Curtin sang his twelve beautiful settings of poems by Emily Dickinson at the weekend prelude. Copland took the podium to lead a diverse program which included two of his own works.

The first, entitled "Dance Panels," was completed in 1962. It contains little in the way of new ideas, or even new sounds. More important, however, the music needs the added visual effect of the dancers. Without them, the score was lifeless. More happily received was the Concerto for Clarinet with Gervase de Peyer as soloist. The composition allows the soloist ample opportunity to demonstrate his abilities and shows the composer in one of his more inspired moments.

Rondo Arlecchinesco, by Busoni, opened the evening. The composer is most widely known for his piano transcriptions, but this rarely heard work gives evidence of his creative imagination. A protest against World War I, its language seems none-the-less effective today. Schubert's lovely Symphony No. 5 brought the evening to a close.

Saturday, July 25
By J.E.T.V.D.

Again, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program for July 25 opened with a first performance and a very strange one at that.

It was C.P.E. Bach's Symphony in D (1775) in three movements. Because of the continuously changing tempi, each movement was actually two in itself, revealing the tremendously advanced mind of its composer. It was a moody piece of unexpected character.

This was followed by Strauss' "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" which I feel, with my slight knowledge of music, may have been too complex for the young conductor — Jorge Mester. To begin with, the piece was somewhat disturbing in its disjointed and unbalanced pompousness. Failing to pay any attention to the first violinist, Mester also failed to maintain congruity between his narcissistic movements and the music. It seems to me, that Jorge Mester, often making unnecessary gestures, may be very good in conducting modern music, but has to slow down a bit for the Baroque and Romantic eras.

Finally the Mozart Symphony No. 41 in C was rich and wholesome, flowing and masterful. However, those fine moments in Mozart's music which must be played with elegant delicacy came out heavy and awkward. Following the intermission, Mester paid more attention to the rest of the orchestra in Mozart's piece.

Whether it was the pieces chosen, his own difficulties or the very humid evening that troubled Mester, I could not be certain, but as the night cooled, the music warmed.

Sunday, July 26
By A.C.S.

If Kenneth Schermerhorn conducts the Milwaukee Symphony with as much verve as he did the BSO, it must be SRO in Milwaukee. His programming is interesting, too. Classic German composers for the first half; Russian composers for the second.

Haydn's Symphony No. 83, "The Hen" was a delightful opener for a hot summer afternoon. The final "vivace," especially, was as refreshing as a tall, cool drink. The Mozart Piano Concerto in F, K. 459 presented Christoph Eschenbach as soloist. A formidable pianist, Eschenbach seems wonderfully suited to this music. An impeccable technique combined with musical sensitivity raised this performance far above the pedestrian level.

Stravinsky's Concerto in D for Strings had its first Tanglewood hearing this afternoon. Relatively brief and in the concerto grosso style, it has all the composer's earmarks. The central "Arioso" is amazingly tuneful. The final work, also a newcomer to Tanglewood, was the Suite No. 4, Op 61 by Tchaikovsky. It is an affectionate tribute to his idol, Mozart, and utilizes (via transcription) four of Mozart's piano works. The third movement is a lovely setting of the famous motet, Ave verum corpus. Kenneth Schermerhorn's debut with the BSO was a resounding success.

66

Tanglewood reviewed

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUL 28 1970 New England Newsclip

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — There was good Mozart at the fourth Tanglewood weekend. Saturday evening brought Jorge Mester's impressive conducting of the "Jupiter" symphony and then. Sunday afternoon, there was the beautiful playing of the F Major piano concerto, K.459, by Christoph Eschenbach, with Kenneth Schermerhorn conducting the Boston Symphony.

There was at first some constraint about the performance, which reached its highest level of vitality only with the beginning of the finale — at least, I remember the playing of the first movement of Saturday's public rehearsal as looser and more open. Of course that finale itself extends the concerto amazingly after the delicacy and extraordinary economy of the first two movements. The elegant temerity of its runaway inventiveness takes me by surprise every time, and how it must have astounded its first Viennese audience in 1784, totally unprepared to have a finale take over a piece so.

Eschenbach, as he showed in last Summer's opening concert at which he played the C Major concerto, K. 467 is a superb graceful, less warm and subjectively fanciful than some, but with a knack of developing enormous energy and projecting delightful humor within the framewok of a highly disciplined, "classical" manner. Except for a few thrown-away or choked down woodwind phrases, the collaboration of Schermerhorn and the orchestra was satisfyig, and the chamber musical aspects of the work were particularly well-realized.

To the real Mozart there was a rather special postscript in the form of "Mozartiana" orchestrations by Tchaikovsky of three of Mozart's piano pieces, the G. Major Gigue, the Minuet in D, and the Variations on "Unser Dunner Poebel mient," a song in popular style from Singstiel by Gluck, also of the touching choral motet, "Ave Verum Corpus." The "A e Verum," called "Treghiera" (prayer) in the "Mozartiana" suite, comes to us through a double romantic filter in that Tchaikovsky worked, not from Mozart's original, but from a piano tanscription by Liszt, itself called "A la-chapelle Sitine."

Tchaikovsky admitted to "idolizing" Mozart and said he loved him "as a musical Christ." "Mozartiana" is as wrong and as crazy as Mozarts version of Handel's Messiah, though not as beautiful. But our perception Mozart is so different from that of a Moscow audience in 1887 that the business of abducting Mozart and taking him on a voyage into the land of the Sleeping Beauty and the Sugarplum Fairy that glockenspiel variation!) really does not speak to us convinceingly. It is a fascinating document of late Romantic taste nad touching testimony to Tchaikovsky's love and marvelous craft, but its appeal is very special.

Schermerhorn was, I think, essentially right to perform it from a perspective of 80 years ago, that is, at tempi and with inflections he would not commit himself in a piece of straight Mozart; still, "Mozartiana" is a piece that neds to be justified by an elegance in performance that was not always forthcoming.

Sunday's concert, which also included Haydn's Symphony 83 in G minor, and Stravinsky's compact and charming concerto in D for string orchestra, was altogether a bit frustrating in that it was so much of the time on the edge of excellence it could not quite attain. Schermerhorn, music director of the Milwaukee Smphony, is one of the most serious and skilled American musicians of his generation, but together with all the thoughtfulness and clarity he brought to his work, there was on Sunday a tightness that kept the level of vitality generally a bit low.

Schermerhorn was the Koussevitzky Conducting Prize Winner at the Berkshire Music Center when he was a student there in 1955 and 1956. His appropriate, indeed belated engagement by the Boston Symphony might be a precedent for guest engagements of other Koussevitzky prize recipients. Some of them, Claudio Abbado (1958), Seiji Ozawa (1960), and Michael Tilson Thomas (1968), have had opportunites with the Boston Symphony anyway; several others, however, have shown themselves distinguished musicians—Paul Vermel, Wyn Morris, Lawrence Foster, James Paul, for example, and would be worth bringing around. It would be an appropriate extension of the recognition the prize is meant to convey, it would enliven the scene a bit, and besides, the big boys on the Boston Symphony podium haven't really always done all that well.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUL 27 1970 New England Newsclip

19,917 Hear Small Symphony On Weekend at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — The fourth weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood covered a lot of ground without scaling any real heights.

Total attendance was 19,917.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, reduced to 50 players, was conducted by Aaron Copland Friday night; Jorge Mester, conductor of Louisville Orchestra, Saturday night, and Kenneth Schermerhorn, Milwaukee Symphony, yesterday afternoon.

Copland, a versatile composer and a pedestrian conductor, naturally included his own works — Dance Panels and Clarinet Concerto. That program opened with a Busoni curiosity, "Rondo Arlecchinesco" (with offstage tenor), and Schubert's Fifth Symphony.

So far as we're concerned, Saturday night's concert began and ended with Mozart's Symphony No. 41, "Jupiter." Most of the time was given to C.P.E. Bach's Symphony in D, and Richard Strauss' 'bon-bon assortment," "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme."

After dutifully plodding through Bach and Strauss, the orchestra resumed its greatness for the Mozart. The previous "rehearsal" sound was dissolved.

The Mozart Symphony's notes, phrases and structure had warmth and fire. The first movement sparkled. Even the treacherous horn statements in the minuet were made without a hitch. The five themes of the finale came through brilliantly.

Mester is not an imposing podium figure, but he is thorough and prompt. Granted that he did get carried away with his tempos in the Bach Symphony, he deserved better playing than he received.

The slow movement was beautifully intoned by reeds, but most of the rest was a mad dash across measure bars.

Strauss' "Gentilhomme" had fillings of harshness between layers of bucolic, sentimental matter. Tempos and coordination were awry and Joseph Silverstein's violin solo will not be remembered among the great moments in music.

The brasses and Jules Eskin's celo sequence supplied moments of revival in an otherwise tepid performance.

In yesterday's concert, Schermerhorn's style stimulated and reflected the character of the music. In Haydn's Symphony No. 83, "The Hen," he gave the orchestra excellent service in cueing tempos, dynamics, phrasing, accents and balances.

The Haydn Symphony was its jovial self. It sounded a trifle calculated, but was abundant in nuances and vitality. Unfortunately, Schermerhorn shifted into high gear for the finale with some note garbling as the result.

Allowing Schermerhorn his due, pianist Christoph Eschenbach was yesterday's Tanglewood hero. You couldn't measure it so much by applause. At Tanglewood, three curtain calls is often just the beginning.

The work was Mozart's Piano Concerto in F, K.459, which lies somewhere between pure fun and serious message. The soloist did agile fingerwork. Notes were spotlessly accurate and a close relationship was maintained between piano and orchestra.

In spite of some restraint in volume and general vitality, Eschanbach made a good exposure of his technical skill in the cadenzas, which were Mozart's own and not the dressed up monkey-shines that most pianists offer.

The time taken up by Stravinsky's Concerto in D for String Orchestra was more than enough to disclose a loosely-bound series of spasmodic motives — a few arresting, the rest of passing interest.

Much the same can be said of Tchaikovsky's suite, "Mozartiana," except that it was not as well played as the Stravinsky.

Copland to conduct Berkshire program

NE

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS. — Conductor - Composer Aaron Copland conducts the opening concert of the fourth weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday at 9 p.m. in the Tanglewood Shed.

The program opens with Busoni's "Rondo Arlecchinesco," followed by Copland conducting two of his own pieces, "Dance Panels," and following intermission the Clarinet concerto, with soloist Gervase de Peyer. The program concludes with Schubert's Symphony No. 5.

AARON COPLAND

Copland was chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center for 25 years and is currently chairman emeritus. His 70th birthday (November 14) will be celebrated this summer on July 28 during the day - long festivities of Tanglewood-on-Parade. The day culminates at 8:30 p.m. with the Gala Concert, during which Copland conducts the Boston Symphony in his "Suite from the Tender Land," and Bernstein's "Candide Overture." He also conducts the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in Hindemith's "Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber."

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents soprano Phyllis Curtin, this summer's Granrud Artist - in-residence at Tanglewood. Miss Curtin sings Copland's "Twelve Poems by Emily Dickinson" and Faure's "Six Poems of Paul Verlaine."

Guest conductor Kenneth Schermerhorn rehearses the Boston Symphony with pianist Christoph Eschenback in the weekly Open Rehearsal, Saturday at 10:30 a.m.

Saturday, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Jorge Mester conducts an all - orchestral program opening with the Symphony in D by C. P. E. Bach, followed by the Strauss Suite "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." The program closes with Mozart's Symphony No. 41, "Jupiter."

JORGE MESTER

On Sunday, July 26 at 2:30 p.m. Kenneth Schermerhorn conducts the Boston Symphony with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist. The program opens with Haydn's Symphony No. 83, followed by Eschenback as soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in F, K. 459. Following intermission, Schermerhorn conducts Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 4 "Mozartiana," Op. 61.

German-born Eschenback made his Boston Symphony debut at the opening concert of the 1969 Tanglewood season. He has also appeared with the Cleveland, Toronto and the Chicago Symphony Orchestras.

The third Contemporary Trends Concert, presented by Bill Graham's Fillmore East, takes place Tuesday at 6 p.m. Joe Cocker, John Sebastian, and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band headline the program.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 18 1970

New England Newsclip

Fourth Weekend At Tanglewood

Conductor - Composer Aaron Copland conducts the opening concert of the fourth weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday evening, July 24 at 9 p.m. in the Tanglewood Shed. The program opens with Busoni's Rondo Arlecchinesco, followed by Mr. Copland conducting two of his own pieces, Dance Panels, and following intermission, the Clarinet concerto, with soloist Gervase de Peyer. The program concludes with Schubert's Symphony no. 5.

Mr. Copeland was Chairman of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center for 25 years and is currently Chairman Emeritus. His 70th birthday (November 14) will be celebrated this summer on Tuesday, July 28 during the day-long festivities of Tanglewood-on-Parade. The day culminates at 8:30 p.m. with the Gala Concert, during which Mr. Copland conducts the Boston Symphony in his Suite from the Tender Land, and Bernstein's Candide overture. He also conducts the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in Hindemith's Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday evening at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents Soprano Phyllis Curtin, this summer's Granrud Artist-in-residence at Tanglewood. Miss Curtin sings Copland's Twelve poems by Emily Dickinson and Faure's Six poems of Paul Verlaine. Admission to Weekend Prelude recitals is free to ticketholders of the 9p.m. Boston Symphony Concert.

Guest Conductor Kenneth Schermerhorn rehearses the Boston Symphony with pianist Christoph Eschenbach in the weekly Open Rehearsal, Saturday morning, July 25 at 10.30 a.m. Tickets for the Open Rehearsals are $2.50 and are on sale the morning of the rehearsal. The Rehearsal benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Saturday evening, July 25 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Jorge Mester conducts an all-orchestral program opening with the Symphony in D by C.P.E. Bach, followed by the Strauss Suite Le bourgeois gentilhomme. The program closes with Mozart's Symphony no. 41 'Jupiter.'

On Sunday, July 26 at 2:30 p.m. Kenneth Schermerhorn conducts the Boston Symphony with Christopher Eschenbach as soloist. The program opens with Haydn's Symphony no. 83, followed by Mr. Eschenbach as soloist in Mozart's Piano concerto in F.K. 459. Following intermission, Mr. Schermerhorn conducts Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Suite no. 4 'Mobartiana,' Op. 61.

The German-born Christopher Eschenbach made his Boston Symphony debut at the opening concert of the 1969 Tanglewood season. He has also appeared with the Cleveland, Toronto and the Chicago Symphony Orchestras.

Tickets for all Berkshire Festival Concerts are available at the Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts 01240. Please enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope with all mail orders. Tickets are also available from 250 TICKETRON locations within a radius of 500 miles of Tanglewood.

The third Contemporary Trends Concert at Tanglewood presented by Bill Graham's Fillmore East takes place Tuesday, July 21 at 6 p.m. Joe Cocker' John Sebastian, and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band headline the program. Tickets are on sale at the Tanglewood Festival Ticket Office.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 19 1970

New England Newsclip

Aaron Copland, noted American composer, who will conduct the Boston Symphony in a July 24 Tanglewood concert which includes some of his own works.

4th weekend at Tanglewood

The fourth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts begins this Friday at 7 p.m. with a song recital by soprano Phyllis Curtin, this summer's Granrud artist-in-residence at Tanglewood. Her program includes Copland's "Twelve Poems by Emily Dickinson" and Faure's "Six Poems of Paul Verlaine."

Miss Curtin's recital is free to ticketholders of the Friday 9 p.m. concert, which features Aaron Copland conducting the Boston Symphony in Busoni's "Rondo Arlecchinesco," Schubert's Symphony No. 5, and two of his own works: "Dance Panels" and the Clarinet Concerto. Gervase de Peyer is the soloist.

Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Jorge Mester conducts the orchestra in K.P.E. Bach's Symphony in D, Strauss' "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" Suite and Mozart's Symphony No. 41.

Kenneth Schermerhorn conducts Sunday, July 26, at 2:30 p.m., opening with Haydn's Symphony No. 83 ("The Hen"). Pianist Christoph Eschenback appears as soloist in Mozart's Concerto in F, K. 459, and the program concludes with Stravinsky's Concerto in D and Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 4 ("Mozartiana").

The third Contemporary Trends Concert at Tanglewood takes place Tuesday, July 21, at 6 p.m., when Bill Graham's Fillmore East presents Chicago (Transit Authority), John Sebastian and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, July 19, 1970

Aaron Copland Conducts Friday

Aaron Copland, 69-year-old chairman emeritus of the Berkshire Music Center, will conduct the Boston Symphony in two of his works, "Dance Panels" and a clarinet concerto featuring Gervase de Peyer, this Friday evening at 9 in the Tanglewood Shed. Copland, whose 70th birthday will be celebrated as part of the Tanglewood-on-Parade festivities July 28, will also direct Busoni's "Rondo Arlecchinesco" and Schubert's Symphony No. 5.

Soprano Phyllis Curtin, currently in residence at Tanglewood, will do Copland's "Twelve Poems by Emily Dickinson" and Faure's "Six Poems of Paul Verlaine," for the weekend prelude at 7 p.m.

Strauss Suite

Jorge Mester will conduct the Bach Symphony in D, the Strauss suite "Le bourgeois gentilhomme" and Mozart's Symphony No. 41 ("Jupiter") for the Saturday performance, beginning at 8:30.

Pianist Christoph Eschenbach will be featured soloist for the Sunday afternoon concert at 2:30. Kenneth Schermerhorn will conduct the Sunday program of Haydn's Symphony No. 33 ("The Hen"), Mozart's Piano Concerto, K. 459, Stravinsky's Concerto in D and Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 4 ("Mozartiana").

Schermerhorn and Eschenbach will play with the orchestra during open rehearsal Saturday morning at 10:30.

COMING PROGRAMS AT TANGLEWOOD

Conductor-Composer Aaron Copland conducts the opening concert of the fourth weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday evening, July 24 at 9 p.m. in the Tanglewood Shed. The program opens with Busoni's "Rondo Arlecchinesco," followed by Mr. Copland conducting two of his own pieces, "Dance Panels," and following intermission, the Clarinet concerto, with soloist Gervase de Peyer. The program concludes with Schubert's Symphony no. 5.

Mr. Copland was Chairman of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center for 25 years and is currently Chairman Emeritus. His 70th birthday (November 14) will be celebrated this summer on Tuesday, July 28 during the day-long festivities of Tanglewood-on-Parade. The day culminates at 8:30 p.m. with the Gala Concert, during which Mr. Copland conducts the Boston Symphony in his "Suite from the Tender Land," and Bernstein's "Candide" overture. He also conducts the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in Hindemith's "Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber."

The Weekend Prelude, Friday evening at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents Soprano Phyllis Curtin, this summer's Granrud Artist-in-residence at Tanglewood. Miss Curtin sings Copland's "Twelve poems by Emily Dickinson" and Faure's "Six poems of Paul Verlaine." Admission to Weekend Prelude recitals is free to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Concert.

Guest Conductor Kenneth Schermerhorn rehearses the Boston Symphony with pianist Christoph Eschenbach in the weekly Open Rehearsal, Saturday morning, July 25 at 10:30 a.m. Tickets for the Open Rehearsals are $2.50 and are on sale the morning of the rehearsal.

Saturday evening, July 25 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Jorge Mester conducts an all-orchestral program opening with the Symphony in D by C.P.E. Bach, followed by the Strauss Suite "Le bourgeoi gentilhomme." The program closes with Mozart's Symphony no. 41, "Jupiter."

On Sunday, July 26 at 2:30 p.m. Kenneth Schermerhorn conducts the Boston Symphony with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist. The program opens with Haydn's Symphony no. 83, followed by Mr. Eschenbach as soloist in Mozart's Piano concerto in F,K. 459. Following intermission, Mr. Schermerhorn conducts Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Suite no. 4 "Mozartiana," Op. 61.

The German-born Christoph Eschenbach made his Boston Symphony debut at the opening concert of the 1969 Tanglewood season.

COMPOSER . . . at Tanglewood on Friday, July 24 at 9 p.m., Aaron Copland will conduct a selection of his own works and a Busoni piece.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 23 1970

New England Newsclip

Next at Tanglewood

A schedule of Berkshire Festival performances at Tanglewood will be published on a weekly basis through the end of the season, Aug. 23. Concerts through next Sunday are given below.

TODAY — Michael Tilson Thomas conducting Haydn's Sym. 98; J. S. Bach's "Jauchzet Gott" Cantata (No. 51); Krenek's "Die Nachtigall," Bethany Beardslee, soloist; and Stravinsky's Pulcinella Suite. Shed, 2:30 p.m.

TUESDAY — Peter, Paul and Mary in Concert, Tanglewood Shed at 8 p.m.

FRIDAY — Weekend Prelude with Phyllis Curtin, soprano, 7 p.m., Shed. Aaron Copland conducts Fusoni's Rondo Arlecchinesco, his own Dance Panels and Clarinet Concerto, Gervase de Peyer, soloist; and Schubert's Sym. No. 5 Shed, 9 p.m.

SATURDAY — Jorge Mester conducting C. P. E. Bach's Sinfonia in D; Strauss' "Le bourgeois gentilhomme" suite; and Mozart's "Jupiter" Sym. (NO. 41). Shed, 8:30 p.m. Open rehearsal at 10:30 a.m.

SUNDAY — Kenneth Schermerhorn conducting Haydn's Sym. 83; Mozart's Piano Concerto in A, K. 414 with Christoph Eschenbach, soloist; Stravinsky's Concerto in D for orchestra; and Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 4, "Mozartina."

Phone (413) 637-1600 for tickets.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260

JUL 19 1970

New England Newsclip

Copland to conduct Berkshire program

NE

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS. — Conductor - Composer Aaron Copland conducts the opening concert of the fourth weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday at 9 p.m. in the Tanglewood Shed.

The program opens with Busoni's "Rondo Arlecchinesco," followed by Copland conducting two of his own pieces, "Dance Panels," and following intermission the Clarinet concerto, with soloist Gervase de Peyer. The program concludes with Schubert's Symphony No. 5.

AARON COPLAND

Copland was chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center for 25 years and is currently chairman emeritus. His 70th birthday (November 14) will be celebrated this summer on July 28 during the day - long festivities of Tanglewood-on-Parade. The day culminates at 8:30 p.m. with the Gala Concert, during which Copland conducts the Boston Symphony in his "Suite from the Tender Land," and Bernstein's "Candide Overture." He also conducts the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in Hindemith's "Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber."

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents soprano Phyllis Curtin, this summer's Granrud Artist - in-residence at Tanglewood. Miss Curtin sings Copland's "Twelve Poems by Emily Dickinson" and Faure's "Six Poems of Paul Verlaine."

Guest conductor Kenneth Schermerhorn rehearses the Boston Symphony with pianist Christoph Eschenback in the weekly Open Rehearsal, Saturday at 10:30 a.m.

Saturday, at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Jorge Mester conducts an all - orchestral program opening with the Symphony in D by C. P. E. Bach, followed by the Strauss Suite "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." The program closes with Mozart's Symphony No. 41. "Jupiter."

JORGE MESTER

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

JUL 18 1970 New England Newsclip

Fourth Weekend At Tanglewood

Conductor - Composer Aaron Copland conducts the opening concert of the fourth weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday evening, July 24 at 9 p.m. in the Tanglewood Shed. The program opens with Busoni's Rondo Arlecchinesco, followed by Mr. Copland conducting two of his own pieces, Dance Panels, and following intermission, the Clarinet concerto, with soloist Gervase de Peyer. The program concludes with Schubert's Symphony no. 5.

Mr. Copeland was Chairman of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center for 25 years and is currently Chairman Emeritus. His 70th birthday (November 14) will be celebrated this summer on Tuesday, July 28 during the day-long festivities of Tanglewood-on-Parade. The day culminates at 8:30 p.m. with the Gala Concert, during which Mr. Copland conducts the Boston Symphony in his Suite from the Tender Land, and Bernstein's Candide overture. He also conducts the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in Hindemith's Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday evening at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents Soprano Phyllis Curtin, this summer's Granrud Artist-in-residence at Tanglewood. Miss Curtin sings Copland's Twelve poems by Emily Dickinson and Faure's Six poems of Paul Verlaine. Admission to Weekend Prelude recitals is free to ticketholders of the 9p.m. Boston Symphony Concert.

Guest Conductor Kenneth Schermerhorn rehearses the Boston Symphony with pianist Christoph Eschenbach in the weekly Open Rehearsal, Saturday morning, July 25 at 10.30 a.m. Tickets for the Open Rehearsals are $2.50 and are on sale the morning of the rehearsal. The Rehearsal benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Saturday evening, July 25 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Jorge Mester conducts an all-orchestral program opening with the Symphony in D by C.P.E. Bach, followed by the Strauss Suite Le bourgeois gentilhomme. The program closes with Mozart's Symphony no. 41 'Jupiter.'

On Sunday, July 26 at 2:30 p.m. Kenneth Schermerhorn conducts the Boston Symphony with Christopher Eschenbach as soloist. The program opens with Haydn's Symphony no. 83, followed by Mr. Eschenbach as soloist in Mozart's Piano concerto in F.K. 459. Following intermission, Mr. Schermerhorn conducts Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Suite no. 4 'Mobartiana,' Op. 61.

The German-born Christopher Eschenbach made his Boston Symphony debut at the opening concert of the 1969 Tanglewood season. He has also appeared with the Cleveland, Toronto and the Chicago Symphony Orchestras.

Tickets for all Berkshire Festival Concerts are available at the Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts 01240. Please enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope with all mail orders. Tickets are also available from 250 TICKETRON locations within a radius of 500 miles of Tanglewood.

The third Contemporary Trends Concert at Tanglewood presented by Bill Graham's Fillmore East takes place Tuesday, July 21 at 6 p.m. Joe Cocker' John Sebastian, and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band headline the program. Tickets are on sale at the Tanglewood Festival Ticket Office.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

JUL 19 1970 New England Newsclip

Aaron Copland, noted American composer, who will conduct the Boston Symphony in a July 24 Tanglewood concert which includes some of his own works.

4th weekend at Tanglewood

The fourth weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts begins this Friday at 7 p.m. with a song recital by soprano Phyllis Curtin, this summer's Granrud artist-in-residence at Tanglewood. Her program includes Copland's "Twelve Poems by Emily Dickinson" and Faure's "Six Poems of Paul Verlaine."

Miss Curtin's recital is free to ticketholders of the Friday 9 p.m. concert, which features Aaron Copland conducting the Boston Symphony in Busoni's "Rondo Arlecchinesco," Schubert's Symphony No. 5, and two of his own works: "Dance Panels" and the Clarinet Concerto. Gervase de Peyer is the soloist.

Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Jorge Mester conducts the orchestra in K.P.E. Bach's Symphony in D, Strauss' "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" Suite and Mozart's Symphony No. 41.

Kenneth Schermerhorn conducts Sunday, July 26, at 2:30 p.m., opening with Haydn's Symphony No. 83 ("The Hen"). Pianist Christoph Eschenback appears as soloist in Mozart's Concerto in F, K. 459, and the program concludes with Stravinsky's Concerto in D and Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 4 ("Mozartiana").

The third Contemporary Trends Concert at Tanglewood takes place Tuesday, July 21, at 6 p.m., when Bill Graham's Fillmore East presents Chicago (Transit Authority), John Sebastian and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, July 19, 1970

Aaron Copland Conducts Friday

Aaron Copland, 69-year-old chairman emeritus of the Berkshire Music Center, will conduct the Boston Symphony in two of his works, "Dance Panels" and a clarinet concerto featuring Gervase de Peyer, this Friday evening at 9 in the Tanglewood Shed. Copland, whose 70th birthday will be celebrated as part of the Tanglewood-on-Parade festivities July 28, will also direct Busoni's "Rondo Arlecchinesco" and Schubert's Symphony No. 5.

Soprano Phyllis Curtin, currently in residence at Tanglewood, will do Copland's "Twelve Poems by Emily Dickinson" and Faure's "Six Poems of Paul Verlaine," for the weekend prelude at 7 p.m.

Strauss Suite

Jorge Mester will conduct the Bach Symphony in D, the Strauss suite "Le bourgeois gentilhomme" and Mozart's Symphony No. 41 ("Jupiter") for the Saturday performance, beginning at 8:30.

Pianist Christoph Eschenbach will be featured soloist for the Sunday afternoon concert at 2:30. Kenneth Schermerhorn will conduct the Sunday program of Haydn's Symphony No. 33 ("The Hen"), Mozart's Piano Concerto, K. 459, Stravinsky's Concerto in D and Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 4 ("Mozartiana").

Schermerhorn and Eschenbach will play with the orchestra during open rehearsal Saturday morning at 10:30.

COMING PROGRAMS AT TANGLEWOOD

Conductor-Composer Aaron Copland conducts the opening concert of the fourth weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday evening, July 24 at 9 p.m. in the Tanglewood Shed. The program opens with Busoni's "Rondo Arlecchinesco," followed by Mr. Copland conducting two of his own pieces, "Dance Panels," and following intermission, the Clarinet concerto, with soloist Gervase de Peyer. The program concludes with Schubert's Symphony no. 5.

Mr. Copland was Chairman of the Faculty of the Berkshire Music Center for 25 years and is currently Chairman Emeritus. His 70th birthday (November 14) will be celebrated this summer on Tuesday, July 28 during the day-long festivities of Tanglewood-on-Parade. The day culminates at 8:30 p.m. with the Gala Concert, during which Mr. Copland conducts the Boston Symphony in his "Suite from the Tender Land," and Bernstein's "Candide" overture. He also conducts the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in Hindemith's "Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber."

The Weekend Prelude, Friday evening at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents Soprano Phyllis Curtin, this summer's Granrud Artist-in-residence at Tanglewood. Miss Curtin sings Copland's "Twelve poems by Emily Dickinson" and Faure's "Six poems of Paul Verlaine." Admission to Weekend Prelude recitals is free to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Concert.

Guest Conductor Kenneth Schermerhorn rehearses the Boston Symphony with pianist Christoph Eschenbach in the weekly Open Rehearsal, Saturday morning, July 25 at 10:30 a.m. Tickets for the Open Rehearsals are $2.50 and are on sale the morning of the rehearsal.

Saturday evening, July 25 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Jorge Mester conducts an all-orchestral program opening with the Symphony in D by C.P.E. Bach, followed by the Strauss Suite "Le bourgeoi gentilhomme." The program closes with Mozart's Symphony no. 41, "Jupiter."

On Sunday, July 26 at 2:30 p.m. Kenneth Schermerhorn conducts the Boston Symphony with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist. The program opens with Haydn's Symphony no. 83, followed by Mr. Eschenbach as soloist in Mozart's Piano concerto in F,K. 459. Following intermission, Mr. Schermerhorn conducts Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Suite no. 4 "Mozartiana," Op. 61.

The German-born Christoph Eschenbach made his Boston Symphony debut at the opening concert of the 1969 Tanglewood season.

COMPOSER . . . at Tanglewood on Friday, July 24 at 9 p.m., Aaron Copland will conduct a selection of his own works and a Busoni piece.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 23 1970 New England Newsclip

Next at Tanglewood

A schedule of Berkshire Festival performances at Tanglewood will be published on a weekly basis through the end of the season, Aug. 23. Concerts through next Sunday are given below.

TODAY — Michael Tilson Thomas conducting Haydn's Sym. 98; J. S. Bach's "Jauchzet Gott" Cantata (No. 51); Krenek's "Die Nachtigall," Bethany Beardslee, soloist; and Stravinsky's Pulcinella Suite. Shed, 2:30 p.m.

TUESDAY — Peter, Paul and Mary in Concert, Tanglewood Shed at 8 p.m.

FRIDAY — Weekend Prelude with Phyllis Curtin, soprano, 7 p.m., Shed. Aaron Copland conducts Fusoni's Rondo Arlecchinesco, his own Dance Panels and Clarinet Concerto, Gervase de Peyer, soloist; and Schubert's Sym. No. 5 Shed, 9 p.m.

SATURDAY — Jorge Mester conducting C. P. E. Bach's Sinfonia in D; Strauss' "Le bourgeois gentilhomme" suite; and Mozart's "Jupiter" Sym. (NO. 41). Shed, 8:30 p.m. Open rehearsal at 10:30 a.m.

SUNDAY — Kenneth Schermerhorn conducting Haydn's Sym. 33; Mozart's Piano Concerto in A, K. 414 with Christoph Eschenbach, soloist; Stravinsky's Concerto in D for orchestra; and Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 4, "Mozartina."

Phone (413) 637-1600 for tickets.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 135,232
(E) 8,250

JUL 19 1970 New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — Conductor - Composer Aaron Copland conducts the opening concert of the fourth weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday at 9 p. m. in the Tanglewood Shed. The program opens with Busoni's Rondo Arlecchinesco, followed by Copland conducting two of his own pieces, Dance Panels, and following intermission, the Clarinet concerto with soloist Gervase de Peyer. The program concludes with Schubert's Symphony No. 5.

Birthday Celebration

Copland was chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center for 25 years and is currently chairman emeritus. His 70th birthday (Nov. 14) will be celebrated this summer on Tuesday, July 28 during the day - long festivities of Tanglewood - on - Parade. The day culminates at 8.30 p. m. with the gala concert, during which Copland conducts the Boston Symphony in his "Suite from the Tender Land," and Bernstein's "Candide" overture. He also conducts the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in Hindemith's Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber.

* * *

The Weekend Prelude, Friday evening at 7 in the Shed, presents Soprano Phyllis Curtin this summer's Granrud Artist - in - residence at Tanglewood. Miss Curtin sings Copland's Twelve poems by Emily Dickinson and Faure's Six poems of Paul Verlaine.

* * *

Guest Conductor Kenneth Schermerhorn rehearses the Boston Symphony with pianist Christoph Eschenbach in the weekly open rehearsal, Saturday, at 10.30 a. m.

Saturday evening, at 8.30 in the Shed, Jorge Mester conducts an all - orchestral program opening with the Symphony in D by C. P. E. Bach, followed by the Strauss Suite Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme. The program closes with Mozart's Symphony No. 41, "Jupiter."

Next Sunday at 2.30 p. m. Kenneth Schermerhorn conducts the Boston Symphony with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist. The program opens with Haydn's Symphony No. 83, followed by Eschenbach as soloist in Mozart's Piano concerto in F. K. 459. Following intermission, Schermerhorn conducts Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 4 "Mozartiana," Op. 61.

The German - born Christoph Eschenbach made his Boston Symphony debut at the opening concert of the 1969 Tanglewood season. He has also appeared with the Cleveland, Toronto and the Chicago Symphony Orchestras.

* * *

The third Contemporary Trends Concert at Tanglewood presented by Bill Graham's Fillmore East takes place Tuesday at 6 p. m. Joe Cocker, John Sebastian, and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band headline the program.

FOURTH WEEKEND
BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL CONCERTS
Friday
7 P. m. Shed
Weekend Prelude
PHYLLIS CURTIN soprano
Songs of Faure and Copland
* * *
9 P. m. Shed
AARON COPLAND conductor
GERVASE DE PEYER clarinetist
Busoni: Rondo Arlecchinesco
Copland: Dance Panels
Copland: Clarinet concerto
Schubert: Symphony no. 5
Saturday
10.30 A. m. Shed
Boston Symphony Orchestra — Open Rehearsal
* * *
8.30 P.m., Shed
JORGE MESTER conductor
C. P. E. Bach: Symphony in D
Strauss: Suite "Le bourgeois gentilhomme"
Mozart: Symphony no. 41 "Jupiter"
day
2.30 P. m. Shed
KENNETH SCHERMERHORN conductor
CHRISTOPH ESCHENBACH pianist
Haydn: Symphony no. 83 "The Hen"
Mozart: Piano concerto K. 459
Stravinsky: Concerto in D
Tchaikovsky: Suite no. 4 "Mozartiana"

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

JUL 19 1970

New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood on Friday, July 24 at 9 p.m., Aaron Copland will conduct a selection of his own works and a Busoni piece. Mr. Copland's compositions were first heard in the United States at a League on Composers in concerts in 1924. He studied in Paris and returned to be the first composer to win a Guggenheim Fellowship.

AARON COPLAND

JORGE MESTER

K. SCHERMERHORN

CHRISTOPH ESCHENBACH

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

JUL 19 1970

New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 18 1970

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

Phyllis Curtin will sing Copland's "Twelve Poems by Emily Dickinson"

Aaron Copland To Conduct

Conductor-composer Aaron Copland will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the opening concert of the fourth weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival on Friday evening, July 24 at 9, in the Tanglewood Shed.

First on the program is Busoni's "Rondo Arlecchinesco," followed by Mr. Copland conducting two of his own pieces, "Dance Panels" and, following intermission, the clarinet concerto with soloist Gervase de Peyer. The concert concludes with Schubert's Symphony No. 5.

Mr. Copland was chairman of the Berkshire Music Center faculty for 25 years. His 70th birthday will be celebrated Tuesday, July 28, during the day-long festivities of Tanglewood on Parade. The day culminates at 8:30 with the gala concert, at which Mr. Copland will conduct the Boston Symphony in his suite from "The Tender Land" and Bernstein's "Candide" overture. He also will direct the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in Hindemith's "Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber."

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 in the Shed, presents soprano Phyllis Curtin, this summer's Granrud artist-in-residence at Tanglewood. Miss Curtil will sing Copland's "Twelve Poems by Emily Dickinson" and Faure's "Six Poems of Paul Verlaine." Admission to Prelude recitals is free to ticketholders of the 9 o'clock concert.

Guest conductor Kenneth Schermerhorn will rehearse the Boston Symphony with pianist Christoph Eschenbach in the weekly open rehearsal Saturday, July 25 at 10:30 a.m.

At 8:30 Jorge Mester will conduct an all-orchestral program, opening with the symphony in D by C.P.E. Bach, followed by the Strauss suite "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme." The program will end with Mozart's Symphony No. 41, "Jupiter."

At 2:30 on Sunday, July 26, Mr. Schermerhorn will lead the program which will open with Haydn's Symphony No. 83. Mr. Eschenbach will perform as soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in F, K. 459. Stravinsky's Concerto in D for String Orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 4, "Mozartiana," Op. 61, will follow intermission.

German-born Mr. Eschenbach made his Boston Symphony debut at the opening concert of the 1969 Tanglewood season. He has also appeared with the Cleveland, Toronto and the Chicago symphony orchestras.

The third Contemporary Trends concert, presented by Bill Graham's Fillmore East, takes place Tuesday, July 21, at 6 p.m. Joe Cocker, John Sebastian and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band headline the program. Tickets are on sale at the Festival ticket office as well as at the Fillmore Box Office, 105 Second Ave., New York.

ITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

YRACUSE HERALD JOURNAL
Wednesday, July 22, 1970
SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

JUL 19 1970

New England Newsclip

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

JUL 19 1970

New England Newsclip

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 35,055

JUL 18 1970

New England Newsclip

AMHERST RECORD
AMHERST, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,342

JUL 22 1970

New England Newsclip

Copland, Mester, Schermerhorn at Tanglewood Shed

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — Conductor - Composer Aaron Copland conducts the opening concert of the fourth week end of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday, July 24 at 9 p.m. in the Tanglewood Shed.

The program opens with Busoni's "Rondo Arlecchinesco," followed by Mr. Copland conducing two of his own pieces, "Dance Panels," and following intermission, the Clarinet concerto, with soloist Gervase de Peyer. The program concludes with Schubert's Symphony No. 5.

Copland was chairman of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center for 25 years and is chairman emeritus. His 70th birthday (November 14) will be celebrated this summer on July 28 during the day-long festivities of Tanglewood - on - Parade.

The day culminates at 8:30 p.m. with the Gala Concert, during which Mr. Copland conducts the Boston Symphony in his "Suite from the Tender Land," and Bernstein's "Candide" overture. He also conducts the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in Hindemith's "Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber."

The Weekend Prelude, Friday evening at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents Soprano Phyllis Curtin, this summer's Granrud artist - in - residence at Tanglewood. Miss Curtin sings Copland's "Twelve Poems" by Emily Dickinson and Faure's "Six Poems of Paul Verlaine." Admission to Weekend Prelude recitals is free to ticket holders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony Concert.

Guest Conductor Kenneth Schermerhorn rehearses the Boston Symphony with pianist Christoph Eschenbach in the weekly Open Rehearsal, Saturday morning, July 25 at 10:30. Tickets for the Open Rehearsals are on sale the morning of the rehearsal. The rehearsal benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Saturday evening, July 25 at 8:30 in the Shed, Jorge Mester conducts an all-orchestral program opening with the Symphony in D by C.P.E. Bach, followed by the Strauss Suite "Le bourgeois gentilhomme." The program closes with Mozart's Symphony No. 41 "Jupiter."

On Sunday, July 26 at 2:30 p.m., Kenneth Schermerhorn conducts the Boston Symphony with Christoph Eschenbach as soloist. The program opens with Haydn's Symphony No. 83, followed by Mr. Eschenbach as soloist in Mozart's Piano concerto in F. K. 459. Following intermission, Schermerhorn conduct Stravinsky's Concerto in D for string orchestra and Tchaikovsky's Suite no. 4 "Mozartiana," Op. 61.

Tickets for all Berkshire Festival Concerts are available at the Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts 01240. Please enclose a stamped, self - addressed envelope with all mail orders. Tickets are also available from 250 within a radius of 500 miles of Tanglewood.

The third Contemporary Trends Concert at Tanglewood presented by Bill Graham's Fillmore East takes place Tuesday, July 21 at 6 p.m. Joe Cocker, John Sebastian, and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band headline the program. Tickets are on sale at the Tanglewood Festival Ticket Office as well as at the Fillmore Box Office, 105 Second Avenue, New York, New York.

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 129,656

JUL 22 1970

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

JUL 22 1970

New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD TALENT. Kenneth Schermerhorn, left, will conduct works by Haydn and Mozart and Christoph Eschenbach, pianist, will play Mozart's Piano Concerto at Sunday's Boston Symphony concert at 2:30 p.m. in the Music Shed of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Schermerhorn is conductor of the Milwaukee Symphony.

Chamber Music at Tanglewood

BHT 8-4

By HERBERT ALPERT
HT Contributing Music Critic

LENOX—Weekend events at Tanglewood got underway last Friday evening with a "prelude" concert of Beethoven chamber music: the Variations, Op. 121 A, and the Piano Trio in E-flat, Op. 70, No. 2, played by violinist Joseph Silverstein, cellist Jules Eskin and pianist Richard Goode. The performances were organically thought out, reserved and tasteful, and there was a particularly lovely lyric climax with a svelte violin sound in the first allegretto of the four-movement Op. 70. Unfortunately, the string duo was occasionally overwhelmed by the songful but somewhat domineering piano.

OTHER EVENTS of the weekend were partially covered in this writer's Monday Herald Traveler article, which described commemorative activities at Tanglewood in honor of George Szell and John Barbirolli. Unmentioned in that report was William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony's lovely performance Friday night of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, with the horns and clarinet on a particularly mellifluous wave length. Also, the same artists' Saturday performance of the same composer's Fourth Symphony, which had an especially elegant trio in the third movement.

In all these works, as also with the "Leonore" No. 3 and "Coriolan" overtures, Steinberg's tempos were carefully adjusted to the architecture, yet somehow seemed a bit brighter than we are used to hearing from him.

ANTAL DORATI'S Sunday performances of the Seventh Symphony and "Egmont" Overture were brisk, spirited and dynamic, if a bit inconsistent with most concepts of the music. In the Seventh, woodwinds were doubled and the last movement sounded almost like a march.

The keyboard artist in Sunday's program was Vladimir Ashkenazy, who played Beethoven's great Lyrical masterpiece, the Piano Concerto No. 3. Romanticism flowed from Ashkenazy's consummate pianism but, unfortunately, this listener felt a lack of architectural tension and cohesion. Whether this was due to some conflict of concept and rubato with the conductor, it is hard to know. In any event, 10,688 people seemed to love it on this pleasant day at Tanglewood.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
AUG 1 1970
New England Newsclip

Piano Trio Prelude Is Sweet, Dulcet

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The piano trio of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Chamber Players gave a really beautiful bit of Beethoven to the 7 p. m. prelude audience Friday at Tanglewood.

Mellowing Effect

It played the Great Man's Piano Trio in E Flat, Opus 70, No. 2, and the Variations for Piano, Violin and Cello on Wenzel Muller's song, "I am the Tailor Kakadu," Opus 121A.

The air was heavy with humidity, which may have had a mellowing effect on the tones, because the music was unusually dulcet and sweet.

Joseph Silverstein, violinist, and Jules Eskin, cellist, ordinarily play without hard edges or forcefulness on their notes. This time even the piano sounded round, although there were times when Richard Goode bore down a bit too heavy to retain the best balance with the lighter strings.

The music was full of the delicate niceties and sudden thrusts of power that make for the best of Beethoven, however, and for the best of chamber music's special appeal.

The Boston Orchestra's Chamber Players, already first-class large-ensemble musicians when the smaller group was organized in 1964, have become equally artistic with music's smaller ensembles.

They played Friday as if they had international reputations of the highest level to protect, and they do. They attracted more than 2000 early listeners.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 3 1970
New England Newsclip

The Magnificence of Steinberg

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

WILLIAM STEINBERG, the musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his first appearance of the Tanglewood season for the first two of this past weekend's trio of concerts and raised the standards of performance and excitement to levels not approached by any of the preceding programs.

To celebrate the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's birth the whole weekend (as well as the one coming a fortnight ahead) was devoted to the music of the Bonn master. It was eminently fitting and proper that a master be assigned the task of conveying the works of one of music's greatests. Steinberg was majestic.

* * *

THE FRIDAY night program was hastily altered to include a tribute to the memory of two eminent conductors, both of whom have been guests of the Boston orchestra in other years and who had died within the immediate days preceding the first weekend concert. Sir John Barbirolli and George Szell, 70 and 73 respectively, among many other individual responsibilities, had been conductors in Manchester, England, and in Cleveland for the final posts of their careers.

Steinberg dedicated the Marcia Funebre from the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony to their memory and a note on the program insertion asked the audience not to applaud at the end of the movement. Never has the effectiveness of that movement been more eloquent, never has the orchestra sounded more resonant, the doleful cortege more spacious.

It was a portent of what the rest of the evening and the Saturday night program would impart. Steinberg indirectly paid his musicians the greatest respect by allowing them to play without indicating every last detail. The result was a revelation of what conducting of the highest intelligence and experience and good taste can produce. His gestures were minimal, reminding those who could recall the manner of Pierre Monteux, but the effects were magnificent. The players rose to the occasion and played with a unanimity of freedom and release which less able conductors do not allow. The greatness of Beethoven was revived and fortified without deviation.

* * *

THE PLAN of the programs was to play an overture, a symphony and a piano concerto. The third program yesterday afternoon was conducted by a guest, Antal Dorati. All three concerts had brilliant soloists.

The Beethoven piano concerti are far from carbon copies of an original. Thus, Claude Frank Friday night in the B Flat Opus 19, the second concerto, gave it the proper rollicking (almost nonchalance) it invites. His technic, as was that of his colleagues on the succeeding programs, was so super-abundant that one was never aware that difficulties existed at any point. Andre Watts on Saturday night, in the G Major, Opus 58, the Fourth, had a more melodramatic role and fulfilled its demands on that score with tremendous impressiveness. Yesterday afternoon Vladimir Ashkenazy played the Third, C Minor, Opus 37, and again the beauties were exposed with luster where proper and with understatement where it was just and personally befitting.

Steinberg in his accompaniment and in his direction of the orchestral works was magnetic. The glories of the "Leonore" overture, No. 3, and the 8th Symphony Friday night and of the Coriolan overture and the 4th Symphony Saturday were conveyed with a graphicness and vividness within well-planned symmetry that disclosed many of the facets which less penetrating insight obfuscates. It was deeply gratifying to see that music-making was the prime and only purpose of the conductor and that display of knowledge and dramatization of emotion were no part of the harlequinade on a podium.

* * *

A COMBINATION of favorable factors — the concentration on Beethoven possibly, the initial appearance of the season of the orchestra's musical director and the best of all weather — produced record audiences for all three concerts: 6,135 Friday; 9,117 Saturday and 10,688 for Dorati's concert yesterday afternoon, bringing the week's total with the Saturday morning rehearsal to 29,482.

* * *

DORATI PLAYED the overture to "Egmont" and the 7th Symphony, Opus 92, in A. The Beethoven overtures belie their designations. They are far more than curtain raisers in this connotation. They are total, concise, intense books in all three examples heard this weekend: Poignant thematic material leads up to powerful utterances, each according to the nature of the plot affording the widest possible range of colors and expression. Steinberg's achievement in these as in the comparably more extended symphonic movements were marvels of disciplined enunciation and contoured balance.

Dorati might have evinced more pity when he chopped off poor Egmont's head. It was all of a piece that Beethoven should show disdain for Napoleon's assumption of pomp and glitter and revulsion for the Duke of Alba's intolerance of Egmont's championing of the common people.

Goethe's play was fresh in the minds of literary Europe when Beethoven was invited to write incidential music for it. What Goethe urged the mob to cry: "Freiheit, Sicherheit" (Freedom, Security), was not far different from what today's populace the world over seeks and battles for.

Whitestone

Conductor William Steinberg and soloist Andre Watts exchange encomiums.

Music: Steinberg At Tanglewood

BHT-8-3

By HERBERT ALPER
HT Contributing Music Critic

TANGLEWOOD — William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted two concerts at Tanglewood Friday and Saturday nights, under dramatic and sad circumstances. His friends and colleagues, George Szell and Sir John Barbirolli, had died within the week. He dedicated the all-Beethoven weekend program to them.

He opened with the March Funebre" from the 'Eroica' Symphony in memoriam and issued a statement on the death of George Szell, conductor and builder of the world-respected Cleveland Symphony. Steinberg honored Szell's musical integrity and his representation of the classics as an exemplary expression in our times.

THE PERFORMANCE of this unscheduled second movement of the Third Symphony was a moving event. Without pathos, it said sensitively, beautifully, accurately and dramatically that a good orchestra can be charged to great waves of communication and musical meaning. It was a reminder of the need for great conducting in this repertoire — a pertinent memorial to the honored men.

Claude Frank's performance of the Piano Concerto No. 2 was sunny, fresh and scintillating. This early Beethoven works beautifully on its own level as a joyous, uncluttered song with simple replies and support from the orchestra. Steinberg respected this balance and yet maintained delicate, stylistic dynamics and phrase shapes. With this underpinning, Frank was free to play with a clear, singing musical line.

Andre Watts, the pianist Saturday night, gave a stunning performance of the Concerto No. 4. In this work, soloist and orchestra are bound in several ways — now supporting, now opposing each other. The scope of the work, however, is considerably larger than the usual chamber music opus. It sometimes gets dull performances, drowned in overorganized intents. Watts stayed loose and carried the audience through the musical maze with poetry and emotion.

Beethoven's own first movement cadenza had a particularly memorable performance. Steinberg's support was again insightful and judicious.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754
AUG 2 1970
New England Newsclip

Conductors Honored at Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — There was great sadness in the air Friday night as the concert began at Tanglewood.

William Steinberg, music director, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a tribute to the Sir John Barbirolli and George Szell, conductors, who died Tuesday and Thursday.

He rearranged the program in order to start it with the second movement (funeral) from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Barbirolli, 78, and Szell, 73, were Steinberg's contemporaries and were highly respected by him and by members of the orchestra.

It was an unusually effective performance — profound. The audience was asked not to applaud.

Then the piano was wheeled out for what turned out to be a performance of nearly equal effectiveness, though of lesser emotional impact because of the lesser substance of the music: Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 2 (the first in order of composition).

Claude Frank was the soloist. He is one of my favorite Mozart pianists, and since Beethoven was still imitating that earlier master when he wrote this concerto, there is good reason for Frank's special affinity for its style.

He played with Mozartean polish and Beethovian bravura, and Steinberg moulded the orchestral sound with a benevolent frown. It was a combination of brilliance.

BHT 8-4

Chamber Music at Tanglewood

By HERBERT ALPERT
HT Contributing Music Critic

LENOX—Weekend events at Tanglewood got underway last Friday evening with a "prelude" concert of Beethoven chamber music: the Variations, Op. 121 A, and the Piano Trio in E-flat, Op. 70, No. 2, played by violinist Joseph Silverstein, cellist Jules Eskin and pianist Richard Goode. The performances were organically thought out, reserved and tasteful, and there was a particularly lovely lyric climax with a svelte violin sound in the first allegretto of the four-movement Op. 70. Unfortunately, the string duo was occasionally overwhelmed by the songful but somewhat domineering piano.

OTHER EVENTS of the weekend were partially covered in this writer's Monday Herald Traveler article, which described commemorative activities at Tanglewood in honor of George Szell and John Barbirolli. Unmentioned in that report was William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony's lovely performance Friday night of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, with the horns and clarinet on a particularly mellifluous wave length. Also, the same artists' Saturday performance of the same composer's Fourth Symphony, which had an especially elegant trio in the third movement.

In all these works, as also with the "Leonore" No. 3 and "Coriolan" overtures, Steinberg's tempos were carefully adjusted to the architecture, yet somehow seemed a bit brighter than we are used to hearing from him.

ANTAL DORATI'S Sunday performances of the Seventh Symphony and "Egmont" Overture were brisk, spirited and dynamic, if a bit inconsistent with most concepts of the music. In the Seventh, woodwinds were doubled and the last movement sounded almost like a march.

The keyboard artist in Sunday's program was Vladimir Ashkenazy, who played Beethoven's great Lyrical masterpiece, the Piano Concerto No. 3. Romanticism flowed from Ashkenazy's consummate pianism but, unfortunately, this listener felt a lack of architectural tension and cohesion. Whether this was due to some conflict of concept and rubato with the conductor, it is hard to know. In any event, 10,688 people seemed to love it on this pleasant day at Tanglewood.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
AUG 1 1970
New England Newsclip

Piano Trio Prelude Is Sweet, Dulcet

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The piano trio of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Chamber Players gave a really beautiful bit of Beethoven to the 7 p. m. prelude audience Friday at Tanglewood.

Mellowing Effect

It played the Great Man's Piano Trio in E Flat, Opus 70, No. 2, and the Variations for Piano, Violin and Cello on Wenzel Muller's song, "I am the Tailor Kakadu," Opus 121A.

The air was heavy with humidity, which may have had a mellowing effect on the tones, because the music was unusually dulcet and sweet.

Joseph Silverstein, violinist, and Jules Eskin, cellist, ordinarily play without hard edges or forcefulness on their notes. This time even the piano sounded round, although there were times when Richard Goode bore down a bit too heavy to retain the best balance with the lighter strings.

The music was full of the delicate niceties and sudden thrusts of power that make for the best of Beethoven, however, and for the best of chamber music's special appeal.

The Boston Orchestra's Chamber Players, already first-class large-ensemble musicians when the smaller group was organized in 1964, have become equally artistic with music's smaller ensembles.

They played Friday as if they had international reputations of the highest level to protect, and they do. They attracted more than 2000 early listeners.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 3 1970
New England Newsclip

The Magnificence of Steinberg

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

WILLIAM STEINBERG, the musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made his first appearance of the Tanglewood season for the first two of this past weekend's trio of concerts and raised the standards of performance and excitement to levels not approached by any of the preceding programs.

To celebrate the 200th anniversary of Beethoven's birth the whole weekend (as well as the one coming a fortnight ahead) was devoted to the music of the Bonn master. It was eminently fitting and proper that a master be assigned the task of conveying the works of one of music's greatests. Steinberg was majestic.

* * *

THE FRIDAY night program was hastily altered to include a tribute to the memory of two eminent conductors, both of whom have been guests of the Boston orchestra in other years and who had died within the immediate days preceding the first weekend concert. Sir John Barbirolli and George Szell, 70 and 73 respectively, among many other individual responsibilities, had been conductors in Manchester, England, and in Cleveland for the final posts of their careers.

Steinberg dedicated the Marcia Funebre from the Beethoven "Eroica" symphony to their memory and a note on the program insertion asked the audience not to applaud at the end of the movement. Never has the effectiveness of that movement been more eloquent, never has the orchestra sounded more resonant, the doleful cortege more spacious.

It was a portent of what the rest of the evening and the Saturday night program would impart. Steinberg indirectly paid his musicians the greatest respect by allowing them to play without indicating every last detail. The result was a revelation of what conducting of the highest intelligence and experience and good taste can produce. His gestures were minimal, reminding those who could recall the manner of Pierre Monteux, but the effects were magnificent. The players rose to the occasion and played with a unanimity of freedom and release which less able conductors do not allow. The greatness of Beethoven was revived and fortified without deviation.

Whitestone

Conductor William Steinberg and soloist Andre Watts exchange encomiums.

* * *

THE PLAN of the programs was to play an overture, a symphony and a piano concerto. The third program yesterday afternoon was conducted by a guest, Antal Dorati. All three concerts had brilliant soloists.

The Beethoven piano concerti are far from carbon copies of an original. Thus, Claude Frank Friday night in the B Flat Opus 19, the second concerto, gave it the proper rollicking (almost nonchalance) it invites. His technic, as was that of his colleagues on the succeeding programs, was so super-abundant that one was never aware that difficulties existed at any point. Andre Watts on Saturday night, in the G Major, Opus 58, the Fourth, had a more melodramatic role and fulfilled its demands on that score with tremendous impressiveness. Yesterday afternoon Vladimir Ashkenazy played the Third, C Minor, Opus 37, and again the beauties were exposed with luster where proper and with understatement where it was just and personally befitting.

Steinberg in his accompaniment and in his direction of the orchestral works was magnetic. The glories of the "Leonore" overture, No. 3, and the 8th Symphony Friday night and of the Coriolan overture and the 4th Symphony Saturday were conveyed with a graphicness and vividness within well-planned symmetry that disclosed many of the facets which less penetrating insight obfuscates. It was deeply gratifying to see that music-making was the prime and only purpose of the conductor and that display of knowledge and dramatization of emotion were no part of the harlequinade on a podium.

* * *

A COMBINATION of favorable factors — the concentration on Beethoven possibly, the initial appearance of the season of the orchestra's musical director and the best of all weather — produced record audiences for all three concerts: 6,135 Friday; 9,117 Saturday and 10,688 for Dorati's concert yesterday afternoon, bringing the week's total with the Saturday morning rehearsal to 29,482.

* * *

DORATI PLAYED the overture to "Egmont" and the 7th Symphony, Opus 92, in A. The Beethoven overtures belie their designations. They are far more than curtain raisers in this connotation. They are total, concise, intense books in all three examples heard this weekend: Poignant thematic material leads up to powerful utterances, each according to the nature of the plot affording the widest possible range of colors and expression. Steinberg's achievement in these as in the comparably more extended symphonic movements were marvels of disciplined enunciation and contoured balance.

Dorati might have evinced more pity when he chopped off poor Egmont's head. It was all of a piece that Beethoven should show disdain for Napoleon's assumption of pomp and glitter and revulsion for the Duke of Alba's intolerance of Egmont's championing of the common people.

Goethe's play was fresh in the minds of literary Europe when Beethoven was invited to write incidential music for it. What Goethe urged the mob to cry: "Freiheit, Sicherheit" (Freedom, Security), was not far different from what today's populace the world over seeks and battles for.

Music: Steinberg At Tanglewood

B H T - 8-3

By HERBERT ALPER
HT Contributing Music Critic

TANGLEWOOD — William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted two concerts at Tanglewood Friday and Saturday nights, under dramatic and sad circumstances. His friends and colleagues, George Szell and Sir John Barbirolli, had died within the week. He dedicated the all-Beethoven weekend program to them.

He opened with the March Funebre" from the 'Eroica' Symphony in memoriam and issued a statement on the death of George Szell, conductor and builder of the world-respected Cleveland Symphony. Steinberg honored Szell's musical integrity and his representation of the classics as an exemplary expression in our times.

THE PERFORMANCE of this unscheduled second movement of the Third Symphony was a moving event. Without pathos, it said sensitively, beautifully, accurately and dramatically that a good orchestra can be charged to great waves of communication and musical meaning. It was a reminder of the need for great conducting in this repertoire — a pertinent memorial to the honored men.

Claude Frank's performance of the Piano Concerto No. 2 was sunny, fresh and scintillating. This early Beethoven works beautifully on its own level as a joyous, uncluttered song with simple replies and support from the orchestra. Steinberg respected this balance and yet maintained delicate, stylistic dynamics and phrase shapes. With this underpinning, Frank was free to play with a clear, singing musical line.

Andre Watts, the pianist Saturday night, gave a stunning performance of the Concerto No. 4. In this work, soloist and orchestra are bound in several ways — now supporting, now opposing each other. The scope of the work, however, is considerably larger than the usual chamber music opus. It sometimes gets dull performances, drowned in overorganized intents. Watts stayed loose and carried the audience through the musical maze with poetry and emotion.

Beethoven's own first movement cadenza had a particularly memorable performance. Steinberg's support was again insightful and judicious.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754
AUG 2 1970
New England Newsclip

Conductors Honored at Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — There was great sadness in the air Friday night as the concert began at Tanglewood.

William Steinberg, music director, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a tribute to the Sir John Barbirolli and George Szell, conductors, who died Tuesday and Thursday.

He rearranged the program in order to start it with the second movement (funeral) from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Barbirolli, 78, and Szell, 73, were Steinberg's contemporaries and were highly respected by him and by members of the orchestra.

It was an unusually effective performance — profound. The audience was asked not to applaud.

Then the piano was wheeled out for what turned out to be a performance of nearly equal effectiveness, though of lesser emotional impact because of the lesser substance of the music: Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 2 (the first in order of composition).

Claude Frank was the soloist. He is one of my favorite Mozart pianists, and since Beethoven was still imitating that earlier master when he wrote this concerto, there is good reason for Frank's special affinity for its style.

He played with Mozartean polish and Beethovian bravura, and Steinberg moulded the orchestral sound with a benevolent frown. It was a combination of brilliance.

Andre Watts Outstanding In Fourth Piano Concerto

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,751
AUG 2 1970 New England Newsclip

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX —The gentle side of Beethoven had the full attention of William Steinberg, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Andre Watts and 9117 rapt listeners at Tanglewood Saturday night.

Contrasting Works

As the great master, whose 200th birthday is being celebrated this year, characteristically put strongly contrasting virile and gentle phrases into his music, so also his major works seem to fall into virile or gentle groups.

All three of the works played Saturday were written about the same time, 1805-7, but two of them are safely classified as placid and serene with only enough virility to make their serenity more noticeable.

Andre Watts is a gentle fellow and he can play the piano with great gentleness and sensitivity; so his appearance with the orchestra to play the Concerto No. 4 made a good match. The other gentle work on the program was Symphony No. 4.

The program opener, the Overture to "Coriolan," Opus 62, is a short piece with plenty of the sudden, full-chord thrusts and satisfying thumps that exhibit Beethoven's virile side.

The opening phrases, especially, are powerful, muscular gestures, and the following deep-throated sonority was almost palpable Saturday.

But the evening belonged to Watts and the Fourth Concerto. It is easily the most eloquently lyrical of the five Beethoven piano concertos, a beautifully balanced work with several gracefully lucid melodies embedded in the glittering filigree of rapid runs and trills.

Watts' technical facility is without question equal to the virtuosic demands of the score, of course; more important, his expressiveness was exceedingly expressive Saturday.

His audience insisted on applauding him after the first movement until he stood to bow and smile, and when the concerto was finished they kept him coming back on stage for bows for eight minutes, nearly as long as Leonard Bernstein's audience had applauded him July 5.

The short, middle (slow) movement was pure poetry. The air was hot and humid after a day of rain, but the listeners sat transfixed until the tranquil music moved without pause into the joyful last movement.

The concerto is a popular one at Tanglewood; it was played here in 1965 by Rudolf Serkin and in 1967 and 1969 by Malcolm Frager. I don't recall hearing it more happily than I did Saturday, although Serkin and Frager offered it, if memory serves, with a bit wider dynamic scope.

The fourth symphony, which followed intermission, is also a gentle and sunny piece, full of airy humor as well as tenderness.

The orchestra played it superbly. It has taken only two performances with their four rehearsals for Steinberg to restore the tight precision of ensembel unity which had begun to show signs of erosion under the direction of Seiji Ozawa.

This afternoon Antal Dorati will conduct the orchestra in the third of the weekend's all-Beethoven programs. On the agenda are the Egmont Overture, the Piano Concerto No. 3 with Vladimir Ashkenazy as soloist and Symphony No. 7.

Tonight the orchestra's concertmaster, Joseph Silverstein, will conduct the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra in a performance of music by Berlioz, Beethoven (Symphony No. 6) and Dvorak (Symphony No. 2).

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
AUG 4 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Beethoven show/a review

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377
AUG 3 1970 New England Newsclip

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — It was all Beethoven at Tanglewood this past weekend, and there was an interesting lot of pianists, Richard Goode, Claude Frank, Andre Watts, and Vladimir Ashkenazy, to list them in the order of their appearance.

Goode was at one time pianist for the Boston Symphony Chamber Players, and he returned to that function Friday evening when, for the Weekend Prelude preceding the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, he joined violinist Joseph Silverstein and cellist Jules Eskin in Beethoven's Variations on a "Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu" and the great, constantly surprising Trio in E flat, opus 70 number 2.

There was an enlivening point-to-point awareness and wit about the playing, and I wished only that I could have heard it in a place less vast and more suited both to the music itself and to the delicately refined style of performance.

Later that evening, Claude Frank was soloist with the Boston Symphony in the Concerto Number 2 in B flat, which he played with his characteristic exuberance and intelligence in the quick movements, and a certain slight prosiness in the adagio that surprised me a bit. The concert was the occasion for the first appearance since January of the orchestra's music director, William Steinberg, who, both in the concerto and the "Eroica" funeral march, played in memory of Sir John Barbirolli and George Szell, seemed tired and only intermittently fully with it and in control.

Steinberg made a very distant impression at Saturday's concert, in which the "coriolian" overture and the frameworks he provided for Andre Watts' playing of the concerto Number 4 in G, were really conducted, shaped, and most of the time very much alive. In the G major concerto, which is both Beethoven's most poetic and most brilliant, Watts did some lovely playing, both a bit too prophetic and a bit too casual at times, with the second movement really impossibly slow, but always musical, always interesting, and pianistically superb.

Vladimir Ashkenazy was the soloist Sunday afternoon, and his concerto was the third in C minor. He was warmly applauded by the Berkshire Festival's largest symphony audience so far this summer (10,688), but I found the performance on the whole perplexing. There were moments, particularly in the Largo and toward the end of the finale, when one could perceive how remarkably sensitive and brilliantly vivacious a player Ashkenazy can be; more often though, he seemed to be trying for a massive, spacious performance style that is essentially alien to him, to say nothing of what it does to Beethoven to reduce one of his fiery allegros to a slightly sentimental adante con moto.

From the occasional forward spurts in the outer movements, I got the impression that Ashkenazy himself was not completely convinced by what he was hearing. It also seemed to me that the slow pace might have been made workable with a conductor like Klemperer to fill in the enormous spaces it defined, but Antal Dorati simply lay across the performance like too many blankets. The reading of the "Egmont" overture with which Dorati began yesterday's concert was all downbeats.

The rest of the weekend repertory included the third, fourth and eighth symphonies, the "Leonore" overture (Steinberg) and the seventh symphony (Dorati). The second installment of the Berkshire Festival's birthday party for Beethoven will be proffered on the weekend of 14-16 in August, with Claude Frank playing piano sonatas, with Rudolf Firkusny and Gerome Lowenthal as soloist in the remaining piano concertos, William Steinberg and Max Rudolf conducting, and the programs to include a performance of the Ninth Symphony (in memory of the Huntley-Brinkley show).

THE WEEKEND AT TANGLEWOOD

Three Pianists and Three Concerti

By Diane Foster

Patriot Ledger Correspondent

Last weekend's Beethoven program at Tanglewood was dedicated to the memory of two great musicians who died during the past week, Sir. John Barbirolli and George Szell. As a tribute to these two famous conductors, Frday evening's program was revised to include the Symphony No. 3 in E Flat, the "Eroica." "Marcia funebre" from Beethoven's

The regularly scheduled program began with Piano Concerto No. 2 in B. Flat followed by the Leonore Overture. No. 3 and Symphony No. 8 in F.

The Second Piano Concerto is actually Beethoven's first, since it preceded the C Major (Piano Concerto No. 1) by three years in order of composition. Belonging to the composer's early period, the B Flat Concerto follows closely in Mozart's footsteps by exhibiting a light, gallant style and by being firmly rooted in classical structure. Yet it also demonstrates Beethoven's individuality with its expanded dimensions, intensified content, themes that outline chords, sudden mood and dynamic changes and emphasis on virtuosity.

Heavy Competition

Both the orchestra and soloist Claude Frank were weighed down with a heavy, approach to this concerto. Lacking a flowing dialogue between tutti and solo, the two forces seemed to be competing with rather than complementing each other, producing a disjointed effect. William Steinberg's conducting allowed ragged entrances and poorly blended ensemble playing. The second movement particularly suffered from a lack of spontaneity, tranquility and gentleness.

The third movement, with its flavorful beat, received a more spirited performance, though again, perhaps a slightly gentler treatment could have captured more of Beethoven's humor and carefree grace.

The exaggerated emotionalism of the Leonore Overture No. 3 induced the excitement and spontaneity of performance that was needed to make it a success. Sparked by this fervor, the orchestra continued on to give a good performance of the Eighth Symphony.

Spectacular, Mr. Watts

On Saturday evening, the Coriolan Overture served as a prelude to the most spectacular performance of the weekend. Andre Watts, soloist in the Fourth Piano Concerto in G, evoked shouts of "Bravo" after the first movement and received a lengthy standing ovation at the conclusion of the concerto. He is an extraordinary pianist whose Beethoven may serve as a model to those who wish to explore the composer.

The Fourth Concerto, though exhibiting Beethoven's characteristic virtuosity, differs from the other piano concerti in its profound lyricism and tender melancholy. Mr. Watts wove its many emotional variations distinctly but fluently into the prevailing mood, and the performance became a spiritual experience.

Mr. Watts' virtuosity is displayed not by bravado or flamboyance, but in terms of ethereal trills, delicate yet penetrating tone, and bell-like clarity — all accomplished with an exhilarating effortlessness, grace, and economy of motion.

In the tranquil pianissimo scoring of the solo in the slow movement, for example, his exquisite tone and dynamic control were particularly manifest in a sound breathtakingly clear, yet so soft as to be obliterated by the slighest sound from the audience. Moreover, it is remarkable that at just 24 years of age Mr. Watts possesses the insight and maturity necessary to project the nuances of composition and performance, such as humor, innocence, and freshness, that one would sooner expect from the lifelong experience of a Horowitz or Rubenstein.

After such an experience, Symphony No. 4 in B Flat was anticlimactic, despite a competent and even spirited rendition.

Sunday's Program, conducted by Antal Dorati, consisted of the Overture to "Egmont," Piano Concerto No. 3 in C minor, and Symphony No. 7 in A.

Mr. Dorati's control over the orchestra was evident from the fine performance of the overture, which was perhaps the best orchestral playing of the weekend. With precise attacks, well-defined phrasing, and controlled dynamics, the musical statements, alone and as part of a larger structure, were clear and lucid.

Vladimir Ashkenazy handled Beethoven's diabolical approach to the C minor Piano Concerto with a flair. Themes that are wild at one moment and subdued and contained at the next reflect the composer's intense and unpredictable moods. Mr. Ashkenazy, however, did not always attain the necessary depth of tone to produce penetrating violence, nor did the pianistic figurations so typical of Beethoven seem to float from the keyboard, as they did with Mr. Watts. The pianist's tone during the flowing accompaniment passages was quite beautiful, especially at the end of the cadenza, where the trills melted into the close of the first movement.

Sonorous strings and sustained pianistic progressions were effective in the second movement. The third movement, however, did not delight in its own light-hearted appeal, possibly because the tempo was a bit on the slow side.

Symphony No. 7 suffered from a dragging and inconsistent tempo in the first movement, but proceeded through an exuberant scherzo to a rousing finale that closed the weekend festivities in a manner most appropriate to Beethoven.

ANDRE WATTS: bravos from the benches

Springfield Union
August 3, 1970

AT TANGLEWOOD

Dorati, Ashkenazy Find Steinberg Tough to Follow

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Dorati and Ashkenazy (guest artists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra) had a couple of tough acts to follow Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood.

Beethoven Weekend

They were there with an all-Beethoven program after another conductor and two other soloists had performed superb all - Beethoven programs Friday and Saturday nights.

Antal Dorati (about 65) is the recently appointed music director of the Washington National Symphony Orchestra; Vladimir Ashkenazy is a young (33) Russian pianist; both have worldwide reputations.

William Steinberg was conductor Friday and Saturday; Claude Frank and Andre Watts were piano soloists.

Different Atmosphere

Sunday, Dorati, Ashkenazy and Boston's Orchestra offered the Piano Concerto No. 3. The combination could hardly go wrong, of course, but the atmosphere was different. Saturday the musicians seemed to enter into the music more deeply and took the audience with them.

Sunday afternoon Dorati seemed to exhibit a slight nervous tension unwarranted by the circumstances, and Ashkenazy, on occasion, fell into the big romantic style he is so good at and which is so appropriate with other concertos.

There was no evidence of this in the middle movement (largo) however. It has a sumptuous, oozing melody that eased its way through the air as if of celestial origin. It had a benign and peaceful fluidity . . . then the third movement burst forth, bouncing, and we were brought back to earth.

Still Good

Ashkenazy is, of course, one of the world's ranking young pianists, but he didn't meet the standard set for Beethoven Friday and Saturday by Frank and Watts, nor did Dorati equal Steinberg's achievement; but the comparisons are unfair. It was a good Beethoven sound on a beautiful afternoon.

The program included the "Egmont" overture (routine Beethoven) and the Symphony No. 7 (superior Beethoven).

The symphony is one of Beethoven's nicer works, a very pleasant sequence of sounds. It would sound good played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra anywhere anytime no matter who was up on the podium as long as the leader didn't interfere with the players' close attention to the score.

Overlarge Orchestra

So it sounded good Sunday because Dorati gave it a reliable, journeyman's reading. It was okay, nice, not inspired . . . except, of course, to those who happened to be especially receptive to it, of whom there are always hundreds.

Then, too, the orchestra was oversize for Beethoven. The full complement was on stage plus doubling in the woodwinds. It was a Tchaikovskian orchestra and it put out a nice, big Tchaikovskian sound . . . especially at the finish when it produced thunderous closing chords that pleased the audience highly.

Weekend gate count: Friday night with Steinberg and Frank, 6135; Saturday morning open rehearsal, 3542; Saturday night with Steinberg and Watts, 9117; Sunday afternoon with Dorati and Ashkenazy, 10,688; Total, 29,482.

HOT TEMPERS

TORONTO (AP) — Toronto Police Supt. Adolphus Payne blames the current heat wave for a record of more than 200 assault charges last week. He said officers were called upon to referee domestic arguments and to stop fights in streets, parks and beer parlors.

Lakeville Journal
Lakeville, Conn.
August 6, 1970

Tanglewood Music Reviewed

Friday, July 31
By R.H.

The program at Tanglewood Friday, July 31, was changed at the last minute to commemorate the recent deaths of Sir John Barbirolli and George Szell. In a tribute to their memories the Boston Orchestra performed the Marcia Funebre from the "Eroica." Despite a printed request not to applaud (albeit a deserving rendition) the usual claque (whose?) made some noise and even yelled "Bravo!" Tanglewood increasingly suggests the "corrida."

Perhaps it was the dreadfully humid weather — surely not grief — but the all-Beethoven program under the direction of William Skinberg was spiritless. Claude Frank played the B flat piano concerto (opus 19) without excitement. In the second movement, however, the thoughtfulness of his playing was evident. The Symphony No. 8 in F (opus 93) was equally uninspired. The "Lenore" overture was the liveliest offering of the evening.

Saturday, August 1
By A.C.S.

This should be the easiest review to write because it was probably the finest concert this reviewer has ever heard. One could simply state the facts: under the direction of William Steinberg, the BSO played an all-Beethoven program which consisted of the "Coriolan Overture," the "Fourth Piano Concerto," and the "Symphony No. 4."

Andre Watts was the piano soloist in the concerto and played superbly. Whatever one could have wished for in the playing of this most beautiful of all Beethoven's piano concertos was present. Bravo, say I; and bravo said the sellout audience.

But this does not explain what happened in the Shed tonight. William Steinberg has been musical director of the BSO for only one season and yet, with due regard for the many fine concerts his predecessors have given, never has the feeling so pervaded an evening that all the assembled musicians spoke as one. There is nothing of the theatrical in his conducting. In fact, he could well serve as an example to the Festival students of how effective the non-dramatic approach can be. Yet Steinberg, with his matter-of-fact appearance, succeeded in projecting every side of the many-faceted Beethoven; the classical, the romantic, the dramatic, the lyric. The combination was unbeatable. Hopefully, those in charge of recording have preserved this unforgettable evening.

Sunday, August 2
By A.C.S.

Antal Dorati was not originally scheduled to conduct at Tanglewood this summer. Fortunately, he was brought in for the third of the six concerts devoted to the music of Beethoven in this, the bicentennial of the composer's birth. Dorati understands the drama in Beethoven. The opening "Egmont Overture" gave the clue. The inner tensions and dynamic extremes were capitalized. The same might be said of the "Seventh Symphony" which ended the concert. Here, however, there was more to deal with. The second movement was especially effective. The final "allegro con brio" became a "tour de force" which could be equalled by few other orchestras.

Vladimir Ashkenazy was soloist in the "Third Piano Concerto." From previous hearings, and even at times this afternoon, it is obvious that his is a great talent. Somehow, everything did not mesh properly, especially in the first movement. There appeared to be a difference of opinion about tempos between soloist and conductor, and the ornaments seemed rushed. The second movement, however, was a prayer. Fortunately, he delayed his first quiet chords until the audience was still enough to savor them. The rondo was its usual charming self.

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,040 (S) 56,127

AUG 4 1970 New England Newsclip

Concerts Dedicated To Szell, Barbiroli

Last week was a sad one for the entire music world with the death of George Szell, 73, and Sir John Barbiroli, 78, two of the foremost conductors of this century. Friday, Saturday and Sunday concerts of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood last weekend were dedicated to the memory of these two great musicians and colleagues of William Steinberg, the permanent musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Steinberg rearranged his Friday evening program so that he could pay tribute to their memory. The concert started with the second movement (funeral march) from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. The audience responded to the solemnity of the occasion and did not applaud as requested. Steinberg and the orchestra gave a most poignant, deeply moving and sober performance of this work.

Steinberg returned to the podium for the Friday and Saturday concerts, after a prolonged convalescence and he drew a tremendous welcome from the audience of 6,135, despite the inclement weather. He was a welcome change from the string of nervous conductors who appeared in the past few weekends, as was the all-Beethoven programs.

Claude Frank followed as soloist in Beethoven's Concerto Number 2, which he played with his inimitable polish and technical skill, but with a deeper, more profound interpretation. The last half was devoted to Beethoven's 8th, and it was indeed a pleasure to hear the full orchestra once again, responding to their permanent conductor for a brilliant reading of this work.

Saturday evening's large audience of 9,117 demonstrated its interest for the all-Beethoven concert by attending despite a heavy rainfall before concert time. Steinberg conducted the Overture to "Coriolan" op. 62 and the first half concluded with Andre Watts performing the Piano Concerto No. 4 in G op. 58. Watts is a very gifted young pianist and he rendered a most brilliant and deeply moving reading of this great concerto.

This reviewer remembered hearing him for the first time at Tanglewood last year, in an exciting and thrilling performance of the Brahms Piano Concerto, which was truly electrifying. While Watts gave a very good performance of Beethoven's 4th, it did not come up to last year's playing. However, his technical skill is quite amazing, and he brought a maturity to his performance which attested to his continuing musical growth. The audience gave him a standing ovation and kept calling him back again and again. It was a triumphant evening for him.

The last half of the concert was devoted to Beethoven's 4th Symphony in B flat op. 60. This was a rare musical treat, since it is heard so infrequently. Steinberg and the orchestra gave an inspiring performance.

Sunday afternoon brought back Antal Dorati as conductor, who has not appeared at Tanglewood since 1958. Coupled with the featured soloist Vladmir Ashkenazy, and a beautiful sunny day, the audience was the largest of the season to-date, numbering 10,688. Dorati has a strange beat and he conducted the Overture to "Egmon" op. 84, quite brilliantly. He controlled the orchestra to give free reign to the pianist who performed Beethoven's Concerto No. 3 in C minor op. 37.

The haunting Largo movement of this piece will long be remembered for its beautifully sensitive playing by Ashkenazy. At the conclusion the audience went wild with applause and bravo's that were very richly deserved. This young man is a most talented and accomplished virtuoso of the keyboard, and continues to develop as one of the outstanding pianists of our time.

Dorati concluded the concert with a frenetic and vigorous interpretation of Beethoven's 7th Symphony. His tempo was very fast, especially in the last movement, when he seemed to be driving the orchestra to fever pitch.

The Festival next weekend will feature Alain Lombard on Friday evening, who will conduct a selection of works by Haydn, Roussel and Stravinsky. Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Gary Graffman will perform a piano concerto by Prokofiev. Graffman has had an international career ever since his debut, at the age of 18, with Eugene Ormandy. He is well-known to Tanglewood audiences as well.

Jules Eskin, principal cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will perform Dvorak's cello concerto next Sunday at 2:30. He is on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Also Charles Mackerras will conduct works of Webern and Dvorak on Sunday. He is music director of the Sadler's welles Opera Trust Limited in London.

Steinberg returns to the podium the weekend of Aug. 14 in an all-Beethoven program on Friday and Saturday of that weekend and Max Rudolf will be the conductor on Aug. 16 in an all-Beethoven program featuring Jerome Lowenthal, pianist, in the Piano Concerto No. 1. The Aug. 15 presentation will be Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 "Choral." The Aug. 14 program also features Rudolf Firkusny playing Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5 "Emporer."

SSM

Springfield Union
August 3, 1970

AT TANGLEWOOD

Dorati, Ashkenazy Find Steinberg Tough to Follow

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Dorati and Ashkenazy (guest artists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra) had a couple of tough acts to follow Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood.

Beethoven Weekend

They were there with an all-Beethoven program after another conductor and two other soloists had performed superb all - Beethoven programs Friday and Saturday nights.

Antal Dorati (about 65) is the recently appointed music director of the Washington National Symphony Orchestra; Vladimir Ashkenazy is a young (33) Russian pianist; both have world-wide reputations.

William Steinberg was conductor Friday and Saturday; Claude Frank and Andre Watts were piano soloists.

Different Atmosphere

Sunday, Dorati, Ashkenazy and Boston's Orchestra offered the Piano Concerto No. 3. The combination could hardly go wrong, of course, but the atmosphere was different. Saturday the musicians seemed to enter into the music more deeply and took the audience with them.

Sunday afternoon Dorati seemed to exhibit a slight nervous tension unwarranted by the circumstances, and Ashkenazy, on occasion, fell into the big romantic style he is so good at and which is so appropriate with other concertos.

There was no evidence of this in the middle movement (largo) however. It has a sumptuous, oozing melody that eased its way through the air as if of celestial origin. It had a benign and peaceful fluidity . . . then the third movement burst forth, bouncing, and we were brought back to earth.

Still Good

Ashkenazy is, of course, one of the world's ranking young pianists, but he didn't meet the standard set for Beethoven Friday and Saturday by Frank and Watts, nor did Dorati equal Steinberg's achievement; but the comparisons are unfair. It was a good Beethoven sound on a beautiful afternoon.

The program included the "Egmont" overture (routine Beethoven) and the Symphony No. 7 (superior Beethoven).

The symphony is one of Beethoven's nicer works, a very pleasant sequence of sounds. It would sound good played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra anywhere anytime no matter who was up on the podium as long as the leader didn't interfere with the players' close attention to the score.

Overlarge Orchestra

So it sounded good Sunday because Dorati gave it a reliable, journeyman's reading. It was okay, nice, not inspired . . . except, of course, to those who happened to be especially receptive to it, of whom there are always hundreds.

Then, too, the orchestra was oversize for Beethoven. The full complement was on stage plus doubling in the woodwinds. It was a Tchaikovskian orchestra and it put out a nice, big Tchaikovskian sound . . . especially at the finish when it produced thunderous closing chords that pleased the audience highly.

Weekend gate count: Friday night with Steinberg and Frank, 6135; Saturday morning open rehearsal, 3542; Saturday night with Steinberg and Watts, 9117; Sunday afternoon with Dorati and Ashkenazy, 10,688; Total, 29,482.

HOT TEMPERS

TORONTO (AP) — Toronto Police Supt. Adolphus Payne blames the current heat wave for a record of more than 200 assault charges last week. He said officers were called upon to referee domestic arguments and to stop fights in streets, parks and beer parlors.

Lakeville Journal
Lakeville, Conn
August 6, 1970

Tanglewood Music Reviewed

Friday, July 31
By R.H.

The program at Tanglewood Friday, July 31, was changed at the last minute to commemorate the recent deaths of Sir John Barbirolli and George Szell. In a tribute to their memories the Boston Orchestra performed the Marcia Funebre from the "Eroica." Despite a printed request not to applaud (albeit a deserving rendition) the usual claque (whose?) made some noise and even yelled "Bravo!" Tanglewood increasingly suggests the "corrida."

Perhaps it was the dreadfully humid weather — surely not grief — but the all-Beethoven program under the direction of William Skinberg was spiritless. Claude Frank played the B flat piano concerto (opus 19) without excitement. In the second movement, however, the thoughtfulness of his playing was evident. The Symphony No. 8 in F (opus 93) was equally uninspired. The "Lenore" overture was the liveliest offering of the evening.

Saturday, August 1
By A.C.S.

This should be the easiest review to write because it was probably the finest concert this reviewer has ever heard. One could simply state the facts: under the direction of William Steinberg, the BSO played an all-Beethoven program which consisted of the "Coriolan Overture," the "Fourth Piano Concerto," and the "Symphony No. 4."

Andre Watts was the piano soloist in the concerto and played superbly. Whatever one could have wished for in the playing of this most beautiful of all Beethoven's piano concertos was present. Bravo, say I; and bravo said the sellout audience.

But this does not explain what happened in the Shed tonight. William Steinberg has been musical director of the BSO for only one season and yet, with due regard for the many fine concerts his predecessors have given, never has the feeling so pervaded an evening that all the assembled musicians spoke as one. There is nothing of the theatrical in his conducting. In fact, he could well serve as an example to the Festival students of how effective the non-dramatic approach can be. Yet Steinberg, with his matter-of-fact appearance, succeeded in projecting every side of the many-faceted Beethoven; the classical, the romantic, the dramatic, the lyric. The combination was unbeatable. Hopefully, those in charge of recording have preserved this unforgettable evening.

Sunday, August 2
By A.C.S.

Antal Dorati was not originally scheduled to conduct at Tanglewood this summer. Fortunately, he was brought in for the third of the six concerts devoted to the music of Beethoven in this, the bicentennial of the composer's birth. Dorati understands the drama in Beethoven. The opening "Egmont Overture" gave the clue. The inner tensions and dynamic extremes were capitalized. The same might be said of the "Seventh Symphony" which ended the concert. Here, however, there was more to deal with. The second movement was especially effective. The final "allegro con brio" became a "tour de force" which could be equalled by few other orchestras.

Vladimir Ashkenazy was soloist in the "Third Piano Concerto." From previous hearings, and even at times this afternoon, it is obvious that his is a great talent. Somehow, everything did not mesh properly, especially in the first movement. There appeared to be a difference of opinion about tempos between soloist and conductor, and the ornaments seemed rushed. The second movement, however, was a prayer. Fortunately, he delayed his first quiet chords until the audience was still enough to savor them. The rondo was its usual charming self.

REPUBLICAN
WORCESTER, MASS.

AUG 4 1970 New England Newschip

Concerts Dedicated To Szell, Barbiroli

Last week was a sad one for the entire music world with the death of George Szell, 73, and Sir John Barbiroli, 78, two of the foremost conductors of this century. Friday, Saturday and Sunday concerts of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood last weekend were dedicated to the memory of these two great musicians and colleagues of William Steinberg, the permanent musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Steinberg rearranged his Friday evening program so that he could pay tribute to their memory. The concert started with the second movement (funeral march) from Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony. The audience responded to the solemnity of the occasion and did not applaud as requested. Steinberg and the orchestra gave a most poignant, deeply moving and sober performance of this work.

Steinberg returned to the podium for the Friday and Saturday concerts, after a prolonged convalescence and he drew a tremendous welcome from the audience of 6,135, despite the inclement weather. He was a welcome change from the string of nervous conductors who appeared in the past few weekends, as was the all-Beethoven programs.

Claude Frank followed as soloist in Beethoven's Concerto Number 2, which he played with his inimitable polish and technical skill, but with a deeper, more profound interpretation. The last half was devoted to Beethoven's 8th, and it was indeed a pleasure to hear the full orchestra once again, responding to their permanent conductor for a brilliant reading of this work.

Saturday evening's large audience of 9,117 demonstrated its interest for the all-Beethoven concert by attending despite a heavy rainfall before concert time. Steinberg conducted the Overture to "Coriolan" op. 62 and the first half concluded with Andre Watts performing the Piano Concerto No. 4 in G op. 58. Watts is a very gifted young pianist and he rendered a most brilliant and deeply moving reading of this great concerto.

This reviewer remembered hearing him for the first time at Tanglewood last year, in an exciting and thrilling performance of the Brahms Piano Concerto, which was truly electrifying. While Watts gave a very good performance of Beethoven's 4th, it did not come up to last year's playing. However, his technical skill is quite amazing, and he brought a maturity to his performance which attested to his continuing musical growth. The audience gave him a standing ovation and kept calling him back again and again. It was a triumphant evening for him.

The last half of the concert was devoted to Beethoven's 4th Symphony in B flat op. 60. This was a rare musical treat, since it is heard so infrequently. Steinberg and the orchestra gave an inspiring performance.

Sunday afternoon brought back Antal Dorati as conductor, who has not appeared at Tanglewood since 1958. Coupled with the featured soloist Vladmir Ashkenazy, and a beautiful sunny day, the audience was the largest of the season to-date, numbering 10,688. Dorati has a strange beat and he conducted the Overture to "Egmon" op. 84, quite brilliantly. He controlled the orchestra to give free reign to the pianist who performed Beethoven's Concerto No. 3 in C minor op. 37.

The haunting Largo movement of this piece will long be remembered for its beautifully sensitive playing by Ashkenazy. At the conclusion the audience went wild with applause and bravo's that were very richly deserved. This young man is a most talented and accomplished virtuoso of the keyboard, and continues to develop as one of the outstanding pianists of our time.

Dorati concluded the concert with a frenetic and vigorous interpretation of Beethoven's 7th Symphony. His tempo was very fast, especially in the last movement, when he seemed to be driving the orchestra to fever pitch.

The Festival next weekend will feature Alain Lombard on Friday evening, who will conduct a selection of works by Haydn, Roussel and Stravinsky. Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Gary Graffman will perform a piano concerto by Prokofiev. Graffman has had an international career ever since his debut, at the age of 18, with Eugene Ormandy. He is well-known to Tanglewood audiences as well.

Jules Eskin, principal cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will perform Dvorak's cello concerto next Sunday at 2:30. He is on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. Also Charles Mackerras will conduct works of Webern and Dvorak on Sunday. He is music director of the Sadler's welles Opera Trust Limited in London.

Steinberg returns to the podium the weekend of Aug. 14 in an all-Beethoven program on Friday and Saturday of that weekend and Max Rudolf will be the conductor on Aug. 16 in an all-Beethoven program featuring Jerome Lowenthal, pianist, in the Piano Concerto No. 1. The Aug. 15 presentation will be Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 "Choral." The Aug. 14 program also features Rudolf Firkusny playing Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5 "Emporer."

SSM

72

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE AUG. 10,1970
NORTHAMPTON MASS.

Tanglewood Review

Beethoven's Birthday Celebrated In Music

By Martha deB. Beaver

A weekend devoted to the music of Beethoven, giant of composers, whose 200th birthday was observed last year, marked the fifth in the current Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in Lenox. And for the first time this summer, William Steinberg, the BSOs music director, and musically eminent figure, took the podium for both Friday and Saturday evenings' concerts.

It was clearly a depressing and difficult time for Steinberg, who seemed to move with less vigor than usual. Two of the foremost conductors in the symphonic field, Sir John Barbirolli and George Szell had passed away a few days previous, their going an inexpressible loss to the music world. Steinberg substituted the "March Funebre" from the "Eroica" Symphony, for the Leonore overture, no. 3, dedicating it to the memory of these distinguished men, which was movingly expressed by the musicians, and unusually eloquent.

As much of a tribute, we think, was Claude Frank's interpretation of the second piano concerto in B flat, op. 19, approached with his usual attitude of intimate understanding and technical empathy with the music, a thorough immersion untouched by any kind of histrionics. It was a joyous, glowingly elegant achievement, balance between soloist and musicians clearly pronounced and proposed through Steinberg's always carefully, simply shaped but never needlessly suggestive direction. The Fmajor eighth symphony, op. 93, concluded the program, a masterful pronunciation of a delightfully exuberant work.

Each of the weekend's programs encompassed an overture, piano concerto and symphony; Saturday's the fourth concerto and symphony plus the Coriolan overture, the latter evincing a bit of the evening's steaminess, and lingering sadness, but evocative nonetheless.

Soloist Andre Watts, age 24, gave a lyrically sensitive performance of the G major concerto, in whose first movement Beethoven gave the opening, compelling harmonic phrase to the piano, against all previous tradition. Although one found many of the rhythms and tempi erratic, really too much bravura on the pianist's part, and Steinberg's perhaps too relaxed attitude toward a completely cohesive rendition, we were touched and impressed by this young man's contemplative devotion to the music, and must say we've never heard his brand choice of instrument sound so evocative. The concerto in itself is one of unfolding beauty, the andante a marvelous dialogue between strings and piano, the one demanding, the other quietly pleading then rising briefly in wild exaltation and falling back into hushed melancholy, as the orchestra enters with a whispered recollection of its once demanding phrase, all ending in a breath taking resolution. Double trills were tossed off by Watts without a ripple of effort evenly toned; flashing runs, with marvelous clear meshing of right and left hands. His is a talent that provoked, and should continue to, a wild ovation, including stamping feet and unison applause.

Sunday's program, started with a crisply integrated projection of the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," op. 84, directed by Antal Dorati.

Vladimir Ashkenazy, age 33, displayed a mature and vigorous talent, in the C minor third piano concerto, (a fascinating combination of Mozartean influence and Beethoven's budding individualism). A magnificently controlled pianissimo increasing to fortissimo, is particularly recalled during the closing of the first movement. Ashkenazy draws his tone from the depths of his instrument but never makes it ponderous; color (mood) contrasts, especially noted in the Beethoven cadenzas, were brilliantly scored. The Largo with its richly developed themes, was tenderly contained, soaring in melodic beauty. Dorati allowed much freedom in tempo and rhythm, which did not always suit, although the performance in itself was stimulating and satisfying, the music inherently so. The seventh symphony closed the afternoon program.

Record audiences attended all three concerts; 6135 on Friday, 9117 Saturday, and 10,688 Sunday, with weather the best so far, warm but agreeable; it plus Beethoven and Steinberg no doubt the overall reason for such interest.

An opportunity to talk with some of the musicians about the difficulty of playing for so many different conductors, brought out the fact that with Steinberg a stable technique is naturally always in force, but with others, a different technique must be developed and adhered to, one that takes time to acquire but is vital to all. It was interesting to learn, too, that there is no longer that obvious feeling of rapport and response between musicians and Ozawa, once so noticeable, now quite the opposite, that we had commented upon. It is not that the youthful conductor doesn't have a secure musical knowledge, but he doesn't transmit any interpretive warmth or depth of feeling to which the players can respond; somewhere along the line Ozawa has gone cold.

Music Review IN by Perdita Duncan

Andre Watts, Pianist

Andre Watts appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of William Steinberg, at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood last Saturday evening. He played Beethoven's "Concerto No. 4 in G Major".

The last two Beethoven Concerti have been described as masterworks that carried the concerto to a dramatic power and expressive eloquence, greater than it had ever known. Mr. Watts played the work with a classically disciplined emotion.

His virtuosity, dynamics, technical mastery and sonority approached perfection itself. At the end of the first movement, pandemonium broke loose as the audience cheered, whistled, waved their programs and filled the music shed with such a torrent of applause that Mr. Steinberg signalled him to take a bow so that the performance could go on.

The second movement, an eloquent dialogue between piano and orchestra was played with a grandeur, so skillfully did Mr. Steinberg control the orchestra. The work ended with the presto to which Mr. Watts brought fire, authority and bite.

People had come from all over the country to attend this concert and if they had had their way, Mr. Watts would still be playing. After taking repeated bows, he threw up his arm in a gesture of appreciation, but which meant he was exhausted. It was a superb performance by both artist and orchestra. With each appearance, Mr. Watts establishes that he is not only a great pianist, but has grown to be a great artist.

The program played by the Symphony of Friday was in memorium to Sir John Barbirelli and George Szell, whose deaths have left a void in the world of music.

Lincoln Center Series

The Lincoln Center Opera on film series, which ran from July 15 to 27, offered New Yorkers the first American showing of ten recently made European opera films and the return of the great 1954 Salzburg Festival production of Mozart's "Don Giovanni".

The productions that we saw were Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro", conducted by Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt and directed by Joachim Hess; Bizet's "Carmen"; Mascatni's "Cavalleria Rusticana" and Leoncavallo's "I Pagliacci". Herbert von Karajan conducted and directed the latter operas.

It was interesting that the audiences applauded the overtures, arias and conductors as if they were hearing a live performance. Enthusiasm was high during each intermission as pros and cons about the artists were given. But movies are a static medium and the films rolled on. The greater mobility of the camera let the audience see back stage, close-ups of the musicians and conductors and artists.

Herbert von Karajan never seemed to have opened his eyes, when he was conducting. The combination of Grace Bumbry and Justino Diaz in "Carmen" made for a sparkling performance. Miss Bumbry's mobile facial expressions, luminous eyes and flamboyant actions captured the bohemian character of her role. There were many comic touches in the film that would not be possible at a live performance. Don Vickers was Don Jose and Mirella Freni - Micaela.

Carmen's costume in Act III, was a weird melange of styles - stretch pants, mod knee high boots and the remnants of a 19th century riding habit.

"The Marriage of Figaro" was a delightful romp from beginning to end. As the opera was sung in German, the arias did not sound as fast as in Italian. The artists gave a first rate performance as did those in "Cavalleria" and "Pagliacci".

The only part about the films that was distracting was that the taped sound tracks were not always perfectly synchronized with the movements of the artists' lips.

It was a delightful series that offered opera hungry New Yorkers a wonderful summer interlude.

NEW YORK
Amsterdam News
W. 82.123
AUG 8 1970

Excellent Music, Beautiful Weather

By GEORGE W. STOWE
Times Music Critic

An all-Beethoven program that featured Vladimir Ashkenazy as soloist and Antal Dorati as conductor drew 10,688 people to Tanglewood Sunday afternoon.

The weather was beautiful, Ashkenazy was in excellent form, and Dorati brought warmth and solidity to the music that was played by the Boston Symphony with glowing sonority and immaculate musicianship.

After some indifferent performances in the last few weeks by this famous orchestra, it was a pleasure to have such a seasoned leader as Dorati at the helm. And the crowd roared its approval in a way that indicated that Beethoven is still the big favorite this season.

Ashkenazy, the brilliant young Soviet pianist, played the Beethoven Third Piano Concerto with that rock-solid rhythmic control and tonal variety that mark him as one of the outstanding instrumentalists of this generation.

And Dorati worked hand and glove with the pianist, balancing the sonorities carefully and keeping everything under tight rein. I cannot recall the slow movement played with more careful attention to dynamics.

To be sure, both soloist and conductor had trouble getting started with the second movement when a bawling child on the lawn and a plane overhead interrupted the flow of the music. The finale was brought to stunning climax by the pianist and the orchestra and the audience tendered both a standing ovation.

Dorati opened the afternoon's program with the composer's "Egmont" Overture and concluded the festivities with a vital and thrusting performance of the Seventh Symphony. The last movement of the symphony was full of driving energy and irresistible momentum.

William Steinberg returned to the podium for the Friday and Saturday programs. He had been recuperating since the concluding weeks of the season in Boston from what was described as general exhaustion and mild heart attack. He will be returning next weekend on Friday and Saturday to continue the Beethoven series.

This weekend's concerts were dedicated to the memory of Sir John Barbirolli and George Szell, two of the foremost conductors of this era, who died within two days of each other (on July 28 and 30).

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 136,232
(E) 8,260
AUG 3 1970
New England Newsclip

9,000 Cheer Watts In Tanglewood Concert

By R.E. KRIEGER
Executive Arts Editor

LENOX, Mass. — The 24-year-old pianist Andre Watts broke it up at the Saturday night Tanglewood concert with a glittering performance of the Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto.

Scarcely had the notes of the finale been played when the audience arose en masse, cheering and shouting. They dashed toward the stage standing at its rim applauding, as Watts bowed and smiled in the flashbulb's white glare. Behind him the orchestra rapped on its instruments and finally started stamping on the stage.

Watts came back again and again as the cheering and clapping kept on and finally left the stage for good, although the audience started up a rhythmic applause trying to get him to return once more.

ANDRE WATTS

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
ALBANY TIMES UNION
Monday, August 3, 1970

AT TANGLEWOOD

Dorati, Ashkenazy Find Steinberg Tough to Follow

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Dorati and Ashkenazy (guest artists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra) had a couple of tough acts to follow Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood.

Beethoven Weekend

They were there with an all-Beethoven program after another conductor and two other soloists had performed superb all - Beethoven programs Friday and Saturday nights.

Antal Dorati (about 65) is the recently appointed music director of the Washington National Symphony Orchestra; Vladimir Ashkenazy is a young (33) Russian pianist; both have worldwide reputations.

William Steinberg was conductor Friday and Saturday; Claude Frank and Andre Watts were piano soloists.

Different Atmosphere

Sunday, Dorati, Ashkenazy and Boston's Orchestra offered the Piano Concerto No. 3. The combination could hardly go wrong, of course, but the atmosphere was different. Saturday the musicians seemed to enter into the music more deeply and took the audience with them.

Sunday afternoon Dorati seemed to exhibit a slight nervous tension unwarranted by the circumstances, and Ashkenazy, on occasion, fell into the big romantic style he is so good at and which is so appropriate with other concertos.

There was no evidence of this in the middle movement (largo) however. It has a sumptuous, oozing melody that eased its way through the air as if of celestial origin. It had a benign and peaceful fluidity . . . then the third movement burst forth, bouncing, and we were brought back to earth.

Still Good

Ashkenazy is, of course, one of the world's ranking young pianists, but he didn't meet the standard set for Beethoven Friday and Saturday by Frank and Watts, nor did Dorati equal Steinberg's achievement; but the comparisons are unfair. It was a good Beethoven sound on a beautiful afternoon.

The program included the "Egmont" overture (routine Beethoven) and the Symphony No. 7 (superior Beethoven).

The symphony is one of Beethoven's nicer works, a very pleasant sequence of sounds. It would sound good played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra anywhere anytime no matter who was up on the podium as long as the leader didn't interfere with the players' close attention to the score.

Overlarge Orchestra

So it sounded good Sunday because Dorati gave it a reliable, journeyman's reading. It was okay, nice, not inspired . . . except, of course, to those who happened to be especially receptive to it, of whom there are always hundreds.

Then, too, the orchestra was oversize for Beethoven. The full complement was on stage plus doubling in the woodwinds. It was a Tchaikovskian orchestra and it put out a nice, big Tchaikovskian sound . . . especially at the finish when it produced thunderous closing chords that pleased the audience highly.

Weekend gate count: Friday night with Steinberg and Frank, 6135; Saturday morning open rehearsal, 3542; Saturday night with Steinberg and Watts, 9117; Sunday afternoon with Dorati and Ashkenazy, 10,688; Total, 29,482.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
AUG 3 1970
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Directed by Dorati

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — After the parade of young podium gymnasts who appeared during the first four weeks of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, it was a revelation to hear the same Boston Symphony improve its craft under the direction of William Steinberg and Antal Dorati.

Steinberg was to conduct the three Beethoven concerts of the festival's fifth weekend. Because of his recent setbacks in health, it was thought prudent to relieve him of yesterday afternoon's concert.

Shares Philosophy

He was replaced by Dorati, new conductor of the Washington (D.C.) National Symphony. Certainly not a self-effacing batonist, Dorati shares Steinberg's philosophy and style. Both are much too preoccupied with making the best music possible to waste time on impassioned exhibitionism.

Beethoven's music is still the biggest box-office draw. The weekend's total attendance was 29,482, with yesterday afternoon's 10,688 the largest audience.

Two young piano soloists were less equal in effect and merit.

Andre Watts created a mild furore Saturday night with Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto. He deserved it. Vladimir Ashkenazy's performance of Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto yesterday was competent, even by high standards, but cloudy in spots.

Not that Steinberg was ever an agitated or agitating conductor, but the simple fact is that he can no longer wage a vigorous battle with the baton.

Marvelous Merger

He doesn't have to. We're yet to hear the Boston Symphony strings sound more sublime than in Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. It came from simple cues and was a marvelous merger of direction and response.

The orchestra reflected every directive, even when almost imperceptible.

Just how well Steinberg knows his orchestra was shown in the "Coriolan" Overture. Everything was done with minimum effort. Only flaw was a bad spot of coordination at the end. It must have been an equal surprise to the players.

The 24-year-old Watts brought the Fourth Concerto to keyboard greatness from the opening solo phrase to the smashing chords that end the finale.

Brilliant Technique

Watts' technique revealed its brilliance in silken-smooth passagework, immaculate note-playing, iron-clad rhythms, and constant concentration on the music's poetry without letting it look or sound like self-indulgence.

Indeed, Watts is trailing Van Cliburn closely as an American piano hero. He's equipped to produce just about anything that the thinking public holds dear.

Yesterday, Dorati brought much of the "grand manner" to Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. It started off with some semblance of caution, but the sound was really quite magnificent. He didn't allow the funeral march to digress into an elegy of grief. The dignity was preserved. The finale did a bit too much galloping.

Restlessness

His version of the "Egmont" Overture was a full-strength structure, neatly punctuated harmonies and a clear disclosure of the work's restlessness.

One knew that the orchestra respects Dorati and tried to do all possible to obey his dictates, particularly in the mad dash with which the overture ends.

By and large, Ashkenazy sustained the Third Piano Concerto with a sound technique. It was clear that he possessed reservoirs of power that weren't needed in the Beethoven.

In a sense, this restraint weakened the performance. Some of the thin passages and fragile phrase endings were almost inaudible and broke the train of thought.

The cadenzas (Beethoven's own) were brilliant but with traces of hammering. The pianist made most of the concerto a bright gem with singing tone, pliant phrasing. The rondo had no restraint of gaiety but pranced along without the handicap of technical hazards.

There was some delay in starting the slow movement. Dorati waited until a crying baby was either pacified or removed.

THE FIRST TIME I ever saw and heard Watts was some nine years ago when Leonard Bernstein used him in one of those famous children's TV concerts introducing him, believe it or not, as a "Nubian prince."

Watts was 15 years old then and already somewhat of a veteran. A year before that he had been soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra in a Robin Hood Dell concert and five (5) years before that at the age of nine had performed with the orchestra in a Haydn concerto.

SOON AFTER his TV appearance he stepped in to take over for an ailing Glenn Gould in two regular New York Philharmonic concerts and since that time has been performing with practically any major orchestra that you can name.

The concerto, written by Beethoven some 164 years ago, opens with a flash and audacity that is splendid to hear and watch. Watts wended his way with decisive technique through this first movement maze and at its conclusion had to take two bows before he could get back to work again. William Steinberg, conducting his second concert of the season at Tanglewood, tried to begin twice and finally had to smile and shrug until things settled down.

IT IS REALLY the andante con moto with its dialogue between piano and strings that is phenomenal in its conception and it was played by Watts with supreme confidence and flair.

Steinberg, to say the very least is one of our less flamboyant conductors. He occasionally flips a finger at the strings, leans toward the woodwinds and his indications toward Watts seemed to be a half-inch jiggle of his elbow. As a soloist with him I imagine you have to have good eyesight.

THE EVENING opened with the flamboyant overture to "Coriolan' and ended with the Beethoven Fourth Symphony, a work of ineffable sweetness played with devotion by the orchestra. Coming between the "Eroica" and the Fifth Symphony it has been described with exactness by Robert Schumann, as a "Greek maiden between two Norse giants."

Music Review IN by Perdita Duncan

Andre Watts, Pianist

Andre Watts appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of William Steinberg, at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood last Saturday evening. He played Beethoven's "Concerto No. 4 in G Major".

The last two Beethoven Concerti have been described as masterworks that carried the concerto to a dramatic power and expressive eloquence, greater than it had ever known. Mr. Watts played the work with a classically disciplined emotion.

His virtuosity, dynamics, technical mastery and sonority approached perfection itself. At the end of the first movement, pandemonium broke loose as the audience cheered, whistled, waved their programs and filled the music shed with such a torrent of applause that Mr. Steinberg signalled him to take a bow so that the performance could go on.

The second movement, an eloquent dialogue between piano and orchestra was played with a grandeur, so skillfully did Mr. Steinberg control the orchestra. The work ended with the presto to which Mr. Watts brought fire, authority and bite.

People had come from all over the country to attend this concert and if they had had their way, Mr. Watts would still be playing. After taking repeated bows, he threw up his arm in a gesture of appreciation, but which meant he was exhausted. It was a superb performance by both artist and orchestra. With each appearance, Mr. Watts establishes that he is not only a great pianist, but has grown to be a great artist.

The program played by the Symphony of Friday was in memorium to Sir John Barbirelli and George Szell, whose deaths have left a void in the world of music.

Lincoln Center Series

The Lincoln Center Opera on film series, which ran from July 15 to 27, offered New Yorkers the first American showing of ten recently made European opera films and the return of the great 1954 Salzburg Festival production of Mozart's "Don Giovanni".

The productions that we saw were Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro", conducted by Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt and directed by Joachim Hess; Bizet's "Carmen"; Mascatni's "Cavalleria Rusticana" and Leoncavallo's "I Pagliacci". Herbert von Karajan conducted and directed the latter operas.

It was interesting that the audiences applauded the overtures, arias and conductors as if they were hearing a live performance. Enthusiasm was high during each intermission as pros and cons about the artists were given. But movies are a static medium and the films rolled on. The greater mobility of the camera let the audience see back stage, close-ups of the musicians and conductors and artists.

Herbert von Karajan never seemed to have opened his eyes, when he was conducting. The combination of Grace Bumbry and Justino Diaz in "Carmen" made for a sparkling performance. Miss Bumbry's mobile facial expressions, luminous eyes and flamboyant actions captured the bohemian character of her role. There were many comic touches in the film that would not be possible at a live performance. Don Vickers was Don Jose and Mirella Freni - Micaela.

Carmen's costume in Act III, was a weird melange of styles - stretch pants, mod knee high boots and the remnants of a 19th century riding habit.

"The Marriage of Figaro" was a delightful romp from beginning to end. As the opera was sung in German, the arias did not sound as fast as in Italian. The artists gave a first rate performance as did those in "Cavalleria" and "Pagliacci".

The only part about the films that was distracting was that the taped sound tracks were not always perfectly synchronized with the movements of the artists' lips.

It was a delightful series that offered opera hungry New Yorkers a wonderful summer interlude.

NEW YORK
Amsterdam News
W. 82,123
AUG 8 1970

Excellent Music, Beautiful Weather

By GEORGE W. STOWE
Times Music Critic

An all-Beethoven program that featured Vladimir Ashkenazy as soloist and Antal Dorati as conductor drew 10,688 people to Tanglewood Sunday afternoon.

The weather was beautiful, Ashkenazy was in excellent form, and Dorati brought warmth and solidity to the music that was played by the Boston Symphony with glowing sonority and immaculate musicianship.

After some indifferent performances in the last few weeks by this famous orchestra, it was a pleasure to have such a seasoned leader as Dorati at the helm. And the crowd roared its approval in a way that indicated that Beethoven is still the big favorite this season.

Ashkenazy, the brilliant young Soviet pianist, played the Beethoven Third Piano Concerto with that rock-solid rhythmic control and tonal variety that mark him as one of the outstanding instrumentalists of this generation.

And Dorati worked hand and glove with the pianist, balancing the sonorities carefully and keeping everything under tight rein. I cannot recall the slow movement played with more careful attention to dynamics.

To be sure, both soloist and conductor had trouble getting started with the second movement when a bawling child on the lawn and a plane overhead interrupted the flow of the music. The finale was brought to stunning climax by the pianist and the orchestra and the audience tendered both a standing ovation.

Dorati opened the afternoon's program with the composer's "Egmont" Overture and concluded the festivities with a vital and thrusting performance of the Seventh Symphony. The last movement of the symphony was full of driving energy and irresistible momentum.

William Steinberg returned to the podium for the Friday and Saturday programs. He had been recuperating since the concluding weeks of the season in Boston from what was described as general exhaustion and mild heart attack. He will be returning next weekend on Friday and Saturday to continue the Beethoven series.

This weekend's concerts were dedicated to the memory of Sir John Barbirolli and George Szell, two of the foremost conductors of this era, who died within two days of each other (on July 28 and 30).

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(E) 135,232
(E) 8,260
AUG 3 1970
New England Newsclip

9,000 Cheer Watts In Tanglewood Concert

By R.E. KRIEGER
Executive Arts Editor

LENOX, Mass. — The 24-year-old pianist Andre Watts broke it up at the Saturday night Tanglewood concert with a glittering performance of the Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto.

Scarcely had the notes of the finale been played when the audience arose en masse, cheering and shouting. They dashed toward the stage standing at its rim applauding, as Watts bowed and smiled in the flashbulb's white glare. Behind him the orchestra rapped on its instruments and finally started stamping on the stage.

Watts came back again and again as the cheering and clapping kept on and finally left the stage for good, although the audience started up a rhythmic applause trying to get him to return once more.

ANDRE WATTS

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
ALBANY TIMES UNION
Monday, August 3, 1970

AT TANGLEWOOD

Dorati, Ashkenazy Find Steinberg Tough to Follow

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Dorati and Ashkenazy (guest artists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra) had a couple of tough acts to follow Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood.

Beethoven Weekend

They were there with an all-Beethoven program after another conductor and two other soloists had performed superb all - Beethoven programs Friday and Saturday nights.

Antal Dorati (about 65) is the recently appointed music director of the Washington National Symphony Orchestra; Vladimir Ashkenazy is a young (33) Russian pianist; both have worldwide reputations.

William Steinberg was conductor Friday and Saturday; Claude Frank and Andre Watts were piano soloists.

Different Atmosphere

Sunday, Dorati, Ashkenazy and Boston's Orchestra offered the Piano Concerto No. 3. The combination could hardly go wrong, of course, but the atmosphere was different. Saturday the musicians seemed to enter into the music more deeply and took the audience with them.

Sunday afternoon Dorati seemed to exhibit a slight nervous tension unwarranted by the circumstances, and Ashkenazy, on occasion, fell into the big romantic style he is so good at and which is so appropriate with other concertos.

There was no evidence of this in the middle movement (largo) however. It has a sumptuous, oozing melody that eased its way through the air as if of celestial origin. It had a benign and peaceful fluidity . . . then the third movement burst forth, bouncing, and we were brought back to earth.

Still Good

Ashkenazy is, of course, one of the world's ranking young pianists, but he didn't meet the standard set for Beethoven Friday and Saturday by Frank and Watts, nor did Dorati equal Steinberg's achievement; but the comparisons are unfair. It was a good Beethoven sound on a beautiful afternoon.

The program included the "Egmont" overture (routine Beethoven) and the Symphony No. 7 (superior Beethoven).

The symphony is one of Beethoven's nicer works, a very pleasant sequence of sounds. It would sound good played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra anywhere anytime no matter who was up on the podium as long as the leader didn't interfere with the players' close attention to the score.

Overlarge Orchestra

So it sounded good Sunday because Dorati gave it a reliable, journeyman's reading. It was okay, nice, not inspired . . . except, of course, to those who happened to be especially receptive to it, of whom there are always hundreds.

Then, too, the orchestra was oversize for Beethoven. The full complement was on stage plus doubling in the woodwinds. It was a Tchaikovskian orchestra and it put out a nice, big Tchaikovskian sound . . . especially at the finish when it produced thunderous closing chords that pleased the audience highly.

Weekend gate count: Friday night with Steinberg and Frank, 6135; Saturday morning open rehearsal, 3542; Saturday night with Steinberg and Watts, 9117; Sunday afternoon with Dorati and Ashkenazy, 10,688; Total, 29,482.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
AUG 3 1970
New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Directed by Dorati

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — After the parade of young podium gymnasts who appeared during the first four weeks of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, it was a revelation to hear the same Boston Symphony improve its craft under the direction of William Steinberg and Antal Dorati.

Steinberg was to conduct the three Beethoven concerts of the festival's fifth weekend. Because of his recent setbacks in health, it was thought prudent to relieve him of yesterday afternoon's concert.

Shares Philosophy

He was replaced by Dorati, new conductor of the Washington (D.C.) National Symphony. Certainly not a self-effacing batonist, Dorati shares Steinberg's philosophy and style. Both are much too preoccupied with making the best music possible to waste time on impassioned exhibitionism.

Beethoven's music is still the biggest box-office draw. The weekend's total attendance was 29,482, with yesterday afternoon's 10,688 the largest audience.

Two young piano soloists were less equal in effect and merit.

Andre Watts created a mild furore Saturday night with Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto. He deserved it. Vladimir Ashkenazy's performance of Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto yesterday was competent, even by high standards, but cloudy in spots.

Not that Steinberg was ever an agitated or agitating conductor, but the simple fact is that he can no longer wage a vigorous battle with the baton.

Marvelous Merger

He doesn't have to. We're yet to hear the Boston Symphony strings sound more sublime than in Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. It came from simple cues and was a marvelous merger of direction and response.

The orchestra reflected every directive, even when almost imperceptible.

Just how well Steinberg knows his orchestra was shown in the "Coriolan" Overture. Everything was done with minimum effort. Only flaw was a bad spot of coordination at the end. It must have been an equal surprise to the players.

The 24-year-old Watts brought the Fourth Concerto to keyboard greatness from the opening solo phrase to the smashing chords that end the finale.

Brilliant Technique

Watts' technique revealed its brilliance in silken-smooth passagework, immaculate note-playing, iron-clad rhythms, and constant concentration on the music's poetry without letting it look or sound like self-indulgence.

Indeed, Watts is trailing Van Cliburn closely as an American piano hero. He's equipped to produce just about anything that the thinking public holds dear.

Yesterday, Dorati brought much of the "grand manner" to Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. It started off with some semblance of caution, but the sound was really quite magnificent. He didn't allow the funeral march to digress into an elegy of grief. The dignity was preserved. The finale did a bit too much galloping.

Restlessness

His version of the "Egmont" Overture was a full-strength structure, neatly punctuated harmonies and a clear disclosure of the work's restlessness.

One knew that the orchestra respects Dorati and tried to do all possible to obey his dictates, particularly in the mad dash with which the overture ends.

By and large, Ashkenazy sustained the Third Piano Concerto with a sound technique. It was clear that he possessed reservoirs of power that weren't needed in the Beethoven.

In a sense, this restraint weakened the performance. Some of the thin passages and fragile phrase endings were almost inaudible and broke the train of thought.

The cadenzas (Beethoven's own) were brilliant but with traces of hammering. The pianist made most of the concerto a bright gem with singing tone, pliant phrasing. The rondo had no restraint of gaiety but pranced along without the handicap of technical hazards.

There was some delay in starting the slow movement. Dorati waited until a crying baby was either pacified or removed.

THE FIRST TIME I ever saw and heard Watts was some nine years ago when Leonard Bernstein used him in one of those famous children's TV concerts introducing him, believe it or not, as a "Nubian prince."

Watts was 15 years old then and already somewhat of a veteran. A year before that he had been soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra in a Robin Hood Dell concert and five (5) years before that at the age of nine had performed with the orchestra in a Haydn concerto.

SOON AFTER his TV appearance he stepped in to take over for an ailing Glenn Gould in two regular New York Philharmonic concerts and since that time has been performing with practically any major orchestra that you can name.

The concerto, written by Beethoven some 164 years ago, opens with a flash and audacity that is splendid to hear and watch. Watts wended his way with decisive technique through this first movement maze and at its conclusion had to take two bows before he could get back to work again. William Steinberg, conducting his second concert of the season at Tanglewood, tried to begin twice and finally had to smile and shrug until things settled down.

IT IS REALLY the andante con moto with its dialogue between piano and strings that is phenomenal in its conception and it was played by Watts with supreme confidence and flair.

Steinberg, to say the very least is one of our less flamboyant conductors. He occasionally flips a finger at the strings, leans toward the woodwinds and his indications toward Watts seemed to be a half-inch jiggle of his elbow. As a soloist with him I imagine you have to have good eyesight.

THE EVENING opened with the flamboyant overture to "Coriolan' and ended with the Beethoven Fourth Symphony, a work of ineffable sweetness played with devotion by the orchestra. Coming between the "Eroica" and the Fifth Symphony it has been described with exactness by Robert Schumann, as a "Greek maiden between two Norse giants."

BLANK PAGE

Beethoven To Rock Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — The first of two weekends by the Boston Symphony Orchestra commemorating the bicentennial of the birth of Beethoven begins Friday evening, July 31 at 9 p.m. in Tanglewood's Shed with music director William Steinberg conducting and Claude Frank as piano soloist. The first of three all-Beethoven concerts by the Boston Symphony opens with a performance of the "Leonore" overture no. 3, followed by the Piano concerto no. 2 in B-flat with Mr. Frank as piano soloist. Following intermission, Mr. Steinberg conducts the "King Stephen" overture and the Symphony no. 8 in F.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents Boston Symphony Orchestra Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, principal cellist Jules Eskin, and pianist Richard Goode in Beethoven's Variations for piano, violin, and cello on Wenzel Muller's song "Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu" and the Piano trio in E-flat, Op. 70, no. 2.

The Open Rehearsal Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed presents Guest Conductor Antal Dorati and pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy rehearsing with the Boston Symphony for the concert the following day.

Pianist Andre Watts is soloist with Conductor William Steinberg Saturday evening, August 1. The program opens with the "Coriolan" overture, followed by Mr. Watts' performance of the Piano concerto no. 4 in G. The Symphony no. 4 in B-flat concludes the program.

In February of 1963, Leonard Bernstein introduced 16 year old Andre Watts to U. S. televiewers from coast to coast as soloist for a New York Philharmonic Young People's Concert. The performance was so spectacular that Mr. Watts was engaged 20 days later as last minute substitute for the ailing Glenn Gould at a regular Philharmonic subscription concert. In the intervening seven years, Mr. Watts has made numerous American concert tours, including three appearances with the Boston Symphony in 1969. He has also made several European tours, including a world tour with Zubin Mehta and the Los Angeles Philharmonic for the United States State Department in the fall of 1967.

Sunday, August 2 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist with Guest Conductor Antal Dorati. The program begins with the "Egmont" overture, followed by the Piano concerto no. 3 in C minor with Mr. Ashkenazy as soloist. Following intermission, the program is devoted to a performance of the Symphony no. 7 in A.

Tanglewood-On-Parade, the annual day-long demonstration of work by the Berkshire Music Center, takes place Tuesday, July 28 at 2 p.m. The festivities conclude with the Gala Concert at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed which celebrates the thirtieth anniversary season of the Berkshire Music Center and the 70th year of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the Berkshire Music Center Faculty. The program includes works by Bernstein, Bach, Hindemith, Copland and Tchaikovsky with Aaron Copland conducting the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, with soloist Lukas Foss, graduate of the Berkshire Music Center's first class in 1940. Following the program is the annual fireworks display over Stockbridge Bowl.

Soviet-born Vladimir Ashkenazy is currently making his fifth tour of North America and will visit more than 35 cities giving recitals and orchestra performances. He has won such competitions as the Queen Elizabeth Competition in Brussels, the International Chopin Competition in Warsaw and was a joint winner in the Second Tchaikovsky Competition. Mr. Ashkenazy made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last summer at Tanglewood.

The fourth Contemporary Trends Concert presented by Tanglewood takes place Monday, July 27 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre - Concert Hall. Artists to be presented are Jeanne Lee (with Marion Brown, alto saxophone and Jack Gregg, bass) and the University of Illinois Jazz Band, John Garvey Leader.

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
(E) 9,230

JUL 22 1970

New England Newsclip

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

GREENVILLE LOCAL
Wednesday, July 29, 1970

All-Beethoven At Tanglewood This Week-End

The first of two weekends by the Boston Symphony Orchestra commemorating the bicentennial of the birth of Beethovan begins this Friday evening, July 31 at 9 p. m. in Tanglewood's Shed with Music Director William Steinberg conducting and Claude Frank as piano soloist. The first of three all-Beethoven concerts by Boston Symphony opens with a performance of the Leonore overture No. 3, followed by the Piano concerto No. 2 in B-flat with Mr. Frank as piano soloist. Following intermission, Mr. Steinberg conducts the King Stephen overture and the Symphony No. 8 in F.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p. m. in the Shed, presents Boston Symphony Orchestra Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, principal cellist Jules Eskin, and pianist Richard Goode in Beethoven's Variation for piano, violin, and cello on Wenzel Muller's song "Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu" and the Piano trio in E-flat, Op. 70, No. 2. Weekend Prelude recitals are free to ticket-holders of the 9 p. m. Symphony concert.

Open Rehearsal Saturday morning at 10:30 a. m. in the Shed presents Guest Conductor Antal Dorati pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy rehearsing with the Boston Symphony for the concert the following day.

Pianist Andre Watts is soloists with Conductor William Steinberg Saturday evening, August 1. The program opens with Coriolan overture, followed by Mr. Watts' performance of the Piano concerto No. 4 in G. The Symphony No. 4 in B-flat concludes the program.

Sunday, August 2 at 2:30 in the Shed, pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist with Guest Conductor Antal Dorati. The program begins with the Egmont overture, followed by the Piano concerto No. 3 in c minor with Mr. Ashkenazy as soloist. Following intermission, the program is devoted to a performance of the Symphony No. 7 in A.

Tanglewood-On-Parade, the annual day-long demonstration of work by the Berkshire Music Center, takes place Tuesday, starting at 2 p. m. The festivities conclude with the Gala Concert at 8:30 p m. in the Shed which celebrates the thirtieth anniversary season of the Berkshire Music Center and the 70th year of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the Berkshire Music Center Faculty. The program includes works by Bernstein, Bach, Hidemith, Copland and Tchaikovsky with Aaron Copland conducting the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, with soloist Lukas Foss, graduate of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, with soloist Lukas Foss, graduate of the Berkshire Music Center's first class in 1940. Following the program is the annual fireworks display over Stockbridge Bowl.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 24 1970

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Sets Weekend Of Beethoven

William Steinberg, music director at Tanglewood, will conduct the Boston Symphony in an all-Beethoven program next weekend.

Steinberg will conduct the Friday evening concert featuring pianist Claude Frank and the Saturday evening program featuring pianist Andre Watts. Antal Dorati, guest conductor, will direct the Sunday afternoon performance with pianist Vladimar Ashkenazy as soloist.

The Weekend Prelude will feature violinist Joseph Silverstein, cellist Jules Eskin and pianist Richard Goode.

This is the first of two all-Beethoven weekends, commemorating the composer's bicentennial, slated at Tanglewood.

FIFTH WEEK
BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL CONCERTS
TANGLEWOOD-ON-PARADE

Friday

7 p.m. Shed
Weekend Prelude
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violinist
JULES ESKIN cellist
RICHARD GOODE pianist
BEETHOVEN PROGRAM
Variations for violin, piano, and cello on Wenzel Muller's song Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu
Piano trio in E-flat Op. 70 no. 2

* * *

9 p.m. Shed
WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor
Claude
CLAUDE FRANK pianist
BEETHOVEN PROGRAM
Leonore overture no. 3
Piano concerto no. 2 in B-flat
King Stephen overture
Symphony no. 8 in F.

* * *

Saturday

10.30 a.m. Shed
Boston Symphony Orchestra—Open Rehearsal
8.30 p.m. Shed
WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor
ANDRE WATTS pianist
BEETHOVEN PROGRAM
Coriolan overture
Piano concerto no. 4 in G
Symphony no. 4 in B-flat

* * *

Sunday

2.30 p.m. Shed
ANTAL DORATI conductor
VLADIMIR ASHKENAZY pianist
BEETHOVEN PROGRAM
Egmont overture
Piano concerto no. 3 in c minor
Symphony no. 7 in A

* * *

Tuesday

8.30 p.m. Shed
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER ORCHESTRA
AARON COPLAND conductor
LUKAS FOSS pianist and conductor
Bernstein: Candide overture
Bach: Piano concerto in d minor
Hindemith: Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber
Copland: Suite from The Tender Land
Tchaikovsky: Romeo and Juliet

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,934

JUL 28 1970

Tanglewood Concert for Beethoven

The first of two weekends by the Boston Symphony Orchestra commemorating the bicentennial of the birth of Beethoven begins at 9 p.m. Friday in the Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

Music director William Steinberg will conduct with Claude Frank as piano soloist in the first of three all-Beethoven concerts. The "Lenore" Overture No. 3 will be folowed by Piano Concerto No. 2 in B-flat, the "King Stephen" Overture, and Symphony No. 8 in F.

Pianist Andre Watts is soloist with conductor Steinberg Saturday evening. The program opens with the "Coriclan" Overture, followed by Watts' performance of he Piano Concerto No. 4 in G. The Symphony No. 4 in B-flat concludes the program.

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist with guest conductor Antal Dorati. The program includes the "Egmont" Overture, Piano Concerto No. 3 in C Minor, and Symphony No. 7 in A.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 30 1970

New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Weekend

The first of two weekends by the Boston Symphony Orchestra commemorating the bicentennial of the birth of Beethoven begins tomorrow evening, July 31 at 9 p.m. in Tanglewood's Shed with Music Director William Steinberg conducting and Claude Frank as piano soloist. The first of three all-Beethoven concerts by the Boston Symphony opens with a performance of the "Leonore" overture no. 3, followed by the Piano concerto no. 2 in B-flat with Mr. Frank as piano soloist. Following intermission, Mr. Steinberg conducts the "King Stephen" overture and the Symphony no. 8 in F.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents Boston Symphony Orchestra Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, principal cellist Jules Eskin, and pianist Richard Goode in Beethoven's Variations for piano, violin, and cello on Wenzel Muller's song "Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu" and the Piano trio in E-flat, Op. 70, no. 2. Weekend Prelude recitals are free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. Symphony concert.

The Open Rehearsal Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed presents Guest Conductor Antal Dorati and pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy rehearsing with the Boston Symphony for the concert the following day.

Pianist Andre Watts is soloist with Conductor William Steinberg Saturday evening, Aug. 1. The program opens with the "Coriolan" overture, followed by Mr. Watts' performance of the Piano concerto no. 4 in G. The Symphony no. 4 in B-flat concludes the program.

In February of 1963, Leonard Bernstein introduced 16-year-old Andre Watts to U.S. televiewers from coast to coast as soloist for a New York Philharmonic Young People's Concert. The performance was so spectacular that Mr. Watts was engaged 20 days later as last minute substitute for the ailing Glenn Gould at a regular Philharmonic subscription concert. In the intervening seven years, Mr. Watts has made numerous American concert tours, including three appearances with the Boston Symphony in 1969. He has also made several European tours, including a world tour with Zubin Mehta and the Los Angeles Philharmonic for the United States State Department in the fall of 1967.

Sunday, Aug. 2 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist with Guest Conductor Antal Dorati. The program begins with the "Egmont" overture, followed by the Piano concerto no. 3 in minor with Mr. Ashkenazy.

YOUNG PIANIST . . . At Tanglewood on Saturday, August 1 at 8:30 p.m., Andre Watts will play Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4.

Beethoven To Rock Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — The first of two weekends by the Boston Symphony Orchestra commemorating the bicentennial of the birth of Beethoven begins Friday evening, July 31 at 9 p.m. in Tanglewood's Shed with music director William Steinberg conducting and Claude Frank as piano soloist. The first of three all-Beethoven concerts by the Boston Symphony opens with a performance of the "Leonore" overture no. 3, followed by the Piano concerto no. 2 in B-flat with Mr. Frank as piano soloist. Following intermission, Mr. Steinberg conducts the "King Stephen" overture and the Symphony no. 8 in F.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents Boston Symphony Orchestra Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, principal cellist Jules Eskin, and pianist Richard Goode in Beethoven's Variations for piano, violin, and cello on Wenzel Muller's song "Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu" and the Piano trio in E-flat, Op. 70, no. 2.

The Open Rehearsal Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed presents Guest Conductor Antal Dorati and pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy rehearsing with the Boston Symphony for the concert the following day.

Pianist Andre Watts is soloist with Conductor William Steinberg Saturday evening, August 1. The program opens with the "Coriolan" overture, followed by Mr. Watts' performance of the Piano concerto no. 4 in G. The Symphony no. 4 in B-flat concludes the program.

In February of 1963, Leonard Bernstein introduced 16 year old Andre Watts to U. S. televiewers from coast to coast as soloist for a New York Philharmonic Young People's Concert. The performance was so spectacular that Mr. Watts was engaged 20 days later as last minute substitute for the ailing Glenn Gould at a regular Philharmonic subscription concert. In the intervening seven years, Mr. Watts has made numerous American concert tours, including three appearances with the Boston Symphony in 1969. He has also made several European tours, including a world tour with Zubin Mehta and the Los Angeles Philharmonic for the United States State Department in the fall of 1967.

Sunday, August 2 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist with Guest Conductor Antal Dorati. The program begins with the "Egmont" overture, followed by the Piano concerto no. 3 in C minor with Mr. Ashkenazy as soloist. Following intermission, the program is devoted to a performance of the Symphony no. 7 in A.

Tanglewood-On-Parade, the annual day-long demonstration of work by the Berkshire Music Center, takes place Tuesday, July 28 at 2 p.m. The festivities conclude with the Gala Concert at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed which celebrates the thirtieth anniversary season of the Berkshire Music Center and the 70th year of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the Berkshire Music Center Faculty. The program includes works by Bernstein, Bach, Hindemith, Copland and Tchaikovsky with Aaron Copland conducting the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, with soloist Lukas Foss, graduate of the Berkshire Music Center's first class in 1940. Following the program is the annual fireworks display over Stockbridge Bowl.

Soviet-born Vladimir Ashkenazy is currently making his fifth tour of North America and will visit more than 35 cities giving recitals and orchestra performances. He has won such competitions as the Queen Elizabeth Competition in Brussels, the International Chopin Competition in Warsaw and was a joint winner in the Second Tchaikovsky Competition. Mr. Ashkenazy made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last summer at Tanglewood.

The fourth Contemporary Trends Concert presented by Tanglewood takes place Monday, July 27 at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre - Concert Hall. Artists to be presented are Jeanne Lee (with Marion Brown, alto saxophone and Jack Gregg, bass) and the University of Illinois Jazz Band, John Garvey Leader.

FIFTH WEEK
BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL CONCERTS
TANGLEWOOD-ON-PARADE

Friday

7 p.m. Shed
Weekend Prelude
JOSEPH SILVERSTEIN violinist
JULES ESKIN cellist
RICHARD GOODE pianist
BEETHOVEN PROGRAM
Variations for violin, piano, and cello on Wenzel Muller's song Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu
Piano trio in E-flat Op. 70 no. 2

* * *

9 p.m. Shed
WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor
Claude
CLAUDE FRANK pianist
BEETHOVEN PROGRAM
Leonore overture no. 3
Piano concerto no. 2 in B-flat
King Stephen overture
Symphony no. 8 in F.

* * *

Saturday

10.30 a.m. Shed
Boston Symphony Orchestra—Open Rehearsal
8.30 p.m. Shed
WILLIAM STEINBERG conductor
ANDRE WATTS pianist
BEETHOVEN PROGRAM
Coriolan overture
Piano concerto no. 4 in G
Symphony no. 4 in B-flat

* * *

Sunday

2.30 p.m. Shed
ANTAL DORATI conductor
VLADIMIR ASHKENAZY pianist
BEETHOVEN PROGRAM
Egmont overture
Piano concerto no. 3 in c minor
Symphony no. 7 in A

* * *

Tuesday

8.30 p.m. Shed
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER ORCHESTRA
AARON COPLAND conductor
LUKAS FOSS pianist and conductor
Bernstein: Candide overture
Bach: Piano concerto in d minor
Hindemith: Metamorphosis on Themes of Weber
Copland: Suite from The Tender Land
Tchaikovsky: Romeo and Juliet

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUL 24 1970
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Sets Weekend Of Beethoven

William Steinberg, music director at Tanglewood, will conduct the Boston Symphony in an all-Beethoven program next weekend.

Steinberg will conduct the Friday evening concert featuring pianist Claude Frank and the Saturday evening program featuring pianist Andre Watts. Antal Dorati, guest conductor, will direct the Sunday afternoon performance with pianist Vladimar Ashkenazy as soloist.

The Weekend Prelude will feature violinist Joseph Silverstein, cellist Jules Eskin and pianist Richard Goode.

This is the first of two all-Beethoven weekends, commemorating the composer's bicentennial, slated at Tanglewood.

Schenectady Gazette
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
D. 55,034
JUL 28 1970

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813
JUL 30 1970
New England Newsclip

TIMES
BEVERLY, MASS.
(E) 9,230
JUL 22 1970
New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Concert for Beethoven

The first of two weekends by the Boston Symphony Orchestra commemorating the bicentennial of the birth of Beethoven begins at 9 p.m. Friday in the Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

Music director William Steinberg will conduct with Claude Frank as piano soloist in the first of three all-Beethoven concerts. The "Lenore" Overture No. 3 will be folowed by Piano Concerto No. 2 in B-flat, the "King Stephen" Overture, and Symphony No. 8 in F.

Pianist Andre Watts is soloist with conductor Steinberg Saturday evening. The program opens with the "Coriclan" Overture, followed by Watts' performance of he Piano Concerto No. 4 in G. The Symphony No. 4 in B-flat concludes the program.

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist with guest conductor Antal Dorati. The program includes the "Egmont" Overture, Piano Concerto No. 3 in C Minor, and Symphony No. 7 in A.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

GREENVILLE LOCAL
Wednesday, July 29, 1970

All-Beethoven At Tanglewood This Week-End

The first of two weekends by the Boston Symphony Orchestra commemorating the bicentennial of the birth of Beethovan begins this Friday evening, July 31 at 9 p. m. in Tanglewood's Shed with Music Director William Steinberg conducting and Claude Frank as piano soloist. The first of three all-Beethoven concerts by Boston Symphony opens with a performance of the Leonore overture No. 3, followed by the Piano concerto No. 2 in B-flat with Mr. Frank as piano soloist. Following intermission, Mr. Steinberg conducts the King Stephen overture and the Symphony No. 8 in F.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p. m. in the Shed, presents Boston Symphony Orchestra Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, principal cellist Jules Eskin, and pianist Richard Goode in Beethoven's Variation for piano, violin, and cello on Wenzel Muller's song "Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu" and the Piano trio in E-flat, Op. 70, No. 2. Weekend Prelude recitals are free to ticket-holders of the 9 p. m. Symphony concert.

Open Rehearsal Saturday morning at 10:30 a. m. in the Shed presents Guest Conductor Antal Dorati pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy rehearsing with the Boston Symphony for the concert the following day.

Pianist Andre Watts is soloists with Conductor William Steinberg Saturday evening, August 1. The program opens with Coriolan overture, followed by Mr. Watts' performance of the Piano concerto No. 4 in G. The Symphony No. 4 in B-flat concludes the program.

Sunday, August 2 at 2:30 in the Shed, pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist with Guest Conductor Antal Dorati. The program begins with the Egmont overture, followed by the Piano concerto No. 3 in c minor with Mr. Ashkenazy as soloist. Following intermission, the program is devoted to a performance of the Symphony No. 7 in A.

Tanglewood-On-Parade, the annual day-long demonstration of work by the Berkshire Music Center, takes place Tuesday, starting at 2 p. m. The festivities conclude with the Gala Concert at 8:30 p m. in the Shed which celebrates the thirtieth anniversary season of the Berkshire Music Center and the 70th year of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the Berkshire Music Center Faculty. The program includes works by Bernstein, Bach, Hidemith, Copland and Tchaikovsky with Aaron Copland conducting the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, with soloist Lukas Foss, graduate of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, with soloist Lukas Foss, graduate of the Berkshire Music Center's first class in 1940. Following the program is the annual fireworks display over Stockbridge Bowl.

Tanglewood Weekend

The first of two weekends by the Boston Symphony Orchestra commemorating the bicentennial of the birth of Beethoven begins tomorrow evening, July 31 at 9 p.m. in Tanglewood's Shed with Music Director William Steinberg conducting and Claude Frank as piano soloist. The first of three all-Beethoven concerts by the Boston Symphony opens with a performance of the "Leonore" overture no. 3, followed by the Piano concerto no. 2 in B-flat with Mr. Frank as piano soloist. Following intermission, Mr. Steinberg conducts the "King Stephen" overture and the Symphony no. 8 in F.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents Boston Symphony Orchestra Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, principal cellist Jules Eskin, and pianist Richard Goode in Beethoven's Variations for piano, violin, and cello on Wenzel Muller's song "Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu" and the Piano trio in E-flat, Op. 70, no. 2. Weekend Prelude recitals are free to ticket-holders of the 9 p.m. Symphony concert.

The Open Rehearsal Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed presents Guest Conductor Antal Dorati and pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy rehearsing with the Boston Symphony for the concert the following day.

Pianist Andre Watts is soloist with Conductor William Steinberg Saturday evening, Aug. 1. The program opens with the "Coriolan" overture, followed by Mr. Watts' performance of the Piano concerto no. 4 in G. The Symphony no. 4 in B-flat concludes the program.

In February of 1963, Leonard Bernstein introduced 16-year-old Andre Watts to U.S. televiewers from coast to coast as soloist for a New York Philharmonic Young People's Concert. The performance was so spectacular that Mr. Watts was engaged 20 days later as last minute substitute for the ailing Glenn Gould at a regular Philharmonic subscription concert. In the intervening seven years, Mr. Watts has made numerous American concert tours, including three appearances with the Boston Symphony in 1969. He has also made several European tours, including a world tour with Zubin Mehta and the Los Angeles Philharmonic for the United States State Department in the fall of 1967.

Sunday, Aug. 2 at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist with Guest Conductor Antal Dorati. The program begins with the "Egmont" overture, followed by the Piano concerto no. 3 in minor with Mr. Ashkenazy.

YOUNG PIANIST . . . At Tanglewood on Saturday, August 1 at 8:30 p.m., Andre Watts will play Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4.

76

Berkshire Week
July 25

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 31 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood To Mark Deaths of Two Noted Conductors

Tanglewood will mark the deaths of two noted conductors this week by starting the weekend concerts with the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica."

Sir John Barbirolli died in London on Tuesday and George Szell, conductor of the Cleveland Symphony, died in Cleveland yesterday. The announced programs will be the same except for the substitution of the Funeral March in place of the regular short introductions.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 31 1970 New England Newsclip

BSO Concert Is Dedicated To Barbirolli

Tonight's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been dedicated to the memory of Sir John Barbirolli, who died Tuesday in London. Sir John conducted the BSO some 10 times, the last occasion in 1964 in Boston.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175

AUG 1 1970 New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD, Berkshire Festival, Lenox, Mass., presents Boston Symphony in Beethoven program 8:30 tonight and 2:30 p.m. Sunday, Steinberg conducting; Haydn, Roussel and Stravinsky program 9 p.m. Friday, Lombard conducts. Open rehearsals in the shed 10:30 a.m. Saturdays ($3 each, unreserved, available in a.m.). Tickets for regular concerts: $4-$8.50. Weekend preludes at 7 p.m. each Friday, two-hours before Boston Symphony concert, features guest artists and members of the orchestra in short recitals, free for Friday p.m. ticket holders. Further information: 1-413-637-1600.

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(E) 23,000 (S) 87,000

AUG 2 1970 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE MUSICAL FESTIVAL, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. — Today at 2:30 p.m., pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy with guest conductor Antal Dorati and the Boston Symphony orchestra in all Beethoven program; Friday at 7 p.m. weekend prelude with the Berkshire Boy choir, George Guest, conductor (free to holders of 9 p.m. tickets); Friday at 9 p.m., the Boston Symphony orchestra with Alain Lombard, music director of the Greater Miami Philharmonic, as guest conductor in program of Haydn, Roussel and Stravinsky's "Petrushka;" open rehearsal, Saturday at 10:30 a.m. with Charles Mackerras and Boston Symphony principal cellist Jules Eskin; Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Boston Symphony with associate conductor Michael Tilson Thomas, conducting; pianist Gary Graffman as soloist, in a program of Rimsky-Korsakov, Prokofiev and Debussy; next Sunday at 2:30 p.m., guest conductor Charles Mackerras, music director of the Sadlers Wells Opera company, makes his debut with the Boston Symphony; principal cellist Jules Eskin as soloist, in program of Webern, Dvorak and Shostakovich.

CITIZEN
MILFORD, CONN.
(M) 8,600 (S) 7,500

JUL 27 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood

Beethoven's Bicentennial To Be Celebrated

The first of two weekends by the Boston Symphony Orchestra commemorating the bicentennial of the birth of Beethoven will begin Friday, July 31, at 9 p.m. in Tanglewood's Shed, with music director William Steinberg conducting and Claude Frank as piano soloist. The first of three Beethoven concerts will open with a performance of the "Leonore" overture, No. 3, followed by the Piano Concerto No. 2 in B Flat, with Mr. Frank as piano soloist. Following intermission, Mr. Steinberg will conduct the "King Stephen" overture and Symphony No. 8 in F.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7, will present Boston Symphony concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, principal cellist Jules Eskin and pianist Richard Goode in Beethoven's variations for piano, violin and cello on Wenzel Muller's song "Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu" and the Piano Trio in E Flat, Op. 70, No. 2. Weekend Prelude recitals are free to ticketholders for the 9 o'clock concert.

The open rehearsal Saturday morning at 10:30 presents guest conductor Antal Dorati and pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy rehearsing with the BSO for the concert the following day. Tickets are $2.50, on sale the morning of the rehearsal and benefit the orchestra's pension fund.

Pianist Andre Watts is soloist with Steinberg on Saturday Aug. 1. The evening opens with the "Coriolan" overture, followed by Mr. Watts' performance of the Piano Concerto No. 4 in G. Symphony No. 4 in B Flat concludes the program.

In February of 1963, Leonard Bernstein introduced 16-year-old Andre Watts to U.S. televiewers from coast to coast as soloist for a New York Philarmonic Young People's Concert. The performance was so spectacular that Mr. Watts was engaged 20 days later as last-minute substitute for the ailing Glenn Gould at a regular Philharmonic subscription concert. In the intervening seven years, he has made numerous American concert tours, including three appearances with the Boston Symphony in 1969. He has also made several European tours, including a world tour with Zubin Mehta and the Los Angeles Philharmonic for the U.S. State Department in the fall of 1967.

Sunday, Aug. 2, at 2:30 p.m., Dorati will lead the "Egmont" overture, followed by the Piano Concerto No. 3 in C Minor with Mr. Ashkenazy as soloist. Following intermission, the program will be devoted to a performance of the Symphony No. 7 in A.

The Soviet-born pianist is currently making his fifth tour of North America and will visit more than 35 cities giving recitals and orchestra performances. He has won such competitions as the Queen Elizabeth competition in Brussels, the International Chopin competition in Warsaw and was a joint winner in the second Tchaikovsky competition. Mr. Ashkenazy made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last summer at Tanglewood.

Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual day-long demonstration of work by the Berkshire Music Center, will take place Tuesday, July 28, at 2 p.m. The festivities conclude with a gala concert at 8:30, celebrating the 30th anniversary season of the Center and the 70th year of Aaron Copland, chairman emeritus of the faculty. The program includes works by Bernstein, Bach, Hindemith, Copland and Tchaikovsky, with Mr. Copland conducting the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center orchestras, with soloist Lukas Foss, graduate of the Center's first class in 1940.

Following the program, the annual fireworks display over Stockbridge Bowl may be seen.

The fourth Contemporary Trends concert will take place Monday, July 27, at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Artists to be presented are Jeanne Lee (with Marion Brown, alto saxophone and Jack Gregg, bass) and the University of Illinois Jazz Band, John Garvey, leader.

Reserved tickets are priced at $4, and $3 is charged for admission to the lawn. Tickets may be purchased from the Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 31 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Celebrates Beethoven Bicentennial

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASSACHUSETTS—The first of two weekends by the Boston Symphony Orchestra commemorating the bicentennial of the birth of Beethoven begins Friday evening, July 31 at 9 pm in Tanglewood's Shed with Music Director William Steinberg conducting and Claude Frank as piano soloist. The first of three all-Beethoven concerts by the Boston Symphony opens with a performance of the Leonore overture no. 3, followed by the Piano concerto no. 2 in B-flat with Mr. Frank as piano soloist. Following intermission, Mr. Steinberg conducts the King Stephen overture and the Symphony no. 8 in F.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 pm in the Shed, presents Boston Symphony Orchestra Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, principal cellist Jules Eskin, and pianist Richard Goode in Beethoven's Variations for piano, violin, and cello on Wenzel Muller's song Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu and the Piano trio in E-flat, Op. 70, no. 2. Weekend Prelude recitals are free to ticket-holders of the 9 pm Symphony concert.

Open Rehearsal

The Open Rehearsal Saturday morning at 10:30 am in the Shed presents Guest Conductor Antal Dorati and pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy rehearsing with the Boston Symphony for the concert the following day. Tickets are on sale the morning of the rehearsal and benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Pianist Andre Watts is soloist with Conductor William Steinberg Saturday evening, August 1. The program opens with the Coriolan overture, followed by Mr. Watts' performance of the Piano concerto no. 4 in G. The Symphony no. 4 in B-flat concludes the program.

In February of 1963, Leonard Bernstein introduced 16 year old Andre Watts to U.S. televiewers from coast to coast as soloist for a New York Philharmonic Young People's Concert. The performance was so spectacular that Mr. Watts was engaged 20 days later as last minute substitute for the ailing Glenn Gould at a regular Philharmonic subscription concert. In the intervening seven years, Mr. Watts has made numerous American concert tours, including three appearances with the Boston Symphony in 1969. He has also made several European tours, including a world tour with Zubin Mehta and the Los Angeles Philharmonic for the United States State Department in the fall of 1967.

Sunday, August 2 at 2:30 pm in theShed, pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist with Guest Conductor Antal Dorati. The program begins with the Egmont overture, followed by the Piano concerto no. 3 in c minor with Mr. Ashkenazy as soloist. Following intermission, the program is devoted to a performance of the Symphony no. 7 in A.

Soviet-born Vladimir Ashkenazy is currently making his fifth tour of North America and will visit more than 35 cities giving recitals and orchestra performances. He has won such competitions as the Queen Elizabeth Competition in Brussels, the International Chopin Competition in Warsaw and was a joing winner in the Second Tchaikovsky Competition. Mr. Ashkenazy made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last summer at Tanglewood.

Tanglewood On Parade

Tanglewood-On-Parade, the annual day-long demonstration of work by the Berkshire Music Center, takes place Tuesday, July 28 at 2 pm. The festivities conclude with the Gala Concert at 8:30 pm in the Shed which celebrates the thirtieth anniversary season of the Berkshire Music Center and the 70th year of Aaron Copland, Chairman Emeritus of the Berkshire Music Center Faculty. The program includes works by Bernstein, Bach, Hindemith, Copland and Tchaikovsky with Aaron Copland conducting the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, with soloist Lukas Foss, graduate of the Berkshire Music Center's first class in 1940. Following the program is the annual fireworks display over Stockbridge Bowl.

The fourth Contemporary Trends Concert presented by Tanglewood takes place Monday, July 27 at 8:30 pm in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Artists to be presented are Jeanne Lee (with Marion Brown, alto saxophone and Jack Gregg, bass) and the University of Illinois Jazz Band, John Garvey Leader. Tickets may be purchased from the Festival Ticket Office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts 01240.

AL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER
CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK
STATE SERVICE

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Tuesday, July 28, 1970

Tanglewood Concert for Beethoven

The first of two weekends by the Boston Symphony Orchestra commemorating the bicentennial of the birth of Beethoven begins at 9 p.m. Friday in the Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

Music director William Steinberg will conduct with Claude Frank as piano soloist in the first of three all-Beethoven concerts. The "Lenore" Overture No. 3 will be folowed by Piano Concerto No. 2 in B-flat, the "King Stephen" Overture, and Symphony No. 8 in F.

Pianist Andre Watts is soloist with conductor Steinberg Saturday evening. The program opens with the "Coriclan" Overture, followed by Watts' performance of he Piano Concerto No. 4 in G. The Symphony No. 4 in B-flat concludes the program.

On Sunday at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist with guest conductor Antal Dorati. The program includes the "Egmont" Overture, Piano Concerto No. 3 in C Minor, and Symphony No. 7 in A.

ANDRE WATTS

Boston Symphony to note bicentennial of Beethoven

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS — The first of two weekends by the Boston Symphony Orchestra commemorating the bicentennial of the birth of Beethoven begins Friday evening at 9 in Tanglewood's Shed with music director William Steinberg conducting and Claude Frank as piano soloist.

The first of three all-Beethoven concerts by the Boston Symphony opens with a performance of the "Leonore Overture No. 3," followed by the Piano Concerto No. 2 in B Flat with Frank as soloist. Following intermission, Steinberg conducts the "King Stephen Overture" and the Symphony No. 8 in F.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents Boston Symphony concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, principal cellist Jules Eskin, and pianist Richard Goode in Beethoven's Variations for piano, violin, and cello on Wenzel Muller's song "Ich Bin der Schneider Kakadu" and the Piano Trio in E Flat, Op. 70, No. 2.

The Open Rehearsal Saturday morning at 10:30 in the Shed presents guest conductor Antal Dorati and pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy rehearsing with the symphony for the concert the following day.

Pianist Andre Watts is soloist with conductor William Steinburg Saturday Evening, Aug. 1. The program opens with the Coriolan Overture, followed by Watts' performance of the Piano concerto No. 4 in G. The Symphony No. 4 in B-flat concludes the program.

In 1963' Leonard Bernstein introudced 16-year-old Watts to U.S. televiewers from coast to coast as soloist for a New York Philharmonic Young People's Concert. The performance was so spectacular that Watts was engaged 20 days later as last minute substitute for the ailing Glenn Gould at a regular Philharmonic subscription concert.

In the intervening seven years, the pianist has made numerous American concert tours, including three appearances with the Boston Symphony in 1969. He has also made several European tours, including a world tour with Zubin Mehta and the Los Angeles Philharmonic for the U.S. State Department in the Fall of 1967.

Next Sunday at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist with guest conductor Dorati. The program begins with the "Egmont Overture," followed by the Piano Concerto No. 3 in C Minor with Ashkenazy as soloist. Following intermission, the program is devoted to a performance of the Symphony No. 7 in A.

Soviet-born Ashkenazy is making his fifth tour of North America and will visit more than 35 cities giving recitals and orchestra performances. He has won the Queen Elizabeth Competition in Brussels, the International Chopin Competition in Warsaw and was a joint winner in the Second Tchaikovsky Competition. Ashkenazy made his debut with the Boston Symphony last summer at Tanglewood.

Tanglewood-on-Parade, the annual day-long demonstration of work by the Berkshire Music Center, is set for Tuesday at 2 p.m. The festivities conclude with the Gala Concert at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed which celebrates the 30th anniversary season of the Berkshire Music Center and the 70th year of Aaron Copland, chairman emeritus of the Berkshire Music Center Faculty. The program includes works by Bernstein, Bach, Hindemith, Copland and Tchaikovsky with Aaron Copland conducting the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, with soloist Lukas Foss, graduate of the Berkshire Music Center's first class in 1940. Following the program is the annual fireworks display over Stockbridge Bowl.

The fourth Contemporary Trends Concert takes place tomorrow at 8:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Artists to be presented are Jeanne Lee, with Marion Brown, alto saxophone and Jack Gregg, Baes, and the University of Illinois Jazz Band, John Garvey leader.

ANDRE WATTS at Tanglewood

FLUSHING, N. Y.
FRESH MEADOWS
TOWNSMAN
(NEW YORK CITY MARKET AREA)
W. 24,000

JUL 23 1970

BOSTON AFTER DARK
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 7,500

AUG 11 1970

New England Newsclip

PAGE ONE

Beethoven in the Berkshires

Pianist ANDRE WATTS will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra's soloist on Saturday evening, August 1st, under the baton of William Steinberg, playing the Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto in the Tanglewood Music Shed as a highlight of the 8-week Berkshire Music Festival.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, July 26, 1970

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUL 26 1970

New England

Pianists Scheduled at Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — The first of two weekends by the Boston Symphony Orchestra commemorating the bicentennial of the birth of Beethoven begins Friday evening at 9 in Tanglewood's Shed with Music Director William Steinberg conducting and Claude Frank as piano soloist. The first of three all-Beethoven concerts by the Boston Symphony opens with a performance of the Leonore overture No. 3, followed by the Piano concerto no. 2 in B-flat with Frank as piano soloist. Following intermission, Steinberg conducts the King Stephen overture and the Symphony no. 8 in F.

* * *

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents Boston Symphony Orchestra Concertmaster Joseph Silverstein, principal cellist Jules Eskin, and pianist Richard Goode in Beethoven's Variations for piano, violin and cello on Wenzel Muller's song Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu and the Piano trio in E-flat, Op. 70, no. 2.

The Open Rehearsal Saturday morning at 10.30 in the Shed presents Guest Conductor Antal Dorati and pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy rehearsing with the Boston Symphony for the concert the following day.

* * *

Pianist Andre Watts is soloist with Conductor William Steinberg Saturday evening. The program opens with the Coriolan overture, followed by Watts' performance of the Piano concerto no. 4 in G. The Symphony no. 4 in B-flat concludes the program.

In February of 1963, Leonard Bernstein introduced 16 year old Andre Watts to U.S. televiewers from coast to coast as soloist for a New York Philharmonic Young People's Concert. The performance was so spectacular that Watts was engaged 20 days later as last minute substitute for the ailing Glenn Gould at a regular Philharmonic subscription concert. In the intervening seven years, Watts has made numerous American concert tours, including three appearances with the Boston Symphony in 1969. He has also made several European tours, including a world tour with Zubin Mehta and the Los Angeles Philharmonic for the United States State Department in the fall of 1967.

* * *

Next Sunday at 2.30 p.m. in the Shed, pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy is soloist with Guest Conductor Antal Dorati. The program begins with the Egmont overture, followed by the Piano concerto no.3 in c minor with Ashkenazy as soloist. Following intermission, the program is devoted to a performance of the Symphony no. 7 in A.

Soviet-born Vladimir Ashkenazy is currently making his fifth tour of North America and will visit more than 35 cities giving recitals and orchestra performances. He has won such competitions as the Queen Elizabeth Competition in Brussels, the International Chopin Competition in Warsaw and was a joint winner in the Second Tchaikovsky Competition. Ashkenazy made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last summer at Tanglewood.

Tanglewood - On - Parade, the annual day-long demonstration of work by the Berkshire Music Center takes place Tuesday at 2 p.m. The festivities conclude with the gala concert at 8.30 in the Shed which celebrates the 30th anniversary season of the Berkshire Music Center and the 70th year of Aaron Copland, chairman emeritus of the Berkshire Music Center Faculty.

The program includes works by Bernstein, Bach, Hindemith, Copland and Tchaikovsky with Aaron Copland conducting the Boston Symphony and Berkshire Music Center Orchestra, with soloist Lukas Foss, graduate of the Berkshire Music Center's first class in 1940. Following the program is the annual fireworks display over Stockbridge Bowl.

* * *

The fourth Contemporary Trends Concert presented by Tanglewood takes place Monday at 8.30 p.m. in the Theater-Concert Hall. Artists to be presented are Jeanne Lee (with Marion Brown; alto saxophone and Jack Gregg, bass) and the University of Illinois Jazz Band, John Garvey Leader.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

JUL 27 1970

New England Newsclip

New York Post
D. 708,180 SAT. 369,902

JUL 27 1970

SPRINGFIELD HERALD
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 104,000

JUL 29 1970

New England Newsclip

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

JUL 27 1970

New England Newsclip

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

29 1970

New England Newsclip

To Perform

At Tanglewood on August 1 at 8:30 p.m., Andre Watts will play Beethoven's Piano concerto no. 4. In February of 1963, Leonard Bernstein introduced Andre Watts to U.S. Televiewers from coast to coast as soloist for the New York Philharmonic Young People's Concert. The performance of the 16-year-old boy was so spectacular that, on the strength of it, Watts was engaged just 20 days later as last minute substitute for the ailing Glenn Gould. At Tanglewood, he will be performing under the baton of William Steinberg.

NEW YORK
Amsterdam News
W. 82,123

AUG 1 1970

Watts Plays

Pianist Andre Watts will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra's soloist on Saturday evening, Aug. 1, under the baton of William Steinberg, playing the Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto in the Tanglewood Music Shed as a highlight of the 8-week Berkshire Music Festival.

Whitestone Photo

William Steinberg

After a six months absence, the music director of the Boston Symphony will return to conduct the orchestra at Tanglewood on Friday and Saturday evenings this week, and on Aug. 14 and 15 in four all-Beethoven programs, which will include three of the piano concertos, the Choral Fantasy, and the Ninth Symphony.

BLANK PAGE

78

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

AUG 13 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Weekend

Lombard, Thomas, MacKerras Conduct

The Friday Prelude brought a return of the Berkshire Boy Choir under the Englishman from Cambridge, George Guest. In its impeccable style the choir sang five Renaissance motets and four modern settings of folk songs. The lively resonance of the male voices gave balancing support to the flutey purity of the boys voices.

Alain Lombard is a young French conductor of experience, at present musical director of the Miami Philharmonic. His interpretations of Haydn, Roussel and Stravinsky had the clarity and brio of best French tradition. Symphony no. 88 had the excitement of sharp contrasts with a sensitive, flowing Largo and a final Allegro in which con spirito was taken to mean presto, thereby losing some of its grace by acquiring dash.

Suite no. 2 from Roussel's ballet: Bacchus and Ariane, should be heard again soon. Roussel, something of a conservative around 1900 was yet original and fresh-sounding. This piece, full of inner movement and color, is richly orchestrated.

We've been hearing all the Stravinsky ballets, and now the turn came for Petrushka, which could well be a French production. Lombard used the whole score (not a suite-from) so that the whole tragi-comedy of the puppet's adventure and fate are suggested. Lombard got the raw variety and tone of parody proper to the sophistication of the piece. Unlike the other ballets this one merely stops as the fair peters out and suffers somewhat without the story-dance but never nods.

Saturday night, Michael Tilson Thomas had his best production so far. A bit from Rimsky-Korsakov's Easter Festival—the quiet color of old Orthodox chants led to the sparkling Piano concerto No. 3, in C by Prokofiev, which had its premiere not in Russia but in Chicago in 1921. It is easy to take, especially with Gary Graffman integrating the piano into the orchestration. The piece is tricked out with upsweeping scales, chattering figurations (so also Mozart) quick climaxes galore, but oh, the marches. Every movement has some passage of march-music that would stir the cockles of a Russian bureaucrat—even the andante had a slow dance with a tickle in it. Graffman and Thomas were in spirited accord.

Debussy's Prelude to Afternoon of a Faun was more sensuously languishing than ever —like the Mallarme poem, erotic dream. The Satie Deaux gymopedies is thin, smart stuff, even with Debussy's orchestration, but a good foil for the great Debussy of La Mer. This is, of course, no sea-impressionism but one of the finest expressionistic dreams of remembering response to the force and form of nature. The BSO has played it well many times but never with as much care for the meshing of instrumental detail, the blending of colors ('cellos on an upward phrase subtly taken away by the french horns, etc.) or the precise distinction from the mass by solo winds, and always small rhythms animating deeper surges. Thomas and the men of the orchestra were obviously caught up in this recreation, responding to each other.

Sunday afternoon Charles MacKerras, music director of the Sadler Wells Opera Company of London and a fartraveler as guest conductor, produced the miniatures, the Six Pieces for Orchestra by Webern, as a titillating beginning, contriving a chamber music delicacy that draws the sponse and suddenly, a rare memory.

Dvorak's Cello concerto in B minor is a labored fraud, short moments of authentic Bohemian inspiration built up to bigness with shoddy material. Jules Eskin played superbly. But Shostokovich, as of 1937, redeemed the program. His Symphony no. 5 is a reminder of great simplicities difficult for avant garde composers hereabouts. But in no. 5 the composer is never trite even in his grandest moments. The classic idea of themes and developments is still alive, allowing a richness of strange experience with tap roots, like a fountain of a tree. And he really uses the total orchestra —favoring, like Tchaikovsky, passages of dark melody in the deep strings, or all strings in impressive unity, powerful, massive brass, woodwind solo voices emerging. The last two chords are a wide-spreading quiet of living tone that harmonizes all drama in acceptance. Mr. MacKerras' operative experience had given him fine command of this over score, which was appreciated by the large audience.

TIMES
HARTFORD, CONN.
(S) 186,232
(E) 8,261

AUG 10 1970 New England Newsclip

Weekend at Tanglewood: Concerts of Sensitivity

By RUTHANNE DEVLIN
Times Staff Writer

LENOX, Mass. — After six weeks playing at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last weekend renewed its reputation as one of the most reliable and consistently capable musical instruments in America. Of the three concerts played Friday and Saturday nights and on Sunday afternoon, all were performed well, one exceptionally so.

Friday, the young Frenchman Alain Lombard, presently musical director of the Miami, Fla., Philharmonic, led the Bostonians through a program of Haydn's Sym. 88, Roussel's Bacchus et Ariane, and Stravinsky's Petrushka (the 1947 revised edition).

The Haydn work is a delicately molded collection of felicitous tunes, great dynamic variety, hints of the Beethoven-to-come, and, under Mr. Lombard's direction, a distinctly heavily Teutonic flavor in the last movement. He conducted this work, and the others, with his baton kept low and pointed down, and an unusual posture, especially from a man noted as an operatic conductor and who must have his hands clearly visible.

Despite this unusual platform manner, Mr. Lombard communicated his energy and enthusiasm for the music to the orchestra, notably in the Roussel. The piece echoes Faust, a bacchanal, dream sequences and dances. Although the orchestra in Petrushka occasionally went its own way, Mr. Lombard had a firm expressive control in the Roussel suite.

Michael Tilson Thomas, the BSO's associate conductor, Saturday night directed the most beautiful, expressive and poetic interpretations of Debussy's La Mer we have ever heard. He must record it. Mr. Thomas possesses great poise, especially for one so young (26 in December), a bedrock tempo sense, and he shaped the richly colored impressionistic seascape with great sensitivity. He utilized a large beat with broad unmistakable sweeping strokes to great advantage, including in the other Debussy work, "Prelude to an afternoon of a faun," and Satie's Deux Gymnopedies, which was orchestrated by Debussy.

Pianist Gary Graffman performed the Prokofiev third concerto with customary skill. Its lightness and apparent simplicity was dampened occasionally by too strong playing. The piece is by no means a cosmic work, and deserves more levity. It is a small criticism, however, and doesn't mar the overall excellence of his interpretation.

Charles Mackerras, Sunday's conductor, is considered one of the most widely travelling conductors, for good reason: he has clear direction, a sense for contemporary music, and a faithfulness to the composer's intent.

When first performed in 1913, Webern's "Six Pieces for Orchestra" caused a riot. The music's transparent sonorities and new ways of combining instruments (chimes, drum, and suspended cymbal, for one) are appreciated today, however, especially when performed so skillfully.

Soloist in the Dvorak cello concerto was the BSO's principal Jules Eskin. He showed great flowing tone, despite a little pitch trouble. He tended to take the second movement a bit slowly, albeit with imaginative solo parts.

The final work, Shostakovich's fifth symphony, was buoyant and march-like and compatible with the composer's declaimed intent—"the making of a man." Unlike some interpreters, Mackerras restrained himself from overly romanticizing the work, even to the regal finale, which could have been a little faster.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 8 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Concert

Lombard Conducts Boston Symphony

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Alain Lombard gave Tanglewood a boistrous and somewhat spectacular concert Friday night for his first appearance as a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

His program was varied, although fairly standard—a Haydn symphony (no 88) from 1787, a colorful French ballet suite from 1930 and Stravinskys big bright ballet 'Petrushka,' from 1911.

He led them subjectively, that is, with somewhat more personal interpretational than is commonly encountered among the younger conductors.

He is 30, born in Paris a winner of the Mitropoulos competition for conductors, a former assistant for Von Karajan, a former assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic and present music director of the Great Miami Philharminic.

On the podium, he is concise frugal of motion and apparently very clearly communicative. He is also unusually handsome for a conductor with black wavy hair and broad shoulders.

With the Haydn, his 'interpretation' seemed to result in a wider dynamic range, clipped phrasing and languid lyricism; it was just a bit quicker, slower louder softer. The purists probably objected, but it was interesting and unusual.

The Roussel Piece (Bacchus et Ariane Suite No. 2. Opus 43) is more romantic than most concertgoers have learned to expect from the suave, sophisticated French composers, and Lombard was more animated for it...also noisier.

The piece was, in 1930 when it was written, a reasonable musical and emotional descendent of the Stravinsky style which gave us 'Petrushka' in 1911.

And at Tanglewood Friday, its occassional brilliance before intermission prepared the audience for the Stravinsky that followed.

Petrushka (which was played in the 1947 revised version) is a work of genius, however, and it resisted with pride and substance the conductor's tendency to lead it into the same sort of noisiness that marred the Roussel piece.

The slim audience (4624) gave both a rousing reception, probably because of their bright colors and endless action.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 8 1970 New England Newsclip

Boy Choir Returns to Tanglewood

LENOX — The Berkshire Boy Choir returned to Tanglewood Friday evening for its fifth appearance in the fourth year of its existence and gave the excellent performance expected of it.

The choir was founded in 1967 to give choristers chosen by competitive audition throughout the country eight summer weeks of intensive training. It is based at Cranwell School, Lenox.

This year there are 65 voices in two groups, 50 treble boys and 15 men. The concert choir includes the men and 30 boys aged 12 and 13 and the cathedral choir includes eight men and 20 boys aged 12 and under.

Friday they presented nine unaccompanied pieces for the 7 p. m. prelude concert preceding the 9 p. m. regular performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Conductor was George Guest, who led the group its first year. Guest is also organist of St. John's College, Cambridge, England, and lecturer in music at the University of Cambridge.

The first six pieces were sung by the concert choir, the last three by the combined choirs. Both groups illustrated the best style one might hear in a serious boy choir: a range of dynamics and phrase that is wide enough to be expressive but not exaggerated, incisive starts and stops, clean diction and a balance of vocal tones that blend to a golden, rather than silver, sexless sound.

The pieces offered ranged from the 15th through the 20th centuries and were best, in my view, when presenting slow, quiet, liquid counterpoint.

RCH

Festival Weekend Excites Audience

The sixth weekend of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood was a most exciting and interesting one, as two young, new and accomplished conductors made their debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra's festival audience.

Friday evening brought the 30-year-old French conductor, Alain Lombard, who is currently musical director of the greater Miami, (Fla.) Philharmonic. The varied and delightful program was beautifully performed under his energetic and enthusiastic direction.

The Haydn Symphony 88 was especially noteworthy, followed by Roussel's Bacchus et Ariane op.43 (suite No. 2). The last half of the program presented Stravinsky's capricious, bizarre and ever enchanting Petrushka (the revised 1947 edition). The audience of 4,624 was wildly enthusiastic.

Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's associate conductor, demonstrated his skill and poise on Saturday evening. The highlight of this concert can be attributed to both conductor as well as guest soloist, Gary Graffman, for his performance of Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3 in C op. 26. He brought out all the composer's nuances of the poetic, precocious and profound passages. The skillful blending of the piano with the orchestra for melodic and dynamic mastery, especially in the third movement, catapulted the audience of 9,036 into a tremendous roar of applause at the concerto's end. Graffman is a very strong and skillful pianist and his interpretation was a great and dynamic one.

French "moderns"—Debussy's prelude to "Afternoon of a Faun", was exquisitely rendered by the orchestra, with special mention and praise going to Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer for her flute solo. They were followed by Satie's Deux gymnopedies, piano pieces originally orchestrated by Debussy, and the piece de resistance. . .Debussy's "La mer" (the Sea), three symphonic sketches which musically described this composer's great passion for the sea. This performance was beautiful and Thomas and the orchestra received a standing ovation.

Sunday afternoon's concert was conducted by Charles Mackerras, the second new conductor of the weekend making his first appearance with the Boston Symphony. It was evident from the start that this was an accomplished and talented conductor who had good control of the orchestra and a confident and sure manner in his knowledge of the music and the interpretation required.

Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra started the program and the orchestra's playing was nothing short of sheer beauty of this modern work. It was first conducted by Arnold Schoenberg at a concert in Vienna in 1913, along with other moderns and the music was so radical in construction that it provoked a riot in the audience then. This composition created new tone colors and the composer's effect with muted tones was an innovation. It was exquisitely played by the orchestra under Mackerras' careful direction. This was pure poetry in sound.

Jules Eskin, first chair cellist with the Boston Symphony, was the soloist in Dvorak's Cello Concerto in B minor, op. 104. His performance was true virtuoso playing and this melodic and sensitive work was given a beautiful reading by both orchestra and soloist. The audience loved it.

Sunday's concert concluded with Shostakovich's 5th Symphony, an exploding and courageous work by this Russian composer, written for the celebration of the 20th anniversary in 1[illegible] of the USSR. It is a simplis[illegible]ork, for the most part, quite melodic with the underlying theme of "the making of a man," and almost romantic in its main theme, which starts in the first movement and develops with the strings, taken over by the woodwinds, returned during the finale for the brasses and percussions.

Mackerras' direction was clear-cut, assured, expansive and strong, which suited the mood and demands of this exciting work. The audience of 6,263 was wildly enthusiastic. This reviewer found this conductor most impressive.

The sixth weekend was indeed a most memorable musical experience with a total of 22,646 attending the three concerts.

Next weekend is again devoted to Beethoven and return William Steinberg to the podium to conduct Friday and Saturday concerts. Friday evening will feature Rudolf Firkusny as piano soloist in Beethoven's "Emporer" Concerto No. 5 and the "Eroica" Symphony No. 3 is the great work. Saturday's concert will present Jerome Lowenthal playing Beethoven's "Choral Fantasy" and Steinberg conducts the 9th Symphony ("Choral"), featuring soloists Gwendolin Sims, Eunice Alberts, William Cochran and Thomas Paul, with the Chorus Pro Musica, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Sunday afternoon Max Rudolf is the guest conductor and Jerome Lowenthal will be the featured artist in the Piano Concerto No. 1 of Beethoven. The program will end with Beethoven's popular 5th Symphony.

AMERICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(E) 42,315
AUG 12 1970 New England Newsclip

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,000 (S) 36,[illegible]
AUG 12 1970 New England Newsclip

Two New Conductors Excel At Tanglewood

The sixth weekend of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood was a most exciting and interesting one, as two young, new and accomplished conductors made their debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra's festival audience.

Friday evening brought the 30-year-old French conductor, Alain Lombard, who is currently musical director of the greater Miami, (Fla.) Philharmonic. The varied and delightful program was beautifully performed under his energetic and enthusiastic direction.

The Haydn Symphony 88 was especially noteworthy, followed by Roussel's Bacchus et Ariane op.43 (suite No. 2). The last half of the program presented Stravinsky's capricious, bizarre and ever enchanting Petrushka (the revised 1947 edition). The audience of 4,624 was wildly enthusiastic.

Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's associate conductor, demonstrated his skill and poise on Saturday evening. The highlight of this concert can be attributed to both conductor as well as guest soloist, Gary Graffman, for his performance of Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 3 in C op. 26. He brought out all the composer's nuances of the poetic, precocious and profound passages. The skillful blending of the piano with the orchestra for melodic and dynamic mastery, especially in the third movement, catapulted the audience of 9,036 into a tremendous roar of applause at the concerto's end. Graffman is a very strong and skillful pianist and his interpretation was a great and dynamic one.

French "moderns"—Debussy's prelude to "Afternoon of a Faun", was exquisitely rendered by the orchestra, with special mention and praise going to Mrs. Doriot Anthony Dwyer for her flute solo. They were followed by Satie's Deux gymnopedies, piano pieces originally orchestrated by Debussy, and the piece de resistance. . .Debussy's "La mer" (the Sea), three symphonic sketches which musically described this composer's great passion for the sea. This performance was beautiful and Thomas and the orchestra received a standing ovation.

Sunday afternoon's concert was conducted by Charles Mackerras, the second new conductor of the weekend making his first appearance with the Boston Symphony. It was evident from the start that this was an accomplished and talented conductor who had good control of the orchestra and a confident and sure manner in his knowledge of the music and the interpretation required.

Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra started the program and the orchestra's playing was nothing short of sheer beauty of this modern work. It was first conducted by Arnold Schoenberg at a concert in Vienna in 1913, along with other moderns and the music was so radical in construction that it provoked a riot in the audience then. This composition created new tone colors and the composer's effect with muted tones was an innovation. It was exquisitely played by the orchestra under Mackerras' careful direction. This was pure poetry in sound.

Jules Eskin, first chair cellist with the Boston Symphony, was the soloist in Dvorak's Cello Concerto in B minor, op. 104. His performance was true virtuoso playing and this melodic and sensitive work was given a beautiful reading by both orchestra and soloist. The audience loved it.

Sunday's concert concluded with Shostakovich's 5th Symphony, an exploding and courageous work by this Russian composer, written for the celebration of the 20th anniversary in 1937 of the USSR. It is a simplistic work, for the most part, quite melodic with the underlying theme of "the making of a man," and almost romantic in its main theme, which starts in the first movement and develops with the strings, taken over by the woodwinds, returned during the finale for the brasses and percussions.

Mackerras' direction was clear-cut, assured, expansive and strong, which suited the mood and demands of this exciting work. The audience of 6,263 was wildly enthusiastic. This reviewer found this conductor most impressive.

The sixth weekend was indeed a most memorable musical experience with a total of 22,646 attending the three concerts.

Next weekend is again devoted to Beethoven and return William Steinberg to the podium to conduct Friday and Saturday concerts. Friday evening will feature Rudolf Firkusny as piano soloist in Beethoven's "Emporer" Concerto No. 5 and the "Eroica" Symphony No. 3 is the great work. Saturday's concert will present Jerome Lowenthal playing Beethoven's "Choral Fantasy" and Steinberg conducts the 9th Symphony ("Choral"), featuring soloists Gwendolin Sims, Eunice Alberts, William Cochran and Thomas Paul, with the Chorus Pro Musica, and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Sunday afternoon Max Rudolf is the guest conductor and Jerome Lowenthal will be the featured artist in the Piano Concerto No. 1 of Beethoven. The program will end with Beethoven's popular 5th Symphony.

SSM

Two guest conductors at Tanglewood/a review

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — Two guest conductors new to the Boston Symphony appeared with the orchestra at Tanglewood during the weekend just past. Alain Lombard conducted the conert Friday evening, and Charles Mackeeras that on Sunday afternoon.

Lombard, 30, is the music director of the Greater Miami Philharmonic. He came to this country from France to conduct a performance of the American Opera Society as long ago as 1963, and since then he has been heard with the New York Philharmonic whose assistant conductor he became after being a winner in the 1966 Mitropolous competition, with the New York Opera Company, and with the Metropolitan Opera (including a "Carmen" in Boston).

For his Tanglewood debut he chose Haydn's symphony number 88 in G major, the second suite from Roussel's ballet score, "Bacchus et Ariane," and Stravinsky's "Petroushka," given in its 1947 revised version. Lombard's beat is large, angular and a bit violent. Though present in both hands almost all the time, it is perhaps less clear from the front than it seemed from behind; either that, or the orchestra just did not put itself out for him much. At any rate, the playing, even though there were some fine solos in "Petroushka," was mostly rough an noisy and the conductor's hard-driving charges through the music did little to clarify it.

Charles Mackeeras in his mid-40s, is music director of the Sadlers Wells Opera in London, and is probably best known in America for some interesting recordings of 18th century music. His Tanglewood program, however, drew on quite another musical world: he began with Webern's six pieces for orchestra, opus six; continued with Dvorak's cello concerto (composed, astoundingly enough, only 11 years earlier) in which the soloist was the orchestra's principal cellist, Jules Eskin, and he finished with the fifth symphony of Shostakovich.

MacKeeras is an excellent conductor. His work was clear and intelligent, coherent, and admirably attentive to dynamics and balances. The Webern pieces, though they are night rather than daylight music, benefitted particularly from MacKeeras' care: the various fadings of piano and pianissimo for once really meant something, and so did the Diminuendos.

To Dvorak's concerto, Eskin brought a lovely sound, though one not quite big enough. In all matters of detail, his playing was tasteful and sensible, but in its view of the piece as a whole it was rather sentimental and self-indulgent. It is a less than exceedingly concentrated piece anyhow, but with Dvorak's tempo markings taken more seriously, it can easily be made to sound less sprawling than it did Sunday afternoon. Dvorak has filled the piece with solos for flute, and both in the concerto and later in the Shostakovich symphony, Doriot Anthony Dwyer did some of her finest playing of recent seasons.

As one further musical intelligence from the weekend, I report that on my way home from Tanglewood I passed a car with a bumper sticker I had not seen before. Its message: "Beverly Sills is a good high."

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 257,967 (E) 194,70[illegible]
(S) 566,377
AUG 10 1970 New England Newsclip

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376
AUG 2 1970 New England Newsclip

RECORDS

Ray LaRocque

By RAY LaROCQUE
Of The Telegram Staff

THE SWEETEST and tenderest moments at this year's festival at Tanglewood could very well come on Friday when the Berkshire Boy Choir is the feature presentation. The choir, conducted by Brian Bennett, has a new RCA Victor LP called "Alleluia" which is ideal summer listening.

The vocal precision, the sweet, clean sounds make this collection enjoyable listening. Especially pleasant are these: John Wilbye's "Sweet honeysucking Bees," Purcell's "Hear My Prayer," and Dawson's "Ain'-a that Good News."

CUE REPORTS FROM

THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL

ALTHOUGH I was born, raised, and semi-educated in the South, I always absurdly feel—as I approach Lenox, Massachusetts—that I am going home again. And I feel the same about the neighboring Tanglewood/Berkshire Festival—although this, in my music commentator role, obviously makes slightly better sense. Perhaps it's because the kinship of festival and historical town make up a familial whole, an abiding and dual entity, reminding us that such splendid and baroque Southern human beings as Mark Twain and William Faulkner could not have flourished until New England's Nathaniel Hawthorne and Herman Melville had hewed the way. History and esthetic geography aside, the past and the current record of the Tanglewood Festival is one at which all American music festivals must aim. In the spring, there were dire reports of a cancellation this season. Perish the economics. The howls of candy-deprived babes would be as nothing compared to what we would hear were the caviar of the Boston Symphony in summer residence taken away from adults.

I chose the particular weekend on which I report because this fabulous and virtuoso orchestra was being led by three different conductors in three successive concerts—two very young, two in debut with the Boston, and one (Michael Tilson Thomas, the ensemble's associate conductor) fresh from several last-minute, save-the-day triumphs of the winter touring season. I heard and learned a lot.

Paris-born Alain Lombard, who is just 30, is, when he is not busy with international and recording commitments, the music director of the Greater Miami Philharmonic. His debut with the Boston Symphony, judging from inadvertently overheard Tanglewood Shed conversations, aroused as much controversy as would pre-packaged frozen sauce on haute cuisine. No controversy in my estimation: I thought M. Lombard was formidable. He is something of an international glamour boy on the podium, but if that image interests him, he does not show it. He grasps at the drama of a score as if he were drowning and it were the lifeline, and they both reach a safe haven. That he revealed the underrated, multi-layered glories of Roussel's second "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite was not surprising; that a keenly appreciative reading of Haydn's beloved and familiar Symphony No. 88 preceded the Roussel was most surprising. The Haydn had the dynamics and the romantic song—right where they fall; the Roussel, shot through with a percussive precision nothing short of amazing, had the pointillistic force of showers of meteors. I cooled during the finale, that 1947 revision of Stravinsky's immortal "Petrouchka." But these reservations had nothing to do with leader or orchestra, but rather with a scaling down of what should have been left alone. I love "Petrouchka" to its last originally scored note, and think 1947's were erratic "last thoughts."

On Saturday evening, 26-year-old Michael Tilson Thomas aroused students, patrons, and the most casual drop-ins to a frenzy. No wonder. For this real product of unreal Hollywood, California, deserved every moment of his ovation. By making superior music with his fluid hands and arms, he clearly has it made. He is already a learned conductor. He is meticulous; he has flair; he delights in fine detail; and he has an eloquent body English on the platform which is as musical as a dancer's. He was blessed by the collaboration of Gary Graffman, a pianist of whom it may be said that "nothing becomes him so much as his maturity." Together they offered as scintillating and probing a performance of the Third Piano Concerto by Prokofiev as I ever expect to hear. This interpretation of one of the most urbane and caustic concerti ever composed was strong enough to support traffic, yet it was suffused with a sense of longing, loss, and rue. Just as scored, there was not an ounce of fat on its elegant frame. This also was true of Mr. Tilson's other selections, which culminated in a vigorous look at Debussy's "La Mer," one which blended fireworks with respect and temperament. Four or five more young artists like Mr. Thomas, and I wouldn't trust anyone over 30.

Sunday's concluding concert was a letdown, and I was sorry. I was sorry because Charles Mackerras, the music director of London's Sadler's Wells Opera Company, and widely admired elsewhere and on many recordings, made a lacklustre debut with the Boston Symphony. Moreover, the principal cellist of the symphony, Jules Eskin, likewise foundered. Under Mr. Mackerras' baton, one heard, as it were, another orchestra overnight. The leader guided some seemingly bored men through Webern's Op. 6 Pieces for Orchestra, which was rather like setting a giant computer to delivering pins. That over, he and Mr. Eskin tred a dinosaurian path through Dvorak's Cello Concerto. Their leaden performance had little relationship to a rhapsodic score, being measure-for-measure unexceptional, dull, and metronomic. This kind of stiffness makes an intermission seem like a reward, but what followed—Shostakovich's Symphony No. 5—was harsher punishment. I admit that I find Shostakovich unbearably verbose as a symphonist, contemptible as a polemicist, and merely tolerable as a composer of light ballet scores. Of the ersatz Mahler which permeates and exposes the Shostakovich pretensions, you can say that the Russian early on gobbled up Mahler. He anticipated by decades the message of Marshall McLuhan: plunder sources, reproduce endlessly. In this derivative symphony, the ghost of a very great man is tortured by listless longueurs and febrile ferocities. Mr. Mackerras lingered over these Mahlerian regurgitations with an appetite bordering on the naive. But duplicator Shostakovich could not erase the joys of Tanglewood, where Hawthorne originated and perfected the Twice-Told Tale. And the Tanglewood Festival cannot retell its own story too often for me.

—GREER JOHNSON

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000

AUG 22 1970

Mostly Music

BY KENNETH ROBERTS
Associate Professor of Music, Williams College

The 19th-Century is alive and doing well, in Marlboro, Vermont. Last Saturday I heard some fantastically electric musicmaking there, coached by Messr's Casals and Serkin. I have not been swayed in years past by the Casals adoration cult; it has reminded me of the lip service paid to Albert Schweitzer in his later years. . .as typified by the editorials in the Saturday Review. And, in addition, Casals recordings. . .especially the Bach series (either playing or conducting), which devotees of Casals are so quick to adore, have been simply dreadful: not true to Bach's printed indications, a sense of style in his time, etc. Thus I came to Marlboro with a prejudice, but with a prejudice at the opposite end of the spectrum than most in the audience. Well, what I saw and heard convinced me that the man knows what he is doing (at least in Beethoven) and quite frankly draws the best from the musicians playing under his direction. Although his physical activity is slow, his mental and communicative prowess remain formidable; he bowed rather than conducted for the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto, making it a model of strength, precision, and boundless athletic energy. . . exactly matching Serkin's pianistic model of the composition. I have heard Rudolf Serkin play this work many times before; never has his view sounded so right as last weekend when that view was also held and realized by the conductor and orchestral musicians. It was galvanizing.

Also on the program were a group of inconsequential Preludes and Fugues for string quartet of Adolf Busch, a founder (spiritually speaking) of Marlboro. . . played I suppose, in memoriam, and an admirable reading of the Mendelssohn String Octet, the first movement of which was especially well prepared and set forth. And a new view of Mendelssohn it was, too, with broadly-bowed, vibrato-filled phrases to set off the rather text-book style of musical form which Mendelssohn fills. To be sure, no humans could have kept up the pace set in tone, intensity, and energy as found in Saturday's opening movement. Thus the Scherzo and later movements came as a letdown. But what an opening!

I deliberately went to hear the Boston Symphony play under two, relatively unknown (to them) guest conductors last week: Alain Lombard (30 years old, a Karajan protegee and Miami, Florida Symphony leader) and Charles Mackerras (slightly older, and musical director of the U. K.'s Sadlers Wells Opera in London). Two very different conductors could not be imagined: Lombard giving every command imperially to the group, eliciting a ho-hum machine-style playing from the BSO, and the Australian-born-in-Schenectady (!) Mackerras suggesting, coaxing, getting the men to relax and play their best. Both programs were typical, with a classic (Haydn 88, Dvorak Cello Concerto respectively) and interest in a larger work (Stravinsky Petrouchka and the Shostakovich 5th, in order). Each program had a curiosity (Lombard's Roussel and Mackerras' Webern opus 6). Some observations: Webern's low dynamic range does not work in an outdoor, summer concert, no matter how much I think we need to hear the music, and no matter how grateful I am for live performances of the new Vienna School; Eskin's tone - in quantity, for the Dvorak is just too small for the Boston Symphony. . .perhaps the conductor could have helped balance here a bit better to aid the soloist; Lombard's Stravinsky was like the SNCF's new aerotrain: off the ground but not operative (such matter-of-fact playing is Tanglewood at its worst); the Roussel Bacchus and Ariane Suite was beautifully played, good ensemble, brilliant frenzied climaxes, gorgeous solo passages, decent and generous dynamic scale, and so forth. But the highlight of the weekend was the Sunday Shostakovich. . .who cares if it's an easy, light work? Mr. Gentleman Johnny II made us forget Soviet music, lack of musical substance (or the ernst, Germanic style normally thought of in a Symphony), and Stravinsky's bitter criticisms of the work. The strings played in tune, in time, with relaxed sound in the slow movement: the BSO before Leinsdorf. And such solo winds. Never have I so enjoyed D.A. Dwyer's flute and Walt's bassoon sound and musicianly phrasing so much. Here is the secret of the Boston, with such great, individual playing in critical solo desk-passages. These two are among the greatest of players in orchestras today, in my humble opinion. What a joy to hear, to watch, and to anticipate. Even the Boston was pleased with its playing Sunday in the Shostakovich; the looks on the men's faces after each glowing movement showed that they could be raised from the boredom of routine playing, even as good as is the routine playing of such a major orchestra as the Boston!

NEWS
WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 1,247

AUG 13 1970

New England Newsclip

Prokofiev's Romanticism Memorable at Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Prokofiev's Third Piano Concerto is big music, full of steam and crunch and nuts and bolts. Saturday at Tanglewood it was presented memorably.

Well-Cast Trio

Gary Graffman, a virtuoso of the first rank in the big-sound department was soloist. Michael Tilson Thomas conducted, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra completed the team.

It was a well cast trio, well matched to the score and well matched to each other . . . The orchestra can play anything well when it cares, and it seems to like its young associate conductor. Thomas has a sure hand with scores of difficult rhythmic patterns such as this one. Graffman is a technical genius on the keyboard and is temperamentally suited to such 20th Century romantics as Prokofiev.

The instant after it came to its sudden electric finish, Thomas impulsively tossed his baton toward the music stand, whacked his hands together with pleasure and turned to Graffman with a giant grin.

Vastly Entertaining

The concerto is a highly colorful and rhythmically compelling one; it has lots of thumps and edges and sudden changes of direction into quietly lyrical moments or into leaping lurching percussive clutches of sound.

It can be a vastly entertaining piece when played without excessive enthusiasm or theatrics. Such treatment would turn it into clashing noise. Thomas and Graffman played it brightly and even beautifully Saturday.

What's more, they played it with a togetherness of motion and mood that made it seem, occasionally, almost magical. Besides, it is my favorite Prokofiev, which probably made it sound better.

After intermission there was lots of Debussy: Prelude to Afternoon of a Faun and La Mer, separated by two short pieces by Erik Satie (orchestrated by Debussy) designed to accompany gymnastic exercises.

Faun and the orchestrations are similar in that they float without seeming support. La Mer, of course, is a great classic of impressionism intended to express the composer's feelings about the sea. It, also, floats no less fluidly.

Thomas handled Debussy with taste and deference. The music is not of the soft that arouses jumping enthusiasm, but it has a strong following, and those who love it are annoyed by anyone who toys with its elusive and fragile subtleties.

Thomas did not toy with it. At 25 he is a conductor with lots of promise, superior already to a few of the occasional journeyman international conductors who pass through here as guests.

He has a few mannerisms on the podium, but they are not showing up in the music. He tends to play the scores straight, uncluttered by vain interference.

It seems likely, at this point, that he will become an established success.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

AUG 9 1970

New England Newsclip

Thomas and Graffman at Tanglewood

By RICHARD VINCENT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Miachael Tilson Thomas presented a program of Twentieth Century music Saturday night at the shed. Assisting artist was the pianist ,Gary Graffman.

Twentieth Century it might have been but serial or twelve tone it was not, with Mussorgsky, Prokofieff, Satie and Debussy the choices.

The featured work, Prokofieff's Piano Concerto No. 3 in Opus 26, a vital and interesting work, was played with great style by Gary Graffman.

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS and the orchestra accompanied Graffman in a most exemplary manner and regardless of whose musical concept was the more in evidence or whether it was an exercise in mututality, the result was exciting for the large crowd in the shed and on the lawns.

The finale marked allegro ma no troppo, in ¾ rhythm, was a lot of fun as the strings and woodwinds did happy battle with the bully on the block, the piano. Musically this contretempts between the soloist and orchestra is the highlight of the Concerto and the contention between the two well matched forces in terms of key signature has a good deal of humor in it.

Two more themes are introduced, one by the woodwinds and another by the piano. The themes are developed and then comes the bright and vivacious coda that led directly into an immediate and enthusiastic demonstration by the audience.

THE PRELUDE to the "Afternoon of a Fawn," by Debussy and "Deux Gymnopedies" by Erik Satie were next.

Satie, that strange and highly individual man whose influence on French music has outweighed his actual production by a good deal, would, (as the program notes) have been very much at home with the aliented youth of today. As further proof that there is little new under the sun, Satie went the route for which many young people opt today. He dropped out. He insisted on doing his own thing in his own way, and he loved to shake up the establishment.

Whether this life style resulted in works of value or whether his innate creative drive would have produced works of art anyhow is moot and, at this stage, academic.

These two short pieces are moving if minor creations, and there is no question that Satie's heuristic brand is on them.

THE FINAL WORK, Debussy's "La Mer" even though from this century has taken on a venerable air, and when one considers it's age, why shouldn't it? It was composed 65 years ago and in musical history and, more to the point, in the history of the big symphony orchestra this is a long time. Only in comparison with ninteenth century composers would Debussy be considered in even the slightest way a modern. If you doubt this listen to Webern's "Six Pieces for Orchestra" that was performed yesterday in the shed. This work was composed in 1913 only eight years after "La Mer" and the difference musically is 180 degrees.

Thomas, who has had a lot of important work to do lately because of Steinberg's recent illness, seems to be seizing his opportunities. Any happenstance that provides a young man still technically in his apprenticeship with a toy like the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play with should be exploited to its full measure. Thomas seems to be doing it.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ALBANY TIMES UNION
Monday, August 10, 1970

CUE REPORTS FROM THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL

ALTHOUGH I was born, raised, and semi-educated in the South, I always absurdly feel—as I approach Lenox, Massachusetts—that I am going home again. And I feel the same about the neighboring Tanglewood/Berkshire Festival—although this, in my music commentator role, obviously makes slightly better sense. Perhaps it's because the kinship of festival and historical town make up a familial whole, an abiding and dual entity, reminding us that such splendid and baroque Southern human beings as Mark Twain and William Faulkner could not have flourished until New England's Nathaniel Hawthorne and Herman Melville had hewed the way. History and esthetic geography aside, the past and the current record of the Tanglewood Festival is one at which all American music festivals must aim. In the spring, there were dire reports of a cancellation this season. Perish the economics. The howls of candy-deprived babes would be as nothing compared to what we would hear were the caviar of the Boston Symphony in summer residence taken away from adults.

I chose the particular weekend on which I report because this fabulous and virtuoso orchestra was being led by three different conductors in three successive concerts—two very young, two in debut with the Boston, and one (Michael Tilson Thomas, the ensemble's associate conductor) fresh from several last-minute, save-the-day triumphs of the winter touring season. I heard and learned a lot.

Paris-born Alain Lombard, who is just 30, is, when he is not busy with international and recording commitments, the music director of the Greater Miami Philharmonic. His debut with the Boston Symphony, judging from inadvertently overheard Tanglewood Shed conversations, aroused as much controversy as would pre-packaged frozen sauce on haute cuisine. No controversy in my estimation: I thought M. Lombard was formidable. He is something of an international glamour boy on the podium, but if that image interests him, he does not show it. He grasps at the drama of a score as if he were drowning and it were the lifeline, and they both reach a safe haven. That he revealed the underrated, multi-layered glories of Roussel's second "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite was not surprising: that a keenly appreciative reading of Haydn's beloved and familiar Symphony No. 88 preceded the Roussel was most surprising. The Haydn had the dynamics and the romantic song—right where they fall: the Roussel, shot through with a percussive precision nothing short of amazing, had the pointillistic force of showers of meteors. I cooled during the finale, that 1947 revision of Stravinsky's immortal "Petrouchka." But these reservations had nothing to do with leader or orchestra, but rather with a scaling down of what should have been left alone. I love "Petrouchka" to its last originally scored note, and think 1947's were erratic "last thoughts."

On Saturday evening, 26-year-old Michael Tilson Thomas aroused students, patrons, and the most casual drop-ins to a frenzy. No wonder. For this real product of unreal Hollywood, California, deserved every moment of his ovation. By making superior music with his fluid hands and arms, he clearly has it made. He is already a learned conductor. He is meticulous; he has flair; he delights in fine detail; and he has an eloquent body English on the platform which is as musical as a dancer's. He was blessed by the collaboration of Gary Graffman, a pianist of whom it may be said that "nothing becomes him so much as his maturity." Together they offered as scintillating and probing a performance of the Third Piano Concerto by Prokofiev as I ever expect to hear. This interpretation of one of the most urbane and caustic concerti ever composed was strong enough to support traffic, yet it was suffused with a sense of longing, loss, and rue. Just as scored, there was not an ounce of fat on its elegant frame. This also was true of Mr. Tilson's other selections, which culminated in a vigorous look at Debussy's "La Mer," one which blended fireworks with respect and temperament. Four or five more young artists like Mr. Thomas, and I wouldn't trust anyone over 30.

Sunday's concluding concert was a letdown, and I was sorry. I was sorry because Charles Mackerras, the music director of London's Sadler's Wells Opera Company, and widely admired elsewhere and on many recordings, made a lacklustre debut with the Boston Symphony. Moreover, the principal cellist of the symphony, Jules Eskin, likewise foundered. Under Mr. Mackerras' baton, one heard, as it were, another orchestra overnight. The leader guided some seemingly bored men through Webern's Op. 6 Pieces for Orchestra, which was rather like setting a giant computer to delivering pins. That over, he and Mr. Eskin tred a dinosaurian path through Dvorak's Cello Concerto. Their leaden performance had little relationship to a rhapsodic score, being measure-for-measure unexceptional, dull, and metronomic. This kind of stiffness makes an intermission seem like a reward, but what followed—Shostakovich's Symphony No. 5—was harsher punishment. I admit that I find Shostakovich unbearably verbose as a symphonist, contemptible as a polemicist, and merely tolerable as a composer of light ballet scores. Of the ersatz Mahler which permeates and exposes the Shostakovich pretensions, you can say that the Russian early on gobbled up Mahler. He anticipated by decades the message of Marshall McLuhan: plunder sources, reproduce endlessly. In this derivative symphony, the ghost of a very great man is tortured by listless longueurs and febrile ferocities. Mr. Mackerras lingered over these Mahlerian regurgitations with an appetite bordering on the naive. But duplicator Shostakovich could not erase the joys of Tanglewood, where Hawthorne originated and perfected the Twice-Told Tale. And the Tanglewood Festival cannot retell its own story too often for me.

—GREER JOHNSON

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 244,000

AUG 22 1970

Mostly Music

BY KENNETH ROBERTS
Associate Professor of Music, Williams College

The 19th-Century is alive and doing well, in Marlboro, Vermont. Last Saturday I heard some fantastically electric musicmaking there, coached by Messr's Casals and Serkin. I have not been swayed in years past by the Casals adoration cult; it has reminded me of the lip service paid to Albert Schweitzer in his later years. . .as typified by the editorials in the Saturday Review. And, in addition, Casals recordings. . .especially the Bach series (either playing or conducting), which devotees of Casals are so quick to adore, have been simply dreadful: not true to Bach's printed indications, a sense of style in his time, etc. Thus I came to Marlboro with a prejudice, but with a prejudice at the opposite end of the spectrum than most in the audience. Well, what I saw and heard convinced me that the man knows what he is doing (at least in Beethoven) and quite frankly draws the best from the musicians playing under his direction. Although his physical activity is slow, his mental and communicative prowess remain formidable; he bowed rather than conducted for the Beethoven "Emperor" Concerto, making it a model of strength, precision, and boundless athletic energy. . . exactly matching Serkin's pianistic model of the composition. I have heard Rudolf Serkin play this work many times before; never has his view sounded so right as last weekend when that view was also held and realized by the conductor and orchestral musicians. It was galvanizing.

Also on the program were a group of inconsequential Preludes and Fugues for string quartet of Adolf Busch, a founder (spiritually speaking) of Marlboro. . . played I suppose, in memoriam, and an admirable reading of the Mendelssohn String Octet, the first movement of which was especially well prepared and set forth. And a new view of Mendelssohn it was, too, with broadly-bowed, vibrato-filled phrases to set off the rather text-book style of musical form which Mendelssohn fills. To be sure, no humans could have kept up the pace set in tone, intensity, and energy as found in Saturday's opening movement. Thus the Scherzo and later movements came as a letdown. But what an opening!

I deliberately went to hear the Boston Symphony play under two, relatively unknown (to them) guest conductors last week: Alain Lombard (30 years old, a Karajan protegee and Miami, Florida Symphony leader) and Charles Mackerras (slightly older, and musical director of the U. K.'s Sadlers Wells Opera in London). Two very different conductors could not be imagined: Lombard giving every command imperially to the group, eliciting a ho-hum machine-style playing from the BSO, and the Australian-born-in-Schenectady (!) Mackerras suggesting, coaxing, getting the men to relax and play their best. Both programs were typical, with a classic (Haydn 88, Dvorak Cello Concerto respectively) and interest in a larger work (Stravinsky Petrouchka and the Shostakovich 5th, in order). Each program had a curiosity (Lombard's Roussel and Mackerras' Webern opus 6). Some observations: Webern's low dynamic range does not work in an outdoor, summer concert, no matter how much I think we need to hear the music, and no matter how grateful I am for live performances of the new Vienna School; Eskin's tone - in quantity, for the Dvorak is just too small for the Boston Symphony. . .perhaps the conductor could have helped balance here a bit better to aid the soloist; Lombard's Stravinsky was like the SNCF's new aerotrain: off the ground but not operative (such matter-of-fact playing is Tanglewood at its worst); the Roussel Bacchus and Ariane Suite was beautifully played, good ensemble, brilliant frenzied climaxes, gorgeous solo passages, decent and generous dynamic scale, and so forth. But the highlight of the weekend was the Sunday Shostakovich. . .who cares if it's an easy, light work? Mr. Gentleman Johnny II made us forget Soviet music, lack of musical substance (or the ernst, Germanic style normally thought of in a Symphony), and Stravinsky's bitter criticisms of the work. The strings played in tune, in time, with relaxed sound in the slow movement: the BSO before Leinsdorf. And such solo winds. Never have I so enjoyed D.A. Dwyer's flute and Walt's bassoon sound and musicianly phrasing so much. Here is the secret of the Boston, with such great, individual playing in critical solo desk-passages. These two are among the greatest of players in orchestras today, in my humble opinion. What a joy to hear, to watch, and to anticipate. Even the Boston was pleased with its playing Sunday in the Shostakovich; the looks on the men's faces after each glowing movement showed that they could be raised from the boredom of routine playing, even as good as is the routine playing of such a major orchestra as the Boston!

NEWS
WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS.
BI-WEEKLY 1,247

AUG 13 1970

New England Newsclip

Prokofiev's Romanticism Memorable at Tanglewood

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Prokofiev's Third Piano Concerto is big music, full of steam and crunch and nuts and bolts. Saturday at Tanglewood it was presented memorably.

Well-Cast Trio

Gary Graffman, a virtuoso of the first rank in the big-sound department was soloist. Michael Tilson Thomas conducted, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra completed the team.

It was a well cast trio, well matched to the score and well matched to each other . . . The orchestra can play anything well when it cares, and it seems to like its young associate conductor. Thomas has a sure hand with scores of difficult rhythmic patterns such as this one. Graffman is a technical genius on the keyboard and is temperamentally suited to such 20th Century romantics as Prokofiev.

The instant after it came to its sudden electric finish, Thomas impulsively tossed his baton toward the music stand, whacked his hands together with pleasure and turned to Graffman with a giant grin.

Vastly Entertaining

The concerto is a highly colorful and rhythmically compelling one; it has lots of thumps and edges and sudden changes of direction into quietly lyrical moments or into leaping lurching percussive clutches of sound.

It can be a vastly entertaining piece when played without excessive enthusiasm or theatrics. Such treatment would turn it into clashing noise. Thomas and Graffman played it brightly and even beautifully Saturday.

What's more, they played it with a togetherness of motion and mood that made it seem, occasionally, almost magical. Besides, it is my favorite Prokofiev, which probably made it sound better.

After intermission there was lots of Debussy: Prelude to Afternoon of a Faun and La Mer, separated by two short pieces by Erik Satie (orchestrated by Debussy) designed to accompany gymnastic exercises.

Faun and the orchestrations are similar in that they float without seeming support. La Mer, of course, is a great classic of impressionism intended to express the composer's feelings about the sea. It, also, floats no less fluidly.

Thomas handled Debussy with taste and deference. The music is not of the sort that arouses jumping enthusiasm, but it has a strong following, and those who love it are annoyed by anyone who toys with its elusive and fragile subtleties.

Thomas did not toy with it. At 25 he is a conductor with lots of promise, superior already to a few of the occasional journeyman international conductors who pass through here as guests.

He has a few mannerisms on the podium, but they are not showing up in the music. He tends to play the scores straight, uncluttered by vain interference.

It seems likely, at this point, that he will become an established success.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,754

AUG 9 1970

New England Newsclip

Thomas and Graffman at Tanglewood

By RICHARD VINCENT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Miachael Tilson Thomas presented a program of Twentieth Century music Saturday night at the shed. Assisting artist was the pianist ,Gary Graffman.

Twentieth Century it might have been but serial or twelve tone it was not, with Mussorgsky, Prokofieff, Satie and Debussy the choices.

The featured work, Prokofieff's Piano Concerto No. 3 in Opus 26, a vital and interesting work; was played with great style by Gary Graffman.

MICHAEL TILSON THOMAS and the orchestra accompanied Graffman in a most exemplary manner and regardless of whose musical concept was the more in evidence or whether it was an exercise in mututality, the result was exciting for the large crowd in the shed and on the lawns.

The finale marked allegro ma no troppo, in ¾ rhythm, was a lot of fun as the strings and woodwinds did happy battle with the bully on the block, the piano. Musically this contretempts between the soloist and orchestra is the highlight of the Concerto and the contention between the two well matched forces in terms of key signature has a good deal of humor in it.

Two more themes are introduced, one by the woodwinds and another by the piano. The themes are developed and then comes the bright and vivacious coda that led directly into an immediate and enthusiastic demonstration by the audience.

THE PRELUDE to the "Afternoon of a Fawn," by Debussy and "Deux Gymnopedies" by Erik Satie were next.

Satie, that strange and highly individual man whose influence on French music has outweighed his actual production by a good deal, would, (as the program notes) have been very much at home with the aliented youth of today. As further proof that there is little new under the sun, Satie went the route for which many young people opt today. He dropped out. He insisted on doing his own thing in his own way, and he loved to shake up the establishment.

Whether this life style resulted in works of value or whether his innate creative drive would have produced works of art anyhow is moot and, at this stage, academic.

These two short pieces are moving if minor creations, and there is no question that Satie's heuristic brand is on them.

THE FINAL WORK, Debussy's "La Mer" even though from this century has taken on a venerable air, and when one considers it's age, why shouldn't it? It was composed 65 years ago and in musical history and, more to the point, in the history of the big symphony orchestra this is a long time. Only in comparison with ninteenth century composers would Debussy be considered in even the slightest way a modern. If you doubt this listen to Webern's "Six Pieces for Orchestra" that was performed yesterday in the shed. This work was composed in 1913 only eight years after "La Mer" and the difference musically is 180 degrees.

Thomas, who has had a lot of important work to do lately because of Steinberg's recent illness, seems to be seizing his opportunities. Any happenstance that provides a young man still technically in his apprenticeship with a toy like the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play with should be exploited to its full measure. Thomas seems to be doing it.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

TIMES UNION
Monday, August 10, 1970

Music Review

Russian-French Themes at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE SIXTH weekend at Tanglewood was a distinct and welcomed departure from the programs of the preceding weeks. They leaned heavily on French and Russian music. Three conductors divided the tasks. Two of them were newcomers. Yesterday Charles Mackerras had what is certainly one of the most rewarding concertos for cello as the central number on his program and the orchestra's principal cellist Jules Eskin as the soloist. The Dvorak B Minor Opus 104, concerto received an overwhelming performance. Eskin actually made his cello sing in the unsurpassably grateful themes with which the work abounds. He gave it a spacious execution and the birds, who have made the girders of the Shed their summer abode were so affected in the Adagio that they added their chirps.

* * *

MACKERRAS began his program with the "Six Pieces" of Anton Webern, six extremely short sketches which in their 60 years have never been clarified to the public. To the initiated they may have significance, but they require a massive dose of good will. They range in duration from 11 to 32 bars, that is if the 7 bars of percussion are subtracted from the "Funeral March," but that omission would amputate a substantial segment from the corpus.

These Webern Pieces are offered as spinach is offered to a child. "This is good for you and if you eat it you can have an ice cream stick." Thus Mackerras gave his audience the Dvorak and then the Shostakovich 5th Symphony, Opus 47.

This is amazingly transparent music and yet intensely effective. While it is purely absolute music, there is always a theme of suspicion in the music written in the Soviet during the period of the 20th anniversary of the U.S.S.R. Thereafter, there is an element of a national anthem in their cumulative tension.

Schumann once wrote a movement which he wanted played "as fast as possible," and then added a minute later "still faster." Shostakovich asks that the final movement be played with a metronome marking of 88. He soon raises the ante "accelarondo poco a poco" to 104, soon to 132, another accelarondo, still a "piu mosso" (still more) and finally to 188. One could not tell at this point yesterday whether the conductor was riding the orchestra or the contrary. Mr. Mackerras otherwise gave the musicians well-controlled and reasoned direction and conveyed in full measure the spirit of the depths of the symphony.

* * *

THIS TEMPTATION to race is too often allowed. With it goes a tendency to increase the decibel count. This was well illustrated Friday when the guest conductor was Alain Lombard. His reading of the Stravinsky "Petrushka" became a runaway at the end. His program, however, included the second suite of Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane," a ballet which merits much more frequent hearings, and for that one should be grateful to Lombard as well as for its graphic depiction. The score abounds in exquisite dissonances, often played with quiet poignance. This was Lombard's high point.

A lovely Haydn symphony, the G Major, Opus 88, opened his program. It was given a superficial reading. Each movement is a treasure in its own right and the excessive arm-flailing in the Largo did not enhance its basic beauty. In the great Minuet one might have expected a differentiation of the wonderful folk-dance tune after the sixth repetition.

* * *

SATURDAY night Michael Thomas chose all his orchestral works from the same part of the library, a shelf which has been quite neglected this season so far. The introduction to Mussorgsky's opera "Khovantchina" sits well beside Debussy and the rarely-heard Erik Satie. The Russian overture was as tranquil as later was the Debussy Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the mood was as well established and sustained. "La Mer," also of Debussy, is essentially subdued and distant in its coloration although, the Roussel ends in a flash of tumultuous animation. But it was soothing and doubly agreeable to hear the quality of tone mutes produced as against some ample servings of ear-splitting excesses on other days. The pleasure of Thomas's readings was augmented by the performance of his principals, flute Doriot Anthony and oboe Ralph Gomberg.

Satie was a composer sui generis. He was a minor composer whose reputation among his contemporaries of World War I outstripped the intrinsic value of his works. Yet in the two "Gymnopedies," which Thomas played, there is a paradoxical warmth without sentiment, probably achieved mainly by harmonic structure. "Gymnopedies," originally for piano and orchestrated by Debussy, were slow processional dances in ancient Greece to celebrate annually at Sparta in honor of Apollo and others.

* * *

GARY GRAFFMAN gave an electrifying performance of the Prokofieff 3rd Piano Concerto in C, Opus 26. The composer has written a far more than meek accompaniment to the solo and Thomas was not always aware of how much he was exhorting the orchestra to execute their assignment. Yet Graffman's powerful fingers and tonal sensitivity proved adequate in most situations. He emerged clearly above the agitation which is the character of the concerto. The technical demands are formidable but clarity and sonority were never sacrificed for mere ostentation.

* * *

IT IS A pleasant coincidence that both concertos played this weekend, the Dvorak cello and the Prokofieff piano, were composed in this country. Dvorak came here in the mid-90s as a teacher; Prokofieff right after World War I as a pianist. Each man returned to his respective homeland but their sojourns in this country were productive of compositions which have been mainstays in the reputations of the two men.

Whitestone

Alain Lombard

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 10 1970
New England Newsclip

Mackerras' Deft Conducting Complements Eskin's Cello

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — Jules Eskin came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as first cellist in 1964 from George Szell's Cleveland orchestra; Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood he was out in front of the orchestra as soloist for Dvorak's Cello Concerto Opus 104. Conductor was Charles Mackerras.

Eskin is not an aggressive cellist, and the cello does not ordinarily have a powerful sound. Also Dvorak integrated it deeply in the fabric of the orchestration. Consequently the conductor must be very careful to keep the 100-plus members of the orchestra from swallowing the soloist.

Mackerras did it deftly Sunday and Eskin's beautifully warm and gentle chamber music manner was clearly heard. The concerto is a warm and gentle score anyway; so Eskin's style enhanced it.

His background includes training with three of the world's leading cellists, musicians of disparate styles, Leonare Rose, Gregor Piatoigorsky and Janos Starker, and with service in the Dallas Symphony Orchestra and New York City Ballet and Opera orchestras as well as Cleveland.

Mackerras' conducting skill, while indicated during his accompaniment of the cello and the Shostakovich Fifth Symphony after intermission, was brightly illuminated during the opening performance of Anton Webern's prototype "Six Pieces for Orchestra" Opus 6, which he conducted from memory.

Webern's lean, transparent, delicate work with the 12-tone system of composition invented by his teacher and friend, Schoenberg, became the primary influence over the composers of the 1950's and 1960's.

The 'Six Pieces,' first performed in 1913, was the first of this work and it is still highly viable. It is incredibly transparent and fragile, consisting from a superficial observation point, of bright bits, little fragments, tense pauses, sudden tangents, endless surprises organized in a gossamer-thin pattern that seems as glittering and as ephemeral as a child's Fourth-of-July sparkler in the dusk.

Mackerras held it together with fine skill and kept its off-balance tendencies level and in steady motion.

The Shostakovich symphony is a good crowd-pleaser, full of satisfying sonority and sufficient variety to hold attention. Mackerras handled that also with professional aplomb.

It was his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was born in Schenectady, grew up in Australia, is music director of the Sadlers Wells Opera in London, and has been the director of the BBC Concert Orchestra and the Hamburg State Opera as well as guest conductor of most of the western world's major orchestras.

Weekend gate count: Friday with Alain Lombard, 4624; Saturday morning open rehearsal, 2723; Saturday night with Thomas and Graffman, 9036; Sunday afternoon with Mackerras, 6263; total 22,646.

Coming up: Monday Berkshire Music Center (BMC) vocal concert at 8.30; Tuesday, Boston Pops with Arthur Fiedler and Earl Wild at 8.30; Wednesday, youth concert with Michael Tilson Thomas at 2.30 and composers forum at 8.30; Thursday, BMC Orchestra with Gunther Schuller at 8.30; Friday, Claude Frank, pianist, with two Beethoven sonatas at 7; Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) with William Steinberg and Rudolf Firkusny at 9; Saturday, BSO with Steinberg (Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at 8.30; Sunday, BSO with Max Rudolf and Jerome Lowenthal at 2.30; first concert of the Festival of Contemporary Music at 8.30.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
AUG 10 1970
New England Newsclip

Two Works Crown Weekend at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — A dashing performance of Prokofieff's Third Piano Concerto, by Gary Graffman, and Charles Mackerras' astute conducting of Symphony No. 5 by Shostakovich were headliners of the Berkshire Music Festival's sixth weekend at Tanglewood.

Michael Tilson Thomas conducted the Boston Symphony for Graffman Saturday night. Mackerras' soloist yesterday afternoon was Jules Eskin in the Dvorak Cello Concerto. Eskin is first cellist with the orchestra.

Weekend attendance was 22,646.

Dazzling Finale

Graffman doled out the Prokofieff with brilliant technique and legitimately brittle style. At times, however, his tone was cloudy. Certainly not in harshly percussive passage work.

Piano and orchestra tempos were not always apace. This may have been Thomas' fault. But brash changes of mood were made with admirable definition.

The work maintained propulsion. The pianist made a dazzling business of the finale's hammered effects and the work was brought to a stampeding close.

Thomas substituted the Prelude to "Khovanshchina" for Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter Overture." The overture probably would have been too long, and the Moussorgsky was quite commonplace.

The devitalizing tempo Thomas selected was amended somewhat by beautifully voiced reed solos.

Similarly, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" was made special by crystalline-pure flute solos by Doriot Anthony Dwyer.

Two fragile "Gymnopedies" by Erik Satie were partly justified by pure, delicate sound and melodic radiance. They are not pieces of much import.

Thomas' concept of Debussy's "La Mer" was standard. He did institute balances that brought out its lushness. Well played solos were properly exposed and contributed glowing poetry. The conducting was explicit and pretty well imbued with some of the work's nobility and powerful rhythmic currents.

Enter Mackerras

Mackerras made his debut yesterday with the Boston Symphony. The event would not have been impressive without the Shostakovich Symphony No. 5.

He is generally associated with Sadler's Wells Opera Company of London but has had worldwide experience as a guest conductor.

The man was born in Schenectady, N.Y. and was brought up in Australia.

In Grand Manner

Mackerras conducted the Shostakovich Fifth in the grand manner, seemingly determined to exhaust its pathos, heavy drama and massive orchestration.

It helped that brasses and percussion were in top form. While the counterpoint of the first movement was gripped by compulsive rhythm, Mackerras was lavishly attentive to lir[illegible] moments, notably the slow movement. He stormed through the scherzo like a bulldozer.

Unfortunately, Mackerras' program opened with Weberns' Six Pieces for Orchestra, Opus 6. The hodgepodge of sounds made its intended effect.

Audience attitude appeared to be one of tolerance of its snatches of melody, chameleon changes of tonal color and ear-splitting climax.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 109,376
AUG 10 1970
New England Newsclip

Lombard, Mackerras Conductors at Lenox

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox — The sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins Friday, August 7, at 9 p. m. in Tanglewood's Music Shed with guest conductor, Alain Lombard, making his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The all - orchestral program begins with a performance of Haydn's Symphony No. 88 in G, followed by the Roussel "Bacchus et Ariane suite No. 2." The remainder of the program is devoted to Lombard conducting a performance of Stravinsky's "Petrushka."

Alain Lombard, currently music director of the Greater Miami Philharmonic, made his conducting debut at the age of 11 at the Salle Gaveau in Paris.

In January of 1966, he won the Mitropoulos competition for conductors and was immediately invited to conduct the New York Philharmonic. He returned to the Philharmonic during the 1966-1967 season as its assistant conductor. He has conducted at the Metropolitan Opera and also accompanied the New York Philharmonic on their European tour in the fall of 1968.

Fridayat 7 p. m. in the Shed, The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p. m. in the Shed, presents the Berkshire Boy Choir, George Guest, conductor. The program consists of music of the 16th and 17th centuries as well as contemporary works. Weekend Preludes are free to ticket holders of the 9 p. m. Boston Symphony concert.

The open rehearsal Saturday morning, August 8, at 10:30 a. m. features guest conductor Charles Mackerras and Boston Symphony principal cellist Jules Eskin rehearsing for the following day's concert. Tickets for the open rehearsals benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Saturday evening, August 8, at 8:30 p. m., Boston Symphony Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts. Pianist Gary Graffman is soloist. The program opens with Rimsky - Korsakov's "Russian Easter Overture," followed by Graffman's performance of Prokofiev's Piano concerto no. 3 in C. Following intermission, Thomas conducts Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," Satie's "Trois Gymnopedies'' and Debussy's "La Mer."

Graffman has made numerous appearances with the Boston Symphony as well as recordings with the orchestra under its late music director, Charles Munch. His first appearance at Tanglewood was during the summer of 1961.

Sunday afternoon, August 9, at 2:30 p. m., guest conductor, Charles Mackerras, makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. Soloist is principal cellist Jules Eskin. The program opens with Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra, followed by the Dvorak Cello concerto with Mr. Eskin as soloist. Following intermission, Mackerras conducts the Shostakovich Symphony No. 5.

Mackerras, music director of the Sadlers Wells Opera Company, has conducted extensively throughout the British Commonwealth as well as in Europe and in America . For two years, he was conductor of the BBC Concert Orchestra, and has made many guest appearances at Covent Garden and the Berlin State Opera. In the United States, he has conducted the Chicago, Cincinnati and Dallas Symphony Orchestras.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 28 1970 New England News

Two Conductors To Make Debut At Tanglewood

Alain Lombard, music director of the Greater Miami Philharmonic, and Charles Mackerras, music director of the Sadlers Wells Opera, will make their conducting debuts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the sixth weekend of concerts at Tanglewood.

Lombard will conduct Haydn's Symphony No. 88 in G, Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane Suite," No. 2, and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" during the Friday evening concert Aug. 7.

Mackerras will conduct six pieces for orchestra by Webern, Dvorak's Cello Concerto in B Minor and Shostakovich's Symphony No. 5 on Sunday, Aug. 9. The program will feature cellist Jules Eskin.

Choir Prelude

The Berkshire Boy Choir, conducted by George Guest, will present the Weekend Prelude.

Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the Saturday evening concert. The program will include works by Satie, Rimsky-Korsakov, Prokofieff and Debussy. Pianist Gary Graffman will be soloist.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055

JUL 25 1970 New England Newsclip

The Knickerbocker News
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 50,[illegible]

AUG 10 1970

A Symphonic Afternoon at Lenox

At the Concert

By MICHAEL WIENER

LENOX, Mass. — This seems to be the year for Schenecadians at Tanglewood. Charles Mackerras, who debuted with the Boston Symphony yesterday, was the second Schenectady-born conductor to lead the orchestra this summer. Mr. Mackerras, raised in Australia, is the music director of London's Sadlers Wells opera.

The program opened with Webern's "Six Pieces for Orchestra, Op. 6". It is a marvelous work and we should be grateful for its performance yesterday since it is still all too infrequently encountered.

THE AFTERNOON'S solo work was Dvorak's Concerto for Cello and Orchestra in B Minor, Op. 104. This work is romantic music at its finest. It is moving and suffused with sentiment but never descends to sentimentality. Its themes are Czech in character and there is hardly a one which isn't memorable.

Technically, too, the concerto is outstanding. The writing for the solo cello is wonderfully ideomatic, and Dvorak is highly considerate of the instrument's low carrying power. He surrounds it with a halo of woodwinds which provides support but never overwhelms.

THE SOLOIST was Jules Eskin, and he played with the skill one would expect from the Boston Symphony's first cellist. Mr. Eskin is not a high-powered performer but he has an attractive, rather wispily feminine tone and his intonation was amazingly good, especially in light of the day's humidity. The orchestral playing was a little coarse but Mr. Mackerras was not afraid to milk the big melodies to the full.

The afternoon's concluding work, Shostakovich's Symphony No. 5, Op. 47, is often attacked these days as an example of the composer's surrender to the party line. This judgement may be based, unfairly, more on the music which followed than on that which preceeded.

SHOSTAKOVICH'S later symphonies often sound like banal rewrites in the epic style he first propounded in the Fifth. The Fifth may not be as experimental as his earlier music, but it should be judged on its own terms.

Its slow movement is one of the finest of any 20th Century symphonic work. The scherzo, apparently based on the corresponding movement in Mahler's First Symphony, is still highly attractive even if Shostakovich later wrote this type of "wrong note" music to death.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

HUDSON REGISTER
Tuesday, August 4, 1970

Tanglewood Opens Concerts Next Fri.

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS.- The sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins next Friday, at 9 p.m., in Tanglewood's Music Shed with guest conductor, Alain Lombard, making his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The all-orchestral program begins with a performance of Haydn's Sumphony No. 88 in G, followed by the Roussel Bacchus et Ariane suite No. 2. The remainder of the program is devoted to Lombard conducting a performance of Stravinsky's Petrushka.

Lombard, currently music director of the Greater Miami Philharmonic, made his conducting debut at the age of 11 at the SalleGaveau in Paris. In January of 1966, he won the Mitropoulos competition for conductors and was immediately invited to conduct the New York Philharmonic.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents the Berkshire Boy Choir, George Guest, conductor. The program consists of music of the 16th and 17th centuries as well as contemporary works. Weekend Preludes are free to ticket holders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert.

The Open Rehearsal Saturday at 10:30 a.m., features guest conductor Charles Mackerras and Boston Symphony principal cellist Jules Eskin rehearsing for the following day's concert. Tickets are $2.50 and benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Saturday evening, at 8:30 p.m., Boston Symphony Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts. Pianist Gary Graffman is soloist. The program opens with Rimsky-Korsakov's Russian Eat Overture, followed by Graffman's performance of Prokofiev's Piano concerto No. 3 in C. Thomas conducts Debussy's Prelude to the afternoon of a faun, Satie's Trois gymnopedies and Debussy's La Mer.

Sunday at 2:30 p.m., guest conductor, Charles Mackerras makes his debut with the Boston Sumphony. Solist is principal cellist Jules Eskin. The program opens with Webern's Six pieces for orchestra, followed by the Dvorak Cello concerto with Eskin as soloist. Mackerras conducts the Shostakovich Symphony No. 5.

Mr. Mackerras is music director of the Sadlers Wells Opera Company.

THE SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN, SPRINGFIELD, MASS., AUGUST 2, 1970 35

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 2 1970 New England Newsclip

Sixth week at Tanglewood

The sixth week of Berkshire Festival Concerts at Tanglewood gets under way this Friday with a 7 p.m. concert by the Berkshire Boy Choir. George Guest conducts the group in a concert that includes works by Palestrina, Gibbons, Vaughn Williams and others. Alain Lombard conducts the Friday 9 p.m. concert, which features the Boston Symphony playing Haydn's Symphony No. 88, Roussel's "Bacchus et Ariane" Suite No. 2 and Stravinsky's "Perushka" suite.

Saturday begins with an open rehearsal of the BSO at 10:30 a.m., while Michael Tilson Thomas leads the 8:30 p.m. French and Russian program which includes works of Rimsky-Korsakov, Debussy and Satie. Gary Graffman appears as soloist in Prokofiev's Third Piano Concerto.

BSO principal cellist Jules Eskin is soloist Sunday at 2:30 p.m. in Dvorak's Concerto in B minor. Charles Mackerras conducts the program which also includes Webern's Six Pieces for Orchestra and Shostakovich's Symphony No. 5.

At Tanglewood, Friday at 9 p.m., Alain Lombard will conduct a selection of works by Haydn, Roussel, and Stravinsky. Lombard is music director of the Greater Miami Philharmonic.

Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Gary Graffman will perform a piano concerto by Prokofiev. Graffman has had an international career ever since his debut, at the age of 18, with Eugene Ormandy.

Jules Eskin, principal cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will perform Dvorak's cello concerto next Sunday at 2:30 p.m. He is on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

At Tanglewood next Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Charles Mackerras will conduct works of Webern and Dvorak. He is music director of the Sadler's Welles Opera Trust Limited in London.

84

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

JUL 29 1970 New England Newsclip

Alain Lombard To Debut With Orchestra

The sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins Friday, August 7, at 9 p.m. in Tanglewood's Music Shed with guest conductor, Alain Lombard, making his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The all-orchestral program begins with a performances of Haydn's Symphony no. 88 in G, followed by the Roussell Bacchus et Ariane suite no. 2. The remainder of the program is devoted to Mr. Lombard conducting a performance of Stravinsky's Petrushka.

Alain Lombard, currently Music Director of the Greater Miami Philharmonic, made his conducting debut at the age of 11 at the Salle Gaveau in Paris. In January of 1966, he won the Mitropoulos competition for conductors and was immediately invited to conduct the New York Philharmonic. He returned to the Philharmonic during the 1966-1967 season as its Assistant Conductor. He has conducted at the Metropolitan Opera and also accompanied the New York Philharmonic on their European tour in the fall of 1968.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents the Berkshire Boy Choir, George Guest, Conductor. The program consists of music of the 16th and 17th centuries as well as contemporary works. Weekend Preludes are free to ticket holders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert.

The Open Rehearsal Saturday morning, August 8, at 10:30 a.m. features guest conductor Charles Mackerras and Boston Symphony principal cellist Jules Eskin rehearsing for the following day's concert. Tickets for the Open Rehearsals are $2.50 and benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Saturday evening, August 8, at 8:30 p.m., Boston Symphony Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts. Pianist Gary Graffman is soloist. The program opens with Rimsky-Korsakov's Russian Easter Overture, followed by Mr. Graffman's performance of Prokofiev's Piano concerto no. 3 in C. Following intermission, Mr. Thomas conducts Debussy's Prelude to the afternoon of a faun, Satie's Trois gymnopedies and Debussy's La Mer.

Gary Graffman has made numerous appearances with the Boston Symphony as well as recordings with the Orchestra under its late Music Director, Charles Munch. His first appearance at Tanglewood was during the summer of 1961.

Sunday afternoon, August 9, at 2:30 p.m., guest conductor Charles Mackerras makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. Soloist is principal cellist Jules Eskin. The program opens with Webern's Six pieces for orchestra, followed by the Dvorak Cello concerto with Mr. Eskin as soloist. Following intermission, Mr. Mackerras conducts the Shostakovich Symphony no. 5.

Mr. Mackerras, Music Director of the Sadlers Wells Opera Company, has conducted extensively throughout the British Commonwealth as well as in Europe and in America. For two years, he was cconductor of the BBC Concert Orchestra, and has made many guest appearances at Covent Garden and the Berlin State Opera. In the United States, he has conducted the Chicago, Cincinnati and Dallas Symphony Orchestra.

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 129,656

AUG 5 1970

TWOSOME AT TANGLEWOOD. Alain Lombard left, music director of the Greater Miami Philharmonic, makes a guest conducting appearance Friday at 8:30 p.m. with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He has chosen works by Hadyn, Roussel and Stravinsky. Pianist Gary Graffman, right, solos for the Prokofiev Piano Concerto the following night at 8:30.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

AUG 4 1970 New England Newsclip

AT TANGLEWOOD Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Gary Graffman will perform a piano concerto by Prokofiev. Mr. Graffman has had an international career ever since his debut, at the age of 13, with Eugene Ormandy. He has toured six continents, and has received raves abroad as well as at home.

L. Journal 8-6-70

CELLIST . . . At Tanglewood on Sunday, August 9 at 2:30 p.m., Jules Eskin, principal cello of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will perform Dvorak's Cello concerto. Mr. Eskin is on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

WEEKEND MUSIC AT TANGLEWOOD

The sixth week of concerts at Tanglewood opens tomorrow evening at 7 p.m. with a weekend prelude by the Berkshire Boy Choir. At 9 p.m. Alain Lombard will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program that includes Haydn's Symphony no. 88, Roussel's Bacchus et Ariane Suite no. 2, and Stravinsky's Petruska.

Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the Saturday evening concert with Gary Hoffman as guest soloist for the performance of Prokofiev's Piano concerto no. 3. Other works on the program that begins at 8:30 p.m. are Rimsky-Korsakov's Russian Easter Overture, Debussy's Prelude to the afternoon of a faun, Satie's Trois gymnopedies, and Debussy's La mer.

Jules Eskin is scheduled as soloist when the orchestra under Charles Mackerras performs Dvorak's Cello concerto Sunday at 2:30 p.m. The orchestra will also perform Webern's Six pieces for orchestra and Shostakovich's Symphony no. 5.

The open rehearsal Saturday morning at 10:30 is a benefit performance for the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175

AUG 8 1970 New England Newsclip

... $4 per concert.

TANGLEWOOD, Berkshire Festival, Lenox, Mass., presents Boston Symphony in Rimsky-Korsakov, Prokofiev, Dubussey and Satie program, 8:30 p.m. today, Thomas conducts. Webern, Dvorak and Shostakovich program, 9:30 p.m. Sunday, Mackerras conducts. Beethoven program 9 p.m. Friday and 8:30 p.m. Aug. 15, Steinberg conducts. Open rehearsals in the shed, 10:30 a.m. Saturdays, unreserved seats, $3. Tickets for regular concerts: $4-$8.50. Weekend Preludes, 7 p.m. Fridays before Boston Symphony Concert, guests artists and members of the orchestra in short recitals; free for Friday evening ticket holders. Information: 1-413-637-1600.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 10 1970 New England Newsclip

22,646 Attend Weekend Concerts

A total of 22,646 people attended the sixth weekend of concerts at Tanglewood. This is slightly ahead of last year's figure of 20,322. Friday night's concert drew 4,624; Saturday's open rehearsal, 2,723; Saturday evening, 9,036; Sunday afternoon, 6,263.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507

AUG 2 1970

Michael Tilson Thomas will lead the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., Saturday.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

JUL 29 1970 New England Newsclip

Alain Lombard To Debut With Orchestra

The sixth weekend of Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins Friday, August 7, at 9 p.m. in Tanglewood's Music Shed with guest conductor, Alain Lombard, making his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The all-orchestral program begins with a performances of Haydn's Symphony no. 88 in G, followed by the Roussell Bacchus et Ariane suite no. 2. The remainder of the program is devoted to Mr. Lombard conducting a performance of Stravinsky's Petrushka.

Alain Lombard, currently Music Director of the Greater Miami Philharmonic, made his conducting debut at the age of 11 at the Salle Gaveau in Paris. In January of 1966, he won the Mitropoulos competition for conductors and was immediately invited to conduct the New York Philharmonic. He returned to the Philharmonic during the 1966-1967 season as its Assistant Conductor. He has conducted at the Metropolitan Opera and also accompanied the New York Philharmonic on their European tour in the fall of 1968.

The Weekend Prelude, Friday at 7 p.m. in the Shed, presents the Berkshire Boy Choir, George Guest, Conductor. The program consists of music of the 16th and 17th centuries as well as contemporary works. Weekend Preludes are free to ticket holders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert.

The Open Rehearsal Saturday morning, August 8, at 10:30 a.m. features guest conductor Charles Mackerras and Boston Symphony principal cellist Jules Eskin rehearsing for the following day's concert. Tickets for the Open Rehearsals are $2.50 and benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Saturday evening, August 8, at 8:30 p.m., Boston Symphony Associate Conductor Michael Tilson Thomas conducts. Pianist Gary Graffman is soloist. The program opens with Rimsky-Korsakov's Russian Easter Overture, followed by Mr. Graffman's performance of Prokofiev's Piano concerto no. 3 in C. Following intermission, Mr. Thomas conducts Debussy's Prelude to the afternoon of a faun, Satie's Trois gymnopedies and Debussy's La Mer.

Gary Graffman has made numerous appearances with the Boston Symphony as well as recordings with the Orchestra under its late Music Director, Charles Munch. His first appearance at Tanglewood was during the summer of 1961.

Sunday afternoon, August 9, at 2:30 p.m., guest conductor Charles Mackerras makes his debut with the Boston Symphony. Soloist is principal cellist Jules Eskin. The program opens with Webern's Six pieces for orchestra, followed by the Dvorak Cello concerto with Mr. Eskin as soloist. Following intermission, Mr. Mackerras conducts the Shostakovich Symphony no. 5.

Mr. Mackerras, Music Director of the Sadlers Wells Opera Company, has conducted extensively throughout the British Commonwealth as well as in Europe and in America. For two years, he was cconductor of the BBC Concert Orchestra, and has made many guest appearances at Covent Garden and the Berlin State Opera. In the United States, he has conducted the Chicago, Cincinnati and Dallas Symphony Orchestra.

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 129,656

AUG 5 1970

TWOSOME AT TANGLEWOOD. Alain Lombard left, music director of the Greater Miami Philharmonic, makes a guest conducting appearance Friday at 8:30 p.m. with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. He has chosen works by Hadyn, Roussel and Stravinsky. Pianist Gary Graffman, right, solos for the Prokofiev Piano Concerto the following night at 8:30.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

AUG 4 1970 New England Newsclip

AT TANGLEWOOD Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Gary Graffman will perform a piano concerto by Prokofiev. Mr. Graffman has had an international career ever since his debut, at the age of 13, with Eugene Ormandy. He has toured six continents, and has received raves abroad as well as at home.

L. Journal 8-6-70

CELLIST . . . At Tanglewood on Sunday, August 9 at 2:30 p.m., Jules Eskin, principal cello of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will perform Dvorak's Cello concerto. Mr. Eskin is on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

WEEKEND MUSIC AT TANGLEWOOD

The sixth week of concerts at Tanglewood opens tomorrow evening at 7 p.m. with a weekend prelude by the Berkshire Boy Choir. At 9 p.m. Alain Lombard will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program that includes Haydn's Symphony no. 88, Roussel's Bacchus et Ariane Suite no. 2, and Stravinsky's Petruska.

Michael Tilson Thomas will conduct the Saturday evening concert with Gary Hoffman as guest soloist for the performance of Prokofiev's Piano concerto no. 3. Other works on the program that begins at 8:30 p.m. are Rimsky-Korsakov's Russian Easter Overture, Debussy's Prelude to the afternoon of a faun, Satie's Trois gymnopedies, and Debussy's La mer.

Jules Eskin is scheduled as soloist when the orchestra under Charles Mackerras performs Dvorak's Cello concerto Sunday at 2:30 p.m. The orchestra will also perform Webern's Six pieces for orchestra and Shostakovich's Symphony no. 5.

The open rehearsal Saturday morning at 10:30 is a benefit performance for the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN 1,445,507

AUG 2 1970

Michael Tilson Thomas will lead the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., Saturday.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175

AUG 8 1970 New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD, Berkshire Festival, Lenox, Mass., presents Boston Symphony in Rimsky-Korsakov, Prokofiev, Dubussey and Satie program, 8:30 p.m. today, Thomas conducts. Webern, Dvorak and Shostakovich program, 9:30 p.m. Sunday, Mackerras conducts. Beethoven program 9 p.m. Friday and 8:30 p.m. Aug. 15, Steinberg conducts. Open rehearsals in the shed, 10:30 a.m. Saturdays, unreserved seats, $3. Tickets for regular concerts: $4-$8.50. Weekend Preludes, 7 p.m. Fridays before Boston Symphony Concert, guests artists and members of the orchestra in short recitals; free for Friday evening ticket holders. Information: 1-413-637-1600.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 36,100

AUG 10 1970 New England Newsclip

22,646 Attend Weekend Concerts

A total of 22,646 people attended the sixth weekend of concerts at Tanglewood. This is slightly ahead of last year's figure of 20,322. Friday night's concert drew 4,624; Saturday's open rehearsal, 2,723; Saturday evening, 9,036; Sunday afternoon, 6,263.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(D) 14,900

AUG 26 1970 New England Newscliip

Concert Review

Three-Day Tribute To Great Composer

By Martha deB. Beaver

From the tender intimacy of Beethoven's Eminor Piano Sonata that opened the next-to-last weekend, on Friday evening, of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, to the fulsome coda in the final movement of the Cmajor fifth symphony on Sunday afternoon, masterly music and musicianship combined with sympathetic weather (also controlled by a Master) to allow more than 32,000 people once again the unique pleasure of participating in this joyous three-day tribute to a great composer. A lover of beauty in all things, and especially nature, the verdant and majestic setting of Tanglewood seems particularly suited to such inspired performance of the music of the mighty Beethoven.

Claude Frank was the pianist for Friday's Prelude, balancing the Eminor Sonata (Beethoven is said to have alluded half-seriously to the first movement as "a tussle between the head and the heart, the second a conversation with the beloved," when asked what the music was about) which he made quietly revelatory in his modest and unassuming manner, with the brilliant Waldstein, almost a concerto without orchestra, spplendidly achieved with vivid emotional contrasts, sparkling, tumultous, serene and happy.

A revised program for the symphony concert at 9:00 introduced the seldom-heard King Stephen Overture, not one of Beethoven's masterpieces, but highly interesting for its content, short motifs, dactyllic theme and use of woods and strings. Steinberg was in excellent form, confident and controlled, in this and the Eflat (Emperor) concerto No. 73, played by Rudolf Firkusny with no less confidence and control, with marvelous insight into the feeling and spirit of this most original, imaginative, effective and difficult work. His trills were magnificent, perfectly balanced and the crescendos in these incredibly executed. We were impressed also with the importance given to stresses by conductor and pianist, pointing up modulatory changes and development deviations. Firkusny brought respectful delicacy and tonal cantibile to the limpidly lovely Adagio, its aura of mystical ecstasy upheld until dispelled by the exuberant Rondo.

On the same but more extended and magnificent level was the performance of the third (Eroica) symphony in the same key, following intermission . . . Steinberg, attentive and approving, casual-seeming and stern . . . the horns could do no wrong, and neither could, or did, the strings . . . our attention didn't waver, so compelling was each movement, of this apotheosis of the heroic in man, considered one gigantic set of variations, the finale a smaller one within the enormous and momentous whole.

Saturday's concert served to introduce an intense young pianist, Jerome Lowenthal, in a lengthy rhapsodic solo introduction of the Fantasy in Cminor for piano, chorus and orchestra, op. 80, giving way to a crisp staccato theme, both handled with extraordinary insight. Here is a pianist, oblivious to all but the music, fluid arm movements a necessary preparation for the smoothly textured plasticity of each statement, the mounting expectancy and downward flow breath-taking in effect and kinesthetic response. It was evident that Steinberg, the players and the chorus, too were caught up in the singular musicality of this lightly built but strongly endowed young artist.

The Fantasy itself is built around an improvisatory piano solo, a set of variations in changing tempi for orchestra, some delightful play with strings and flute, and finally a choral proclamation with alternate solo parts. There is a gay variation in the style of a gavotte, and another, march-like, that clearly suggests the Alla marcia of the Ninth Symphony, a fascinating work altogether, composed well before the finale of the Choral symphony.

It was a fitting preparation for the Dminor symphony, highlight to most of the 12,325 listeners, which absorbed the rest of the evening. Steinberg's slow drawn-out upbeat almost lost its effect with the horns' momentarily shaky entrance, soon dispelled in the vigorous development of the first movement. But why quibble about a few weak moments? There weren't many. This fertile, imaginative and muscially adventurous work still has the power to stir the most adverse critic. Trained by Alfred Nash Patterson, the Chorus Pro Musica combined with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus directed by John Oliver, to outshine and more than complement the orchestra.

The quartet (soprano Gwendolin Sims, contralto Eunice Alberts, tenor William Cochran and bass Thomas Paul) surmounted the known difficulties of their parts with consummate skill and practised ease. But it was the chorus, perfectly balanced, and supremely articulate, that engendered the excitement and hopeful exaltation Beethoven reached for the attained with his rythmically simple yet inspired theme, an unmistakable "Ode to Joy".

Again, at Sunday afternoon's concert conducted by Max Rudolf, Jerome Lowenthal proved his serious and sensitive musicianship in his sympathetic portrayal of the Cmajor concerto, Op. 15. Here the individuality of the youthful Beethoven emerges from the still obvious influence of Mozart and Haydn . . . arpeggios and chords in quick succession, trills in thirds, runs free and suddenly halted . . . all marvelously aspirated by Lowenthal . . . the Mozartean and impassioned Largo, where the clarinet takes the lead occasionally . . . the crispy staccato theme of the Rondo and slight Spanish lilt of the lesser motif suggesting an Austrian folksong.

Both the Leonore overture No. 2 and Fifth Symphony in Cminor are so well-known to almost everyone that their programming seems of little import. Except that Rudolf brought a finely spun interpretation to both that carried fresh inspiration to the incomparable Boston Symphony players. The second movement of the symphony in particular, throbbed with the deep-throated tones of cellos and basses, contrastingly exquisite pianissimos, heard again in the beginning of the third, building increasingly, almost agonizingly into a triumphant fortissimo.

The final weekend brings Alexis Weissenberg at the 7:00 Prelude performing piano music by Bach and Chopin, Gunther Schuller conducting the symphony at 9:00 in Wagner's Rienzi Overture, Paul Zukofsy piaying Szymanowski's violin concerto No. 1, op. 35, Schuller's own Spectra, and Scriabin's Poeme d'extase op. 54. Saturday, Seiji Ozawa will direct Lutoslawski's Concerto for orchestra, Alexis Weissenberg playing Rachmaninov's Piano concerto No. 3 in D minor, op. 30, and Bartok's Concerto for orchestra. Sunday, Ozawa and the BSO will perform Berlioz' Requiem, op. 5 in memory of Charles Munch.

Firkusny Sparkles in Tanglewood Performance

By RICHARD VINCENT

Rudolf Firkusny, who played Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5 in E Flat, "The Emperor" at Tanglewood the past weekend, was the third pianist of note to do so in the past few days in the area. The other two were Van Cliburn and Rudolf Serkin.

There is no way, of course to avoid the odious game of comparison, but there is no question that there was wide range of musical sensibility and concept in these performances.

Van Cliburn who changed the program at Saratoga at the last moment, (he was scheduled to play the Concerto No. 3) gave a performance that bordered on the inept considering both his reputation and the company with who he is being compared.

His bravura technique for which he is noted failed him at times and, Firkusny also had some wrong notes. But the essential difference is not the musical flubs anyhow, this is a continuing occupational hazard of the metier, but rather in the overall concept of the concerto itself and the ability to translate this concept into a viable musical experience. This musicality, call it what you yill, was achieved in good measure by Firkusny and was not in evidence at Van Cliburn's concert.

The other primary factors involved, namely the conductor and the orchestras, could be vital if in either case they were not doing the job. This would of course, influence and intrude upon the pianist to an extent that would be pivotal. But let us consider the conductors and orchestras involved, Frubeck DeBurgos and the Philadelphia Orchestra and William Steinberg and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With this kind of talent it is virtually axiomatic that with these forces at work the performances could only be aggrandized and implemented to a great degree.

There are differences between these two orchestras of course, but none of them includes anything that smacks in any degree of unprofessionalism.

Steinberg's credentials are well known and complete and DeBurgos proved this summer that he is a young conductor with enoromus abilities.

This leaves us with the soloists then,, then this ingredient alone made the difference between a first class performance by Firkusny and a second class one by Van Cliburn.

In the first place the work under scrutiny is one of the sublime examples of art of Concer to form. There is no way to approach it casually and succeed, not only because of technique,one must assume that anyone who attempts it with a first rank orchestra is capable of playing the notes, but it has such depth and meaning that the demands on the temperament and character of the soloist is extreme. It must be studied and understood and any other approach to it yould inevitably result in a superficial experience.

Firkusny and Steinberg both have this approach, they realize the ineffable and palpable qualities inherent in the music and in consequence their performance was of considerable merit.

They played an interpreted together, it was a fine example of musical synergy the whole being greater than the sum of its parts.

I am aware that this profound and serious approach to classical music is not generally palatable to the casual concert goer, but this work is one that merits a most intellectual treatment.

This is what ig got and that is why it was good.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
ALBANY TIMES UNION
Monday, August 17, 1970

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,437

AUG 15 1970 New England Newscliip

Aural Fireworks At Tanglewood

By GENIE ZUST

LENOX — To have the "Emperor" concerto and the "Eroica" symphony on the same program is a true indulgence of one's passion for Beethoven. It is almost an embarrassment of riches.

William Steinberg led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in last night's concert. The evening began with the "King Stephan overture," a short, bumptious piece that is seldom heard, second-rate Beethoven. Of course, even second-rate Beethoven is close to first-rate by almost anyone else's standards.

When the audience was seated and the glorious sunset ended, Rudolf Firkusny began the Fifth piano concerto. A piece written in a time of chaos and violence, the so-called "Emperor" concerto is full of vitality and power, a paean to man's joyous ability to survive and to thrive.

Steinberg and Firkusny did justice to the concerto's grandeur from the sharp opening bite to the final brilliant development of the third movement's theme.

Firkusny has the sure touch of the polished artist. It was a spectacularly controlled display of aural fireworks.

Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E Flat, the "Eroica," was a breakthrough in its time,a new, richer use of the symphonic form. It still is one of the greatest symphonic masterpieces of all time.

It has both elemental power and mental power. William Steinberg and the BSO played this magnificent piece as though for the first time.

There was no touch of the shop-worn or hackneyed about their performance. This is a tribute not only to the orchestra but also to the music itself.

The shuddering chords of the second movement, the funeral march, were superb as was the crisp and almost overpowering finale, the allegro molto. It was a concert that was a feast to the mind as well as to the emotions.

The prelude concert at 7 was an all-Beethoven sonata program, a fitting overture to the planned all-Beethoven weekend of symphonic concerts.

Claude Frank, noted student of Arthur Schnabel, played the Beethoven piano sonata in E minor and the sonata in C, the famous "Waldstein."

Frank played the sonata in E minor, with its singing melodic second movement, with gentle lyricism. He showed the piece off in its near Mozartian delicacy.

BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 2,[illegible]

New England Newscliip

Tanglewood

Confluence of elements

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

Beautiful weather, pure chance, or the combination of Beethoven, the Boston Symphony, led by William Steinberg and Max Rudolf, and guest artists galore brought more than 32,000 people to Tanglewood over the weekend—next to last before the Berkshire Festival closes on Aug. 23.

In the second segment of the BSO's summer Beethoven tribute, Mr. Steinberg was back in strong form for two concerts—a Friday program which included the "King Stephen" overture, the "Emperor" Concerto with Rudolf Firkusny as soloist, and the Third Symphony ("Eroica"), and the Choral Fantasy and Ninth Symphony on Saturday evening, when 12,325 intent listeners filled the shed and carpeted the lawns under a fullish moon with a hint of a breeze rustling the pines.

The ninth is hardly a novelty at Tanglewood or anywhere else, particularly this year, and it would be difficult to point to this or that feature that made Saturday's performance especially outstanding. However, it was a confluence of elements — Mr. Steinberg's reverential approach, the one-and-only Boston sound ringing through the night air, a well-matched quartet (soprano Gwendolin Sims, contralto Eunice Alberts, tenor William Cochran, bass Thomas Paul), the clarion chorus, the beauty and repose of the locale — that paved the way for easy and open-hearted receptivity. Beethoven spoke forcefully through music and nature, and the rapturous ovation at the end indicated that the message had arrived.

A BSO debut

Jerome Lowenthal made his BSO debut as piano soloist in the C Minor Fantasy which preceded the D Minor Symphony—the first of two impressive appearances on the weekend. Not a thunderer, Mr. Lowenthal nevertheless proved to have the power and technique to play the fantasy in the grand manner, and the following afternoon, under Mr. Rudolf's baton, to adapt his style to the more delicate requirements, but no less demanding treatment, of the Concerto No. 1 in C. Actually it was a heartening example of the soloist accommodating himself stylistically to two quite different masterpieces, rather than imposing a single inflexible image on both. Certain other virtuosos and all students please take notice.

Mr. Rudolf's program on Sunday afternoon, in addition to the first piano concerto to which he lent the kind of understanding support any soloist must love, began with the "Leonore" Overture No. 2, and concluded with the Fifth Symphony, two Beethoven items which time and usage have perhaps unfairly relegated to the respective status of underdone and overdone. Neither of them sounded that way on Sunday, thanks to Mr. Rudolf's incisive beat and the orchestra's ready response to it. There was both grandeur and humility in Mr. Rudolf's readings, and that's certainly the way it should be. There was also some delectable solo playing from winds and brass during the afternoon—a nice mark of respect toward a composer who thought a lot of them too.

Steinberg Conducts at Tanglewood

BSO Plays Beethoven's 9th

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 19 1970 New England Newsclip

By HERBERT ALPER
HT Contributing Music Critic

William Steinberg, the Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and conductor of two of last weekends concerts at Tanglewood's Beethoven programs, manifestly loves the word "bruder". At least he has his musicians sing this German word for brother as if they meant it — every single time. It was conveyed to the very large audience.

LET'S FACE IT, however. The Ninth Symphony is far from being the most gracious musical writing for voices, and the universal call to brotherhood is frequently weakened by musical problems such as vocal pitch, as it was Saturday night. But Steinberg is an excellent conductor. He is one of the few who not only follows the gradual dynamic markings of a composer's score, but also frequently follows the pitch contour with appropriate crescendos and decrescendos. He balances these subtleties with the important musical thought as well.

The last movement was sung with words detached and clarified, and a listener could really hear them.

The first three movements were beautifully controlled and projected. Even the extended third movement sustained interest throughout. Again, it seems to this listener that in general Steinberg's tempos were faster than one remembers from hearings in other times and places. The soloists for the Ninth were Gwendolin Sims, Eunice Alberts, William Cochran and Thomas Paul. The Chorus Pro Musica was prepared by Alfred Nash Patterson and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus by John Oliver.

THREE PIANISTS took part in the festivities of the weekend. Claude Frank played two sonatas for the Weekend Prelude. The E minor, op. 90, came off in a beautiful, personal manner. The "Waldstein", op. 53, became the problem it does for many pianists. Percussive chords (probably not that loud on Beethoven's piano) stretched the structure out of shape. Rudolph Firkusny played the "Emperor" Concerto Friday night with clarity but a lack of momentum. Jerome Lowenthal played the Fantasy in C minor for Piano and Orchestra, op. 80, and brilliantly balanced the upper and lower parts of the piano so that treble lines were never obscured.

Finally, since this is the last of this listener's reports from Tanglewood, I would like to salute two members and a section of the B. S. O. that rarely get their due. Sherman Walt, bassoonist with the fat, lovely sound is a musician of the first order. One thinks of the counter-theme in the second statement of the last movement of the Ninth, the statement (with violins) of an expository theme in a Haydn Symphony, and many more.

Ditto the gentlemanly and musicianly William Gibson, trombone. Finally, all praise to Vic Firth and the immaculate percussion section who never miss — or one wouldn't know it.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

AUG 17 1970 New England Newsclip

Record Audiences at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — With only one weekend to go, it's doubtful if anything in the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood will top the magnificent performance Beethoven's Ninth Symphony received Saturday night under William Steinberg's direction.

The three Beethoven concerts and Saturday morning's open rehearsal were attended by 32,510. The audience of 8,148 was the largest for a Friday night in the festival's 33 years.

Beethoven's Ninth was all things to Steinberg. His quiet but potent influence spread like wildfire through orchestra chorus and soloists.

It came as a surprise. In the preceding work — Fantasy in C minor — about the only thing that went consistently well was the page turning.

Tiny Gestures

Steinberg gave one of the most inactive physical performances of the Ninth on record. Most of the time it was tiny gestures instead of grand sweeps.

But communication was extraordinary. From the austere start to frantic finish every orchestral and choral phrase was virtually sculptured.

The scherzo was unloosed like a torrent. The adagio was silken smooth. One hundred mixed voices from the Tanglewood Chorus and Chorus Pro Musica sang with life-or-death tension. Yet, the soft-sung phrases were just as emotional.

Soprano Gwendolin Sims and contralto Eunice Alberts sang their roles without resorting to the usual screaming. Thomas Paul had the bass power to carry the solo introduction of the finale. William Cochran hammered away at the tenor part until he exhausted it.

The Beethoven Fantasy was a sad affair. Pianist Jerome Lowenthal apparently had left the practice room much too soon. He contributed an epidemic of wrong notes.

Chorus Pro Musica sounded pallid and unexciting, gaining some fortitude in heavier stretches. Woodwind and string solos restored the work's modest status, far removed from the composer's better efforts.

Max Rudolf conducted yesterday afternoon's concert. Best-known for his work at the Met, he's conductor emeritus of the Cincinnati Symphony and presently heads the opera department at the Curtis Institute.

Innately a conductor of good taste and sound judgment, Rudolf couldn't miss with the second "Leonore" Overture and Fifth Symphony. Lowenthal was his soloist in the First Piano Concerto.

Rudolf and the orchestra gave Lowenthal a background of symphonic status, but restrained enough to fully display his talents.

Lowenthal's playing was facile, stylistic and accurate, for the most part. The first movement cadenza was pretty frantic, however.

Along with pictorial mannerisms, the pianist produced a singing tone and sympathetic attitude toward melody in the slow movement. He plunged into the finale at full speed, achieving here his best results.

Rudolf's concept of the Fifth Symphony was no routined matter.

He moved the opening movement along at a slightly faster than usual tempo, then tackled the second in opposite fashion. Lead to the finale was more matter-of-fact than dramatic. The finale itself had splendor and calculated build-up to a full-scale climax.

Rudolf ordered and received a wealth of rich hues in the "Leonore." The orchestra was its most painstaking with quality, precision and obedience to the minutest directive. The feverish parallel passages in strings were breath-taking.

This kind of thing happens only when the Boston Symphony likes and respects its conductor.

All-Beethoven
Saturday night
William Steinberg, conductor
Fantasy in C minor for piano, chorus and orchestra, Opus 80
Jerome Lowenthal, piano
Chorus Pro Musica
Symphony No. 9 in D minor, Opus 125
Gwendolin Sims, soprano
Eunice Alberts, contralto
William Cochran, tenor
Thomas Paul, bass
Chorus Pro Musica
Tanglewood Festival Chorus
Sunday Afternoon
Max Rudolf, conductor
Leonore Overture No. 2, Opus 72a
Piano Concerto No. 1 in C major, Opus 15
Jerome Lowenthal, piano
Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Opus 67

Tanglewood Concert Shows Beethoven's Growth

By GENIE ZUST

William Steinberg conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood last night in the Fantasy In C Minor for Piano, Chorus and Orchestra and the Ninth Symphony. Another superb all-Beethoven concert.

The evening opened with the seldom heard and somewhat chaotically assembled Fantasy in C Minor. It is a preview, a hint, of the 9th Symphony. Its major theme is akin to the much more fully developed final theme of the famous Choral Symphony. Hearing the two pieces together gives one a picture of before and after, of youth and maturity.

Not only is the musical theme similar in half thought out form, the lyrics are also. The words are inferior poetry but state the belief that music, harmony is the bringer of peace and joy. Musically and poetically it points to the great later work of the 9th.

The Chorus Pro Musica directed by Alfred Nash Patterson and the very youthful looking Jerome Lowenthal at the piano performed the Fantasy with grand verve and discipline. Mr. Lowenthal was clear, vital and brilliant in this his first appearance with the Boston Symphony.

Then came the 9th Symphony. Words fail to describe it for it speaks to the whole man mind, body and emotions. It is an adventure in inexhaustible musical imagination.

Mr. Steibnerg displayed the second movement's hypnotic rhythms to perfection.

He is precision incarnate and the rarefied delicacy of the scherzo was beautiful. The third slow movement which is a complex development of two contrasting themes, lacked a bit on the emotional side. Mr. Steinberg's interpretation tends more toward Leinsdorf's than Koussevitsky's.

The four soloists were all excellent .Soprano Gwendolin Sims was in soaringly joyful voice. Eunice Adams, alto, William Cochran, tenor and Thomas Paul, bass did their solos and ensemble work well. The Chorus Pro Musica was augmented by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus directed by John Oliver.

The music and the words of last night's concert held the message for Beethoven's time as for ours, that all men are brothers and in that harmony lies true joy.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 17 1970 New England Newsclip

Concerts Builds Image of Growth

By GENIE ZUST

William Steinberg conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood in the Fantasy In C Minor for Piano, Chorus and Orchestra and the Ninth Symphony. Another superb all-Beethoven concert.

The evening opened with the seldom heard and somewhat chaotically assembled Fantasy in C Minor. It is a preview, a hint, of the 9th Symphony. Its major theme is akin to the much more fully developed final theme of the famous Choral Symphony. Hearing the two pieces together gives one a picture of before and after, of youth and maturity.

Not only is the musical theme similar in half thought out form, the lyrics are also. The words are inferior poetry but state the belief that music, harmony is the bringer of peace and joy. Musically and poetically it points to the great later work of the 9th.

The Chorus Pro Musica directed by Alfred Nash Patterson and the very youthful looking Jerome Lowenthal at the piano performed the Fantasy with grand verve and discipline. Mr. Lowenthal was clear, vital and brilliant in this, his first appearance with the Boston Symphony.

Then came the 9th Symphony. Words fail to describe it for it speaks to the whole man mind, body and emotions. It is an adventure in inexhaustible musical imagination.

Mr. Steibnerg displayed the second movement's hypnotic rhythms to perfection.

He is precision incarnate and the rarefied delicacy of the scherzo was beautiful. The third slow movement which is a complex development of two contrasting themes, lacked a bit on the emotional side. Mr. Steinberg's interpretation tends more toward Leinsdorf's than Koussevitsky's.

The four soloists were all excellent .Soprano Gwendolin Sims was in soaringly joyful voice. Eunice Adams, alto, William Cochran, tenor and Thomas Paul, bass did their solos and ensemble work well. The Chorus Pro Musica was augmented by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus directed by John Oliver.

At Tanglewood

Rudolf, Lowenthal Exemplary Team

By GENIE ZUST

LENOX — The last concert of the second Beethoven weekend at Tanglewood was blessed by both the weather and magnificently performed music. The conductor was Max Rudolf, conductor emeritus of the Cincinnati Orchestra.

Lowenthal Angelic

The afternoon concert opened with the Leonore Overture No. 2 with its emotional build to the dramatic trumpet call climax. Mr Rudolf emphasized the suspenseful pauses between the towering chords with grand drama.

Jerome Lowenthal played the Piano Concerto No. 1 in C. He does a seated dance of weaves, bobs and arabesques as he plays. Obviously the "body English" works, for Mr Lowenthal made the sounds of an angel. Mr Rudolf in his sixties and Mr. Lowenthal in his twenties, youth and age, made an exemplary musical team.

This concerto No. 1 is very close to Mozart and has that special singing glow in the largo and the use of delicately irregular phrasing which needs a light staccato touch on the piano in the rondo. It has a late entrance for the solo instrument. It is almost like the excitement built up for the entrance of a stage star.

All for One

The performance was an example of beautiful ensemble work, 70 musicians, Mr. Rudolf and Mr. Lowenthal worked as one mind and body. Solo and tutti; one for all and all for one. The audience interrupted at the end of the first movement to give a hand to Jerome Lowenthal for his brilliant performing of that extended and difficult solo passage.

The opening six chords of Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 are a musical signature known all over the world. It is probably the most popular and best known symphony of all time, heard on millions of records and in hundreds of concerts.

The first movement, the first allegro, is perhaps the most gracefully symetrical and flowing music ever heard. Mr. Rudolf and the BSQ did full justice to it. The tender melody of the andante with the surging song of the celli and the violas at its beginning was built magnificently.

Heat Forgotten

Through the Liltingscherzo allegro and the somewhat rough trio to the haunting oboe coda, the music held the audience.

The temperature was in the 90's butthe music was great enough and the rendition good enough for us all to forget the heat for a brief while.

Beethoven used trombones for the first time in any symphony in the finale of the 5th. Their pneumatic, raucous cries were shocking in Beethoven's day, and they are still tremendously exciting in ours.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
AUG 17 1970
New England Newsclip

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 35,055
AUG 17 1970
New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 17 1970
New England Newsclip

Concert Below Par At Tanglewood

By RICHARD CONWAY

A large and enthusiastic audience heard the all - Beethoven program played by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon. The applause was vigorous and long, but the performance was not really that good.

It was, in brief, a rather pedestrian afternoon, with neither conductor, orchestra or soloist scaling any great musical heights. But Beethoven is Beethoven, and that alone seems to draw and excite audiences.

Under the direction of Max Rudolf, guest conductor, the program opened with the Overture 'Leonore No. 2' Opus 72a.

In an effort to find the right opening for his only opera, Beethoven wrote three overtures. The third is the most well known and most often played. No. 2 is very similar to No. 3 and contains some truly great passages.

But Sunday's performance failed to generate any real excitement. In two or three passages the orchestra simply was not together at all. It was especially noticeable toward the close of the work.

Jerome Lowenthal was guest artist for the piano concerto No. 1 in C, opus 15. Beethoven's first two piano concertos are much like Mozart in style and sound, although the harmonic vocabulary and modulations are clearly Beethoven.

Lowenthal played strongly and clearly, but for some reason set an incredible tempo for the last movement and the whole thing just barely hung together. Matters of tempo seemed to present a problem for the entire first half of the concert.

Entrances of the orchestra following the piano solos were rather tentative at times. The largo movement of the concerto was by far the most satisfactory.

The concert closed with a performance of what is perhaps the most well - known work in all of symphonic literature — Symphony No. 5 in C minor, opus 67. Even a poor performance of this work fails to dim its greatness, and the Boston orchestra's effort was far from being poor. Yet, neither did it really inspire.

Rudolf's interpretation of the first movement didn't allow time for the work to sink in. His conducting is rather clean and done with a minimum of motion or theatrics. He doesn't allow himself to get in the way of the music, and this is good. But the music comes out sounding rather cold.

The Fifth Symphony is anything but cold, though, and we could have wished for more fire. Again, it was the second movement that was the most successful.

An afternoon or evening with Beethoven's music is never wasted. It always provides something to think about, but Sunday's concert just didn't do his music full justice.

Music Review

Beethoven at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE PENULTIMATE Tanglewood weekend was the second of two devoted to observing the 200th anniversary of the birth of Beethoven. For both events William Steinberg, the music director of the Boston Symphony, returned to take over the helm for the first two of each trio of concerts, alloting the third to a guest. For yesterday's program Max Rudolf was the conductor. He is a man of about Steinberg's generation and of similar training and parallel participation with orchestras.

Rudolf's Fifth Symphony was one that had been put through the sieve of many performances and years and was majestic in its contrasting starkness and sensitivity. The orchestra gave expression to a wide gamut of dynamics and tone qualities, fitting like masonry built for endurance each phrase into its rational character.

* * *

THE SOLOIST of the afternoon was Jerome Lowenthal, who had also participated in the previous evening's program when the C Minor Fantasy was played. He played with great virtuosity but one may have a few reservations about the concerto. First of all, it has nearly the longest introductions of all the five, in a very robust vein which leads into a very simple, gentle theme which the soloist played with much lucidity. The cadenza was executed with brilliance but it becomes redundant before it is completed. Lowenthal's fingers produced sparks, however, whenever the occasion permitted and his articulation of the slow movement had deep distinction.

* * *

RUDOLF'S PROGRAM had begun with the Leonore overture, No. 2, Opus 72a, one of four Beethoven wrote while searching for one that would best suit the situation. It has many of the recognizable traits of No. 3 and merits exhibition more often.

Max Rudolf

* * *

FRIDAY EVENING Steinberg opened his program with the short and moderately bland overture to "King Stephan," Opus 117, as a curtain-raiser to give the soloist of the evening, Rudolf Firkusny, a proper entrance for the E Flat Piano Concerto, Opus 73, the "Emperor." To conclude, Steinberg played the "Eroica" symphony, Opus 55, making the evening totally in the same key. It was also totally an evening of consummate maturity.

Steinberg and Firkusny can safely be designated as veterans and their performances were the result of long years of experience and, so-to-speak, marination. Neither of the two great works was given mere routine repetitions but an eager, fresh concept. Firkusny played with an immaculate, youthful proficiency and a thoughtfully poetic realization. Steinberg's accompaniment was in complete agreement and the symphony was notably plumb architecturally and splendid tonally.

With the security he exhibited on his previous appearance and the confidence he patently has in his musicians, Steinberg gave an admirable performance of the "Eroica," achieving both stature and details with rare judgment and taste and inflecting phrases to give clarity and perception to the score.

* * *

SATURDAY NIGHT Steinberg played the Fantasy in C Minor, Opus 80, for Piano (with Jerome Lowenthal as soloist), Chorus (employing the Chorus Pro Musica, of which Alfred Nash Patterson is the able director) and Orchestra, following it with the great Choral symphony.

Steinberg did not immediately start from the summit of the ridge he finally reached in the symphony. The delineation was not as clear and sharp as at the later level. And to quickly dispel all other smudges, one might mention that the introduction to the final movement of the "Eroica" and the instrumental recitative at the beginning of the Finale of the "Choral" was less than dramatic. However, these details once past and out of the way, the music arrived at the grandeur Beethoven conceived, conspicuously with the proclamation baritone Thomas Paul uttered as a voice makes its initial audition. Gwendolin Sims, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, and William Cochran, tenor, were the other members of the excellent quartet of soloists whose opportunities unfortunately in this symphony are always too meager for the resources they command.

* * *

ONE OF THE great moments of the Ninth is always the statement of the principal theme in the cellos and basses and its ensuing repetition successively in the higher timbered strings. Here the Boston orchestra was at its most splendid full-throated glory. Another moment was that when the chorus and the solo quartet let out with their effulgent affirmation of exultation, "Joy, thou spark from heav'n immortal."

An examination of the reasons for the record attendance at these Beethoven programs might be difficult to detect. Was it Beethoven? The ideal Berkshire weather? Was it a tribute to Steinberg? Or a combination of all factors? An analysis is not necessary but whatever the reasons the ovations the artists were accorded were also of record proportions.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
Monday, August 17, 1970

Max Rudolf Excels In Beethoven's 5th

By MICHAEL WIENER

LENOX, Mass. — Beethoven's Fifth may be the best known symphony in the repertory but a performance can still be a stirring experience as Max Rudolf demonstrated yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood.

For all its popularity, the Fifth does not play itself and one rarely encounters a performance as fine as Mr. Rudolf's. Rather than regarding the work as V-for-Victory program music, he took special care to make the symphony's structural outlines clear. The first movement, for once, made logical as well as emotional sense.

Mr. Rudolf also paid particular attention to the work's many tricky passages, so that, for example, the rhythm of the strings at the beginning of the third movement was the same as that of horncall which followed.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY was kept under firm control and the brass and tympani did not go berserk as orchestra often do in performances of this symphony. Mr. Rudolf's reading was a model of orchestral discipline.

The same high level of performance prevailed in the "Piano Concerto No. 1 in C, Op. 15." The soloist, Jerome Lowenthal, gave a lightly inflected rendering which was filled with snap and beautifully phrased.

MR. RUDOLF shared Mr. Lowenthal's conception of the concerto and directed a highly complementary rendition of the orchestral part .The Boston Symphony's wind players deserve special praise for their delightfully witty contributions.

The all-Beethoven program opened with the "Leonore Overture No. 2," which would probably stand as one of the most popular curtain raisers in the repertory if it were not for the existence of the "Leonore No. 3". They are similar in theme and gwneral outline but the relative looseness in development of "No. 2" only becomes apparent in comparison with its successor.

The performance of the "Lenore No. 2" was welcome in its own right and for the glimpse it offered into the creative process. It is probably the closest thing we have to a public view of Beethoven's sketchbooks.

At Tanglewood

Rudolf, Lowenthal Exemplary Team

By GENIE ZUST

LENOX — The last concert of the second Beethoven weekend at Tanglewood was blessed by both the weather and magnificently performed music. The conductor was Max Rudolf, conductor emeritus of the Cincinnati Orchestra.

Lowenthal Angelic

The afternoon concert opened with the Leonore Overture No. 2 with its emotional build to the dramatic trumpet call climax. Mr Rudolf emphasized the suspenseful pauses between the towering chords with grand drama.

Jerome Lowenthal played the Piano Concerto No. 1 in C. He does a seated dance of weaves, bobs and arabesques as he plays. Obviously the "body English" works, for Mr Lowenthal made the sounds of an angel. Mr Rudolf in his sixties and Mr. Lowenthal in his twenties, youth and age, made an exemplary musical team.

This concerto No. 1 is very close to Mozart and has that special singing glow in the largo and the use of delicately irregular phrasing which needs a light staccato touch on the piano in the rondo. It has a late entrance for the solo instrument. It is almost like the excitement built up for the entrance of a stage star.

All for One

The performance was an example of beautiful ensemble work, 70 musicians, Mr. Rudolf and Mr. Lowenthal worked as one mind and body. Solo and tutti; one for all and all for one. The audience interrupted at the end of the first movement to give a hand to Jerome Lowenthal for his brilliant performing of that extended and difficult solo passage.

The opening six chords of Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 are a musical signature known all over the world. It is probably the most popular and best known symphony of all time, heard on millions of records and in hundreds of concerts.

The first movement, the first allegro, is perhaps the most gracefully symetrical and flowing music ever heard. Mr. Rudolf and the BSQ did full justice to it. The tender melody of the andante with the surging song of the celli and the violas at its beginning was built magnificently.

Heat Forgotten

Through the Liltingscherzo allegro and the somewhat rough trio to the haunting oboe coda, the music held the audience.

The temperature was in the 90's butthe music was great enough and the rendition good enough for us all to forget the heat for a brief while.

Beethoven used trombones for the first time in any symphony in the finale of the 5th. Their pneumatic, raucous cries were shocking in Beethoven's day, and they are still tremendously exciting in ours.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
AUG 17 1970
New England Newsclip

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 35,055
AUG 17 1970
New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
AUG 17 1970
New England Newsclip

Concert Below Par At Tanglewood

By RICHARD CONWAY

A large and enthusiastic audience heard the all-Beethoven program played by the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon. The applause was vigorous and long, but the performance was not really that good.

It was, in brief, a rather pedestrian afternoon, with neither conductor, orchestra or soloist scaling any great musical heights. But Beethoven is Beethoven, and that alone seems to draw and excite audiences.

Under the direction of Max Rudolf, guest conductor, the program opened with the Overture 'Leonore No. 2' Opus 72a.

In an effort to find the right opening for his only opera, Beethoven wrote three overtures. The third is the most well known and most often played. No. 2 is very similar to No. 3 and contains some truly great passages.

But Sunday's performance failed to generate any real excitement. In two or three passages the orchestra simply was not together at all. It was especially noticeable toward the close of the work.

Jerome Lowenthal was guest artist for the piano concerto No. 1 in C, opus 15. Beethoven's first two piano concertos are much like Mozart in style and sound, although the harmonic vocabulary and modulations are clearly Beethoven.

Lowenthal played strongly and clearly, but for some reason set an incredible tempo for the last movement and the whole thing just barely hung together. Matters of tempo seemed to present a problem for the entire first half of the concert.

Entrances of the orchestra following the piano solos were rather tentative at times. The largo movement of the concerto was by far the most satisfactory.

The concert closed with a performance of what is perhaps the most well-known work in all of symphonic literature — Symphony No. 5 in C minor, opus 67. Even a poor performance of this work fails to dim its greatness, and the Boston orchestra's effort was far from being poor. Yet, neither did it really inspire.

Rudolf's interpretation of the first movement didn't allow time for the work to sink in. His conducting is rather clean and done with a minimum of motion or theatrics. He doesn't allow himself to get in the way of the music, and this is good. But the music comes out sounding rather cold.

The Fifth Symphony is anything but cold, though, and we could have wished for more fire. Again, it was the second movement that was the most successful.

An afternoon or evening with Beethoven's music is never wasted. It always provides something to think about, but Sunday's concert just didn't do his music full justice.

Music Review

Beethoven at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

Max Rudolf

THE PENULTIMATE Tanglewood weekend was the second of two devoted to observing the 200th anniversary of the birth of Beethoven. For both events William Steinberg, the music director of the Boston Symphony, returned to take over the helm for the first two of each trio of concerts, alloting the third to a guest. For yesterday's program Max Rudolf was the conductor. He is a man of about Steinberg's generation and of similar training and parallel participation with orchestras.

Rudolf's Fifth Symphony was one that had been put through the sieve of many performances and years and was majestic in its contrasting starkness and sensitivity. The orchestra gave expression to a wide gamut of dynamics and tone qualities, fitting like masonry built for endurance each phrase into its rational character.

* * *

THE SOLOIST of the afternoon was Jerome Lowenthal, who had also participated in the previous evening's program when the C Minor Fantasy was played. He played with great virtuosity, but one may have a few reservations about the concerto. First of all, it has nearly the longest introductions of all the five, in a very robust vein which leads into a very simple, gentle theme which the soloist played with much lucidity. The cadenza was executed with brilliance but it becomes redundant before it is completed. Lowenthal's fingers produced sparks, however, whenever the occasion permitted and his articulation of the slow movement had deep distinction.

* * *

RUDOLF'S PROGRAM had begun with the Leonore overture, No. 2, Opus 72a, one of four Beethoven wrote while searching for one that would best suit the situation. It has many of the recognizable traits of No. 3 and merits exhibition more often.

* * *

FRIDAY EVENING Steinberg opened his program with the short and moderately bland overture to "King Stephan," Opus 117, as a curtain-raiser to give the soloist of the evening, Rudolf Firkusny, a proper entrance for the E Flat Piano Concerto, Opus 73, the "Emperor." To conclude, Steinberg played the "Eroica" symphony, Opus 55, making the evening totally in the same key. It was also totally an evening of consummate maturity.

Steinberg and Firkusny can safely be designated as veterans and their performances were the result of long years of experience and, so-to-speak, marination. Neither of the two great works was given mere routine repetitions but an eager, fresh concept. Firkusny played with an immaculate, youthful proficiency and a thoughtfully poetic realization. Steinberg's accompaniment was in complete agreement and the symphony was notably plumb architecturally and splendid tonally.

With the security he exhibited on his previous appearance and the confidence he patently has in his musicians, Steinberg gave an admirable performance of the "Eroica," achieving both stature and details with rare judgment and taste and inflecting phrases to give clarity and perception to the score.

* * *

SATURDAY NIGHT Steinberg played the Fantasy in C Minor, Opus 80, for Piano (with Jerome Lowenthal as soloist), Chorus (employing the Chorus Pro Musica, of which Alfred Nash Patterson is the able director) and Orchestra, following it with the great Choral symphony.

Steinberg did not immediately start from the summit of the ridge he finally reached in the symphony. The delineation was not as clear and sharp as at the later level. And to quickly dispel all other smudges, one might mention that the introduction to the final movement of the "Eroica" and the instrumental recitative at the beginning of the Finale of the "Choral" was less than dramatic. However, these details once past and out of the way, the music arrived at the grandeur Beethoven conceived, conspicuously with the proclamation baritone Thomas Paul uttered as a voice makes its initial audition. Gwendolin Sims, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, and William Cochran, tenor, were the other members of the excellent quartet of soloists whose opportunities unfortunately in this symphony are always too meager for the resources they command.

* * *

ONE OF THE great moments of the Ninth is always the statement of the principal theme in the cellos and basses and its ensuing repetition successively in the higher timbered strings. Here the Boston orchestra was at its most splendid full-throated glory. Another moment was that when the chorus and the solo quartet let out with their effulgent affirmation of exultation, "Joy, thou spark from heav'n immortal."

An examination of the reasons for the record attendance at these Beethoven programs might be difficult to detect. Was it Beethoven? The ideal Berkshire weather? Was it a tribute to Steinberg? Or a combination of all factors? An analysis is not necessary but whatever the reasons the ovations the artists were accorded were also of record proportions.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
Monday, August 17, 1970

Max Rudolf Excels In Beethoven's 5th

By MICHAEL WIENER

LENOX, Mass. — Beethoven's Fifth may be the best known symphony in the repertory but a performance can still be a stirring experience as Max Rudolf demonstrated yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood.

For all its popularity, the Fifth does not play itself and one rarely encounters a performance as fine as Mr. Rudolf's. Rather than regarding the work as V-for-Victory program music, he took special care to make the symphony's structural outlines clear. The first movement, for once, made logical as well as emotional sense.

Mr. Rudolf also paid particular attention to the work's many tricky passages, so that, for example, the rhythm of the strings at the beginning of the third movement was the same as that of horncall which followed.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY was kept under firm control and the brass and tympani did not go berserk as orchestra often do in performances of this symphony. Mr. Rudolf's reading was a model of orchestral discipline.

The same high level of performance prevailed in the "Piano Concerto No. 1 in C, Op. 15." The soloist, Jerome Lowenthal, gave a lightly inflected rendering which was filled with snap and beautifully phrased.

MR. RUDOLF shared Mr. Lowenthal's conception of the concerto and directed a highly complementary rendition of the orchestral part .The Boston Symphony's wind players deserve special praise for their delightfully witty contributions.

The all-Beethoven program opened with the "Leonore Overture No. 2," which would probably stand as one of the most popular curtain raisers in the repertory if it were not for the existence of the "Leonore No. 3". They are similar in theme and gwneral outline but the relative looseness in development of "No. 2" only becomes apparent in comparison with its successor.

The performance of the "Lenore No. 2" was welcome in its own right and for the glimpse it offered into the creative process. It is probably the closest thing we have to a public view of Beethoven's sketchbooks.

Steinberg, Rudolf direct Beethoven at Tanglewood

The second of two weekends of music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra devoted to the works of Beethoven begins Friday evening August 14, at 9 in the Tanglewood Shed. William Steinberg, Boston Symphony Music Director, conducts the Orchestra with piano soloist Rudolf Firkusny. The program opens with Symphony no. 3 in E-flat 'Eroica', followed by the Piano concerto no. 5 in E-flat 'Emperor' with Mr. Firkusny as piano soloist.

The Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in the Shed presents pianist Claude Frank performing two Sonatas: E-minor, op. 90 and C major, op. 53 'Waldstein.' Admission to Weekend Prelude recitals is free to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert.

The Open Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony, Saturday morning, August 15, at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed, presents guest conductor Max Rudolf with pianist Jerome Lowenthal rehearsing the program for the concert the following day. Tickets are $2.50, on sale the morning of the rehearsal, and benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Jerome Lowenthal, making his debut this weekend with the Boston Symphony, made his concert debut in 1963 with the New York Philharmonic. He has toured extensively in North and South America, Asia and Europe giving recitals and playing with many of the major orchestras. In 1964, Mr. Lowenthal toured with William Steinberg and the Pittsburgh Symphony through 14 countries of Europe and the Middle East under the sponsorship of the United States State Department.

William Steinberg conducts the Boston Symphony Saturday evening August 15, at 8:30. The program opens with the Fantasy in c minor for piano, chorus and orchestra with soloists Jerome Lowenthal, piano, the Chorus Pro Musica and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. The second half of the program is devoted to a performance of the Symphony no. 9 in d minor op. 125 'Choral' with soloists Gwendolin Sims, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, William Cochran, tenor, Thomas Paul, bass, the Chorus Pro Musica and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Sunday afternoon, August 16, at 2:30 in the Shed, guest conductor Max Rudolf conducts the Boston Symphony in the Leonore overture no. 2, the Piano concerto no. 1 in C major, Jerome Lowenthal, soloist, and the Symphony no. 5 in c minor.

The annual Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood concert is Tuesday evening, August 11 at 8 o'clock in the Shed. Arthur Fiedler conducts the Pops in an all Gershwin program with piano soloist Earl Wild.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,055
AUG 6 1970 New England Newsclip

Second Beethoven Weekend Slated at Tanglewood

The second of two weekends of music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra devoted to the works of Beethoven begins Friday, Aug. 14, at 9 p.m. in the Tanglewood Shed. William Steinberg, Boston Symphony music director, will conduct the orchestra with piano soloist Rudolf Firkusny. The program opens with Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica") in E-flat, followed by the piano concerto No. 5 ("Emperor") in E-flat with Mr. Firkusny as soloist.

The weekend prelude at 7 p.m. in the Shed presents pianist Claude Frank performing two sonatas, E-Minor, Opus 90 and C-Major, Opus 53 ("Waldstein"). Admission to weekend prelude recitals is free to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert.

The open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony, Saturday morning, at 10:30 in the Shed, presents guest conductor Max Rudolf with pianist Jerome Lowenthal rehearsing the Sunday program. Ticket proceeds from the rehearsal benefit the orchestra's pension fund.

Lowenthal, who is making his debut with the Boston Symphony, made his concert debut in 1963 with the New York Philharmonic. He has toured extensively in North and South America, Asia and Europe, giving recitals and playing with many of the major orchestras. In 1964 Lowenthal toured with William Steinberg and the Pittsburgh Symphony through 14 countries of Europe and the Middle East. The tour was sponsored by the United States State Department.

Orchestra and Chorus

Steinberg will conduct the Boston Symphony Saturday, Aug. 15, at 8:30 p.m. The program opens with Fantasy in C-Minor for piano, chorus and orchestra with soloists Lowenthal, the Chorus Pro Musica and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. The second half of the program will be devoted to a performance of Symphony No. 9 ("Choral") in D-Minor Opus 125 with soloists Gwendolin Sims, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, William Cochran, tenor, Thomas Paul, bass, and the Chorus Pro Musica and the Festival Chorus.

The concert Sunday, Aug. 16, at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, will feature guest conductor Max Rudolf. He will direct the Boston Symphony in "Leonore Overture" No. 2, Piano Concerto No. 1 in C-Major, Lowenthal, soloist, and Symphony No. 5 in C-Minor.

The annual Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood concert is Tuesday, Aug. 11 at 8 p.m. in the Shed. Arthur Fiedler conducts the Pops in an all-Gershwin program with piano soloist Earl Wild.

BACK BAY LEDGER
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY 10,000
AUG 6 1970 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,160
AUG 7 1970 New England Newsclip

Performers at Tanglewood Next Weekend

Eunice Alberts will perform in the Beethoven program Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Miss Alberts is from Boston and attended the New England Conservatory of Music. She also attended the opera Department of the Berkshire Music Center.

At Tanglewood next Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Max Rudolf will conduct the Beethoven program. Rudolf, music director emeritus of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, has been a professional musician for nearly 50 years. He plays the trumpet, cello and organ.

Gwendolin Sims will perform Beethoven's Symphony no. 9, "Choral Saturday at 8:30 p.m. Miss Sims attended Oberlin College Conservatory as a voice major. She has toured Europe and the U.S.

Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Jerome Lowenthal will play a piece from the Beethoven program. Lowenthal has risen rapidly to his present position of prominence, his debut having been in 1963. He has performed with most of the great conductors of the world and in most of the great music centers.

Rudolf Firkusny will perform Beethoven's piano concerto no. 5, "Emperor" under the baton of William Steinberg, Friday at 9 p.m. Firkusny is known throughout the world today. He devotes six months of each year to concerts in North America, three months in Europe, leaving time for trips to South America or the Orient.

Beethoven Concerts In Second Weekend At Tanglewood Shed

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX — The second of two weekends of music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra devoted to the works of Beethoven will begin August 14 at 9 p.m. in the Tanglewood Shed.

William Steinberg, Boston Symphony music director, will conduct the orchestra with piano soloist Rudolf Firkusny. The program will open with Symphony No. 3 in E-flat 'Eroica', followed by the Piano concerto No. 5 in E-flat 'Emperor' with Firkusny as piano soloist.

The Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in the Shed will present pianist Claude Frank performing two Sonatas: E minor, Op. 90 and C major, Op. 53 'Waldstein.' Admission to Weekend Prelude recitals is free to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert.

The open rehearsal of the Boston Symphony, August 15, at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed, will present guest conductor Max Rudolf with pianist Jerome Lowenthal rehearsing the program for the concert the following day. Tickets on sale the morning of the rehearsal and benefit the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Jerome Lowenthal, making his debut this weekend with the Boston Symphony, made his concert debut in 1963 with the New York Philharmonic. In 1964, Mr. Lowenthal toured with William Steinberg and the Pittsburgh Symphony through 14 countries of Europe and the Middle East under the sponsorship of the United States State Department.

William Steinberg will conduct the Boston Symphony August 15, at 8:30 p.m. The program opens with the Fantasy in C minor for piano, chorus and orchestra with soloists Jerome Lowenthal, piano, the Chorus Pro Musica and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

The second half of the program will be devoted to a performance of the Symphony No. 9 in D minor Op. 125 'Choral' with soloists Gwendolin Sims, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, William Cochran, tenor, Thomas Paul, bass, the Chorus Pro Musica and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus.

Sunday afternoon, August 16, at 2:30 p.m. in the Shed, guest conductor Max Rudolf will conduct the Boston Symphony in the "Leonore" overture No. 2, the Piano concerto No. 1 in C major, Jerome Lowenthal, soloist, and the Symphony No. 5 in C minor.

The annual Boston Pops-at-Tanglewood concert is Tuesday at 8 p.m. in the Shed. Arthur Fiedler conducts the Pops in an all-Gershwin program with piano soloist Earl Wild.

ITALIAN ECHO
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
WEEKLY
JUL 31 1970 New England Newsclip

Trip to Tanglewood

A Sunday afternoon concert at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lenox, Mass., has been scheduled for August 16 by the Travel Club of the YWCA of Greater Rhode Island. The all Beethoven program will be conducted by William Steinberg, with Jerome Lowenthal, pianist, as soloist.

Plans call for the group to leave the Providence building of the YWCA, 54 Jackson Street, at 9:30 a.m. on August 16, arriving at Tanglewood by 12:30, in time for a leisurely exploration of the festival grounds before the 2:30 concert. Members may bring a picnic lunch or purchase light refreshments there.

Following the afternoon concert, the group will leave for home by 5:30, stopping en route at the Yankee Pedlar Inn for dinner.

Reservations must be made by July 31 with Mrs. Marion Hill at the YWCA. Open to all friends of music, the trip will be made by air conditioned chartered bus.

POST
E. PROVIDENCE, R. I.
WEEKLY 2,500
JUL 30 1970 New England Newsclip

Women's group slates trip to Tanglewood

A trip to Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Lenox, Mass., has been scheduled for Sunday, August 16, by the Travel Club of the YWCA of Greater Rhode Island. The all-Beethoven program will be conducted by William Steinberg, with Jerome Lowenthal, pianist, as featured soloist.

The group will leave the Providence building of the YWCA, 54 Jackson Street, at 9:30 a.m., traveling by air conditioned chartered bus. Arrival at Tanglewood by 12:30 allows time for leisurely enjoyment of the festival grounds before the 2:30 concert.

Members may bring along a picnic lunch or purchase light refreshments on the grounds. Homeward bound following the concert, a dinner stop will be made at the Yankee Pedlar Inn.

Reservations, open to all music lovers, must be made by July 31 with Mrs. Marion Hill at the YWCA. For added information, call the YWCA at 861-2910.

PIANIST . . . At Tanglewood on Saturday, August 15 at 8:30 p.m., Jerome Lowenthal will play a piece from the Beethoven Program. Mr. Lowenthal has risen rapidly to his present position of prominence, his debut having been in 1963. He has performed with most of the great conductors of the world and in most of the great music centers.

WEEKEND MUSIC AT TANGLEWOOD

The seventh weekend of music at Tanglewood will open Friday evening Aug. 14, with a piano prelude played by Claude Frank at 7 p.m.; a curtain-raiser to the first of three all-Beethoven programs beginning at 9. William Steinberg will conduct the Eroica symphony and the Piano concerto number 5 (the "Emperor") which will feature Rudolf Firkusny, pianist.

Mr. Firkusny is known throughout the world. He devotes six months of each year to concerts in North America, three to a European tour, leaving three for trips to South America and the Orient.

Saturday's concert at 8:30 in the evening will again be under the baton of Mr. Steinberg. Beethoven's choral fantasy featuring Jerome Lowenthal will open the program followed by the famous 9th Symphony. This will feature the Pro Musica and Tanglewood Festival choruses plus Gwendolin Sims, Eunice Alberts, William Cochran and Thomas Paul in the solo roles.

Sunday afternoon at 2:30 Max Rudolf, Music Director Emeritus of the Cincinnati Symphony, will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in Beethoven's "Consecration of the House" overture followed by the Piano concerto number 1 featuring Mr. Lowenthal. The program will be concluded by Beethoven's 5th Symphony.

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,040 (S) 56,127
AUG 13 1970 New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813
AUG 13 1970 New England Newsclip

Symphony soloist

Soprano Gwendolin Sims will be a member of the vocal quartet to be heard in Beethoven's Ninth with the Boston Symphony under William Steinberg's direction at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on Saturday evening, Aug. 15.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
AUG 9 1970 New England Newsclip

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900
JUL 29 1970 New England Newsclip

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
AUG 7 1970 New England Newsclip

CITIZEN
WINSTED, CONN.
(E) 4,300
JUL 31 1970 New England Newsclip

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
AUG 1 1970 New England Newsclip

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
WEEKLY 11,000
JUL 31 1970 New England Newsclip

Max Rudolf

The director emeritus of the Cincinnati Orchestra will conduct the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 16, in the final concert of the summer's Beethoven cycle.

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 129,656
AUG 14 1970

DEVOTED TO BEETHOVEN. Eunice Alberts, left, and Gwendolin Sims perform on the all-Beethoven program of the Boston Orchestra tomorrow at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Miss Sims will be heard in Symphony No. 9, the Choral. She attended Oberlin College Conservatory while Miss Alberts studied at New England Conservatory.

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
S. 251,094
AUG 9 1970

GUEST. Rudolf Firkusny will play Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5, "Emperor" with the Boston Symphony under the baton of William Steinberg Friday at 9 p.m. in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Firkusny devotes six months of the year to concerts in North America, three months to performing in Europe and divides the rest between tours to South America or the Orient.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, August 9, 1970

GUEST. Rudolf Firkusny will play Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5, "Emperor" with the Boston Symphony under the baton of William Steinberg Friday at 9 p.m. in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Firkusny devotes six months of the year to concerts in North America, three months to performing in Europe and divides the rest between tours to South America or the Orient.

Whitestone Photo

William Steinberg

After a six months absence, the music director of the Boston Symphony will return to conduct the orchestra at Tanglewood on Friday and Saturday evenings this week, and on Aug. 14 and 15 in four all-Beethoven programs, which will include three of the piano concertos, the Choral Fantasy, and the Ninth Symphony.

TWO PIANISTS FEATURE the weekend program at Tanglewood. Rudolf Firkusny, right, who will perform Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5, "Emperor," under the baton of William Steinberg, Friday evening at 9 p.m. Saturday, at 8:30 p.m., Jerome Lowenthal, left, will play a piece from the Beethoven program. Both artists are well known in the musical field, Firkusny divides his time between North America, Europe and South America; and Lowenthal has played in most of the great musical centers with most of the great conductors of the world.

Beethoven's 'Emperor'

At Tanglewood on Friday, August 14 at 9 pm, Rudolf Firkusny will perform Beethoven's Piano concerto, the "Emperor" under the baton of William Steinberg. Mr Firkusny is known throughout the world today: he devotes six months of each year to concerts in North America, three months in Europe, leaving time for trips to South America or the Orient.

POST
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
(E) 33,000 (S) 87,000
AUG 16 1970 New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD 1970, Berkshire Festival at Lenox, Mass.—Today at 2:30 p.m., guest Max Rudolf conducts the Boston Symphony orchestra in the "Leonore" overture No. 2, the Piano concerto, No. 1 in C major, Jerome Lowenthal, soloist; and Symphony No. 5 in C minor; Friday at 9, M. Schuller conducting in Weber, Der Freischutz overture; Szymanowski, Violin concerto No. 1 with Paul Zukofsky as guest artist; Schuller, Spectra; Scriabin, Poem of Ecstasy; Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Ozawa conducting in Lutoslawski, Concerto for orchestra; Rachmaninov, Piano Concerto No. 3 with Alexis Weissenberg as guest artist; Bartok, Concerto for orchestra; next Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Ozawa conducting in Berlioz Requiem; Leopold Simoneau soloist with Tanglewood Festival chorus, Framingham Choral society and MIT chorus; weekend prelude Friday at 7 p.m., with guest artists in short recitals at no extra charge to Friday night ticket holders.

PIANIST . . . At Tanglewood on Saturday, August 15 at 8:30 p.m., Jerome Lowenthal will play a piece from the Beethoven Program. Mr. Lowenthal has risen rapidly to his present position of prominence, his debut having been in 1963. He has performed with most of the great conductors of the world and in most of the great music centers.

WEEKEND MUSIC AT TANGLEWOOD

The seventh weekend of music at Tanglewood will open Friday evening Aug. 14, with a piano prelude played by Claude Frank at 7 p.m.; a curtain-raiser to the first of three all-Beethoven programs beginning at 9. William Steinberg will conduct the Eroica symphony and the Piano concerto number 5 (the "Emperor") which will feature Rudolf Firkusny, pianist.

Mr. Firkusny is known throughout the world. He devotes six months of each year to concerts in North America, three to a European tour, leaving three for trips to South America and the Orient.

Saturday's concert at 8:30 in the evening will again be under the baton of Mr. Steinberg. Beethoven's choral fantasy featuring Jerome Lowenthal will open the program followed by the famous 9th Symphony. This will feature the Pro Musica and Tanglewood Festival choruses plus Gwendolin Sims, Eunice Alberts, William Cochran and Thomas Paul in the solo roles.

Sunday afternoon at 2:30 Max Rudolf, Music Director Emeritus of the Cincinnati Symphony, will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in Beethoven's "Consecration of the House" overture followed by the Piano concerto number 1 featuring Mr. Lowenthal. The program will be concluded by Beethoven's 5th Symphony.

Symphony soloist

Soprano Gwendolin Sims will be a member of the vocal quartet to be heard in Beethoven's Ninth with the Boston Symphony under William Steinberg's direction at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on Saturday evening Aug. 15.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
AUG 9 1970 New England Newsclip

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(S) 14,900
JUL 29 1970 New England Newsclip

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
AUG 7 1970 New England Newsclip

CITIZEN
WINSTED, CONN.
(E) 4,300
JUL 31 1970 New England Newsclip

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850
AUG 1 1970 New England Newsclip

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
WEEKLY 11,000
JUL 31 1970 New England Newsclip

Max Rudolf

The director emeritus of the Cincinnati Orchestra will conduct the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 16, in the final concert of the summer's Beethoven cycle.

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 179,655
AUG 14 1970

DEVOTED TO BEETHOVEN. Eunice Alberts, left, and Gwendolin Sims perform on the all-Beethoven program of the Boston Orchestra tomorrow at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Miss Sims will be heard in Symphony No. 9, the Choral. She attended Oberlin College Conservatory while Miss Alberts studied at New England Conservatory.

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
S. 251,094
AUG 9 1970

GUEST. Rudolf Firkusny will play Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5, "Emperor" with the Boston Symphony under the baton of William Steinberg Friday at 9 p.m. in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Firkusny devotes six months of the year to concerts in North America, three months to performing in Europe and divides the rest between tours to South America or the Orient.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, August 9, 1970

GUEST. Rudolf Firkusny will play Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5, "Emperor" with the Boston Symphony under the baton of William Steinberg Friday at 9 p.m. in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Firkusny devotes six months of the year to concerts in North America, three months to performing in Europe and divides the rest between tours to South America or the Orient.

Whitestone Photo

William Steinberg

After a six months absence, the music director of the Boston Symphony will return to conduct the orchestra at Tanglewood on Friday and Saturday evenings this week, and on Aug. 14 and 15 in four all-Beethoven programs, which will include three of the piano concertos, the Choral Fantasy, and the Ninth Symphony.

TWO PIANISTS FEATURE the weekend program at Tanglewood. Rudolf Firkusny, right, who will perform Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5, "Emporer," under the baton of William Steinberg, Friday evening at 9 p.m. Saturday, at 8:30 p.m., Jerome Lowenthal, left, will play a piece from the Beethoven program. Both artists are well known in the musical field, Firkusny divides his time between North America, Europe and South America; and Lowenthal has played in most of the great musical centers with most of the great conductors of the world.

Beethoven's 'Emperor'

At Tanglewood on Friday, August 14 at 9 pm, Rudolf Firkusny will perform Beethoven's Piano concerto, the "Emperor" under the baton of William Steinberg. Mr Firkusny is known throughout the world today: he devotes six months of each year to concerts in North America, three months in Europe, leaving time for trips to South America or the Orient.

TANGLEWOOD 1970, Berkshire Festival at Lenox, Mass.—Today at 2:30 p.m., guest Max Rudolf conducts the Boston Symphony orchestra in the "Leonore" overture No. 2, the Piano concerto, No. 1 in C major, Jerome Lowenthal, soloist; and Symphony No. 5 in C minor; Friday at 9, M. Schuller conducting in Weber, Der Freischutz overture; Szymanowski, Violin concerto No. 1 with Paul Zukofsky as guest artist; Schuller, Spectra; Scriabin, Poem of Ecstasy; Saturday at 8:30 p.m., Ozawa conducting in Lutoslawski, Concerto for orchestra; Rachmaninov, Piano Concerto No. 3 with Alexis Weissenberg as guest artist; Bartok, Concerto for orchestra; next Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Ozawa conducting in Berlioz Requiem; Leopold Simoneau soloist with Tanglewood Festival chorus, Framingham Choral society and MIT chorus; weekend prelude Friday at 7 p.m., with guest artists in short recitals at no extra charge to Friday night ticket holders.

90

WHRB review read 9/22

The weekend of August 14 was the Boston Symphony's greatest summer contribution to the Beethoven Bicentennial. In three days you could hear symphonies 3, 5, and 9, the first and fifth piano concerti, the choral fantasy, the Waldstein and Op. 90 sonatas, the Lenore no. 2 and King Stephen Overtures. Most of these are if anything overfamiliar, but they are masterpieces none the less; and to do justice to that much good music was not easy.

Consider the Friday evening Weekend Prelude. Claude Frank had planned what on paper looked like a particularly good program: the beautiful but rarely played sonata Op. 90 and the popular Waldstein. Unfortunately it didn't work and one couldn't really blame Frank that it didn't. To offer something as intimate as the Op. 90 sonata to the huge, open shed at Tanglewood was almost embarrassing. Frank not only found it difficult to project subtleties of mood; he was visibly ill at ease with the piece himself. The Waldstein is not so intimate, but Frank's performance still lacked structure. Individual gestures didn't come off well, so he couldn't fit them together.

The orchestral concert which followed, however, had no such problems. In Eroica, in the Emperor concerto, and in the King Stephen overture, William Steinberg's dramatic structure was beyond reproach. Any competent performance of Eroica is going to be exciting. Steinberg's Eroica, however, was tightly unified as well. Even certain ambiguous references to the second movement in the fourth were convincing. Steinberg has had a rough time with Boston critics, but both Friday's concert and the Ninth symphony on Saturday were very impressive. The soloist in the Emperor was Rudolf Firkusny. He has been around longer than Claude Frank, and his maturity shows. Firkusny played with an odd percussive touch that made for clarity despite the size of the shed and despite the richness of his tone. Moreover, he matched tone and sound volume with the orchestra more effectively than any other pianist I have heard at Tanglewood. With that sort of technique he could be a musician.

The orchestra played well for Steinberg on both evenings--perhaps a good sign since such was not the case for most of last year. Eroica was a particularly good piece for the BSO in that, of the winds, the oboe is prominent and the clarinet is not. The horns, however, had trouble with the trio of the scherzo and in the scherzo of the Ninth had practically to be nursed along. As for the strings, the sound of the violin sections in the slow movement of the Ninth was something to remember for a long time. Furthermore, the whole string section seemed to play with a richer, more conventional tone than was the case under Leinsdorf and for a large part of last year.

Sunday's concert involved two men not yet mentioned: conductor Max Rudolf and pianist Jerome Lowenthal. Rudolf conducted most of the Beethoven Festival concerts last spring, and his approach at Tanglewood was much the same: predictable, uneccentric, and generally quite effective. If Steinberg tends to underplay, Rudolf does exactly the opposite; but the two nonetheless have much in common. Both belong to a generation of conductors more concerned with dramatic structure than with objective factors, such as orchestral clarity. Lowenthal, who was heard in the first piano concerto on Sunday and in the choral fantasy Saturday night, is a young pianist with considerable promise and a long way to go. The expressive techniques at his disposal are too often limited to an excessively lyrical or a bouncy, percussive style. He is fun to listen to, but he is not subtle.

The BSO begins its season this Friday with a program including Beethoven's seventh. If the orchestra plays as well under Steinberg as it did during the summer, the concert should be worth a special effort.

For WHRB this is Jerry Gechter.

Schuller Leads Tanglewood Into a Slavic Mood

By DONAL HENAHAN
Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 23—Tanglewood, which earlier wore the face of a contemporary festival, did a quick change at week's end and transformed itself into a small survey of older 20th-century Slavic music. Paul Zukofsky, the avant-garde's favorite violinist, took a look over his shoulder at the rarely heard Violin Concerto No. 1 of Szymanowski, a 1917 piece of considerable power in spite of some deeply purple patches that might have been at home in a nickelodeon.

Mr. Zukofsky and the Boston Symphony, under Gunther Schuller, gave an intense and continually persuasive performance on Friday night that maximized the score's claims to be revived occasionally. They kept its modernistic (for 1917) ideas in the foreground without losing sight of the Polish composer's 19th-century roots.

Mr. Schuller, long a lover of Scriabin, led the Bostonians through the Russian mystic's "Poem of Ecstasy," building its single-entendre moans and screams with an experienced lover's fine balancing of control and abandon. One who had not heard Mr. Schuller conduct for some time was prepared for the expertness, but not entirely for the passion of this performance. Mr. Schuller did not flog climaxes obviously, either, but let the Scriabin score's graces and moody suggestions of Debussy's "La Mer" float up effectively.

•

Seiji Ozawa sold Lutoslawski's Concerto for Orchestra to Saturday night's audience with a high-pressured, virtuosic performance. The Pole's 1954 piece, no world-beater when played in the clinical style that most conductors feel appropriate for recent music, has never before kept this listener's attention so consistently as in Mr. Ozawa's robust interpretation. It was also possible to admire how the conductor adapted his orchestral accompaniment to Alexis Weissenberg's pianistically brilliant if rather quirky performance of the Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 3.

Mr Weissenberg's playing could be thundering along and then drop so suddenly and inexplicably into a whispering salon style that the orchestra could scarcely let him be heard. The soloist, whose technique is among the most respected in his craft, churned up a great deal of excitement in the final movement, but his Rachmaninoff on the whole remained cold and lacking in breadth.

Off the Pan-Slavic trail, there was Mr. Schuller's own "Spectra," a 1958 score that involves wholesale rearranging of the orchestra into seven groups. Mr. Schuller conducted Mr. Schuller's technically difficult 23-minute score with understandable assurance and succeeded in holding one's ears with its kaleidoscopic changes of color. "Spectra" seems one of those works, like Debussy's "Jeux," that fascinate by their textures rather than by a simply identifiable line or profile. But among postwar American scores, "Spectra" stands quite high in both listenability and complexity, not an easy balance to achieve.

•

Mr Ozawa's only non-Slavic side trip provided a hard-driving, rhythmically vital performance of the Bartók Concerto for Orchestra. However, quite often subtle points were blown out of proportion, and the final movement's fugue could not unreel with great precision at the tempo Mr. Ozawa chose. With so much talent at his disposal, it is a shame the young conductor did not resist more firmly the temptation to please the portion of the audience that likes its music as broad as the ocean and as deep as a wading pool.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN, 1,445,507
AUG 24 1970

Ozawa Runs Gamut of Virtuosity

By RICHARD HAMMERICH

LENOX —The gamut of orchestral virtuosity was traveled at Tanglewood Saturday night with Seiji Ozawa on the podium with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tone color is probably the fourth most basic ingredient of music after rhythm, melody and harmony, and the program offered a surfeit of it.

First there was Lutoslawski's Concerto For Orchestra, a piece of such brilliance of orchestral color that at times it overlaps into noisiness. It was raucous now and then, but entertaining nevertheless because of its infectious liveliness.

It didn't have the satisfying substance of Bartok's Concerto For Orchestra of course, which ended the program in spite of, or because of, its plethora of wall shaking cymbals, drums, and blaring brass.

It lasted about a half hour and certainly was exciting even when noisy, but the really big piece of the evening was the Rachmaninov Concerto No. 3, one of the most crowd-pleasing pieces of the 20th century (It was written for the composer's piano playing tour of America in 1909).

Alexis Weissenberg was the soloist and he was well cast for the role of bravura romanticist, musically that is. He didn't look the part.

He does not have theatrical mannerisms of the piano bench; he is slight of build, thin of hair, and sits stock still at the keyboard.

But his hands are incredible and his fingers are unbelievable; they are strong, absolutely secure, lushly sensitive, dramatically expressive, as quick as a shortstop, and as nimble as a running back.

The third is my favorite of the Rachmaninov concertos and I don't remember having heard it played with greater fulfillment.

Weissenberg's tendency to overplay to overpedal, to recreate pink clouds and thunder (without tiltin g his head) may be inappropriate with some styles (Notably Bach last Friday) but Saturday night with Rachmaninov it was right, and his feeling for such muscular romanticism may be unsurpassed.

The Bartok Concerto for Orchestra, a really fine piece, which followed probably would have been a victim of anticlimax if intermission hadn't given the audience a chance to recover.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
AUG 24 1970
New England Newsclip

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
AUG 23 1970
New England Newsclip

Schuller Departs From Avant Garde

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — If the programming at Tanglewood Friday had any significance, the attitudes of the musical avant garde were modified.

Gunther Schuller conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Wagner's overture "Rienzi," Szymanowski's Violin Concerto No. 1, his own "Spectra" (1956) and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

During the last 10 years or so, the young musicians of this generation, especially the composers have avoided the romantic like the plague; not so Friday.

They have directed their affection toward the small scale, light - footed sounds of the 17th and early 18th centuries; their efforts toward creating sounds of contrapuntal transparency and tonal variety.

The solid sonority of the romantics of substance such as Wagner was not for them; but Friday Schuller led the orchestra all through a rousing rendition of a work of Wagner's youth to open the program.

Then his associate at the Berkshire Music Center, violinist Paul Zukofsky, appeared to be soloist for the lushly romantic Szymanowski violin concerto.

Zukofsky is a violinist well known among musicians for his ability to play the most horrendously difficult avant garde contemporary inventions. But he draws a delicate almost shy tone from his fiddle; there isn't an arrogant note in him.

So the thickly chromatic, atmosphere of the Szymanewski was clarified a bit by Zukofsky's clarity and purity of tone...but not enough.

There isn't much that could make the piece satisfying; a yawn seen in the middle of the second violin section about half way through the 20 minutes may not have been significant.

The program ended with a 22 - minute work by Scriabin. Words that appear whenever writers discuss his work may give an indication of the scope of its romanticism, i.e., "mystery in tones," "vaporous abstractions," "Aesthetic ecstacy."

So why does a vocal advocate of the sinewy, boney contemporary sounds conduct three of the fattest, most fervid works within reach? Who knows...unless the new wave of musical acceptability has finally recognized the campy entertainment in a Victorian music.

It may be of interest to note that Schullers piece, the 22 - minute "spectra," also has its romantic aspect (in the stylistic sense).

It makes a special effort to use all of the instruments in the large orchestra and it uses them fulsomely to create all of the kaleidoscopic colors (hence 'spectra') available.

The special aspect of this piece (its serialistic frugality is common) is in its mechanical displacement of the members of the orchestra.

Schuller's score calls for unusual combinations of instruments in small ensembles; so he seated those who play passages together near each other. A simple plan which works well, although the piece may not have been worth the trouble.

Attendance was 4238.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427
AUG 22 1970
New England Newsclip

Schuller Puts a Damper On Avant Garde Movement

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — If the programming at Tanglewood Friday had any significance, the attitudes of the musical avant garde was modified.

Gunther Schuller conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Wagner's overture "Rienzi," Szymanowski's Violin Concerto No. 1, his own "Spectra" (1956) and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

During the last 10 years or so, the young musicians of this generation, especially the composers have avoided the romantic like the plague; not so Friday.

They have directed their affection toward the small scale, light - footed sounds of the 17th and early 18th centuries; their efforts toward creating sounds of contrapuntal transparency and tonal variety.

The solid sonority of the romantics of substance such as Wagner was not for them; but Friday Schuller led the orchestra all through a rousing rendition of a work of Wagner's youth to open the program.

Then his associate at the Berkshire Music Center, violinist Paul Zukofsky, appeared to be soloist for the lushly romantic Szymanowski violin concerto.

Zukofsky is a violinist well known among musicians for his ability to play the most horrendously difficult avant garde contemporary inventions. But he draws a delicate almost shy tone from his fiddle; there isn't an arrogant note in him.

So the thickly chromatic, atmosphere of the Szymanewski was clarified a bit by Zukofsky's clarity and purity of tone...but not enough.

There isn't much that could make the piece satisfying; a yawn seen in the middle of the second violin section about half way through the 20 minutes may not have been significant.

The program ended with a 22 - minute work by Scriabin. Words that appear whenever writers discuss his work may give an indication of the scope of its romanticism, i.e., "mystery in tones," "vaporous abstractions," "Aesthetic ecstacy."

So why does a vocal advocate of the sinewy, boney contemporary sounds conduct three of the fattest, most fervid works within reach? Who knows...unless the new wave of musical acceptability has finally recognized the campy entertainment in a Victorian music.

It may be of interest to note that Schullers piece, the 22 - minute "spectra," also has its romantic aspect (in the stylistic sense).

Tonight at 8.30, Ozawa will conduct the Rachmaninoff and two pieces title concerto for orchestra, one by Bartok and the other by Lutoslawski.

REPUBLICAN
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(S) 113,757
AUG 23 1970
New England Newsclip

Weissenberg Outstanding In Romantic Interpretation

By RICHARD HAMMERICH

LENOX —The gamut of orchestral virtuosity was traveled at Tanglewood Saturday night with Seiji Ozawa on the podium with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tone color is probably the fourth most basic ingredient of music after rhythm, melody and harmony, and the program offered a surfeit of it.

First there was Lutoslawski's Concerto For Orchestra, a piece of such brilliance of orchestral color that at times it overlaps into noisiness. It was raucous now and then, but entertaining nevertheless because of its infectious liveliness.

It didn't have the satisfying substance of Bartok's Concerto For Orchestra of course, which ended the program in spite of, or because of, its plethora of wall shaking cymbals, drums, and blaring brass.

It lasted about a half hour and certainly was exciting even when noisy, but the really big piece of the evening was the Rachmaninov Concerto No. 3, one of the most crowd-pleasing pieces of the 20th century (It was written for the composer's piano playing tour of America in 1909).

Alexis Weissenberg was the soloist and he was well cast for the role of bravura romanticist, musically that is. He didn't look the part.

No Mannerisms, But

He does not have theatrical mannerisms of the piano bench; he is slight of build, thin of hair, and sits stock still at the keyboard.

But his hands are incredible and his fingers are unbelievable; they are strong, absolutely secure, lushly sensitive, dramatically expressive, as quick as a shortstop, and as nimble as a running back.

The third is my favorite of the Rachmaninov concertos and I don't remember having heard it played with greater fulfillment.

Weissenberg's tendency to overplay to overpedal, to recreate pink clouds and thunder (without tiltin g his head) may be inappropriate with some styles (Notably Bach last Friday) but Saturday night with Rachmaninov it was right, and his feeling for such muscular romanticism may be unsurpassed.

The Bartok Concerto for Orchestra, a really fine piece, which followed probably would have been a victim of anticlimax if intermission hadn't given the audience a chance to recover.

But let us not get carried away; Rachmaninov's Piano Concertos are immensely entertaining and Weissenberg played this one about as impressively as anyone can; he is a little man but a big pianist; but I heard the rehearsal Saturday morning of the Berlioz Requiem which is to be performed Sunday afternoon . . .

Now there is a piece that is really something. It will end the Tanglewood season.

92

Tanglewood finale

BSO—Ozawa's epic Berlioz

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Negotiations between rain and sun came to a satisfactory settlement too late on Sunday for the traditional last-day crowds to assemble for one of the major events of this summer's Berkshire Festival — the first Boston Symphony performance since 1952 of the Berlioz Requiem ("Grande messe des morts," Op. 5).

Glowering skies notwithstanding, 6,482 dauntless listeners, (the Festival Shed's capacity — plus), heard the orchestra under Seiji Ozawa, with tenor Leopold Simoneau, and a combined chorus (Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Framingham Choral Society, John Oliver, director, and MIT Glee Club, Klaus Liepmann, director) in a moving tribute to the late Charles Munch. The former BSO conductor, it will be remembered, conducted the Requiem in its previous BSO performances (1951 and '52, with Mr. Simoneau as soloist), and in 1937 had been chosen to lead the 100th anniversary of the first performance of the mass in Paris at the Hôtel des Invalides.

Considering the magnitude of his compositional output, it is regrettable that Berlioz is generally represented in live performance these days by a mere handful of works — the "Symphonie fantastique," the "Roméo et Juliette" fantasy, "Faust" excerpts, several overtures, and the "Nuits d'été." Recordings serve him better — particularly a new complete realization of his mammoth opera, "Les Troyens."

Sunday's performance of the Requiem was indeed a labor of love, affectingly conceived by Mr. Ozawa, and solidly achieved by him and the large forces, choral and instrumental, which the work demands. The shed at Tanglewood lent itself admirably to the strategic placement of four brass choirs, used to spine-chilling effect in three sections of the mass, and most important, provided a boundless, unrestricting vessel for the dissemination of music which four walls of the best concert hall in the world could not help but inhibit. Mr. Ozawa, in his most notable Tanglewood performance to date, was a supersensitive catalyst for these massive and contrasting elements, balancing them with skill, and with understanding of the ultimate impact inherent in each movement.

The glories of this Requiem are numberless: the sinuous interweaving of choral and instrumental lines; the tremendously gripping, yet subtle use of percussion in many guises (the muted cymbals in the "Sanctus," for instance); the one soaring solo vocal passage, also in the "Sanctus," sung again on this occasion with breathtaking beauty by Mr. Simoneau; the sheer emotional power of the full ensemble passages, which make their effect not by virtue of volume but through a majesty almost architectural in design. The form of the mass, on this gigantic scale, gave the composer a glorious opportunity to produce what one writer has pointed out is, in fact, "not an act of faith in God, but an act of faith in Berlioz."

How long will it be before another performance of the Requiem comes along? No record player invented can reproduce faithfully the involvement of artists and audience in a mass of ethereal sound as it occurred on Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood. It is a live experience that many more should be able to share.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

AUG 25 1970

New England Newsclip

A Sense of Transcendence

BY THOMAS WILLIS

Lenox, Mass.

Seiji Ozawa

● IN SPITE of what the purveyors of four-channel stereo would have us believe, Hector Berlioz's "Grande Messe des Morts" cannot be experienced second-hand. Its doomsday brass, "sounding thru the tombs of all lands," must be sensed liturgically, with the listener part of a worshipping population.

The whish of its awe-struck cymbals—10 pairs are called for in the score—must hover and inclose us in acoustic space. The muffled kettle drums which measure humanity's vanishing seconds in the Requiem's final moments must be struck by human operators. Singers must be singing. Music must be being made. The dead must be honored by the living.

This is no easy matter. The composer envisioned an epic assembly of performing forces—700 or 800 singers and as many as 400 instrumentalists. A minimum group for effective realization would include 150 singers, a full symphony orchestra, and the drums and brasses from a large military band. There also must be a room large enough to accommodate both performers and listeners.

It would be rash to call the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance of the Requiem here Sunday afternoon a full realization of the composer's extraordinary vision. Tanglewood's aging outdoor concert shell is neither temple nor heroic monument. The chorus, a combination of Berkshire Music Center students, area singers, the Framingham Choral society and the M. I. T. Glee Club, did not have enough focused voices to cut thru clearly at all times. Seiji Ozawa, who now shares the Berkshire Festival artistic direction with Gunther Schuller, chose for his ascent to Parnassus cross-country shortcuts and sports car cornerings. The heavens trembled in the aftermath of rain, not quite willing to cooperate with sunshine.

But none of us present is likely to forget the occasion. Mr. Ozawa controled his forces with expert logistical awareness. The driving exaltation of "Rex Tremendae" and "Osanna" thrust the intricate polyphony forward with an urgency bordering on desperation. The subterranean trombone pedal notes, sounding eerily electronic and slightly out-of-tune, rose from the Pavilion floor as from a crypt. The doubling flutes, strangers from a higher harmonic grave, propelled the exotic musical offering into each cranny, at one point startling a nervous bird into song.

And when Leopold Simoneau, singing from a central position in the midst of the chorus, began the lyric Sanctus, the stillness caused by a single soloist was overpowering. Mr. Simoneau fashioned the rising line into an arch of rainbow splendor. It had breadth, expansive joy, and a sense of the transcendent. Here, at least, one felt the presence of Charles Munch, to whom the performance was dedicated.

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 805,924 SUN. 1,131,752

AUG 25 1970

Music

Superb 'Requiem' at Tanglewood

By MICHAEL WIENER

LENOX, Mahs. — Seiji Ozawa brought Tanglewood's season to a close esterday afternoon with a magnificent performance of the Berlioz "Requiem."

The concert was in memory of Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony's music director from 949-1962. Dr. Munch was highly influential in furthering the appreciation of both the composer and conductor of yesterday's program. He was an ardent champion of the music of Berlioz and much of the composer's current popularity can be attributed to hih efforts.

IT WAS also Dr. Munch who, years ago, invited Seiji Ozawa to be a conducting fellow at the Berkshirt Music Center. This summer Mr. Ozawa was, of course, Tanglewood's artistic director.

The Berlioz "Requiem" is one of those works which is famous, even infamous, for the wrong reasons. Ith scoring, in addition to orchestra (including four sets of tympani), and large chorus, calls for four brass bands, spaced throughout the auditorium. The "Dies Irae", "Tuba mirum," and "Lacrymosa", sections are the suund-lover's dream.

Yet these portionh represent but a fraction of the work. Mush of the score is written andmust be performed with an almost classical restraint. The tenor solo must be sung quietly if it is to be effective and many scoring details, quitely if it is to be effective and many scoring details, huch as the brushed cymbols, are almost inaudible. Perhaps the most beautiful sections of the "Requiem" are the last four, which do not make use of the full orchestral complement.

ASSISTING in yesterday's performance were the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the Framingham Choral Society, both under the direction of John Oliver, and the MIT Chorus, Klaus Liepmann, director.

The tenor soloist wah Leopold Simoneau, who was the perfect choice for both artistic and sen- choice for both artistic and sentimental reasons. He has a warm, free voice and the control and taste to use it well. Mr. Simoneau last sang with the Boston Symphony in performance of the "Requiem" under the direction of Charlts Munch.

r. Ozawa led with the skill of a master conductor. Each of the work's sections was performed for maximum effectiveness, yet he maintained balance and proportion throughout the ninety minute whole. His ability to prepare a large scale work such as the "Requiem" under limited summer festival rehearsal conditions is a tribute to hih talent and experience and to that of the orchestra.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Albany Knickerbocker News
Monday, August 24, 1970

Music: Ozawa and Bostonians in Berlioz Requiem

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 953,600

AUG 25 1970

New England Newsclip

Mammoth Work Ends Tanglewood Season

By DONAL HENAHAN

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass. Aug. 24—To lead a grand-scale performance of the Berlioz Requiem, a conductor must be not only a good musician but also a frustrated generalissimo, a bit of a charlatan, a lay bishop and a logistics expert.

For yesterday's Requiem, which closed the 1970 Tanglewood season, Seiji Ozawa rallied the necessary outsized orchestral force, more than 200 choristers and four supplementary brass bands. He controlled them all with Napoleonic authority. If it did not eclipse previous Boston Symphony performances of the Berlioz, Mr. Ozawa's grasp of the mammoth score nevertheless left one satisfied in major respects.

The Requiem was played in memory of Charles Munch, the orchestra's former music director, who died in 1968.

Tailoring his ideas somewhat to the Tanglewood milieu, Mr. Ozawa deployed his four extra bands offstage, at the periphery of the audience. The placement served the spirit of Berlioz's score, if not quite the letter,and contributed to a stirring stereo effect.

Bob Greene

Seiji Ozawa

●

Although never as overwhelming in sonority in the open airas when heard in an enclosed space, the Berlioz raised a heavenly din at the big moments. Just at the first thunderous outcry of all in-1 struments, Mr. Ozawa turned his back on the orchestra and chorus and conducted the outying bands, then whipped about to bring in the massed voices in a grand fortissimo at the Tuba Mirum. One would have had to be indeed dead to the world to quicken at this moment, as the Boston virtuosos managed it.

Not every one of Berlioz's strokes was managed with equal impressiveness, of course, for Mr. Ozwa's experience as a conductor of the Requiem cannot yet be extensive. One wanted more concentration and serenity—perhaps the world is spirituality — in some of the more delicate pages. And more precise choral work would have helped at times.

Some details of interpretation could be questioned, too: the tempo quickening at the Confutatis Maledictus was nearly enough to achieve the intended contrast, for instance, and at the close of the Sanctus, Mr. Ozawa pulled hard on the reins five measures before the score requests a slight ritardando, thereby weakening the ending somewhat.

●

But Mr. Ozawa, conducting without score, welded together what proved on the whole a sonorously exciting Requiem. He was helped to success by Leopold Simoneau's tasteful tenor solo in the Sanctus. Mr. Simoneau who recorded this work under Dr. Munch still had the B-flats (eight of them) required for this ethereal piece, and enough style in delivery to share with a dozen of his tenorial colleagues.

Although a preconcert downpour drastically limited the turnout for Berlioz, Tanglewood closed its season with a total attendance up more than 20,000 from last summer. In their first season as co-artistic directors of the Berkshire Festival, Mr. Ozawa and Gunther Schuller saw increases in every category of attraction. Total attendance at the eight-week festival was 257,419, compared to 236,937 in 1969.

Twenty-four Boston Symphony programs and eight rehearsals drew 186,190 persons, against last season's 175,468. Three Fillmore-at-Tanglewood concerts of rock music accounted for 51,459 customers, with July 7 evening performance featuring The Who, Jethro Tull and It's a Beautiful Day attracting the season's largest crowd, 18,784.

4 Bands and Chorus of 200 Join Orchestra

Tanglewood finale

BSO—Ozawa's epic Berlioz

By Louis Snyder

Lenox, Mass.

ARTS
ENTERTAINMENT

Negotiations between rain and sun came to a satisfactory settlement too late on Sunday for the traditional last-day crowds to assemble for one of the major events of this summer's Berkshire Festival — the first Boston Symphony performance since 1952 of the Berlioz Requiem ("Grande messe des morts," Op. 5).

Glowering skies notwithstanding, 6,482 dauntless listeners, (the Festival Shed's capacity — plus), heard the orchestra under Seiji Ozawa, with tenor Leopold Simoneau, and a combined chorus (Tanglewood Festival Chorus and Framingham Choral Society, John Oliver, director, and MIT Glee Club, Klaus Liepmann, director) in a moving tribute to the late Charles Munch. The former BSO conductor, it will be remembered, conducted the Requiem in its previous BSO performances (1951 and '52, with Mr. Simoneau as soloist), and in 1937 had been chosen to lead the 100th anniversary of the first performance of the mass in Paris at the Hôtel des Invalides.

Considering the magnitude of his compositional output, it is regrettable that Berlioz is generally represented in live performance these days by a mere handful of works — the "Symphonie fantastique," the "Roméo et Juliette" fantasy, "Faust" excerpts, several overtures, and the "Nuits d'été." Recordings serve him better — particularly a new complete realization of his mammoth opera, "Les Troyens."

Sunday's performance of the Requiem was indeed a labor of love, affectingly conceived by Mr. Ozawa, and solidly achieved by him and the large forces, choral and instrumental, which the work demands. The shed at Tanglewood lent itself admirably to the strategic placement of four brass choirs, used to spine-chilling effect in three sections of the mass, and most important, provided a boundless, unrestricting vessel for the dissemination of music which four walls of the best concert hall in the world could not help but inhibit. Mr. Ozawa, in his most notable Tanglewood performance to date, was a supersensitive catalyst for these massive and contrasting elements, balancing them with skill, and with understanding of the ultimate impact inherent in each movement.

The glories of this Requiem are numberless: the sinuous interweaving of choral and instrumental lines; the tremendously gripping, yet subtle use of percussion in many guises (the muted cymbals in the "Sanctus," for instance); the one soaring solo vocal passage, also in the "Sanctus," sung again on this occasion with breathtaking beauty by Mr. Simoneau; the sheer emotional power of the full ensemble passages, which make their effect not by virtue of volume but through a majesty almost architectural in design. The form of the mass, on this gigantic scale, gave the composer a glorious opportunity to produce what one writer has pointed out is, in fact, "not an act of faith in God, but an act of faith in Berlioz."

How long will it be before another performance of the Requiem comes along? No record player invented can reproduce faithfully the involvement of artists and audience in a mass of ethereal sound as it occurred on Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood. It is a live experience that many more should be able to share.

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,850

AUG 25 1970

New England Newsclip

A Sense of Transcendence

BY THOMAS WILLIS

Lenox, Mass.

Seiji Ozawa

● IN SPITE of what the purveyors of four-channel stereo would have us believe, Hector Berlioz's "Grande Messe des Morts" cannot be experienced second-hand. Its doomsday brass, "sounding thru the tombs of all lands," must be sensed liturgically, with the listener part of a worshipping population.

The whish of its awe-struck cymbals—10 pairs are called for in the score—must hover and inclose us in acoustic space. The muffled kettle drums which measure humanity's vanishing seconds in the Requiem's final moments must be struck by human operators. Singers must be singing. Music must be being made. The dead must be honored by the living.

This is no easy matter. The composer envisioned an epic assembly of performing forces—700 or 800 singers and as many as 400 instrumentalists. A minimum group for effective realization would include 150 singers, a full symphony orchestra, and the drums and brasses from a large military band. There also must be a room large enough to accommodate both performers and listeners.

It would be rash to call the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance of the Requiem here Sunday afternoon a full realization of the composer's extraordinary vision. Tanglewood's aging outdoor concert shell is neither temple nor heroic monument. The chorus, a combination of Berkshire Music Center students, area singers, the Framingham Choral society and the M. I. T. Glee Club, did not have enough focused voices to cut thru clearly at all times. Seiji Ozawa, who now shares the Berkshire Festival artistic direction with Gunther Schuller, chose for his ascent to Parnassus cross-country shortcuts and sports car cornerings. The heavens trembled in the aftermath of rain, not quite willing to cooperate with sunshine.

But none of us present is likely to forget the occasion. Mr. Ozawa controled his forces with expert logistical awareness. The driving exaltation of "Rex Tremendae" and "Osanna" thrust the intricate polyphony forward with an urgency bordering on desperation. The subterranean trombone pedal notes, sounding eerily electronic and slightly out-of-tune, rose from the Pavilion floor as from a crypt. The doubling flutes, strangers from a higher harmonic grave, propelled the exotic musical offering into each cranny, at one point startling a nervous bird into song.

And when Leopold Simoneau, singing from a central position in the midst of the chorus, began the lyric Sanctus, the stillness caused by a single soloist was overpowering. Mr. Simoneau fashioned the rising line into an arch of rainbow splendor. It had breadth, expansive joy, and a sense of the transcendent. Here, at least, one felt the presence of Charles Munch, to whom the performance was dedicated.

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 805,024 SUN. 1,131,752

AUG 25 1970

Music

Superb 'Requiem' at Tanglewood

By MICHAEL WIENER

LENOX, Mahs. — Seiji Ozawa brought Tanglewood's season to a close esterday afternoon with a magnificent performance of the Berlioz "Requiem."

The concert was in memory of Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony's music director from 1949-1962. Dr. Munch was highly influential in furthering the appreciation of both the composer and conductor of yesterday's program. He was an ardent champion of the music of Berlioz and much of the composer's current popularity can be attributed to hih efforts.

IT WAS also Dr. Munch who, years ago, invited Seiji Ozawa to be a conducting fellow at the Berkshirt Music Center. This summer Mr. Ozawa was, of course, Tanglewood's artistic director.

The Berlioz "Requiem" is one of those works which is famous, even infamous, for the wrong reasons. Ith scoring, in addition to orchestra (including four sets of tympani), and large chorus, calls for four brass bands, spaced throughout the auditorium. The "Dies Irae", "Tuba mirum," and "Lacrymosa", sections are the suund-lover's dream.

Yet these portionh represent but a fraction of the work. Mush of the score is written andmust be performed with an almost classical restraint. The tenor solo must be sung quietly if it is to be effective and many scoring details, quitely if it is to be effective and many scoring details, huch as the brushed cymbols, are almost inaudible. Perhaps the most beautiful sections of the "Requiem" are the last four, which do not make use of the full orchestral complement.

ASSISTING in yesterday's performance were the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the Framingham Choral Society, both under the direction of John Oliver, and the MIT Chorus, Klaus Liepmann, director.

The tenor soloist wah Leopold Simoneau, who was the perfect choice for both artistic and sentimental reasons. He has a warm, free voice and the control and taste to use it well. Mr. Simoneau last sang with the Boston Symphony in performance of the "Requiem" under the direction of Charlts Munch.

r. Ozawa led with the skill of a master conductor. Each of the work's sections was performed for maximum effectiveness, yet he maintained balance and proportion throughout the ninety minute whole. His ability to prepare a large scale work such as the "Requiem" under limited summer festival rehearsal conditions is a tribute to hih talent and experience and to that of the orchestra.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Monday, August 24, 1970

Music: Ozawa and Bostonians in Berlioz Requiem

NEW YORK, N.Y.

AUG 25 1970

New England Newsclip

Mammoth Work Ends Tanglewood Season

By DONAL HENAHAN

Special to The New York Times

LENOX, Mass. Aug. 24—To lead a grand-scale performance of the Berlioz Requiem, a conductor must be not only a good musician but also a frustrated generalissimo, a bit of a charlatan, a lay bishop and a logistics expert.

For yesterday's Requiem, which closed the 1970 Tanglewood season, Seiji Ozawa rallied the necessary outsized orchestral force, more than 200 choristers and four supplementary brass bands. He controlled them all with Napoleonic authority. If it did not eclipse previous Boston Symphony performances of the Berlioz, Mr. Ozawa's grasp of the mammoth score nevertheless left one satisfied in major respects.

The Requiem was played in memory of Charles Munch, the orchestra's former music director, who died in 1968.

Tailoring his ideas somewhat to the Tanglewood milieu, Mr. Ozawa deployed his four extra bands offstage, at the periphery of the audience. The placement served the spirit of Berlioz's score, if not quite the letter, and contributed to a stirring stereo effect.

Bob Greene

Seiji Ozawa

●

Although never as overwhelming in sonority in the open airas when heard in an enclosed space, the Berlioz raised a heavenly din at the big moments. Just at the first thunderous outcry of all instruments, Mr. Ozawa turned his back on the orchestra and chorus and conducted the outying bands, then whipped about to bring in the massed voices in a grand fortissimo at the Tuba Mirum. One would have had to be indeed dead to the world to quicken at this moment, as the Boston virtuosos managed it.

Not every one of Berlioz's strokes was managed with equal impressiveness, of course, for Mr. Ozwa's experience as a conductor of the Requiem cannot yet be extensive. One wanted more concentration and serenity—perhaps the world is spirituality — in some of the more delicate pages. And more precise choral work would have helped at times.

Some details of interpretation could be questioned, too: the tempo quickening at the Confutatis Maledictus was nearly enough to achieve the intended contrast, for instance, and at the close of the Sanctus, Mr. Ozawa pulled hard on the reins five measures before the score requests a slight ritardando, thereby weakening the ending somewhat.

●

But Mr. Ozawa, conducting without score, welded together what proved on the whole a sonorously exciting Requiem. He was helped to success by Leopold Simoneau's tasteful tenor solo in the Sanctus. Mr. Simoneau who recorded this work under Dr. Munch still had the B-flats (eight of them) required for this ethereal piece, and enough style in delivery to share with a dozen of his tenorial colleagues.

4 Bands and Chorus of 200 Join Orchestra

Although a preconcert downpour drastically limited the turnout for Berlioz, Tanglewood closed its season with a total attendance up more than 20,000 from last summer. In their first season as co-artistic directors of the Berkshire Festival, Mr. Ozawa and Gunther Schuller saw increases in every category of attraction. Total attendance at the eight-week festival was 257,419, compared to 236,937 in 1969.

Twenty-four Boston Symphony programs and eight rehearsals drew 186,190 persons, against last season's 175,468. Three Fillmore-at-Tanglewood concerts of rock music accounted for 51,459 customers, with July 7 evening performance featuring The Who, Jethro Tull and It's a Beautiful Day attracting the season's largest crowd, 18,784.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

AUG 24 1970 New England Newsclip

AT TANGLEWOOD

Shouting Ovation Accorded Choral Mass by Berlioz

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX — The weather was sinful and the music heavenly at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon; hearty rain all morning kept the attendance down to 6482 enthusiastic music lovers who gave Seiji Ozawa and 250 musicians a shouting ovation.

Berlioz Mass

They performed the Berlioz 'Grande Messe des Morts,' Opus 5 (requiem), without intermission in a manner which is likely to be remembered a very long time.

This requiem is a very special piece of music; it lasts a bit less than an hour and a half, uses a large chorus, an augmented symphony orchestra and a tenor soloist.

It has some of the most colorfully imaginative and dramatic sound combinations to come out of the early 19th century as well as some of the most profoundly beautiful.

And it was given a first class performance Sunday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, tenor Leopold Simoneau and a 150-voice chorus made up of the MIT Glee Club, the Framingham Choral Society and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. . .all under the direction of L. Seiji Ozawa, who left his score unopened on the stand before him.

There are ten sections in the requiem. The most dramatic are the Dies Irae, Rex Tremendae, Lacrymosa, Hostias and Sanctus-Hosanna. The most gracefully lyrical are Quid Sum Miser, Quarens Me, Offertorium and Agnus Dei.

As a means of only hinting at the kinds of sounds that were heard Sunday, let us indicate quickly some of the ingredients.

Most dramatic was the use of the four augmenting brass bands, two on each side of the shed under the edges of the roof 50 and 100 feet from the stage.

They were used singly and in varying combinations for contrapuntal and antiphonal effects (something like multi channel surround sound) in the Dies Irae, Rex Tremendae, Lacrymosa and Hostias.

A couple of the more interesting sound sensations came from the use of six pairs of timpani and two giant bass drums, all tuned for specific chords, the matching of low, flaring trombones with high droning flutes to accompany the male chorus in the Hostias; the six gigantic whispering cymbals used with a dozen murmuring strings to accompany the tenor in the Sanctus.

The most impressive of the quiet sections came during the unison male chorus (13 tenors) in Quid Sum Miser, the unaccompanied six part chorus during the Quaerens, the delicacy of the choral work of the Offertorium, and the long quiet floating amen.

Ozawa's pacing of all these sensations was unflagging but unhurried, and he held them together firmly. His treatment of this work (and the romantic orchestrations of Saturday night also) was much more secure and satisfying than that he gave to Mozart and Haydn earlier in the season.

The orchestra, as usual, was impeccable.

The tenor, Leopold Simoneau, who recorded this work with Charles Munch and the Boston orchestra sang with entirely appropriate clean clear open tones.

The performance, given in memory of Munch, was easily one of the two or three most satisfying programs of the 1970 Tanglewood season.

Overall attendance for the summer was 257,419, a few more than 20,000 beyond the total for 1969.

AMERICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(S) 42,315

AUG 26 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Ends Season With Ambitious Show

Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood ended its 1970 season with an exciting and hauntingly beautiful performance of Berlioz's Requiem, a mammoth and ambitious work, conducted by Seiji Ozawa and the Boston Symphony orchestra, joined by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Framigham Choral Society, the 200-voice MIT Glee Club with the famed tenor, Leopold Simoneau, as soloist.

The concert was given in memory of Charles Munch (1891-1968), music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center from 1949 to 1952. He was considered the greatest exponent of the revival of Berlioz in this country in the 1950's. While Ozawa lacks years of experience in conducting this work, he coordinated all the various components, the orchestra, the special four brass bands stationed off stage and in each of the four corners of the hall, and the choral groups, to give a most effective and stereo effect of this dramatic work. Despite a pre-concert downpour the audience's spirit was not dampened in their enthusiastic response to the performance.

Saturday evening Ozawa conducted a beautiful concert presenting Lutoslawski's Concerto for Orchestra, a stirring piece, composed in 1954; followed by a virtuoso performance of the Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 3, with Alexis Weissenberg as soloist, which was performed with great contrasts, impassioned playing, technically electrifying and emotionally exciting concerto which demonstrates the artist's accomplished ability. Saturday's concert ended with Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra which was conducted with some depth and skill by Ozawa. The audience was most enthusiastic in its appreciation to the conductor and soloist, who made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra with this performance.

Tanglewood closed its season with a total attendance increase of more than 20,000 more than in 1969, under the artistic leadership of the co-directors Gunther Schuller and Sieji Ozawa, both responsible for the artistic programming in 1970's summer festival, with numerous innovations. Total attendance at the eight-week festival was 257,419 compared to 236,937 in 1969. The two Beethoven weekend concerts drew the largest attendance of the season, with all five concertos performed by talented soloists, and a performance of the 9th symphony conducted by William Steinberg, the Boston Symphony Musical Director.

REPUBLICAN
WATERBURY, CONN.
(M) 27,040 (S) 56,127

AUG 26 1970 New England Newsclip

Festival Ends With Berlioz

Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood ended its 1970 season with an exciting and hauntingly beautiful performance of Berlioz's Requiem, a mammoth and ambitious work, conducted by Seiji Ozawa and the Boston Symphony orchestra, joined by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Framigham Choral Society, the 200-voice MIT Glee Club with the famed tenor, Leopold Simoneau, as soloist.

The concert was given in memory of Charles Munch (1891-1968), music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center from 1949 to 1952. He was considered the greatest exponent of the revival of Berlioz in this country in the 1950's. While Ozawa lacks years of experience in conducting this work, he coordinated all the various components, the orchestra, the special four brass bands stationed off stage and in each of the four corners of the hall, and the choral groups, to give a most effective and stereo effect of this dramatic work. Despite a pre-concert downpour the audience's spirit was not dampened in their enthusiastic response to the performance.

Saturday evening Ozawa conducted a beautiful concert presenting Lutoslawski's Concerto for Orchestra, a stirring piece, composed in 1954; followed by a virtuoso performance of the Rachmaninoff Piano Concerto No. 3, with Alexis Weissenberg as soloist, which was performed with great contrasts, impassioned playing, technically electrifying and emotionally exciting concerto which demonstrates the artist's accomplished ability. Saturday's concert ended with Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra which was conducted with some depth and skill by Ozawa. The audience was most enthusiastic in its appreciation to the conductor and soloist, who made his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra with this performance.

Tanglewood closed its season with a total attendance increase of more than 20,000 more than in 1969, under the artistic leadership of the co-directors Gunther Schuller and Sieji Ozawa, both responsible for the artistic programming in 1970's summer festival, with numerous innovations. Total attendance at the eight-week festival was 257,419 compared to 236,937 in 1969. The two Beethoven weekend concerts drew the largest attendance of the season, with all five concertos performed by talented soloists, and a performance of the 9th symphony conducted by William Steinberg, the Boston Symphony Musical Director.

Hector Berlioz' Requiem

Music: Tanglewood Finale

By HARRY NEVILLE

LENOX—Yesterday's Berkshire Festival concert, the final event of the 1970 Tanglewood season, was devoted to a performance of Hector Berlioz' Requiem, played in memory of the late Charles Munch, Music Director of the Boston Symphony from 1949 to 1962.

Seiji Ozawa, Tanglewood Artistic Director, conducted, and the participating forces included the Boston Symphony (augmented to what looked like twice its normal size), tenor Leopold Simoneau, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Framingham Choral Society, and MIT Glee Club.

IN ADDITION to the forces on stage, Berlioz' score calls for four smaller brass orchestras, to be placed at the four corners of the main performing forces. On yesterday's occasion Ozawa had positioned these in the seating area of the shed, two of them somewhat near the stage and the others toward the rear of the auditorium. The resulting quintasonic acoustical arrangement, plus the diversity of the performing forces, offered some splendid opportunities for magnificent effects, none of which were lost on Ozawa and his musicians.

The really striking thing about the Requiem is that despite the immensity of the scoring it is a relatively restrained work. To be sure, there are some overwhelming climaxes, but by and large the score is extremely subtle and poetic, and those were qualities that came through very nicely in Ozawa's reading.

His finest achievement, it seemed to this listener, was to preserve sensitive balances throughout—which is not at all an easy thing to do when one is at times dealing with six separate groups.

THIS OBSERVER had never seen Ozawa conduct with quite the calm he displayed on this occasion. He conducted without score and seemed very much in command of the situation from beginning to end. His pacing was superb and one hardly had a sense of the music's being forced or driven. The big moments were indeed colossal, as the composer intended, and yet they were mercifully devoid of false emotion and hysteria. All in all, a memorable performance and a fitting conclusion to the season.

Yesterday marked the final appearance with the orchestra of several BSO players. The following is the Tanglewood Press Office list of departing musicians with their years of service: Julius Schulman (10 years) and Victor Manusevitch (26 years), violins; Karl Zeise (31 years), cello; Buell Neidlinger (3 years), double-bass; Phillip Kaplan (31 years), flute; Hugh Matheny (6 years), oboe; Gino Cioffi (20 years) clarinet; and Josef Orosz (27 years), trombone.

NEW MEMBERS of the Orchestra this fall will be Cecylia Arzewski and Marylou Speaker (violins), Joel Moerschel (cello), Lawrence Wolf (double-bass), Paul Fried (flute), Harold Wright (clarinet) and Ronald Barron (trombone).

The Press Office also released attendance figures for this year's festival. For all events, including rock and other popular music concerts, total attendance was 257,419 as opposed to 236,937 last year. For the 24 BSO weekend concerts and eight open rehearsals the figures were 186,190 this year and 175,468 last.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 24 1970 New England Newsclip

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(D) 85,055

AUG 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Boston Symphony Season Ends With Munch Memorial

By RICHARD CONWAY

The Boston Symphony ended its summer season at Tanglegood Sunday afternoon with a beautiful performance of Hector Berlioz' Requiem Mass, opus 5. It was performed in memory of Charles Munch.

The orchestra, assisted by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Framingham Choral Society and MIT Glee Club, gave a sensitive and inspired reading of this, at times, overpowering work.

Seiji Ozawa's conducting was beautifully fashioned and precise, calling the very best from his musicians.

The Berlioz Mass is a large work, calling for large musical resources. In addition to an enlarged orchestra, the score calls for four brass choirs spaced at various points throughout the auditorium. At times, the effect is overwhelming.

Besides the large choral resources, a tenor soloist is called for in the next-to-last movement. Leopold Simoneau was the guest artist and, after the first two entrances, sang with great beauty and clarity.

Prepared by John Oliver and Klaus Liepmann, the combined choruses sang with rich tone and sensitivity.

It was the male voices that were heard to best effect, and the tenors especially were outstanding. The sopranos were pushing much of the time and were noticeably under pitch.

But, all in all, the choral work was excellent, particularly in the softer passages.

Berlioz' work is interesting in that for all its bigness, it starts and ends quietly. It is as though the French composer of the 19th Century was trying to say something that is of importance to us today: that with all the bigness and all the grandeur, it is in quietness that truth is revealed.

It is in the quieter, more reflective passages that the work is musically the best. The composer saved some of his most inspired ideas for these sections: the third movement "Quid sum miser" sung by the male chorus and accompanied by bass instruments only, for example; or the "Hostias, accompanied by trombones, flutes, and strings. These are remarkable passages, and they were beautifully done.

Ozawa is a brilliant conductor, deeply sensitive to the music. He brought the Tanglewood season to a high close.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

AUG 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Festival ends with Berlioz

By Michael Steinberg
Globe Staff

LENOX — The 1970 Berkshire Festival ended yesterday afternoon with a performance of the Berlioz "Grande Messe des Mortes," Seiji Ozawa conducting, and with the Boston Symphony orchestra joined by the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Framingham Choral Society, the MIT Glee Club and the tenor Leopold Simoneau.

The concert was given in memory of Charles Munch (1891-1968), music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Music Center from 1949 to 1962, and a conductor who contributed energetically to the Berlioz revival in this country during the 50s.

To the poet deVigny, who heard the requiem at its first performance in 1837, its music was "beautiful and strange, wild, convulsed and dolorous." It is all those things, and the wildness and strangeness of some of it still astonishes us today. At the same time — and perhaps we can hear that more easily now — it is a work of precision and economy.

No doubt its most celebrated feature is the use of four extra brass groups placed by Berlioz at the four corners of the performing body (and by most modern conductors at the four corners of the hall, or something like it) to evoke the sounding of the last trump in the Dies Irae.

Yet the remarkable thing is not that Berlioz does it, as what it attempts to do with that extraordinary resource, so that he gives us not only those first collosal fanfares at "tuba, mirum stargens sonum," but also such things as (the brass intervention at "me cadam in obscurum" (Lest I fall into darkness), or those marvelous single note punctuations through the "Lacrymosa."

Perhaps in the end, the most haunting, the most touching, the heart-stopping events in the requiem are the quiet ones, whether they are compositional, like the extension of the scale with which the work opens by a semi-tone upon its repetition (to D the first time, E flat the second), the garlands of quiet eighth notes that the sopranos hang about the words "Dona eis, Domine," and the insistent reiteration of just two notes in all but the last 18 bars of the choral part of the Offertorium, or whether they are textural, like the pianissimo clashes of three pairs of cymbals and bass drum Insanctus, the gripping and famous chords of the high flutes with low trombones and the Hospias, or, on the very last pages, the hushed G majjor chords for eight kettle drums.

There is something excitingly sure about the conviction and rasp with which Berlioz possessed the requiem text, just as when he took on Shakespeare's "Romeo" a couple of of years ago, or Virgil's "Aeneid" a couple of decades later. The combination of authority, passion, phantasy and nobility, that he brought to his task make the work beautiful and singularly moving.

The requiem is very much a work to experience in live concert. Performances are rare, and good ones afford special pleasure. The one ozawa produced at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon was a good one, both dynamic and restrained, well shaped and paced with excellent playing by the orchestra, and with lovely singing by Leopold Simoneau in the Sanctus.

The choral singing was serviceable rather than beautiful, and the lack in it of a true pianissimo diminished poetry as well as dramatic contrast. It was an impressive ending to a spotty festival.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387

AUG 25 1970 New England Newsclip

The Sound of Music

Closing with a Gentle Requiem in the Rain

By Peter M. Knapp

LENOX — Tanglewood 1970 came to a grandiose finale ~~Sunday afternoon~~ as Seiji Ozawa conducted a small army of musicians in Hector Berlioz' massive "Grande Messe des Morts" or Requiem. The performance, attended by 6,482 in grey, dank weather after a morning of pouring rain, was dedicated to the memory of Charles Munch, the late Boston Symphony music director who last conducted the Requiem here.

Even with the bad weather for Sunday's concert, which probably cut attendance by several thousand, the summer's eight-week Berkshire Festival box office registered 20,000 more listeners than last year. The 1969 festival attracted 236,937 persons in all, 175,468 for the weekend Boston Symphony Concerts. This year, 257,419 attended, 186,190 for the BSO. The Contemporary Trends concerts (six this year) drew 54,431.

Had they counted Sunday's performers, several hundred more would have been added to the figures. Berlioz never thought small, and his rarely heard Requiem is a musical score of cosmic proportions: A basic orchestra of 140, about 200 voices in the chorus, plus four additional brass ensembles (at Tanglewood, placed in the side aisles of the shed) and eight pairs of timpani (fewer used in the Tanglewood performance).

It seemed as if every musician in Massachusetts had been recruited, and when the brass bands, plus six timpanists and two bass drummers, let loose in the "Tuba mirum," the effect was properly overwhelming.

More Brahms Than Verdi

Yet the Requiem is not all awesome noise. In fact, the predominant mood is subdued and gentle, sharing more of the atmosphere of the Brahms Requiem than that of Verdi. And between the theatrical effects of the "Dies Irae" and "Lacrymosa" — whose use of the brass choirs are impressive for their spatial dimension as well as for massive sound — and the fine writing of the "Offertorium" and "Sanctus," lie stretches of lesser inspiration and effect.

Ozawa conducted a generally impressive performance from memory, leading the massed voices of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Framingham Choral Society and the MIT Glee Club. Diction was excellent, intonation and balances reliable (even with the far-flung instrumental forces), and tenor Leopold Simoneau sang the "Sanctus" with fervor and beauty of tone.

Ozawa, Tanglewood's co-artistic director, led a third of the concerts in the shed this summer, but this was his most gruelling assignment and he rose to the occasion. Munch, of course, was the acknowledged master of the score and Ozawa had to cope with this memory, too. But the lithe Japanese conductor produced a reading of proper majesty and repose, though with a few loose ends (the rhythms in the opening of the "Lacrymosa," for example) and perhaps missing the air of hushed mystery Berlioz intends in the opening and closing choral statements.

Something Different

Gunther Schuller, co-artistic director of Tanglewood, commanded the podium Friday evening for an unconventional and well-played program: Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi"; Karol Szymanowski's Violin Concerto No. 1; Schuller's own "Spectra"; and Alexander Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

Schuller's direction was consistently excellent: coherent and controlled (perhaps occasionally under wraps), detailed and with a fine sense of proportion. He is a quiet conductor in contrast to the choreographic types Tanglewood has had this season, but he gets results — again proving the distinction between the kind of gesture and its ultimate meaning.

The "Rienzi" overture with its Verdian exuberance was a robust curtain-raiser, also displaying the rich orchestral sound the orchestra produced for Schuller during the evening. Armando Ghitalla's playing of the crescendo-decrescendo trumpet calls opening the work was distinguished, as were his later solos in the Scriabin.

But the peak of the concert was Paul Zukofsky's sensational performance in the Syzmanowski Violin Concerto of 1917. It is a lovely work, like the Scriabin "Poem" revelling in chromatics. But while Syzmanowski's chromaticism is exotic, ~~moving into the~~ quasi-oriental, Scriabin's is hotly erotic.

Best of Contemporaries.

Unfortunately, this original concerto seldom gets a hearing nowadays (along with such other period scores as the Wieniawski and the Delius). It is in one unbroken movement, lyrically rhapsodic with a high tessitura for the soloist, backed by an imaginative, chirping orchestral accompaniment.

While Zukofsky, 27, has become the unchallenged king of contemporary-music violinist, his playing of the romantic Szymanowski was stunning for its beauty and technical facility. It isn't easy, what with all the exposed harmonics, slides, arpeggio tumbles and double-stopping, but Zukofsky made it seem so. His tone was chrome-clean and his playing marvellously timed and objective — no sobs, no throbs, and even more astounding, always in the middle of each note. Such an ear for intonation is indeed rare, even to the absolute purity of the most perilous harmonics.

The audience of 4,238 had warm applause for Schuller's "Spectra," a work begun in 1956 that deals with effects of color and sound-transformation that the composer has been exploring. "Spectra," arranged into a succession of episodes, perhaps variations, also employs a special orchestral seating plan that enables Schuller to produce antiphonal effects or events in travelling sound. The score makes its point, but keeps on making it and seems overlong for its content.

PAUL ZUKOFSKY: peak performance

Touching The Emotions

Scriabin's "Le poeme d'extase" (1908) actually does the same thing. It is heavy-breathing, lushly-scored music, unabashedly sensual (Scriabin's biographer, Faubion Bowers, calls it music of orgasm; it was originally called "Orgiastic Poem"). The waves of sound build to enormous climaxes and the final chord is one of the loudest (pre-Rock) in music. "Wow!" gasped one long-haired youth leaving the shed after the final reverberations, "that's kind of out of sight!"

Ozawa led an all-concerto program Saturday evening, as 7,196 attended in pleasant weather. Between the Concertos for Orchestra of Witold Lutoslawski and Bela Bartok came the Rachmaninov Piano Concerto No. 3, with Alexis Weissenberg as soloist.

Everything was well applauded and Weissenberg received a long and thunderous standing ovation for his fleet pianism in the Rachmaninov. It was an unusual performance starting with an embarrassment: orchestra poised, pianist on the bench, conductor on the podium—but no baton and no conductor's score. After a few whispered signals passed through the orchestra, they were retrieved — in two trips.

Weissenberg has an incredible technique; polished, articulate fingerwork in the super-technician class. The slight Bulgarian-born pianist does everything with a minimum of fuss and motion, all wrist and finger action. And while most pianists with the big technique will launch into the Rachmaninov with bravura effects, Weissenberg's playing was predominantly soft, refined, almost delicate in the first movement, though with glorious rapid octaves and arpeggios in the cadenza.

From this low-key, underplayed opening, Weissenberg turned on the heat in the last movement, as he and Ozawa burst into the finale in a jet-propelled introductory launching. The accompaniment, which went generally well in the first two movements became hazardous as Ozawa was evidently following his soloist and Weissenberg was using plenty of rubato — difficult to anticipate for the orchestral entrances.

There were several problems with collaboration, and Weissenberg seemed to lose his place a couple of times but covered well. He spurted ahead at a frantic, nearly unplayable tempo during the episodes of the staccato chords and the coda wound up at a furious, tingling pace. It wasn't exactly consistent in tempo, but it was exciting and Weissenberg is a formidable pianist.

Both the Lutoslawski and Bartok works are flashy orchestral showpieces. The former, completed in 1954 by the contemporary Polish composer, is eclectic (with elements of Stravinsky, Bartok and Hindemith popping out of the score), aurally attractive and not especially out of the ordinary in musical content.

There is a neat touch near the end of the first movement with wind and violin solos against a high sustained string chord, and the Capriccio second movement is playful, light and deft. The tripartite finale, though, is dull and uneventful, ending up in a Hindemith-Hollywood chorale.

The Lutoslawski went rather well, with several instances of superior instrumental work. The Bartok, at the end of a long concert, often seemed hurried and perfunctory. It wound up in a virtuoso bustle, but the three inner movements were soft in detail, the Elegy lacking in tension and idiomatic sweep.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

New England Newsclip

As I Hear It

On Greatness

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

IS there a word all of us use more often, and often indiscriminately, than "great"? Mother's cooking, Willy Mays' diving catch up against the wall in last year's world's series, a certain movie, a vacation. "Great" is the easiest and swiftest and most economical word to express all-out approval that we have on tap, but we fling it around like birdseed, often expending it on ephemeral things. There are certain performances in music and in the theatre, however, certain creations in painting, sculpture and architecture which are of more lasting impact than the transitory matters on which we at times squander the word.

And of course there can be great, rather I should say, wide differences on the music or the art we would place in that category. Judgment and taste are individual matters. There is no assurance of agreement on such subjects. Many things in nature, everything in fact, is great. Yet we have certain mountains we so designate which are not Everests and rivers which are not Mississippis, but they are, nevertheless, God's handiwork. What makes an object or an event of man's handiwork great?

* * * *

I WOULD CALL the sprinters who do the 100 in less than 10 seconds and the longer-distance runners who do the mile under four minutes great. I would call the performance of the Berlioz Requiem at Tanglewood last Sunday great.

Great music cannot be qualified in stock market or gross national product terms. When the average person asks, "How's Tanglewood doin'?" he probably expects an answer analogous to a report from General Motors that so many cars were sold this year as against last year. The questioners in this instance are not concerned with the programs or the performances. They wonder if Tanglewood is doing as well as Saratoga, for example.

* * * *

BERLIOZ indicated the number of players he required for a performance of his Requiem. It was larger than the number specified for any other symphonic work, and he said he wanted a chorus of 500 voices. These demands are not met mainly for two reasons: the size of a platform and financial limitations. It is the nobility of the inspiration that makes music great, not the number of the participants. If size were a criterion, everyone would elevate and isolate Tintoretto for the walls and ceiling of the Scuola di S. Rocco and ignore anyone like Vermeer and prize the Pentagon over the Parthenon.

I am sure every one holds dear certain performances in music or drama, which stand far above anything else he ever heard or witnessed. I have a few treasures of that sort: a performance of the Bach D minor piano concerto by Rudolf Serkin on South Mountain; a performance of the Coronation piano concerto of Mozart at Tanglewood by Robert Casadesus; a performance of the ballet to Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet" by Rudolf Nureyev at the Metropolitan; Jane Cowl as "Juliet"; a Grace Kelly movie, and Humphrey Bogart and Ingrid Bergman in "Casablanca."

* * * *

GREATNESS is not of dimensions. It is something of more subtle symmetry. It can even be an understatement, plain simplicity. The introductory theme of last week's Requiem was assigned to the violas. The phrase can be sounded on a fingerboard or a keyboard without shifting the hand at all. Even "The Last Rose of Summer" extends to a full octave. When Beethoven at his most sublime moment in the choral finale of the Ninth Symphony sought a phrase to express his paramount inspiration, he, too, stayed within the same compass as Berlioz was to do 10 years later. When Wagner searched for the expression which would elevate his "Parsifal" to the pinnacle to which he aspired, he achieved greatness by a quintessential but severe unaffectedness. Beauty unadorned.

The most common example of the efficacy of greatness in oratory is "the" Gettysburg address. Lincoln, in a few words and in a few minutes, spoke what has endured beyond comparison with that of the main speaker of the day, Edward Everett.

Greatness isn't measured in decibels or megatons either. Whereas the "Tuba Mirum" of the Requiem assaulted and overwhelmed our ears last week with its additional brass choirs in the four corners of the auditorium, it was the softer "Sanctus" that penetrated and made the deeper impression. It penetrated our senses and our memories more than the overpowering volume of sound of the preceding sections.

* * * *

VERSAILLES, the most grandiose, most vainglorious gesture of man in his own glorification, with its acres and acres of marble and stone in terms more pretentious than the Acropolis, St. Peter's, the Temples of the Nile and memorials to military triumphs, recedes in awesomeness when we leave it and become aware of the social callousness to which it is a monument. Some of us are not impressed by those born to greatness or who have greatness thrust upon them but we are appreciative and respectful of those who achieve greatness.

TIMES UNION
ALBANY, N. Y.
D. 71,675 SUN. 165,169

AUG 25 1970

Tanglewood Ends 33rd Season

By RICHARD VINCENT

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood closed its 33d season Sunday afternoon with a performance of Berlioz epic "Requiem Mass.

The performance was in memory of Charles Munch who conducted this great orchestra from 1949 to 1962.

To give some idea of the heroic proportions of this work it might be illustrative to list just what the composer called for in his notes.

THE SCORE calls for a main orchestra of 4 flutes, 2 oboes, 2 English Horns, 4 clarinets, 12 horns, 8 bassoons, 25 first and 25 second violins, 20 violas, 20 cellos and 18 double basses, 8 pairs of timpani, bass drum, 4 tam tams and 10 pairs of cymbals. Four additional brass choirs, to be placed at the four corners of the performing forces and include 4 trumpets (or cornets) 4 trombones in each choir with 2 tubas in one and four ophicleides in another. (An ophicleide is a deep-toned brass wind instrument of the key bugle class.)

BERLIOZ also listed 80 sopranos and alto, 60 tenors and 70 basses. He added however that "the indications of number are only relative and one may double or triple the whole choral body and augment the instrumental forces in the same proportion."

There is more but that should present some image of the complexity of the performing groups. Berlioz knew however that simply adding instruments or singers ultimately would produce a coarsening of the sound and difficulty with precise intonation. He therefore used these considerable forces with great care assuring that the result would never, in a proper performance, be just great amorphous gouts of sound.

THE MAN in charge was Seiji Ozawa, and he chose to conduct without a score. His confidence and assurance was not misplaced and in general it was a striding performance.

There was some evidence of ragged meter when the brass choirs, each placed out in the shed on opposite sides were playing in conjunction with the orchestra. However if one moved to different locations during the concert it appeared that this could be explained by the fact that the sound had to carry so far and from varisites.

The very large chorus, an amalgamation of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Framingham Choral Society, and the M.I.T. Glee Club performed competently and it was apparent that they were well-prepared.

LEOPOLD SIMONEAU, the Canadian tenor, did what he has done many times so very well. His solo in the "Sanctus" was a moving and controlled example of the fine art of singing.

The audience, held down by the inclement weather that continually threatened responded after the last tender "Amen" with considerable enthusiasm. It was a fine way to end the season.

SEIJI OZAWA

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

AUG 24 1970

New England Newsclip

Memorial to Munch Closes 33rd Berkshire Music Festival

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Music Review

LENOX — What with brass players blazing away from four points in the huge Tanglewood music shed, and stage packed with full symphony orchestra and 165 singers, it's no wonder that Berlioz' Requiem brought the 33rd Berkshire Music Festival to a dazzling close yesterday afternoon.

The performance by the Boston Symphony, chorus, and tenor Leopold Simoneau was a memorial to Charles Munch, conductor of the orchestra from 1949 to 1962.

Alexis Weissenberg received a tremendous reception Saturday night for his playing of Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto.

After Gunther Schuller's conducting of the Boston Symphony Friday night, the festival was seriously in need of first aid.

Attendance Figures

The posted attendance figure of 4,238 for Friday night was widely questioned as being excessively high. The same source gave 20,449 for the weekend.

According to the box-office, 257,419 persons attended events at Tanglewood this summer as compared to 236,937 in 1969. The 24 regular concerts of the Boston Symphony were attended by 186,190 during the past eight weeks as against 175,468 last summer.

Seiji Ozawa conducted the last two concerts. We've never seen him in better form with solo and accompanying orchestra. He had scores before him but rarely glanced at them.

Berlioz' Requiem (he referred to it as Messe des Morts, or Mass for the Dead) came closest to satisfying the composers' ravenous appetite for enormity of production and sound.

Voices and Text

Essentially an orchestral conductor, Ozawa recognized that the work's impact rests with voices and the Latin text. Short of silencing the orchestra, no conductor could manage to exact balances that a spiritual message would survive such ponderous instrumental fabric.

Somehow, religious depth was achieved and it wasn't merely because no applause was permitted until the end.

The singers were from the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Framingham Choral Society and MIT Glee Club. They couldn't have gotten closer to the core of things. Unaccompanied singing of "Quaerens me sedisti lassus" soared with sumptuous sounds. The "Lacrymosa" and "Tuba, mirum..." had about as much expansion as orchestral collaboration would permit.

Unfortunately, strain frequently marred quality in soprano voices and the tenors produced veiled tones that were intended to be powerful.

Solid Part Singing

When the hall wasn't overpowered with brassy sound, solid part singing was heard in "Quantus Tremor." Eight male voices were splendid in "Quid sum miser."

Simoneau sang his part in the Sanctus with a firm, expressive, tonally colorful voice.

As we said, Weissenberg created a storm Saturday night with the Rachmaninoff.

The concert platform is crowded with keyboard supermen. Most of them seem to have short heydays.

If Weissenberg will pull in the reins on his pyrotechnical equipment, he could be an exception. The man has an eye-popping technique. When he doubled the tempos in the finale's geyser passages, the results were electrifying.

But he also poured out poetry as if the supply was unlimited.

Weissenberg played the original version of the concerto, a rare experience. His faith in it paid dividends, just as it has for Cliburn.

As Weissenberg stormed through the booby traps, he was not an infallible technician. But the orchestra members said it all at the end when they put down their instruments, stood, and gave the pianist an ovation of their own.

Bartok Concerto

Ozawa traced polished, beautifully formed melodies through Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra. Here were smooth exchanges of volume from bursting sonorities to pastel hues.

Lutoslawski's Concerto for Orchestra was a sizzler. Heavy drama was stated in bold, defiant language. It may be the loudest piece contrived for orchestra since Tchaikovsky's "1812."

Most of it was noisy and brassy, ending in a cloudburst of clangor.

But much of it gave a clear view off the Boston Symphony that has no peer when it plays that well.

SATURDAY NIGHT

Concerto for Orchestra — Lutoslawski
Piano Concerto No. 3 in D minor, Opus 30 — Rachmaninoff
Alexis Weissenberg, pianist
Concerto for Orchestra — Bartok

SUNDAY AFTERNOON

Requiem, Opus 5 — Berlioz
Leopold Simoneau, tenor
Tanglewod Festival Chorus
Framingham Choral Society
MIT Glee Club

96

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Season Ends With Homage to Charles Munch

Berlioz Requiem Memorializes Late Conductor

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

THE CONCLUDING spaced, soft chords of the Berlioz Requiem at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon left the huge audience in mesmerized silence. Conductor Seiji Ozawa signaled for the final pianissimo G Major chord and let his head tilt forward, his arms limp by his side. The violins let the tips of their bows rest unmoving on their strings. The audience, fearful to break the awesome spell, was still.

The Requiem had been chosen for the last concert of the season to honor the memory of a late musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, who had been a staunch Berlioz devotee. The whole afternoon was a moving experience and the capacity-filled great Shed reacted as if heeding John Donne's admonition in "A Valediction Forbidding Mourning." This was not a moment for ebullient, riotous applause but rather:

So let us melt and make no noise
No teare-floods, nor sigh-tempests move,
T'were prophanation of our joyes
To tell the layetie our love.

* * *

THE REQUIEM was played without intermission, with only a short pause after the Lacrymosa. The audience did not leave their seats and refrained from applause until the completion of the performance and the terminal magic entrancement had been dispersed.

The early sections of "La Grande Messe des Morts" employs a chorus in great declamations. There are no purely orchestral interludes. The voices are built to tremendous climaxes. The famous Tuba Mirum, which calls for small brass choirs stationed at the four corners of the auditorium, came off with stunning effect.

The voices consisted of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus and the Framingham Choral Society, both directed by John Oliver, and of the MIT Glee Club, Klaus Liepmann, director. They sing practically without respite for the hour and a half duration of the Mass, and their alert, full-throated response never varied from the excellence they established at the start. Yet no part of Berlioz's thunderous crests was quite so impressive as the majestic Sanctus, in which Leopold Simoneau's superb tenor solo alternated. His was a memorable vocal achievement, in timbre, line and spirit.

* * *

THE PROGRAMS of the final weekend of the Tanglewood season disclosed more audacity than had been apparent in the preceding seven weeks. Yesterday Ozawa honored Munch by playing the Requiem. On the preceding evening he had played two concertos for orchestra. one of the year 1954 by the contemporary Polish composer, Witold Lutoslawski, and one, 10 years older, by the late Bela Bartok.

Friday night was Gunther Schuller's evening. He not only took the podium but included his own "Spectra" in the program. It proved to be from the same capital from which he had expended material for his "Klee Pictures" of three years ago but vastly improved in several directions. The explorations into novel and deep, dark sonorities are the most striking factors of his music, and the contrasts, partially achieved by a new and original seating arrangement of the musicians, are colorful. A plan is not apparent on a single hearing, but the orchestral writing is evidence of distinct progress in the composer's development. Before the final measure there is a caesura — a rhetorical pause — after which the composition ends with a hearty "Gesundheit!"

* * *

IT IS REMARKABLE to notice that the Scriabin "Poem of Ecstasy" had never been performed at Tanglewood before. It is soaring, hyperbolic music, described in London on its first English performance as "too hysterical." Its passionate oestrus Friday mounted to a frenzy which rarely subsided. It is not insignificant that Scriabin inherited or was "polluted" by the same artistic atmospheres, albeit in different countries, as was Marcel Proust, a twin of his birth year. This should go down as one of the highlights of the 1970 season.

Schuller opened his program with the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi," one of the very early operas he wrote the year after Bulwer-Lytton wrote his novel, in 1837, of that title. At that time Berlioz was finding inspiration in Byron's "Childe Harold," Beethoven had taken off Goethe's "Egmont," Donizetti from Walter Scott's "Lucia di Lammermoor." Exciting times!

* * *

ANOTHER VALUABLE inclusion to the evening was Paul Zukofsky's performance of the solo in Karol Szymanowski's first violin concerto. Zukofsky struggled valiantly and successfully in most situations against the composer's heavy orchestral writing and the conductor's incitement to vigorous participation. There is great similarity in character to the Chausson "Poeme." The most effective moments of the concerto for the soloist come when he can climb to the top positions of his chanterelle, whence his tonal "vision" is not obscured nor impeded by the busy orchestra.

* * *

SATURDAY NIGHT Ozawa achieved a tour de force. On paper it did not seem that to list two concertos for orchestra was good program-making, and I still am not convinced that it was. Yet the performances were so galvanic that any skepticism becomes quibbles. There is always the question why a composer chooses the term "concerto" rather than "symphony" and the distinction is pretty hazy.

The Bartok by now no longer needs advocates at court. The Lutoslawski is not yet so well-ensconced and from here does not appear to deserve space on the same shelf. The third movement of the contemporary Polish composer's concerto starts with a widely spaced, plucked theme in the double basses to which a saxophone adds its voice, somewhat in the manner of Bartok's third movement "Elegia." But Lutoslawksi's theme becomes a plodding advance. The same composer's droning bagpipes are engaging, as is the fugue in the Capriccio, but the strings have a battle in the interminable last movement against the strength of the brass.

* * *

BARTOK, IN spite of the stern first movement and the lugubrious elegy, is generally witty and fanciful, all the more meaningful when one becomes aware of the low state of his personal situation at the time (1944).

The midsection of the Saturday evening program was filled brilliantly by Alexis Weissenberg in the third piano concerto, D Minor, Opus 30, of Rachmaninoff. The soloist's execution was prodigious, especially in the herculean cadenza of the first movement. But the most lasting impression is of the beauty of his tone and simplicity of his averment of Rachmaninoff's naive theme initially and in its repetitions.

In such surroundings Rachmaninoff seems almost like a lagniappe to a little boy who has eaten his spinach. The harmony is but one degree removed from cloying, yet it was an ideal choice to place between such realistic vitamins as Lutoslawski and Bartok. It sent everyone home with his musical digestion well-balanced.

Whitestone

Standing ovation is given Boston Symphony and choirs at end of Berlioz Requiem.

Whitestone

End of the season

Total Attendance Reaches 257,419, 20,482 Over '69

Attendance Roundup

An audience of 257,419 listeners attended the 1970 concert season at Tanglewood. This figure, 20,482 more than last year's attendance of 236,937, comprises the numbers from all events, including the Boston Symphony performances and the several rock and popular music concerts. A breakdown shows that 186,190 listeners attended the 24 weekend concerts and eight open rehearsals as compared to an audience of 175,468 for similar programs during the 1969 season.

This weekend's concerts attracted a total crowd of 20,449. Friday night's concerts drew 4,238 listeners; Saturday's open rehearsal, 2,533; Saturday evening, 7,196; and Sunday afternoon, 6,482.

Boston Symphony Announces New Members

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will have seven new members this fall. They are Cecylia Arzewski and Marylou Speaker, violins, Joel Moerschel, cello, Lawrence Wolf, double bass, Paul Fried, flute, Harold Wright, clarinet, and Ronald Barron, trombone.

BULLETIN
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
(E) 150,082

AUG 24 1970 New England Newsclip

FINAL CONCERT

Lenox, Mass. — (UPI) — More than 6,400 persons attended the final concert yesterday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Tanglewood Music Shed, bringing the season's total to a record 257,419.

TRANSCRIPT-TELEGRAM
HOLYOKE, MASS.
(E) 27,800

AUG 27 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood closed a great season Sunday with the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing the Berlioz Requiem. The Requiem had been chosen for the final concert of the season to honor the memory of Charles Munch, who had been a staunch Berlioz devotee. The Berkshire Eagle reviewer said the huge audience was left in Mesmerized silence. This past season drew 257,419 people which was 20,482 more than last year's attendance.

Tanglewood Review

Final Weekend Attracts About 18,000

Martha deB. Beaver

The final weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox brought a little over 18,000 people to hear some of the finest performances of the series. Unfortunately, the heavens did not smile on those who had looked forward to hearing Sunday's Berlioz Requiem from the spacious lawns, which cut attendance at least one third. A few hardy souls braved the overcast skies, however, with chairs and heavy blankets to protect them.

Friday's concert saw Gunther Schuller, artistic director, on the podium. He opened the program with Wagner's Rienzi Overture, distilling the full essence of this delightfully Italianate work, the orchestra presenting the operatic themes with their usual tonal clarity, memorable verve, and lyric sweep.

Highlight of this section was the seldom heard Szmanowski Concerto No. 1, interpreted magnificently and with consummate skill, minus any but the necessary body movements, by Paul Zukowsky. Not a single tone was off-pitch throughout the whole beautifully framed (by the orchestra) work, even the harmonics — all were securely placed and exquisitely intoned; leaps, runs, double stops, spoke with dynamic clarity and the right amount of feeling. Much of this concerto lies in the upper register; only the last movement (all three are played without pause) encompasses all the staff, it seems. It was an unforgettable performance.

Saturday evening, Seijii Ozawa commended himself to many, after a thoroughly exacting, exhausting, and exciting rehearsal in the morning of Berlioz' Requiem. He set himself a formidable task with the programming of three concertos (an elderly gentleman informed us he'd heard this combination only twice in his lefetime).

The first, by Lutoslawski, offered some fascinating orchestration and development of simple material, percussion, including the piano, a large part of the three movements, a repetitive drum beat underlying one theme passed from the bass and cellos, through the violas, second, then first violins . . . a long flute and oboe combination, muted strings playing ponticello; the second movement skittish, and strings muted pizzcatto, lightly plucked with several drum rolls, a kind of passacaglia with the basses plucking their strings, several piano cluster runs, and a haunting oboe solo above all this . . . the third movement. The third movement was lengthy and repetitious, a lot of notes with little exposition, and could have been omitted, as the composer had said all with great charm in the first two.

Alexis Weissenberg was soloist for Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3 in Dminor, so very Russian in feeling we almost expected the first violins to get up and dance during the impassioned Adagio theme played so expressively by the pianist, Silverstein swaying with the rhythm. There is some fascinating and smooth juxtaposition among flute, clarinet, English horn and French horns in the first movement, which opens so very quietly. A brilliant player, Weissenberg was impressive, technically and interpretatively; he looked slight and calm in his approach, but showed great strength and moving perceptiveness in his interpretation; everything he did was neatly executed. Ozawa took the fast movements at extraordinarily swift tempos, but seemed to leave much of the impetus to the pianist, so that the orchestra wasn't always quite there with him, although there were moments when both were amazingly "right on", particularly when runs were being completed.

Bartok's Concerto for orchestra closed the evening's program, a thorough reading, but one that didn't reveal any unusual dimensions. The audience was extremely responsive, as usual. We noted Bishop Christopher Weldon in the audiende, enjoying the concert. And many blue minks were being worn. Another aside: Ozawa forgot his baton before the Rachmanminoff, and the stage manager having placed the wrong score on the stand, changed it and brought the baton making two trips to complete all. We understand he wasn't very happy about his own mistake.

The weekend's finale, on Sunday afternoon, again saw Ozawa conducting, this time a performance of the massive Berlioz Requiem, for which Leopold Simoneau was tenor soloist; the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, augumented by the Framingham Choral Society and the MIT Glee Club.

The afternoon was dedicated to the memory of Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony from 1949 to 1962, a conductor whose affinity for the music of Berlioz is gratefully noted. The dedication of the "Grande Messe des morts" to him was more than a tribute, as appropriate as it was generous.

The afternoon offered other felicities as well: the elegiac elegance of the opening "Requiem", the magnificent and jarring syncopated power of the "Lacrymosa" (one of the finest sections of the work), the muted and delicate tracery of the "Offertory", the chorus hushed, confined to a two-note pattern, the orchestra melodically expansive, and, of course, the soaring and sublime "Santus". Simoneau's dulcet tenor the perfect instrument to express its wondrous loveliness.

As splendid as some of the parts were, there were others that did not impress nearly as well, notably those which called either for more sound or a more pointed one than the choristers seemed able to produce, those in which lyricism suffered because of a deficiency of musical phrase and line, and particularly those big sections in which disparate elements did not coalesce into a rhythmic entity.

Some of the afternoon's unsuccess has to do, it must be said, with the piece itself, for it is a demanding work whose peculiar difficulties are both diverse and enormous. Part of these difficulties are inherent in the massive forces and their suitable arrangement, necessary for a satisfactory reading of the work, and some of these have to do with those extended portions of the score which demand extraordinary and eloquent expression in order for them to be at all effective.

It was in both of these areas that Ozawa seemed discomfited, for neither in the accurate aggregate of components, instrumental or rhythmic, nor in the delineation of sounds and shapes, was he particularly engaging. One could not help but feel that it will take several more exposures of the conductor to work before experience and temperament are molded into a force that is capable of sut suming one set of intricacies and demands with another.

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 60,000
AUG 30 1970 New England Newsclip

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900
AUG 28 1970 New England Newsclip

E. J. DIAS

A Look At the Arts

A Note on Attendance at Tanglewood

I have read with considerable interest the attendance statistics for the Boston Symphony's Tanglewood season, which ended last Sunday with a grand-scale performance of the Berlioz "Requiem," led by Seiji Ozawa and utilizing the entire orchestra, 200 choristers, and four supplementary brass bands.

My interest in the following statistics lies in the fact that this season marked the first under the co-artistic direction of Ozawa and Gunther Schuller — appointments necessitated by the resignation of Erich Leinsdorf.

It is pleasant to report that Ozawa and Schuller seem to have won much success. Tanglewood closed its season with a total attendance up more than 20,000 from last summer. Total attendance for the eight-week festival was 257,419, compared to 236,937 in 1969; 24 Boston Symphony programs and eight rehearsals drew 186,190 against last season's 175,468. Three Fillmore-at-Tanglewood concerts of rock music (an innovation made by the co-directors) accounted for 51,149 customers, with the July 7 evening performance, which featured The Who, Jethro Tull and It's a Beautiful Day; attracting the season's largest crowd — 18,784.

During the Tanglewood season, more modern music was played than at any other festival in Berkshire history. Obviously, Ozawa and Schuller set out to attract youthful listeners — certainly a laudable purpose inasmuch as any symphony orchestra must look to young people if it is to build an audience for the future.

As far as I know, William Steinberg, who missed most of last season because of illness, will be back on the podium when the Boston Symphony begins its fall and winter season in October in Symphony Hall.

Music Mailbag

She Done Him Wrong at Tanglewood?

To the Editor:

At Tanglewood we heard the superb performance of the Berlioz Requiem conducted by Seiji Ozawa. The audience gave a prolonged standing ovation, and as always, Ozawa shied away from accepting any of the tribute. He directed it all to the orchestra, chorus and soloist. Ozawa himself was reluctant to face the audience until it became imperative after being called back four times.

Upon my return I was dismayed to read the interview of Ozawa by Joan Peyser. She gives a false, one-sided impression of this great man. Miss Peyser's report could well have ended after the first paragraph, which gave a concise survey of this fine conductor. What followed was, for the main part, an explanation of what piqued her: that Mr. Ozawa was not over anxious to be interviewed. He had evidently been interviewed before by reporters like Miss Peyser.

I can't imagine a person like Ozawa, who finds it difficult to even compliment his orchestra members, being able to talk to an arbitrary woman like Miss Peyser. When he explained to her that he did not like interviews because, "Musicians," (meaning himself), "cannot talk well," the ungracious Miss Peyser berated him by citing countless other interviews she'd had with "very articulate men." (A fine way to smooth the way—they can do it, why can't you?)

He even confessed he wished he were able to communicate like Bernstein whom he admires. But our reporter was relentless. Her conclusions were selfish and unfair to her subject. In the beginning she says, "I interviewed the conductor one afternoon . . . and learned virtually nothing except that he is an aloof, controlling man." Whereupon after complaining of his aloofness, she proceeds to give forth a great many facts that Mr. Ozawa gave to her, reluctantly or not. But for these she credits him nothing.

In closing Miss Peyser says ominously, "Two important questions remain: Is arrogance a defensive mask for tension and insecurity? And does Ozawa's reluctance to communicate with words suggest anything regarding his communication with music?" I would say that she is the arrogant one, and the first question might well apply in that case. As to the second, one can only assume that she has not observed him conduct, or heard the magnificent performances resulting from his communication with music.

Mrs. Marjorie K. Peterson
Albany, N. Y.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 959,600
SEP 6 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood In Review

Friday, Aug. 21
By D.D.

Delightfully cool weather and a relatively small audience enhanced an unusual program this evening, beginning with Wagner and ending with Scriabin. A rousing performance of The Rienzi Overture opened the program. Following this, and undoubtedly the high point of the program, was a remarkable performance by violinist Paul Zukofsky of Szymanowsky's Violin Concerto No. 1. A complex work of stunning impact, it requires not only a very advanced technical mastery of the instrument, but a very special feeling for the varied moods and subtle details which make it up. Soloist and conductor, Gunther Schuller seemed at ease with the score and in complete agreement as to balance and interpretation. Zukofsky's left hand work was impeccable, and his bowing and tone nothing short of magnificent. Mr. Schuller's own composition, Spectra followed intermission. This work has moments of originality popping out here and there from a "fond sonore" of pre-electronic cliches. Well performed, and certainly not lacking in surprises the work must have satisfied a few initiates although it elicited but feeble applause. The more accessible Poem of Ecstasy of Scriabin was given a sympathetic reading. Mr. Schuller emphasized the dream-like, searching qualities of this excellent score, achieving beautiful orchestral balance among the constantly shifting tonal patterns and colors.

Saturday, August 22
By J.B.

At the penultimate concert of the Summer, Seiji Ozawa directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of music by three 20th century composers.

The Concert for Orchestra by Lutoslawski (the only living composer on the program), was completed only 16 years ago but is surprisingly classical in form. The third movement is a passacaglia and toccata, two forms of variations used as early as the 17th century.

Piano soloists seem popular with Tanglewood audiences, and Alexis Weissenberg, playing Rachmaninov's Third Piano Concerto, was no exception.

The most interesting and beautiful piece for me in this concert was the last played, Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra. Bartok was suffering from leukemia when he wrote it, and died nine months after its performance. The main theme of the fourth movement should be heard by anyone who considers Bartok unmelodic.

A last word should be said of Seiji Ozawa, musical director of Tanglewood this summer. Besides a trim figure he has a superb sense of rhythm and a courageous willingness to play new music.

Sunday, August 23
By A.C.S.

The final offering for this season was a performance of the Berlioz "Requiem." Before the conductor appeared, an expectant hush fell over the large audience. From that moment on one felt part of a church service rather than a concert. And, indeed, it was a memorial to Charles Munch who had introduced the work to Tanglewood audiences in 1952 during his tenure as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Today's concert was not without fault (primarily a lack of coordination between the widely spaced brass bands), but it was probably as fine a live performance as one is apt to hear. It would be difficult to imagine more beautiful choral singing than that provided by the combined voices of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Framingham Choral Society, and MIT Glee Club. To get more than two hundred singers to enunciate so clearly, to blend so perfectly, and to phrase so musically reflects hours of concentrated effort by the singers and their leaders. The singing of the tenor section alone was worth the price of admission. Leopold Simoneau was the excellent tenor soloist in the "Sanctus."

The superb chorus, soloist, and orchestra could not in themselves have created such a memorable performance without the truly inspired leadership of Seiji Ozawa. Despite some fine conducting earlier in the season, he seemed to have saved his best for last.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813
AUG 27 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Review

Final Weekend Attracts About 18,000

Martha deB. Beaver

The final weekend of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox brought a little over 18,000 people to hear some of the finest performances of the series. Unfortunately, the heavens did not smile on those who had looked forward to hearing Sunday's Berlioz Requiem from the spacious lawns, which cut attendance at least one third. A few hardy souls braved the overcast skies, however, with chairs and heavy blankets to protect them.

Friday's concert saw Gunther Schuller, artistic director, on the podium. He opened the program with Wagner's Rienzi Overture, distilling the full essence of this delightfully Italianate work, the orchestra presenting the operatic themes with their usual tonal clarity, memorable verve, and lyric sweep.

Highlight of this section was the seldom heard Szmanowski Concerto No. 1, interpreted magnificently and with consummate skill, minus any but the necessary body movements, by Paul Zukowsky. Not a single tone was off-pitch throughout the whole beautifully framed (by the orchestra) work, even the harmonics — all were securely placed and exquisitely intoned; leaps, runs, double stops, spoke with dynamic clarity and the right amount of feeling. Much of this concerto lies in the upper register; only the last movement (all three are played without pause) encompasses all the staff, it seems. It was an unforgettable performance.

Saturday evening, Seijii Ozawa commended himself to many, after a thoroughly exacting, exhausting, and exciting rehearsal in the morning of Berlioz' Requiem. He set himself a formidable task with the programming of three concertos (an elderly gentleman informed us he'd heard this combination only twice in his lefetime).

The first, by Lutoslawski, offered some fascinating orchestration and development of simple material, percussion, including the piano, a large part of the three movements, a repetitive drum beat underlying one theme passed from the bass and cellos, through the violas, second, then first violins . . . a long flute and oboe combination, muted strings playing ponticello; the second movement skittish, and strings muted pizzcatto, lightly plucked with several drum rolls, a kind of passacaglia with the basses plucking their strings, several piano cluster runs, and a haunting oboe solo above all this . . . the third movement. The third movement was lengthy and repetitious, a lot of notes with little exposition, and could have been omitted, as the composer had said all with great charm in the first two.

Alexis Weissenberg was soloist for Rachmaninoff's Piano Concerto No. 3 in Dminor, so very Russian in feeling we almost expected the first violins to get up and dance during the impassioned Adagio theme played so expressively by the pianist, Silverstein swaying with the rhythm. There is some fascinating and smooth juxtaposition among flute, clarinet, English horn and French horns in the first movement, which opens so very quietly. A brilliant player, Weissenberg was impressive, technically and interpretatively; he looked slight and calm in his approach, but showed great strength and moving perceptiveness in his interpretation; everything he did was neatly executed. Ozawa took the fast movements at extraordinarily swift tempos, but seemed to leave much of the impetus to the pianist, so that the orchestra wasn't always quite there with him, although there were moments when both were amazingly "right on", particularly when runs were being completed.

Bartok's Concerto for orchestra closed the evening's program, a thorough reading, but one that didn't reveal any unusual dimensions. The audience was extremely responsive, as usual. We noted Bishop Christopher Weldon in the audiende, enjoying the concert. And many blue minks were being worn. Another aside: Ozawa forgot his baton before the Rachmanminoff, and the stage manager having placed the wrong score on the stand, changed it and brought the baton making two trips to complete all. We understand he wasn't very happy about his own mistake.

The weekend's finale, on Sunday afternoon, again saw Ozawa conducting, this time a performance of the massive Berlioz Requiem, for which Leopold Simoneau was tenor soloist; the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, augumented by the Framingham Choral Society and the MIT Glee Club.

The afternoon was dedicated to the memory of Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony from 1949 to 1962, a conductor whose affinity for the music of Berlioz is gratefully noted. The dedication of the "Grande Messe des morts" to him was more than a tribute, as appropriate as it was generous.

The afternoon offered other felicities as well: the elegiac elegance of the opening "Requiem", the magnificent and jarring syncopated power of the "Lacrymosa" (one of the finest sections of the work), the muted and delicate tracery of the "Offertory", the chorus hushed, confined to a two-note pattern, the orchestra melodically expansive, and, of course, the soaring and sublime "Santus". Simoneau's dulcet tenor the perfect instrument to express its wondrous loveliness.

As splendid as some of the parts were, there were others that did not impress nearly as well, notably those which called either for more sound or a more pointed one than the choristers seemed able to produce, those in which lyricism suffered because of a deficiency of musical phrase and line, and particularly those big sections in which disparate elements did not coalesce into a rhythmic entity.

Some of the afternoon's unsuccess has to do, it must be said, with the piece itself, for it is a demanding work whose peculiar difficulties are both diverse and enormous. Part of these difficulties are inherent in the massive forces and their suitable arrangement, necessary for a satisfactory reading of the work, and some of these have to do with those extended portions of the score which demand extraordinary and eloquent expression in order for them to be at all effective.

It was in both of these areas that Ozawa seemed discomfited, for neither in the accurate aggregate of components, instrumental or rhythmic, nor in the delineation of sounds and shapes, was he particularly engaging. One could not help but feel that it will take several more exposures of the conductor to work before experience and temperament are molded into a force that is capable of sut suming one set of intricacies and demands with another.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
(E) 14,900

AUG 28 1970 New England Newsclip

STANDARD-TIMES
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
(E) 70,000 (S) 68,000

AUG 30 1970 New England Newsclip

E. J. DIAS

A Look At the Arts

A Note on Attendance at Tanglewood

I have read with considerable interest the attendance statistics for the Boston Symphony's Tanglewood season, which ended last Sunday with a grand-scale performance of the Berlioz "Requiem," led by Seiji Ozawa and utilizing the entire orchestra, 200 choristers, and four supplementary brass bands.

My interest in the following statistics lies in the fact that this season marked the first under the co-artistic direction of Ozawa and Gunther Schuller — appointments necessitated by the resignation of Erich Leinsdorf.

It is pleasant to report that Ozawa and Schuller seem to have won much success. Tanglewood closed its season with a total attendance up more than 20,000 from last summer. Total attendance for the eight-week festival was 257,419, compared to 236,937 in 1969; 24 Boston Symphony programs and eight rehearsals drew 186,190 against last season's 175,468. Three Fillmore-at-Tanglewood concerts of rock music (an innovation made by the co-directors) accounted for 51,149 customers, with the July 7 evening performance, which featured The Who, Jethro Tull and It's a Beautiful Day, attracting the season's largest crowd — 18,784.

During the Tanglewood season, more modern music was played than at any other festival in Berkshire history. Obviously, Ozawa and Schuller set out to attract youthful listeners — certainly a laudable purpose inasmuch as any symphony orchestra must look to young people if it is to build an audience for the future.

As far as I know, William Steinberg, who missed most of last season because of illness, will be back on the podium when the Boston Symphony begins its fall and winter season in October in Symphony Hall.

Music Mailbag

She Done Him Wrong at Tanglewood?

To the Editor:

At Tanglewood we heard the superb performance of the Berlioz Requiem conducted by Seiji Ozawa. The audience gave a prolonged standing ovation, and as always, Ozawa shied away from accepting any of the tribute. He directed it all to the orchestra, chorus and soloist. Ozawa himself was reluctant to face the audience until it became imperative after being called back four times.

Upon my return I was dismayed to read the interview of Ozawa by Joan Peyser. She gives a false, one-sided impression of this great man. Miss Peyser's report could well have ended after the first paragraph, which gave a concise survey of this fine conductor. What followed was, for the main part, an explanation of what piqued her: that Mr. Ozawa was not over anxious to be interviewed. He had evidently been interviewed before by reporters like Miss Peyser.

I can't imagine a person like Ozawa, who finds it difficult to even compliment his orchestra members, being able to talk to an arbitrary woman like Miss Peyser. When he explained to her that he did not like interviews because, "Musicians," (meaning himself), "cannot talk well," the ungracious Miss Peyser berated him by citing countless other interviews she'd had with "very articulate men." (A fine way to smooth the way—they can do it, why can't you?)

He even confessed he wished he were able to communicate like Bernstein whom he admires. But our reporter was relentless. Her conclusions were selfish and unfair to her subject. In the beginning she says, "I interviewed the conductor one afternoon . . . and learned virtually nothing except that he is an aloof, controlling man." Whereupon after complaining of his aloofness, she proceeds to give forth a great many facts that Mr. Ozawa gave to her, reluctantly or not. But for these she credits him nothing.

In closing Miss Peyser says ominously, "Two important questions remain: Is arrogance a defensive mask for tension and insecurity? And does Ozawa's reluctance to communicate with words suggest anything regarding his communication with music?" I would say that she is the arrogant one, and the first question might well apply in that case. As to the second, one can only assume that she has not observed him conduct, or heard the magnificent performances resulting from his communication with music.

Mrs. Marjorie K. Peterson
Albany, N. Y.

TIMES (M)
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 1,054,600

SEP 6 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood In Review

Friday, Aug. 21
By D.D.

Delightfully cool weather and a relatively small audience enhanced an unusual program this evening, beginning with Wagner and ending with Scriabin. A rousing performance of The Rienzi Overture opened the program. Following this, and undoubtedly the high point of the program, was a remarkable performance by violinist Paul Zukofsky of Szymanowsky's Violin Concerto No. 1. A complex work of stunning impact, it requires not only a very advanced technical mastery of the instrument, but a very special feeling for the varied moods and subtle details which make it up. Soloist and conductor, Gunther Schuller seemed at ease with the score and in complete agreement as to balance and interpretation. Zukofsky's left hand work was impeccable, and his bowing and tone nothing short of magnificent. Mr. Schuller's own composition, Spectra followed intermission. This work has moments of originality popping out here and there from a "fond sonore" of pre-electronic cliches. Well performed, and certainly not lacking in surprises the work must have satisfied a few initiates although it elicited but feeble applause. The more accessible Poem of Ecstasy of Scriabin was given a sympathetic reading. Mr. Schuller emphasized the dream-like, searching qualities of this excellent score, achieving beautiful orchestral balance among the constantly shifting tonal patterns and colors.

Saturday, August 22
By J.B.

At the penultimate concert of the Summer, Seiji Ozawa directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of music by three 20th century composers.

The Concert for Orchestra by Lutoslawski (the only living composer on the program), was completed only 16 years ago but is surprisingly classical in form. The third movement is a passacaglia and toccata, two forms of variations used as early as the 17th century.

Piano soloists seem popular with Tanglewood audiences, and Alexis Weissenberg, playing Rachmaninov's Third Piano Concerto, was no exception.

The most interesting and beautiful piece for me in this concert was the last played, Bartok's Concerto for Orchestra. Bartok was suffering from leukemia when he wrote it, and died nine months after its performance. The main theme of the fourth movement should be heard by anyone who considers Bartok unmelodic.

A last word should be said of Seiji Ozawa, musical director of Tanglewood this summer. Besides a trim figure he has a superb sense of rhythm and a courageous willingness to play new music.

Sunday, August 23
By A.C.S.

The final offering for this season was a performance of the Berlioz "Requiem." Before the conductor appeared, an expectant hush fell over the large audience. From that moment on one felt part of a church service rather than a concert. And, indeed, it was a memorial to Charles Munch who had introduced the work to Tanglewood audiences in 1952 during his tenure as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Today's concert was not without fault (primarily a lack of coordination between the widely spaced brass bands), but it was probably as fine a live performance as one is apt to hear. It would be difficult to imagine more beautiful choral singing than that provided by the combined voices of the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Framingham Choral Society, and MIT Glee Club. To get more than two hundred singers to enunciate so clearly, to blend so perfectly, and to phrase so musically reflects hours of concentrated effort by the singers and their leaders. The singing of the tenor section alone was worth the price of admission. Leopold Simoneau was the excellent tenor soloist in the "Sanctus."

The superb chorus, soloist, and orchestra could not in themselves have created such a memorable performance without the truly inspired leadership of Seiji Ozawa. Despite some fine conducting earlier in the season, he seemed to have saved his best for last.

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

AUG 27 1970 New England Newsclip

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

SEP 3 1970

New England Newsclip

the lively world

by Milton R. Bass

IF BEETHOVEN were alive today, he would be 200 years old.

But Beethoven IS alive today. Anyone who attended the Beethoven weekends at Tanglewood this summer could see from the audience reaction that Beethoven is alive and well and living wherever classical music is played.

Which brings us to the next life-death problem. There are those who say that within five years there will be no classicial recordings made in the United States. An article in Newsweek recently stated that classical record sales have nosedived in this country because of "youth turned off by the concert hall's irrelevance, a shrinking number of serious-record stores, a union that has almost priced orchestras out of the market, radio stations dominated by pop releases, a record-buying public that only responds to a few glittering names, a repertory glutted by old war-horses."

* * *

OUR OWN Boston Symphony Orchestra severed its relationship with RCA Victor last year to go with Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft. The BSO hinted that it wanted out of its long-standing RCA contract because the American outfit would not be doing any classical recordings in a few years. But it was no secret that RCA was not having much luck selling BSO recordings, that it was putting pressure on the BSO to hire a glamorous conductor and that the only reason it had stuck with the BSO was that the Pops recordings were a big seller. Arthur Fiedler's birthday gift to the BSO was a letter stating that he, too, would sign with DGG.

* * *

WARREN SYER, publisher of High Fidelity magazine in Great Barrington, says there is no doubt that the classical recording business is in trouble in this country, but this has nothing to do with classical music. High Fidelity's circulation has soared to 200,000, which indicates that there are a lot of people who take their music seriously. Advertising from recording companies, however, has dropped from 22 per cent to 10 per cent, which means that the equipment people are the ones who are supporting the reviews, etc.

Some feel that a great deal of the problem lies in the fact that most of the recording companies are now run by lawyers or accountants, men who came up through the business office rather than the talent side. These men are interested only in the numbers, and if classical records seem soft, then they pull back rather than attempt to charge forward.

* * *

AND WHEN WERE you last able to ask a clerk in a record store a question about classical music and get an answer? There was a time when you would hear a theme on the radio, go in a record store and hum it and the clerk would be able to identify the piece and get the record for you. Try it now and see what happens.

Also, the public is not interested in contemporary classical music. It is almost impossible to draw a crowd to a concert hall for contemporary compositions, let alone sell anybody a recording of them. Aaron Copland is about the last of the contemporary composers who writes music that sells, and they just celebrated his 70th birthday.

Some people maintain that classical music is dying because the younger generation associates it with the Establishment and puts it down, but Syer says his people go around the country to all the colleges, and they hear an amazing amount of classical music coming out of the dorm windows. This is a rather informal survey, to be sure, but it does indicate a positive attitude.

* * *

TANGLEWOOD DREW some 193,000 people to its 24 classical concerts this summer, as compared to 57,000 to the three Contemporary Trends evenings. Thus, some 20 per cent of its gate was contemporary. The classical contemporary concerts drew only a few hundred hardy souls to their evenings. Which indicates that Rock is in and psuedo-goofy is out.

Happy birthday, Ludwig, wherever you are.

Memorial concert Sunday

Final weekend at Tanglewood

The final weekend of 1970 Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins Friday evening, August 21, at 9 p.m. in the Shed with Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller conducting and violinist Paul Zukofsky as soloist. The program opens with Wagner's Rienzi overture, followed by the Szymanowski Violin concerto no. 1, with Mr. Zukofsky. Following intermission, Mr. Schuller conducts his own composition, Spectra. Concluding the program is Scriabin's Poem of ecstacy.

The Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in the Shed presents pianist Alexia Weissenberg performing Bach's Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue in D minor and Chopin's Sonata in B minor. Weekend Preludes are free to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert.

The final Open Rehearsal of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place in the Shed, Saturday morning at 10.30 a.m. These Open Rehearsals offer a relaxed look at the Orchestra, conductor and soloists preparing the Berkshire Festival Music. Seats are unreserved, $2.50 each, and are available to the general public at the box office the morning of the rehearsal. The admission charged benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Saturday evening at 8.30 p.m. in the Shed, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony with piano soloist Alexis Weissenberg. The program includes the Lutoslawski Concerto for orchestra, the Rachmaninov Piano concerto no. 3 with Mr. Weissenberg as piano soloist and the Bartok Concerto for orchestra.

For the final concert of the 1970 Tanglewood season, Sunday afternoon, August 23, at 2.30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa conducts a performance of the Berlioz Requiem in memory of the late Boston Symphony Orchestra Music Director, Charles Munch. Tenor Leopold Simoneau is soloist with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Framingham Choral Society and the M.I.T. Glee Club.

Dr. Munch, the Orchestra's Music Director from 1949 to 1962, was born in Strasbourg, France. Comingfrom a musical family, he first contemplated a medical career and went to Paris at the age of twenty-one to study medicine, but found himself devoting more and more time to playing the violin.

In 1932, Charles Munch settled in Paris and began his conducting career. He founded the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris and conducted the Lamoureux Concerts. In 1937 he became conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. He conducted the Boston Symphony for the first time on December 27, 1946.

In the fall of 1949, Charles Munch succeeded Serge Koussevitzky as Music Director of the Boston Symphony.

Dr. Munch led the Orchestra on its first tour of Europe, in May of 1952, and in the spring of the following year, he and the Orchestra toured to the West Coast. In 1956, he took the Orchestra to Moscow and Leningrad, the first visit of a western orchestra to the Soviet Union. Four years later, Dr. Munch introduced the Orchestra to Japan and other Far Eastern countries.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

AUG 21 1970 New England Newsclip

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 293,557

AUG 16 1970 New England Newsclip

Last weekend at Tanglewood

The final weekend of Berkshire Festival concerts begins Friday at 9 p.m., when Gunther Schuller conducts the Boston Symphony in Wagner's "Rienzi" Overture, Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" and his own "Spectra." On the same program Paul Zukofsky appears as soloist in Szymanowski's Violin Concerto No. 1. Preceding this event is the weekend Prelude concert, which features pianist Alexis Weissenberg in works of Bach and Chopin.

Weissenberg appears also in the Saturday 8:30 p.m. concert as soloist in Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto. Seiji Ozawa conducts the program, which also includes the Bartok and Lutoslawski concertos for orchestra.

The final concert of the season, Aug. 23, at 2:30 p.m., will be devoted to a performance of the Berlioz Requiem in memory of the late Boston Symphony music director Charles Munch. Ozawa will conduct and Leopold Simoneau will appear as tenor soloist. Also taking part will be the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Framingham Choral Society and the MIT Glee Club.

Alexis Weissenberg, pianist, who will perform Rachmaninoff's Third Concerto with the Boston Symphony this Saturday at Tanglewood.

Presentations for final weekend of season at Tanglewood listed

The final weekend of the 1970 Berkshire Festival Concerts at Tanglewood, Lenox by the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins Friday evening at 9 p.m. in the Shed with Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller conducting and violinist Paul Zukofsky as soloist. The program opens with Wagner's "Rienzi" overture, followed by the Szymanowski Violin Concerto No. 1, with Mr. Zukofsky. Following intermission, Mr. Schuller conducts his own composition, "Spectra." Concluding the program is Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy."

The Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in the Shed presents pianist Alexis Weissenberg performing Bach's "Chromatic Fantasy" and "Fugue in D Minor" and Chopin's "Sonata in B Minor." Weekend Preludes are free to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert.

The final open rehearsal of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place in the Shed, Saturday morning at 10.30 a.m. These open rehearsals offer a relaxed look at the orchestra, conductor and soloists preparing the Berkshire Festival Music. Seats are unreserved and are available to the public at the box office the morning of the rehearsal. The admission charged benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Saturday evening at 8.30 p.m. in the Shed, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Symphony with piano soloist Alexis Weissenberg. The program includes the Lutoslawski Concerto for orchestra, the Rachmaninov Piano Concerto No. 3 with Mr. Weissenberg as piano soloist and the Bartok Concerto for orchestra.

For the final concert of the 1970 Tanglewood season, Sunday afternoon at 2.30 p.m. Mr. Ozawa conducts a performance of the Berlioz "Requiem" in memory of the late Boston Symphony Orchestra music director, Charles Munch. Tenor Leopold Simoneau is soloist with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Framingham Choral Society and the M.I.T. Glee Club.

Dr. Munch, the Orchestra's director from 1949 to 1962, was born in Strasbourg, France. Coming from a musical family, he first contemplated a medical career and went to Paris at the age of 21 to study medicine, but found himself devoting more and more time to playing the violin.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500

AUG 19 1970 New England Newsclip

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

AUG 18 1970 New England Newsclip

Whitestone Photo

Gunther Schuller

. . . will conduct the Boston Symphony on Friday, Aug. 21, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., in a program which includes works by Wagner, Szymanowski, Scriabin, and his own "Spectra." Violinist Paul Zukofsky will be the evening's soloist.

JEWISH ADVOCATE
BOSTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 24,000

AUG 20 1970 New England Newsclip

REVIEW
DARIEN, CO'N.
WEEKLY 4,162

BERKSHIRE COURIER
GT. BARRINGTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 3,650

AUG 20 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Begins Final Season

LENOX–The final weekend of 1970 Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins tomorrow evening, at 9 p.m. in the Shed with Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller conducting and violinist Paul Zukofsky as soloist. The program opens with Wagner's "Rienzi" overture, followed by the Szymanowski Violin concerto no. 1, with Mr. Zukofsky. Following intermission, Mr. Schuller conducts his own composition, "Spectra." Concluding the program is Scriabin's "Poem of ecstacy."

The Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in the Shed presents pianist Alexis Weissenberg performing Bach's Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue in D minor and Chopin's Sonata in B minor. Weekend Preludes are free to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert.

The final Open Rehearsal of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place in the Shed, Saturday morning at 10:30. These Open Rehearsals offer a relaxed look at the Orchestra, conductor and soloists preparing the Berkshire Festival Music. Seats are unreserved, and are available to the general public at the box office the morning of the rehearsal. The admission charged benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony with piano soloist Alexis Weissenberg. The program includes the Lutoslawski Concerto for orchestra, The Rachmaninov Piano concerto no. 3 with Mr. Weissenberg as piano soloist and the Bartok Concerto for orchestra.

For the final concert of the season, Sunday afternoon, at 2:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa conducts a performance of the Berlioz "Requiem" in memory of the late Boston Symphony Orchestra Music Director, Charles Munch. Tenor Leopold Simoneau is soloist with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Framingham Choral Society and the M.I.T. Glee Club.

NEWS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(E) 85,935

AUG 18 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Program Listed

The final week end of 1970 Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin August 21 at 9 p.m. in the Shed with Tanglewood Artistic Director and violinist Paul Zukofsky as soloist.

The program will open with Wagner's "Rienzi" overture, followed by the Szymanowski Violin Concerto No. 1, with Zukofsky. Schuller will conduct his own composition, "Spectra." concluding the program will be Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy."

The Weekend Prelude at 7 p.m. in the Shed will present pianist Alexis Weissenberg performing Bach's Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue in D minor and Chopin's Sonata in B minor. Weekend Preludes are free to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert.

The final open rehearsal of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in the Shed, August 22 at 10:30 p.m. These open rehearsals offer a relaxed look at the orchestra, conductor and soloists preparing the Berkshire Festival Music. Seats are unreserved and are available to the general public at the box office the morning of the rehearsal. The admission charged benefits the orchestra's pension fund.

On August 22 at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Seiji Ozawa will conduct the Boston Symphony with piano solist Alexis Weissenberg. The program will include the Lutoslawski Concerto for orchestra, the Rachmaninov Piano Concerto No. 3 with Weissenberg as piano soloist and the Bartok Concerto for orchestra.

For the final concert of the 1970 Tanglewood season August 23, at 2:30 p.m. Seiji Ozawa will conduct a performance of the Berlioz Requiem in memory of the late Boston Symphony Orchestra Music Director, Charles Munch. Tenor Leopold Simoneau will be soloist with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Framingham Choral Society and the M.I.T. Glee Club.

Dr. Munch, the Orchestra's Music Director from 1949 to 1962, was born in Strasbourg, France. Coming from a musical family, he first contemplated a medical career and went to Paris at the age of 21 to study medicine, but found himself devoting more and more time to playing the violin.

In 1932, Charles Munch settled in Paris and began his conducting career. He founded the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris and conducted the Lamoureux Concerts. In 1937 he became conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. He conducted the Boston Symphony for the first time on Dec. 27, 1946.

100 Tanglewood

Ozawa and Schuller for Final Weekend

The final Open Rehearsal of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place in the Shed, Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m. These Open Rehearsals offer a relaxed look at the orchestra, conductor and soloists preparing the Berkshire Festival music. Seats are unreserved, $2.50 each, and are available to the general public at the box office the morning of the rehearsal. The admission charged benefits the orchestra's pension fund.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony with piano soloist Alexis Weissenberg. The program includes the Lutoslawski "Concerto for Orchestra", the Rachmaninov "Piano Concerto No. 3" with Mr. Weissenberg as piano soloist and the Bartok "Concerto for Orchestra."

For the final concert of the 1970 Tanglewood season, Sunday afternoon, August 23, at 2:30 pm, Seiji Ozawa conducts a performance of the Berlioz "Requiem" in memory of the late Boston Symphony Orchestra Music Director, Charles Munch. Tenor Leopold Simoneau is soloist with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Framingham Choral Society and the MIT Glee Club.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 22 1970 New England Newsclip

In Festival Finale

Alexis Weissenberg

The final weekend of 1970 Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins Friday evening, August 21, at 9 pm in the Shed with Gunther Schuller conducting and violinist Paul Zukofsky as soloist. The Weekend Prelude at 7 pm in the Shed presents pianist Alexis Weissenberg performing Bach's Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue in D minor and Chopin's Sonata in B minor.

The final Open Rehearsal of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place in the Shed, Saturday morning at 10:30 am. Saturday evening at 8:30 pm in the Shed, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony with piano soloist Alexis Weissenberg. The program includes the Lutoslawski Concerto for orchestra, the Rachmaninov Piano concerto no. 3 with Mr Weissenberg as piano soloist and the Bartok Concerto for orchestra.

For the final concert of the 1970 Tanglewood season, Sunday afternoon, August 23, at 2:30 pm, Seiji Ozawa conducts a performance of the Berlioz Requiem in memory of the late Boston Symphony Orchestra Music Director, Charles Munch. Tenor Leopold Simoneau is soloist with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Framingham Choral Society and the M.I.T. Glee Club.

BEE
NEWTOWN, CONN.
WEEKLY 11,000

AUG 21 1970 New England Newsclip

RECORD-AMERICAN
BOSTON, MASS.
(M&E) 433,300

AUG 19 1970 New England Newsclip

Hub Symphony At Tanglewood

Gunther Schuller will conduct the Boston Symphony on Friday at Tanglewood, Lenox, in a program which includes works by Wagner, Szymanowski, Scriabin and his own "Spectra." Violinist Paul Zukofsky will be the evening's soloist.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SYRACUSE HERALD AMERICAN
Sunday, August 16, 1970

At Berkshire

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS. — The final weekend of 1970 Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins Friday at 9 p.m. in the Shed with Tanglewood artistic director Gunther Schuller conducting and violinist Paul Zukofsky as solosit.

The program opens with Wagner's "Rienzi Overture," followed by the Szymanowski Violin Concerto No. 1, with Zukofsy. Following intermission, Schuller conducts his own composition, "Spectra." Concluding the program is Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy."

The weekend prelude at 7 p.m. in the Shed presents pianist Alexis Weissenberg performing Bach's Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue in D minor and Chopin's Sonata in B minor.

ALEXIS WEISSENBERG

The final open rehearsal of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestera takes place in the Shed Saturday at 10:30 p.m.

Saturday evening at 8:30 p.m. in the Shed, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony with piano soloist Alexis Weissenberg. The program incles the Lutoslawski Concerto for orchestera, the Rachmaninov Piano Concerto No. 3 with Weissenberg as piano soloist and Bartok Concerto for orchestra.

For the final concert of the 1970 Tanglewood season next Sunday at 2:30 p.m., Seiji Ozawa conducts a performance of the Berlioz "Requiem" in memory of the late Boston Symphony Orchestra Music Director, Charles Munch. Tenor Leopold Simoneau is solist with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Framingham Choral Society and the M. I. T. Glee Club.

Munch, the orchestra's music director from 1949 to 1962, was born in Strasbourg, France. Coming from a musical family, he first contemplated a medical career and went to Paris at the age of twenty-one to study medicine, but found himself devoting more and more time to playing the violin.

In 1932, Munch settled in Paris and began his conducting career. He founded the Orchestra Symphonique de Paris and conducted the Lamoreux Concerts. In 1937 he became director of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. He conducted the Boston Symphony for the first time on December 27, 1946.

In the fall of 1949, Munch succeeded Serge Koussevitzky As music director of the Boston Symphony.

Munch led the orchestra on is first tour of Europe, in May of 1952, and in the spring of the following year, he and the Orchestra toured to the West Coast. In 1956, he took the orchestra to Moscow and Leningrad, the first visit of a western orchestra to the Soviet Union. Four years later, Munch introduced the Orchestra to Japan and other Far Eastern countries.

PAUL ZUKOFSKY

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ITHACA NEWS HERALD
August 21, 1970

Final Week At Tanglewood

The final weekend of 1970 Berkshire Festival Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins Friday evening. August 21, at 9 pm in the Shed with Tanglewood Artistic Director Gunther Schuller conducting and violinist Paul Zukofsky as soloist. The program opens with Wagner's Rienzi overture, followed by the Szymanowski Violin concerto no. 1, with Mr. Zukofsky. Following intermission, Mr. Schuller conducts his own composition, Spectra. Concluding the program is Scriabin's Poem of ecstacy.

The Weekend Prelude at 7 pm in the Shed presents pianist Alexis Weissenberg performing Bach's Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue in D minor and Chopin's Sonata in B minor. Weekend Preludes are free to ticketholders of the 9 p. m. concert.

The final Open Rehearsal of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place in the Shed, Saturday morning at 10:30 a. m. These Open Rehearsals offer a relaxed look at the Orchestra, conductor and soloists preparing the Berkshire Festival Music. Seats are unreserved, and are available to the general public at the box office the morning of the rehearsal. The admission charged benefits the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Saturday evening at 8:30 pm in the Shed, Seiji Ozawa conducts the Boston Symphony with piano soloist Alexis Weissenberg. The program includes the Lutoslawski Concerto for orchestra, the Rachmaninov Piano concerto no. 3 with Mr. Weissenberg as piano soloist and the Bartok Concerto for orchestra.

For the final concert of the 1970 Tanglewood season, Sunday afternoon, August 23, at 2:30 pm, Seiji Ozawa conducts a performance of the Berlioz Requiem in memory of the late Boston Symphony Orchestra Music Director, Charles Munch. Tenor Leopold Simoneau is soloist with the Tanglewood Festival Chor, the Framingham Choral Society and the M. I. T. Glee Club.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
AUG 15 1970 New England Newsclip

Last Tanglewood Concert Features Berlioz 'Requiem'

TANGLEWOOD — The final weekend of 1970 Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins Friday evening, Aug. 21, at 9 p.m. in the Shed with Tanglewood artistic director, Gunther Schuller, conducting and violinist Paul Zukofsky as soloist. The program opens with Wagner's "Rienzi" overture, followed by the Szymanowski violin concerto No. 1, with Zukofsky. Following intermission, Schuller conducts his own composition, "Spectra." Concluding the program is Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy."

Bach's Fantasy

The weekend prelude at 7 p.m. in the Shed presents pianist Alexis Weissenberg performing Bach's Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue in D-Minor and Chopin's Sonata in B-Minor. Weekend preludes are free to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert.

The final open rehearsal of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place in the Shed, Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m. These open rehearsals offer a relaxed look at the orchestra, conductor and soloists. Seats are unreserved, and are available to the general public at the boxoffice the morning of the rehearsal. The admission charged benefits the orchestra's pension fund.

The Saturday evening concert at 8:30 in the Shed presents Seiji Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony with piano soloist Weissenberg. The program includes the Lutoslawski concerto for orchestra, the Rachmaninoff Piano concerto No. 3, with Weissenberg as piano soloist, and the Bartok concerto for orchestra.

Dedicated to Munch

For the final concert of the 1970 Tanglewood season on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 23, at 2:30, Seiji Ozawa conducts a performance of the Berlioz "Requiem" in memory of the late Boston Symphony Orchestra music director, Charles Munch. Tenor Leopold Simoneau is soloist with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Framingham Choral Society and the MIT Glee Club.

Dr. Munch, the orchestra's music director from 1949 to 1962, was born in Strasbourg, France. Coming from a musical family, he first contemplated a medical career and went to Paris at the age of 21 to study medicine, but found himself devoting more and more time to playing the violin.

In 1932, Charles Munch settled in Paris and began his conducting career. He founded the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris and conducted the Lamoureux Concerts. In 1937 he became conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. He conducted the Boston Symphony for the first time Dec. 27, 1946.

In the fall of 1949, Charles Munch succeeded Serge Koussevitzky as music director of the Boston Symphony. He led the orchestra on its first tour of Europe, in May of 1952, and in the following spring, he and the orchestra toured to the West Coast. In 1956, he took the orchestra to Moscow and Leningrad, the first visit of a Western orchestra to the Soviet Union. Four years later, Dr. Munch introduced the orchestra to Japan and other Far Eastern countries.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557
AUG 23 1970 New England Newsclip

101

Music

Grand moment at Tanglewood

by Harry Neville

For today's final concert of the Tanglewood season Seiji Ozawa and the Boston Symphony are performing one of the grandest monuments of 19th century romanticism, the Berlioz Requiem or "Grande Messe des Morts," to use the composer's original French designation.

The Requiem, which dates from 1837, is one of Berlioz's most famous works. Some would say too that it is one of his greatest works, and the composer himself shared the latter opinion. In a letter written toward the end of his life he said: "If I were threatened with the destruction of the whole of my works save one, I would ask mercy for the Requem."

Undoubtedly the single factor that has contributed most to the Requiem's fame (or notoriety, as some would have it) is the size of the forces required to perform it. Berlioz's specifications, which are almost modest when compared with his original intentions, call for the following: a chorus of 80 sopranos and altos, 60 tenors and 70 basses; an orchestra of 50 violins, 20 violas, 20 cellos, 18 double basses, four flutes, two oboes, two English horns, eight bassoons, four clarinets, 12 horns, four cornets, 12 trumpets, 16 trombones, six tubas, 16 tympani, two bass drums, four gongs and five pairs of cymbals.

These numbers were only relative, stated the composer, adding that the chorus might be doubled or tripled with proportionate increases in the orchestra. The most famous movement of all, the "Tuba mirum," utilizes, in addition to the principal orchestra, four small brass orchestras which are positioned at the corners of the main body.

The remarkable thing is that with such a gigantic ensemble at his disposal, Berlioz exercised great restraiint and discretion in his use of it. Although the Requiem has acquired a reputation for excessive decibel content, the fact of the matter is that a comparatively small part of the writing calls for unusually loud volumes. Berlioz certainly aimed to achieve colossal effects in the Requiem but his notion of the colossal by no means relied on sheer din. In writing about another of his large works, the "Funeral and Triumphal Symphony," he observed that a vast ensemble would project vastness not only in its immense sound but in its silences as well: "its repose would be as majestic as the ocean."

Despite the ritual form of the Requiem it may be doubted that for Berlioz it expressed any religious or spiritual content. The composer had no personal faith, yet he was deeply attracted by the aesthetics of religious ritual and the Catholic Mass for the Dead provided a perfect dramatic scaffolding for his own romantically melancholy feelings about mortality.

The idea of resurrection was for Berlioz an opportunity for dramatic utterance of the most grandiose kind in which the brass convey a picture of terror and apocalypse. Yet for the most part the score is brooding and introspective in nature—a picture of death unrelieved by any ray of hope.

Seiji Ozawa conducts the Berlioz Requiem today at 2:30 p.m. in the final concert of the season at Tanglewood. Given in memory of Boston Symphony Music Director Charles Munch, the concert will include the participation of tenor Leopold Simoneau, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Framingham Choral Society and MIT Glee Club.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
NICHI BEI TIMES
D. 7,000
AUG 15 1970

BUSY SCHEDULE FOR CONDUCTOR OZAWA BEFORE S.F. OPENING

Seiji Ozawa, who takes his post as conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony for the 1970-71 season beginning Dec. 2, is apparently a man of iron.

He is currently guest conducting with the Berlin Philharmonic in Salzburg, Austria, until Aug. 17.

On Aug. 22 and 23 he will appear at the Tanglewood Music Festival in Lenox, Mass., with the program for the latter concert consisting of a special performance of the Berlioz Requiem in memory of Charles Munch.

Maestro Ozawa returns to Salzburg on Aug. 27 to conduct the orchestra for a presentation of the Mozart opera, "Cosi fan Tutte."

New York Concerts Next

Immediately after this performance Maestro Ozawa flies to New York to begin a tour of Japan and Korea conducting the New York Philharmonic from Aug. 30 through Sept. 10. A four-day tour of the United States with this same orchestra begins Sept. 14.

He will then conduct the Dresden Philharmonic in Dresden, Germany, for two days, Oct. 2 and 3, and then it's off to Berlin to conduct the Berlin Philharmonic for one concert.

On Oct. 9 and 10 Maestro Ozawa will be busy recording Prokofieff's Second Piano Concerto with the Orchestra de Paris for Angel Records.

San Francisco on Dec. 2

The guest soloist will be Alexis Weissenberg, who, incidentally, will be the guest soloist with the San Francisco Symphony April 21, 23 and 24, 1971.

And as if all that were not enough he will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony in Boston and New York from Nov. 3 through 21.

From there it's on to San Francisco to prepare for the much-awaited opening of the San Francisco Symphony season Dec. 2.

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654
AUG 20 1970 New England Newsclip

Framingham Choral Group Will Sing at Tanglewood

FRAMINGHAM — The Framingham Choral Society, John Oliver, conductor, will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday at 2:30 p.m. in the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

The Berlioz Requiem, conducted by Seiji Ozawa, with Leopold Simoneau as soloist will be performed in memory of Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Music Director from 1949-1962.

Tanglewood is an estate of 210 acres in the Berkshire Hills, easily accessible by turnpikes from New York City and Boston. In the 19th century it was a private estate on which Nathaniel Hawthorne lived and wrote.

Given to the Boston

The Sunday concert of the Berlioz Requiem which concludes the 1970 season will be broadcast over WGBH-FM at the time of the performance.

The Choral Society will have 165 members and the group will be augmented with another 15 from musical groups from M.I.T.

A large delegation from Framingham has indicated it will be on hand for the program.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 66,387
AUG 15 1970 New England Newsclip

MUSIC

TANGLEWOOD—
Lenox
Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, artistic directors. Leonard Bernstein, advisor.

Tomorrow
2:30 p.m., Shed. Beethoven Program. Max Rudolf, conductor, Jerome Lowenthal, pianist.

Friday
7 p.m., Shed. Weekend Prelude: Bach, Chopin. Alexis Weissenberg, pianist. 9 p.m., Shed. Wagner, Szymanowski, Schuller, Scriabin. Gunther Schuller, conductor. Paul Zukofsky, violinist.

Next Saturday
10:30 a.m., Shed. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Open Rehearsal. 8:30 p.m., Shed. Bartok, Rachmaninoff, Lutoslawski. Seiji Ozawa conductor, Alexis Weissenberg, pianist.

Next Sunday
2:30 p.m., Shed. Tanglewood Fest. Chorus, Framingham Choral Society, M.I.T. Glee Club. Seiji Ozawa conductor, Leopold Simoneau, tenor. Performing Berlioz's "Requiem".

AUG 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Week

Contemporary and traditional classical music is featured during the concluding week at Tanglewood Festival at Lenox, Mass.

TODAY — Shed, 2:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducting. All Beethoven program: The 'consecration of the house' overture; Piano Concerto No. 1, Jerome Lowenthal, pianist; and Sym. No. 5.

TUESDAY — Contemporary rock concert. Shed, 6 p.m.

FRIDAY — Weekend prelude, 7 p.m., shed, Alexis Weissenberg, pianist. Concert, 9 p.m., Gunther Schuller conducting. Weber's Der Freischutz overture; Szymanowski's violin concerto No. 1, Paul Zukovsky, soloist; Schuller's Spectra; and Scriabin's Poem of ecstasy.

SATURDAY — Open rehearsal, 10:30 a.m. Concert, 8:30 p.m., shed. Seiji Ozawa conducting. Lutoslawski's Concerto for orchestra; Rachmaninov's Piano concerto No. 3, Alexis Weissenberg, soloist; and Bartok's Concerto for orchestra.

SUNDAY — Shed, 2:30 p.m. Seiji Ozawa conducting. Berlioz' Requiem. Orchestra, soloists, chorus. Last concert this season.

Fromm week festival of modern music runs Sunday night through Thursday.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175
AUG 22 1970 New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD, Berkshire Festival, Lenox, Mass., presents Boston Symphony in Lutoslawski, Rachmaninov, Bartok program, 8:30 p.m. today, and Berlioz program, 2:30 p.m. Sunday, Ozawa conducts. Tickets: $4-$8.50. Open rehearsal in the shed, 10:30 a.m. Saturday, unreserved seats, $3. Information: 1-413-637-1600.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 23 1970 New England Newsclip

Music

Grand moment at Tanglewood

by Harry Neville

For today's final concert of the Tanglewood season Seiji Ozawa and the Boston Symphony are performing one of the grandest monuments of 19th century romanticism, the Berlioz Requiem or "Grande Messe des Morts," to use the composer's original French designation.

The Requiem, which dates from 1837, is one of Berlioz's most famous works. Some would say too that it is one of his greatest works, and the composer himself shared the latter opinion. In a letter written toward the end of his life he said: "If I were threatened with the destruction of the whole of my works save one, I would ask mercy for the Requem."

Undoubtedly the single factor that has contributed most to the Requiem's fame (or notoriety, as some would have it) is the size of the forces required to perform it. Berlioz's specifications, which are almost modest when compared with his original intentions, call for the following: a chorus of 80 sopranos and altos, 60 tenors and 70 basses; an orchestra of 50 violins, 20 violas, 20 cellos, 18 double basses, four flutes, two oboes, two English horns, eight bassoons, four clarinets, 12 horns, four cornets, 12 trumpets, 16 trombones, six tubas, 16 tympani, two bass drums, four gongs and five pairs of cymbals.

These numbers were only relative, stated the composer, adding that the chorus might be doubled or tripled with proportionate increases in the orchestra. The most famous movement of all, the "Tuba mirum," utilizes, in addition to the principal orchestra, four small brass orchestras which are positioned at the corners of the main body.

The remarkable thing is that with such a gigantic ensemble at his disposal, Berlioz exercised great restraiint and discretion in his use of it. Although the Requiem has acquired a reputation for excessive decibel content, the fact of the matter is that a comparatively small part of the writing calls for unusually loud volumes. Berlioz certainly aimed to achieve colossal effects in the Requiem but his notion of the colossal by no means relied on sheer din. In writing about another of his large works, the "Funeral and Triumphal Symphony," he observed that a vast ensemble would project vastness not only in its immense sound but in its silences as well: "its repose would be as majestic as the ocean."

Despite the ritual form of the Requiem it may be doubted that for Berlioz it expressed any religious or spiritual content. The composer had no personal faith, yet he was deeply attracted by the aesthetics of religious ritual and the Catholic Mass for the Dead provided a perfect dramatic scaffolding for his own romantically melancholy feelings about mortality.

The idea of resurrection was for Berlioz an opportunity for dramatic utterance of the most grandiose kind in which the brass convey a picture of terror and apocalypse. Yet for the most part the score is brooding and introspective in nature—a picture of death unrelieved by any ray of hope.

Seiji Ozawa conducts the Berlioz Requiem today at 2:30 p.m. in the final concert of the season at Tanglewood. Given in memory of Boston Symphony Music Director Charles Munch, the concert will include the participation of tenor Leopold Simoneau, the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, Framingham Choral Society and MIT Glee Club.

Last Tanglewood Concert Features Berlioz 'Requiem'

TANGLEWOOD — The final weekend of 1970 Berkshire Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins Friday evening, Aug. 21, at 9 p.m. in the Shed with Tanglewood artistic director, Gunther Schuller, conducting and violinist Paul Zukofsky as soloist. The program opens with Wagner's "Rienzi" overture, followed by the Szymanowski violin concerto No. 1, with Zukofsky. Following intermission, Schuller conducts his own composition, "Spectra." Concluding the program is Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy."

Bach's Fantasy

The weekend prelude at 7 p.m. in the Shed presents pianist Alexis Weissenberg performing Bach's Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue in D-Minor and Chopin's Sonata in B-Minor. Weekend preludes are free to ticketholders of the 9 p.m. Boston Symphony concert.

The final open rehearsal of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place in the Shed, Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m. These open rehearsals offer a relaxed look at the orchestra, conductor and soloists. Seats are unreserved, and are available to the general public at the boxoffice the morning of the rehearsal. The admission charged benefits the orchestra's pension fund.

The Saturday evening concert at 8:30 in the Shed presents Seiji Ozawa conducting the Boston Symphony with piano soloist Weissenberg. The program includes the Lutoslawski concerto for orchestra, the Rachmaninoff Piano concerto No. 3, with Weissenberg as piano soloist, and the Bartok concerto for orchestra.

Dedicated to Munch

For the final concert of the 1970 Tanglewood season on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 23, at 2:30, Seiji Ozawa conducts a performance of the Berlioz "Requiem" in memory of the late Boston Symphony Orchestra music director, Charles Munch. Tenor Leopold Simoneau is soloist with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus, the Framingham Choral Society and the MIT Glee Club.

Dr. Munch, the orchestra's music director from 1949 to 1962, was born in Strasbourg, France. Coming from a musical family, he first contemplated a medical career and went to Paris at the age of 21 to study medicine, but found himself devoting more and more time to playing the violin.

In 1932, Charles Munch settled in Paris and began his conducting career. He founded the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris and conducted the Lamoureux Concerts. In 1937 he became conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. He conducted the Boston Symphony for the first time Dec. 27, 1946.

In the fall of 1949, Charles Munch succeeded Serge Koussevitzky as music director of the Boston Symphony. He led the orchestra on its first tour of Europe, in May of 1952, and in the following spring, he and the orchestra toured to the West Coast. In 1956, he took the orchestra to Moscow and Leningrad, the first visit of a Western orchestra to the Soviet Union. Four years later, Dr. Munch introduced the orchestra to Japan and other Far Eastern countries.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
NICHI BEI TIMES
D. 7,000

AUG 15 1970

BUSY SCHEDULE FOR CONDUCTOR OZAWA BEFORE S.F. OPENING

Seiji Ozawa, who takes his post as conductor and music director of the San Francisco Symphony for the 1970-71 season beginning Dec. 2, is apparently a man of iron.

He is currently guest conducting with the Berlin Philharmonic in Salzburg, Austria, until Aug. 17.

On Aug. 22 and 23 he will appear at the Tanglewood Music Festival in Lenox, Mass., with the program for the latter concert consisting of a special performance of the Berlioz Requiem in memory of Charles Munch.

Maestro Ozawa returns to Salzburg on Aug. 27 to conduct the orchestra for a presentation of the Mozart opera, "Cosi fan Tutte."

New York Concerts Next

Immediately after this performance Maestro Ozawa flies to New York to begin a tour of Japan and Korea conducting the New York Philharmonic from Aug. 30 through Sept. 10. A four-day tour of the United States with this same orchestra begins Sept. 14.

He will then conduct the Dresden Philharmonic in Dresden, Germany, for two days, Oct. 2 and 3, and then it's off to Berlin to conduct the Berlin Philharmonic for one concert.

On Oct. 9 and 10 Maestro Ozawa will be busy recording Prokofieff's Second Piano Concerto with the Orchestra de Paris for Angel Records.

San Francisco on Dec. 2

The guest soloist will be Alexis Weissenberg, who, incidentally, will be the guest soloist with the San Francisco Symphony April 21, 23 and 24, 1971.

And as if all that were not enough he will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony in Boston and New York from Nov. 3 through 21.

From there it's on to San Francisco to prepare for the much-awaited opening of the San Francisco Symphony season Dec. 2.

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,000

AUG 20 1970 New England Newsclip

Framingham Choral Group Will Sing at Tanglewood

FRAMINGHAM — The Framingham Choral Society, John Oliver, conductor, will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Sunday at 2:30 p.m. in the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

The Berlioz Requiem, conducted by Seiji Ozawa, with Leopold Simoneau as soloist will be performed in memory of Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Music Director from 1949-1962.

Tanglewood is an estate of 210 acres in the Berkshire Hills, easily accessible by turnpikes from New York City and Boston. In the 19th century it was a private estate on which Nathaniel Hawthorne lived and wrote.

Given to the Boston The Sunday concert of the Berlioz Requiem which concludes the 1970 season will be broadcast over WGBH-FM at the time of the performance.

The Choral Society will have 165 members and the group will be augmented with another 15 from musical groups from M.I.T.

A large delegation from Framingham has indicated it will be on hand for the program.

PATRIOT-LEDGER
QUINCY, MASS.
(E) 68,527

AUG 15 1970 New England Newsclip

MUSIC

TANGLEWOOD—
Lenox
Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller, artistic directors. Leonard Bernstein, advisor.

Tomorrow
2:30 p.m., Shed. Beethoven Program. Max Rudolf, conductor, Jerome Lowenthal, pianist.

Friday
7 p.m., Shed. Weekend Prelude: Bach, Chopin. Alexis Weissenberg, pianist. 9 p.m., Shed. Wagner, Szymanowski, Schuller, Scriabin. Gunther Schuller, conductor. Paul Zukolsky, violinist.

Next Saturday
10:30 a.m., Shed. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Open Rehearsal. 8:30 p.m., Shed. Bartok, Rachmaninoff, Lutoslawski. Seiji Ozawa conductor, Alexis Weissenberg, pianist.

Next Sunday
2:30 p.m., Shed. Tanglewood Fest. Chorus, Framingham Choral Society, M.I.T. Glee Club. Seiji Ozawa conductor, Leopold Simoneau, tenor, Performing Berlioz's "Requiem".

Tanglewood Week

Contemporary and traditional classical music is featured during the concluding week at Tanglewood Festival at Lenox, Mass.

TODAY — Shed, 2:30 p.m. William Steinberg conducting. All Beethoven program: The 'consecration of the house' overture; Piano Concerto No. 1, Jerome Lowenthal, pianist; and Sym. No. 5.

TUESDAY — Contemporary rock concert. Shed, 6 p.m.

FRIDAY — Weekend prelude, 7 p.m., shed, Alexis Weissenberg, pianist. Concert, 9 p.m., Gunther Schuller conducting. Weber's Der Freischutz overture; Szymanowski's violin concerto No. 1, Paul Zukovsky, soloist; Schuller's Spectra; and Scriabin's Poem of ecstasy.

SATURDAY — Open rehearsal, 10:30 a.m. Concert, 8:30 p.m., shed. Seijl Ozawa conducting. Lutoslawski's Concerto for orchestra; Rachmaninov's Piano concerto No. 3, Alexis Weissenberg, soloist; and Bartok's Concerto for orchestra.

SUNDAY — Shed, 2:30 p.m. Seiji Ozawa conducting. Berlioz' Requiem. Orchestra, soloists, chorus. Last concert this season.

Fromm week festival of modern music runs Sunday night through Thursday.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
(E) 107,575 (S) 125,175

AUG 22 1970 New England Newsclip

TANGLEWOOD, Berkshire Festival, Lenox, Mass., presents Boston Symphony in Lutoslawski, Rachmaninov, Bartok program, 8:30 p.m. today, and Berlioz program, 2:30 p.m. Sunday, Ozawa conducts. Tickets: $4-$8.50. Open rehearsal in the shed, 10:30 a.m. Saturday, unreserved seats, $3. Information: 1-413-637-1600.

Clemens Kalischer

Seiji Ozawa, who is conducting the season's final concert at Tanglewood today, with his wife Vera
"I kept thinking of Japan as such a sweet country. But Japan was really not that sweet"

Ozawa: 'I Do Not Like Interviews'

By JOAN PEYSER

LENOX, MASS.

SEIJI OZAWA, born 35 years ago in Manchuria, is a rising star in the western musical world. This summer he assumed Erich Leinsdorf's position as director of Tanglewood's concert season and, in the fall, he will take over Josef Krips's post as conductor of the San Francisco Symphony—his first permanent conductorship in the United States. Ozawa not only treats music of the past with care and musicianship, but he also conducts contemporary works by Messiaen and Ligeti in a clean, yet interesting way. Clean performances of this music are often dry; interesting ones are frequently sloppy. Ozawa's ability and diplomacy have earned him very prestigious jobs at a remarkably young age.

*

I interviewed the conductor one afternoon in the Green Room of Tanglewood's Shed and learned virtually nothing from the interview except that he is an aloof, controlling man.

This is the sequence of events:

I arrived at Tanglewood's Main Gate and was greeted by Marvin Schofer, the Boston Symphony Orchestra press officer; David Levenson, a member of the press staff, and Clemens Kalischer, the photographer assigned to the story. To the right of us was the cafeteria, to the left the Tanglewood Shed. Schofer left us to go to the cafeteria where Ozawa was having lunch in order to escort him to the Shed. Kalischer suggested we remain where we were because the two men would have to pass us. Levenson blanched. "Ozawa wants you waiting in the Green Room," he said. We acquiesced to the formal conditions and walked over by ourselves.

Outside the Green Room we met Mary Smith, concert manager of the B.S.O. I told her I needed one hour and a half to interview Ozawa and had just learned from Levenson that only one hour had been set aside. Miss Smith said Ozawa would never have agreed to an hour and a half and objected even to an hour, but she added that his afternoon was free and that if the interview went smoothly, she was certain he could be persuaded to stay.

I began to feel uneasy; it is unpleasant to beg for time.

Levenson, Kalischer and I were talking in the Green Room when the door was flung open; Ozawa, accompanied by Schofer, rushed into the room. He seemed out of breath, smiled pleasantly, and kept running his fingers through his mass of long black hair. He was dressed like an American swinger: tight black cotton pants, black turtleneck shirt, navy blue blazer and espadrilles without socks. He said he had just finished hot dogs for lunch.

A few minutes later and not a bit out of breath, Vera Ozawa glided into the room. The conductor's wife sat down in a corner, picked up a book from a nearby table, and flipped through its pages during her husband's interview. Her skin was adorned with heavy eye make-up, her fingers with several oversized rings. She wore black patent shoes with chunky heels, black turtleneck sweater with a leather belt slung low around her waist and a lightweight suede jacket over slightly flared dungarees. Mrs. Ozawa identified herself as a writer. Her husband added proudly that she was a poet. She's also known as a model who owns a boutique in Tokyo.

The thin, agile conductor sank into the only large, comfortable chair in the room. Schofer said that, in accordance with Ozawa's wishes, Levenson would stay throughout the interview. I objected to this, explaining that both Ozawa and I would be inhibited by Levenson's presence. But the conductor would not budge. I asked him why he was so adamant. Schofer quipped: "That's the first question of the interview." Then he left the Shed; Levenson, the photographer and Mrs. Ozawa stayed. Ozawa and I proceeded to embark on a singularly guarded, superficial interview. We went through a formal ritual—comparable to a Noh drama—in which the conductor recited many facts before his seemingly uninterested wife, a Tanglewood-oriented publicity man, the Times's photographer and myself.

"I do not like interviews," Ozawa began, as though he were telling me something I did not know. "Musicians," he added, "can not talk well." I disagreed and cited several recent interviews I have had with exceptionally articulate men: Boulez, Babbitt, Berio, Carter and Britten. "But they are composers," the conductor explained, "not musician musicians—performers like myself." Ozawa said he can communicate musical directions to members of the orchestra but that when he wants to compliment them, he finds it difficult. "I wish I could talk to them like Bernstein does."

Leonard Bernstein, probably the most famous American musician, has exerted an enormous influence on Ozawa. Ten years ago, after graduating from music school in Tokyo, Ozawa sought out and found Bernstein in Berlin. That summer he enrolled at Tanglewood where Bernstein had studied and taught. In 1961 Ozawa became one of Bernstein's three assistants with the New York Philharmonic and accompanied him that spring to Japan. A few years later Ozawa was appointed Bernstein's only assistant and, following the closing of Tanglewood today, will accompany him and the orchestra to Japan once again. Ozawa opened Tanglewood's festivities this summer with a devoted performance of Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms." The composer in white suit and long black cape—to embrace the conductor and exchange congratulations all around.

There is much of Bernstein in Ozawa's personal style: both dress flashily, fashionably (Ozawa wears bell bottoms on the podium). Both use the left hand during a performance to control dramatically unruly hair. Both expend themselves before the public to the point of physical exhaustion and both generate a frenetic audience response. Vera Ozawa, whom the conductor married a few years ago after a divorce from his first wife, a concert-pianist, is thin, chic, and elegantly cool, superficially similar to Felicia Bernstein.

*

But, as Ozawa himself confessed, he does not communicate like Bernstein. He even refuses to answer questions.

"Why," I asked him, "have you canceled the performance of Xenakis' 'Eonta'?"

"I will not answer that."

"What recent films or plays have you seen?"

"None."

"When did you marry Mrs. Ozawa?"

"Look it up in City Hall. If the Times is interested in my personal life, they should have sent someone from the Women's Page. Then I would not have granted an interview."

I told the conductor that people were interested in him as a man and asked whether he ever read Rex Reed's highly personal interviews on the Times's movie page. Mrs. Ozawa finally looked up. "We saw him," she said, "in 'Myra Breckinridge.'"

*

Hot dogs, Messiaen and "Myra Breckinridge"! Why did a Japanese man commit himself so vigorously to the West?

Ozawa does not think in psychological terms. He answered—with resignation—that all interviewers ask him that question and then delivered what appears to be his standard response:

"Before the war the Japanese people were interested in the West but at that time the channels were closed. Then all the money went into the war. Afterwards—with the Japanese culture dying—all eyes and ears turned to the West—to Western music, art, architecture and writing."

But the Ozawa family's adoption of the West started well before World War II. Kalsumi, the oldest of the boys, played accordion and harmonica when he was young, at a time when such instruments were rare in Japan. He pressed his father to buy a piano and all of the boys learned to play it well. Ozawa speaks with reverence of the instrument: "A pianist can do anything by himself. A pianist can make all music alone."

*

Western thought appears to have been introduced to the children through their mother, a convert to Christianity. "Although she never had us baptized," Ozawa said, "she did sing us Christian hymns and, when I was 15, sent me to live in a church for a year. We were poor and, in exchange for playing organ for services, I received my room and board. That was when I learned all the Protestant hymns and all of Bach's keyboard music. At 19, playing rugby, I broke two fingers"—Ozawa held up his index fingers—"and that stopped my piano career." Piano was replaced by composition which was soon replaced by conducting. In 1959, at 24, Ozawa conducted the Japan Radio Orchestra (NHK) and the Japan Philharmonic and was named outstanding musical talent of the year.

Ozawa then set his sights on the West and persuaded a Japanese firm to lend him a motor scooter in return for promoting it on a tour of Europe. In Besançon he won first prize in the important International Competition for Young Conductors for which Charles Munch was a judge. That was shortly before he met Bernstein in Berlin.

*

During the early 1960's, when he was in New York and Tanglewood, Ozawa says he was emotionally torn. "I did not know where I wanted to be. I kept thinking of Japan as such a sweet country. But in 1962 I went back to conduct the NHK orchestra, this time as a professional. Then I had a big problem. The musicians were accustomed to taking orders only if they came from conductors with a German accent or Russian name. I was the first Japanese conductor in its 50-year history. I thought I was doing much good—cleaning up sections of the orchestra. But the night of the first concert, not one musician came. I came but the orchestra did not. The management had cancelled the show. This was good for me to see. This was good for me to find out. Japan was really not that sweet. Now I could easily leave my country. I no longer had any choice."

As I left Tanglewood, I felt I had elicited little material on which to base a good article. Ozawa had not revealed himself at all. Was my failure due to the fact that I am a woman and Ozawa will not talk seriously to women about musical politics or music itself? (I asked which contemporary composers were his favorites. Mentioning the most disparate musicians, he carefully touched all practical bases: Xenakis, Ives, Bernstein and Schuller.) Or was my failure due to my inability to understand a Japanese man with the open, smiling face he presents to the public and the closed, tight self he holds from the world?

Later, checking some points about Ozawa's career, I came upon an account of the incident with the NHK orchestra: the musicians broke their contract with the conductor, complaining of his "arrogant attitude."

Two important questions remain: Is arrogance a defensive mask for tension and insecurity? And does Ozawa's reluctance to communicate with words suggest anything regarding his communication with music? The conductor's experience with the San Francisco Symphony should give us the final answers to both.

SUNDAY TIMES
NEW YORK, N. Y.
CIRC. 1,587,600

AUG 23 1970

New England Newsclip

Music

As I Hear It

Transmitted Contacts

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

ANYONE WHO WENT to elementary school in World War I days can recall that veterans of the Civil War came to talk to their classes on patriotic holidays. One such schoolgirl recently told me that one of the veterans, who came to talk to her class, said he had once seen Abraham Lincoln! Most of us know the number of the year in which Abe was assassinated. However, 1865 might as well have been in an even more remote century or on another planet. History has such a way of distancing itself.

* * * *

THIS FINAL WEEK'S programs at Tanglewood have several instances of what Henry James called "transmitted contacts," that is, overlapping life-spans which might have made possible contact with some of history's famous personalities. For instance, if you'll be real charitable, since Victoria was born before Beethoven died and lived beyond the year of my own birth, that makes me an old crony of good old Ludwig!

* * * *

WELL, ON THIS week's programs appear, among others, the names of Scriabin, Rachmaninoff and Bartok. All three of these composers were friends of and benefited by the interest shown them by Serge Koussevitzky. These three were by no means the only ones whose careers were advanced by the late Boston conductor. Among the others was Prokofieff. One episode in his relationship with Koussevitzky will not soon be forgotten. Koussevitzky had scheduled Prokofieff's new "Scythian Suite" for its premiere in December of 1916, but so many of the orchestral musicians were called into the Army that the work had to be postponed to the following season. The Moscow critic, Leonid Sabaneyev, unaware of the change in the program and obviously not in the concert hall, reviewed the performance.

When Koussevitzky came to Boston, his very first concert in 1924 ended with the Scriabin "Ecstasy." In 1908, Koussevitzky went to Lausanne where Scriabin, then considered the most advanced Russian composer, was living. They hit it off admirably. Scriabin needed a publisher with money. Koussevitzky had money and was looking for a composer. On the conductor's first famous Volga tour he had Scriabin as soloist in his own piano concerto in 11 cities. When Scriabin died in 1914, Koussevitzky gave a memorial cycle of four concerts for Scriabin's family at which Rachmaninoff was soloist in the piano concerto. The entire proceeds from the series were turned over to the composer's family.

* * * *

POOR BARTOK had a hard time in this country. He really was never sure of his next meal. His health was consistently bad. During one of his lowest spells, on all counts, Koussevitzky went to his New York hotel rooms and handed him a check for a commission for a composition of his own volition. The result was the "Concerto for Orchestra" which will be heard tonight at Tanglewood.

* * * *

BERLIOZ DIED four years later than Lincoln but there are few, if any, "transmitted contacts" known to link him with anyone living today by any vincula as flimsy as those we have used in these other cases. I once sat in an orchestra in which the flute player said he had once played under Gounod the very music that was on our desks at the time. Of course, the composer of Faust (1859) outlived the premiere of his most famous opera by 34 years, but my colleague's statement at the time seemed absolutely incredible.

Last year on the centennial of Berlioz's death the Victoria and Albert Museum in London held a remarkable exhibition of his life and age. The Sterling and Francine Clark Art Museum in Williamstown lent the London museum one of its Corots, "The View of the Castello Sant'Angelo, Rome," to illustrate what the famous French painter was doing while his friend and contemporary Berlioz was writing his immortal masterpieces.

Of special interest were seating plans of some of the Berlioz concerts. For example, at one in December 1840, there were reservations made for the composer's friends: Victor Hugo, Alfred de Vigny, Theophile Gautier and Honoré Balzac. In the loge for another concert were Franz Liszt, Frederic Chopin and their inamorata George Sand.

* * * *

THE PERFORMANCE tomorrow afternoon of the Berlioz "Requiem" is to honor the memory of one of the late musical directors of the Boston Symphony, Charles Munch, who did so much to revive interest in Berlioz. Beethoven's Ninth (Choral) Symphony dates from 1824, when the composer was 54. Berlioz's "Fantastique" dates from 1830, only six years later, but Berlioz was only 27. Wagner was born 10 years after Berlioz but, as Jacques Barzun points out, Berlioz is considered as of the first half of the 19th century, and Wagner of the second. The Requiem was written in 1837 before Berlioz was 34.

Berlioz's career was not dissimilar, as far as recognition is concerned, to that of Bartok who came a century later. Berlioz did have some remunerative successes. However, the records show that, when he went to Russia in 1847, Balzac lent him a fur-lined coat as the trip by sleigh, made in April, from St. Petersburg to Moscow was a four-day journey.

The big work on the initial program of this year's Tanglewood festival was the Berlioz "Fantastique" Symphony, and now the season is ending with the "Requiem." Anytime is right for a celebration, the exact year of a centennial or a year later. Already one sees mention of preparations for a great anniversary in 1976. In 1876 Richard Wagner was commissioned to write a march for the Philadelphia World Exhibition. Jacques Offenbach, the famous light-opera composer, was brought over from Paris to conduct the orchestra. From all accounts, he must have been the Arthur Fiedler of his day. More power to them.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
AUG 16 1970
New England Newsclip

A starry summer setting

BAY STATERS have a vast entertainment spectrum to explore this season as vacationers continue to be treated to the cream of show business, often as close as their "backyard."

IN LARRY JOHNSON'S collage you get a pretty good idea of the entertainment in store for Bostonians and tourists. At left, rising "pop" star Melanie (upper) and folk-singer Tom Rush (lower) close out the successful Schaefer Music Festival at Harvard Stadium tomorrow evening.

TANGLEWOOD patrons will see Seiji Ozawa (upper right) as he conducts the Boston Symphony and chorus next Sunday in a tribute to the Symphony's late music director, Charles Munch.

THE BLONDE BEAUTY of song, Peggy Lee (below right) continues to smash records at the Racquet Club of the Sheraton Hyannis Inn where she combines "pop" with jazz and the old with the new for Cape Codders, whether they be visitors or residents. Entertainment-wise, it has been a summer of content.

104

WHRB review read 9/23

Seiji Ozawa conducted two of the most ambitious programs of the Tanglewood season. On July 11, he led a concert opera performance of Mozart's Cosi Fan Tutte, and six weeks later he conducted the last of the summer concerts--a performance of the Berlioz Requiem in memory of Charles Munch.

Ozawa is relatively new to this sort of thing. His debut as an opera conductor took place last year at Salzburg, where he also did Cosi. The performance of Cosi at Tanglewood was marvelous, but the Berlioz was not--because, it seemed, Ozawa didn't know how to get out of the music what he knew was there. Ozawa's ideas about a piece of music he is conducting are perfectly clear to anyone with an unobstructed view of the conductor. Ozawa personifies the mood he is trying to create. And in the classical and neo-classical pieces he has usually performed in Boston, his presence on the podium is just about all the guide to interpretation the musicians need.

Cosi Fan Tutte, while not so famous as the three standard Mozart operas, is one of the greatest things ever composed for the stage. As Leinsdorf's recent recording shows, the music just needs a few accents in the right places to come alive--and Ozawa did more than that. He made the orchestra aware of the musical point of each phrase--not necessarily on a deep or sophisticated level, but enough so that the score itself could take over. With soloists of the order of Phyllis Curtin, George Shirley, and Tom Kraus, the result was a stunning performance.

The Berlioz Requiem, on the other hand, demands much more of the conductor. The piece has great potential, but if it is performed straight, it will sound thin, repetitive, and (despite imaginative orchestration) monotonous. It needs lots of rubato, careful gradations of sound volume, and everything else to underline variety and drama in the piece. Ozawa's behavior at the podium was such that one could see he understood Berlioz. The music, however, was monotonous. Apparently Ozawa was not comfortable with the mannerisms of French romantic tradition to the point where he could get his orchestra to actually create the piece. Only in the Sanctus, where Leopold Simoneau was superb as tenor soloist, was the performance as compelling as it might have been.

Ozawa was listed as one of two Artistic Directors to the Tanglewood Season. This may mean he is being considered for Steinberg's post when the present temporary arrangement ends. In any case he is a young conductor worth watching.

For WHRB this is Jerry Gechter.

THEATER / ARTS

Bernstein speaks about hope

By Michael Steinberg, Globe Staff

LENOX—Thirty years ago, when the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood opened for the first time, the principal speaker was the director, Serge Koussevitzky, then in his 16th year as music director of the Boston Symphony. Randall Thompson's "Hallelujah", composed for the occasion, was sung by the music center's first class of students, one of whom was Leonard Bernstein. Gunther Schuller was then a precocious teen ager, very soon to make a name for himself as a prodigiously gifted horn player and, later, composer; Seiji Ozawa was a toddler nearly 6000 miles away.

At the opening exercises yesterday afternoon at the Berkshire Music Center's 1970 session, the Thompson Hallelujah was sung at it had been at each opening since the first, conducted this time by the Boston Symphony's associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, who wasn't yet born in 1940. Gunther Schuller and Seiji Ozawa were in their first year as the center's co-directors (it was the first time that the directorship did not more or less automatically go with the music directorship of the Boston Symphony), and Leonard Bernstein, in a Koussevitzkian white suit was there as adviser to Tanglewood to give the principal address.

Bernstein's topic was "The Principle of Hope," a title borrowed from a book by Ernst Bloch, a contemporary German philosopher.

"It is Bloch's thesis," Bernstein explained, "that the principle of hope is an absolute, in the platonic sense, that in a purely scientific way hopes resides in us. The difficulty with today's youth," Bernstein said, was a "massive impatience, sensing that the changes must come and wanting them now as a baby cries out to be fed at the instant it senses hunger."

Bernstein deplored what he called "the instant generation" to be "patient but not passive. You have to recognize the hope that exists in you, but not let impatience turn it into despair."

The audience that filled the Tanglewood theater concert hall received Bernstein's speech with a standing ovation.

In a brief talk earlier, Gunther Schuller said that "training and learning" would be emphasized at the music center "as opposed to performance." He spoke as well of the need "to break down the artificial barriers between the traditional music and the music of our time," and promised to strive for "a greater continuum" between music center activities and those of the Boston Symphony in the shed on the other side of the lawn. Co-director Seiji Ozawa was conducting at Ravinia Park, Chicago, yesterday afternoon.

The opening exercises included words of welcome from Thomas D. Perry, Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony, and Robert Alsop, a member of the orchestra's board of overseers. Poulenc's trio for obeo, bassoon, piano was played by Ralph Gomberg, Sherman Walt, and Gilbert Kalish of the music center faculty.

Berkshire Music Center classes and rehearsals begin today. Other activities this week include a feculty recital by pianist Bela Boszormeny-Nagy tomorrow night, and open rehearsal of Bruckner's Ninth Symphony by Leonard Bernstein and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Thursday evening, and concerts by the Boston Symphony during the coming weekend, Seiji Ozawa and Leonard Bernstein conducting.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUN 29 1970

New England Newsclip

BMC

NEWSWEEK
NEW YORK, N. Y.
W. 1,935,000

JUL 13 1970

Berkshire Music Center Opens for 30th Season

S. Union June 29, 70

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX —The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, began its 30th year Sunday afternoon on a note of nostalgia.

Berstein Speaks

Leonard Bernstein's 25-minute welcoming address to the 160 advanced musical students attending the center this year was founded on his memory of Serge Koussevitzky, the center's founder, and on his attendance, as a student, at the first opening ceremony of the center July 8, 1940.

There were another 1200 listeners overflowing Tanglewood's theater-concert hall, including about 150 students who will be attending the study programs to be presented by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music.

Bernstein talked of the difference of the students in 1940 and 1970 ("We had hope"), of the reasons why today's students are frustrated ("We taught you to hope"), of Koussevitzky's admonition (to be dedicated, to have patience).

"It is the artists of this world," he said, "the feelers and thinkers, who will ultimately save us . . .How do you do it? Find out what you can do well, uniquely well, and then do it for all you're worth. . ."

And I don't mean doing your own thing and dropping out. I'm talking about doing . . .serving your community . . ."

The program included, in chronological order, greetings from Tod Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; greetings from Gunther Schuller, one of two artistic directors this season at Tanglewood; Robert Alsop of Stockbridge, a member of the orchestra's board of overseers; a performance by members of the orchestra of Poulenc's trio for oboe, bassoon and piano, Bernstein's speech, the traditional singing by the student body, without accompaniment, of Randall Thompson's "Alleluia," composed for the first opening ceremony and sung every year since.

OPENING

Leonard Bernstein to speak on Berkshire anniversary

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. — Leonard Bernstein will deliver the principal address at the 30th anniversary opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center at 2:30 p.m. Sunday in the Theater-Concert Hall.

Randall Thompson's "Alleluia," composed in 1940 for the Center's inaugural exercises, concludes the program. Following the exercises, the audience is invited to a reception in Tanglewood's Formal Gardens.

Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors of Tanglewood and Leonard Bernstein advisor. Chairman of the BMC faculty is Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been head of the faculty since the fall of 1965.

A grant from the National Orchestral Association enables the BMC to include an expanded program for conductors as part of its 1970 fellowship program. Under the direction of Leon Barzin, head of conducting and orchestral music at BMC, this program involves conducting techniques and practical conducting experience with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra.

The Center founded in 1940 by Boston Symphony Orchestra Music Director Serge Koussevitzky provides an environment in which young musicians can continue their professional training and add to their artistic experience through the guidance of eminent musicians.

Activities of BMC include orchestra and chamber music concerts, composers' forums and the "Festival of Contemporary Music." Sponsored by the BMC in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, the Festival of Contemporary Music will be held during the week of Aug. 16.

The "festival within a festival" opens with a concert by the BMC Orchestra conducted by Gunther Schuller and will feature the American premiere of Luigi Nono's "Canto Sospeso." Four composers have received commissions to be premiered at the Festival. They are: Richard Feliciano, Barbara Kolb, Olly Wilson, and Jurg Wyttenbach.

The BMC Faculty includes members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, composers George Crumb and Mel Powell, pianists Claude Frank, Lilian Kallir, and Gilbert Kalish, and violinist Paul Zukofsky. Two artists-in-residence will supplement the faculty: soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janis.

Included in the session will be a special series of weekly seminars and master classes for string players with such distinguished violinists and string teacher as Josef Gingold, Matthew Raimondi, Aaron Rosand, Oscar Shumsky and Walter Trampler.

NEWSMAKERS

With a display of old-guard grit and gallantry, Earl Mountbatten stole the show at last week's opening of Parliament in London. The 70-year-old World War II hero was called on to hold up the 8-pound sword of state while Queen Elizabeth II—his cousin—delivered her speech in the House of Lords. Soon it was apparent to Princess Anne and others nearby that Mountbatten was having trouble, and by midspeech his head had dropped, his eyes were shut and he was tottering. The peer in charge gave the distress signal—a wiggle of his thumb—and a courier hastened to Mountbatten's side, ready to relieve him of the sword. But the old soldier snapped his head up and shook it. And when Her Majesty finished, His Lordship marched off with her—still clutching the sword.

What's the real mood of today's youth? "It's not despair—it's impatience, frustration, fury," insisted conductor Leonard Bernstein, 51, opening the annual Tanglewood music festival in Massachusetts and aiming his remarks at the many under-30s in the audience. "Let's go, all right already, enough talk, enough with political self-seeking, power grabs, hate campaigns. Enough with guns and blood all over our TV sets, all over our consciences. Enough with black-white-red-pinko-Commie-Fascist-faggot-hippie hatreds. You're right, it's enough. But the solution is not going to come like instant gratification, like mother's milk." He went on to advocate patience and hope as weapons against the ills of the world. "If there are still any among you who doubt that you possess hope," said Lenny in conclusion, "I will now prove you wrong. You surely have hopes that this speech has reached an end. Well, congratulations, your hopes are fulfilled. Thank you." He got a standing ovation.

Whitestone Studio

Bernstein on podium: High hope

Bernstein to Address Berkshire Opening

LENOX, Mass. — Leonard Bernstein will deliver the main address at the 30th anniversary opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center at 2:30 p.m. Sunday in Tanglewood's Theater-Concert Hall.

* * *

Randall Thompson's "Alleluia," composed in 1940 for the center's inaugural exercises, concludes the program. A reception will follow in Tanglewood's formal gardens.

Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller are artistic directors of Tanglewood for the 1970 season, with Leonard Bernstein as adviser.

Chairman of the music center faculty is Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been faculty head since fall of 1965.

A grant from the National Orchestral Association will enable the center to include an expanded program for conductors of part of its 1970 fellowship program. Under the direction of Leon Barzin, this program involves conducting techniques and practical conducting experience with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra.

* * *

Sponsored by the center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, the Festival of Contemporary Music will be held the week of Aug. 16. The festival will open with a concert by the center orchestra conducted by Schuller and will feature the American premiere of Luigi Nono's "Canto Sospeso."

* * *

Four composers have received commissions to be premiered at the festival. They are Richard Felciano, Barbara Kolb, Olly Wilson and Jurg Wyttenbach.

The center's 30th anniversary will be celebrated July 28 with a gala concert and the day-long festivities of "Tanglewood-on-Parade."

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Wednesday, June 24, 1970

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SYRACUSE HERALD JOURNAL
Tuesday, June 23, 1970

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUN 29 1970

New England Newsclip

Bernstein speaks about hope

By Michael Steinberg, Globe Staff

LENOX—Thirty years ago, when the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood opened for the first time, the principal speaker was the director, Serge Koussevitzky, then in his 16th year as music director of the Boston Symphony. Randall Thompson's "Hallelujah", composed for the occasion, was sung by the music center's first class of students, one of whom was Leonard Bernstein. Gunther Schuller was then a precocious teen ager, very soon to make a name for himself as a prodigiously gifted horn player and, later, composer; Seiji Ozawa was a toddler nearly 6000 miles away.

At the opening exercises yesterday afternoon at the Berkshire Music Center's 1970 session, the Thompson Hallelujah was sung at it had been at each opening since the first, conducted this time by the Boston Symphony's associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, who wasn't yet born in 1940. Gunther Schuller and Seiji Ozawa were in their first year as the center's co-directors (it was the first time that the directorship did not more or less automatically go with the music directorship of the Boston Symphony), and Leonard Bernstein, in a Koussevitzkian white suit was there as adviser to Tanglewood to give the principal address.

Bernstein's topic was "The Principle of Hope," a title borrowed from a book by Ernst Bloch, a contemporary German philosopher.

"It is Bloch's thesis," Bernstein explained, "that the principle of hope is an absolute, in the platonic sense, that in a purely scientific way hopes resides in us. The difficulty with today's youth," Bernstein said, was a "massive impatience, sensing that the changes must come and wanting them now as a baby cries out to be fed at the instant it senses hunger."

Bernstein deplored what he called "the instant generation" to be "patient but not passive. You have to recognize the hope that exists in you, but not let impatience turn it into despair."

The audience that filled the Tanglewood theater concert hall received Bernstein's speech with a standing ovation.

In a brief talk earlier, Gunther Schuller said that "training and learning" would be emphasized at the music center "as opposed to performance." He spoke as well of the need "to break down the artificial barriers between the traditional music and the music of our time," and promised to strive for "a greater continuum" between music center activities and those of the Boston Symphony in the shed on the other side of the lawn. Co-director Seiji Ozawa was conducting at Ravinia Park, Chicago, yesterday afternoon.

The opening exercises included words of welcome from Thomas D. Perry, Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony, and Robert Alsop, a member of the orchestra's board of overseers. Poulenc's trio for obeo, bassoon, piano was played by Ralph Gomberg, Sherman Walt, and Gilbert Kalish of the music center faculty.

Berkshire Music Center classes and rehearsals begin today, Other activities this week include a feculty recital by pianist Bela Boszormeny-Nagy tomorrow night, and open rehearsal of Bruckner's Ninth Symphony by Leonard Bernstein and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Thursday evening, and concerts by the Boston Symphony during the coming weekend, Seiji Ozawa and Leonard Bernstein conducting.

THEATER / ARTS

Bernstein speaks about hope

By Michael Steinberg, Globe Staff

LENOX—Thirty years ago, when the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood opened for the first time, the principal speaker was the director, Serge Koussevitzky, then in his 16th year as music director of the Boston Symphony. Randall Thompson's "Hallelujah", composed for the occasion, was sung by the music center's first class of students, one of whom was Leonard Bernstein. Gunther Schuller was then a precocious teen ager, very soon to make a name for himself as a prodigiously gifted horn player and, later, composer; Seiji Ozawa was a toddler nearly 6000 miles away.

At the opening exercises yesterday afternoon at the Berkshire Music Center's 1970 session, the Thompson Hallelujah was sung at it had been at each opening since the first, conducted this time by the Boston Symphony's associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, who wasn't yet born in 1940. Gunther Schuller and Seiji Ozawa were in their first year as the center's co-directors (it was the first time that the directorship did not more or less automatically go with the music directorship of the Boston Symphony), and Leonard Bernstein, in a Koussevitzkian white suit was there as adviser to Tanglewood to give the principal address.

Bernstein's topic was "The Principle of Hope," a title borrowed from a book by Ernst Bloch, a contemporary German philosopher.

"It is Bloch's thesis," Bernstein explained, "that the principle of hope is an absolute, in the platonic sense, that in a purely scientific way hopes resides in us. The difficulty with today's youth," Bernstein said, was a "massive impatience, sensing that the changes must come and wanting them now as a baby cries out to be fed at the instant it senses hunger."

Bernstein deplored what he called "the instant generation" to be "patient but not passive. You have to recognize the hope that exists in you, but not let impatience turn it into despair."

The audience that filled the Tanglewood theater concert hall received Bernstein's speech with a standing ovation.

In a brief talk earlier, Gunther Schuller said that "training and learning" would be emphasized at the music center "as opposed to performance." He spoke as well of the need "to break down the artificial barriers between the traditional music and the music of our time," and promised to strive for "a greater continuum" between music center activities and those of the Boston Symphony in the shed on the other side of the lawn. Co-director Seiji Ozawa was conducting at Ravinia Park, Chicago, yesterday afternoon.

The opening exercises included words of welcome from Thomas D. Perry, Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony, and Robert Alsop, a member of the orchestra's board of overseers. Poulenc's trio for obeo, bassoon, piano was played by Ralph Gomberg, Sherman Walt, and Gilbert Kalish of the music center faculty.

Berkshire Music Center classes and rehearsals begin today. Other activities this week include a feculty recital by pianist Bela Boszormeny-Nagy tomorrow night, and open rehearsal of Bruckner's Ninth Symphony by Leonard Bernstein and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Thursday evening, and concerts by the Boston Symphony during the coming weekend, Seiji Ozawa and Leonard Bernstein conducting.

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUN 29 1970

New England Newsclip

Leonard Bernstein to speak on Berkshire anniversary

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass. — Leonard Bernstein will deliver the principal address at the 30th anniversary opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center at 2:30 p.m. Sunday in the Theater-Concert Hall.

Randall Thompson's "Alleluia," composed in 1940 for the Center's inaugural exercises, concludes the program. Following the exercises, the audience is invited to a reception in Tanglewood's Formal Gardens.

Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller have been appointed artistic directors of Tanglewood and Leonard Bernstein advisor. Chairman of the BMC faculty is Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been head of the faculty since the fall of 1965.

A grant from the National Orchestral Association enables the BMC to include an expanded program for conductors as part of its 1970 fellowship program. Under the direction of Leon Barzin, head of conducting and orchestral music at BMC, this program involves conducting techniques and practical conducting experience with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra.

The Center founded in 1940 by Boston Symphony Orchestra Music Director Serge Koussevitzky provides an environment in which young musicians can continue their professional training and add to their artistic experience through the guidance of eminent musicians.

Activities of BMC include orchestra and chamber music concerts, composers' forums and the "Festival of Contemporary Music." Sponsored by the BMC in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, the Festival of Contemporary Music will be held during the week of Aug. 16.

The "festival within a festival" opens with a concert by the BMC Orchestra conducted by Gunther Schuller and will feature the American premiere of Luigi Nono's "Canto Sospeso." Four composers have received commissions to be premiered at the Festival. They are: Richard Feliciano, Barbara Kolb, Olly Wilson, and Jurg Wyttenbach.

The BMC Faculty includes members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, composers George Crumb and Mel Powell, pianists Claude Frank, Lilian Kallir, and Gilbert Kalish, and violinist Paul Zukofsky. Two artists-in-residence will supplement the faculty: soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janís.

Included in the session will be a special series of weekly seminars and master classes for string players with such distinguished violinists and string teacher as Josef Gingold, Matthew Raimondi, Aaron Rosand, Oscar Shumsky and Walter Trampler.

Bernstein to Address Berkshire Opening

LENOX, Mass. — Leonard Bernstein will deliver the main address at the 30th anniversary opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center at 2:30 p.m. Sunday in Tanglewood's Theater-Concert Hall.

* * *

Randall Thompson's "Alleluia," composed in 1940 for the center's inaugural exercises, concludes the program. A reception will follow in Tanglewood's formal gardens.

Seiji Ozawa and Gunther Schuller are artistic directors of Tanglewood for the 1970 season, with Leonard Bernstein as adviser.

Chairman of the music center faculty is Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been faculty head since fall of 1965.

A grant from the National Orchestral Association will enable the center to include an expanded program for conductors of part of its 1970 fellowship program. Under the direction of Leon Barzin, this program involves conducting techniques and practical conducting experience with the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra.

* * *

Sponsored by the center in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, the Festival of Contemporary Music will be held the week of Aug. 16. The festival will open with a concert by the center orchestra conducted by Schuller and will feature the American premiere of Luigi Nono's "Canto Sospeso."

* * *

Four composers have received commissions to be premiered at the festival. They are Richard Felciano, Barbara Kolb, Olly Wilson and Jurg Wyttenbach.

The center's 30th anniversary will be celebrated July 28 with a gala concert and the day-long festivities of "Tanglewood-on-Parade."

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SCHENECTADY GAZETTE
Wednesday, June 24, 1970

NEWSMAKERS

With a display of old-guard grit and gallantry, Earl Mountbatten stole the show at last week's opening of Parliament in London. The 70-year-old World War II hero was called on to hold up the 8-pound sword of state while Queen Elizabeth II—his cousin—delivered her speech in the House of Lords. Soon it was apparent to Princess Anne and others nearby that Mountbatten was having trouble, and by midspeech his head had dropped, his eyes were shut and he was tottering. The peer in charge gave the distress signal—a wiggle of his thumb—and a courier hastened to Mountbatten's side, ready to relieve him of the sword. But the old soldier snapped his head up and shook it. And when Her Majesty finished, His Lordship marched off with her—still clutching the sword.

What's the real mood of today's youth? "It's not despair—it's impatience, frustration, fury," insisted conductor Leonard Bernstein, 51, opening the annual Tanglewood music festival in Massachusetts and aiming his remarks at the many under-30s in the audience. "Let's go, all right already, enough talk, enough with political self-seeking, power grabs, hate campaigns. Enough with guns and blood all over our TV sets, all over our consciences. Enough with black-white-red-pinko-Commie-Fascist-faggot-hippie hatreds. You're right, it's enough. But the solution is not going to come like instant gratification, like mother's milk." He went on to advocate patience and hope as weapons against the ills of the world. "If there are still any among you who doubt that you possess hope," said Lenny in conclusion, "I will now prove you wrong. You surely have hopes that this speech has reached an end. Well, congratulations, your hopes are fulfilled. Thank you." He got a standing ovation.

Whitestone Studio

Bernstein on podium: High hope

NEWSWEEK
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JUL 13 1970

Berkshire Music Center Opens for 30th Season

S. Union June 29, 70

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX —The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, began its 30th year Sunday afternoon on a note of nostalgia.

Berstein Speaks

Leonard Bernstein's 25-minute welcoming address to the 160 advanced musical students attending the center this year was founded on his memory of Serge Koussevitzky, the center's founder, and on his attendance, as a student, at the first opening ceremony of the center July 8, 1940.

There were another 1200 listeners overflowing Tanglewood's theater-concert hall, including about 150 students who will be attending the study programs to be presented by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music.

Bernstein talked of the difference of the students in 1940 and 1970 ("We had hope"), of the reasons why today's students are frustrated ("We taught you to hope"), of Koussevitzky's admonition (to be dedicated, to have patience).

"It is the artists of this world," he said, "the feelers and thinkers, who will ultimately save us . . .How do you do it? Find out what you can do well, uniquely well, and then do it for all you're worth. . ."

And I don't mean doing your own thing and dropping out. I'm talking about doing . . .serving your community . . ."

The program included, in chronological order, greetings from Tod Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; greetings from Gunther Schuller, one of two artistic directors this season at Tanglewood; Robert Alsop of Stockbridge, a member of the orchestra's board of overseers; a performance by members of the orchestra of Poulenc's trio for oboe, bassoon and piano, Bernstein's speech, the traditional singing by the student body, without accompaniment, of Randall Thompson's "Alleluia," composed for the first opening ceremony and sung every year since.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

SYRACUSE HERALD JOURNAL
Tuesday, June 23, 1970

GLOBE
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 237,967 (E) 194,700
(S) 566,377

JUN 29 1970

New England Newsclip

Bernstein speaks about hope

By Michael Steinberg, Globe Staff

LENOX—Thirty years ago, when the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood opened for the first time, the principal speaker was the director, Serge Koussevitzky, then in his 16th year as music director of the Boston Symphony. Randall Thompson's "Hallelujah", composed for the occasion, was sung by the music center's first class of students, one of whom was Leonard Bernstein. Gunther Schuller was then a precocious teen ager, very soon to make a name for himself as a prodigiously gifted horn player and, later, composer; Seiji Ozawa was a toddler nearly 6000 miles away.

At the opening exercises yesterday afternoon at the Berkshire Music Center's 1970 session, the Thompson Hallelujah was sung at it had been at each opening since the first, conducted this time by the Boston Symphony's associate conductor, Michael Tilson Thomas, who wasn't yet born in 1940. Gunther Schuller and Seiji Ozawa were in their first year as the center's co-directors (it was the first time that the directorship did not more or less automatically go with the music directorship of the Boston Symphony), and Leonard Bernstein, in a Koussevitzkian white suit was there as adviser to Tanglewood to give the principal address.

Bernstein's topic was "The Principle of Hope," a title borrowed from a book by Ernst Bloch, a contemporary German philosopher.

"It is Bloch's thesis," Bernstein explained, "that the principle of hope is an absolute, in the platonic sense, that in a purely scientific way hopes resides in us. The difficulty with today's youth," Bernstein said, was a "massive impatience, sensing that the changes must come and wanting them now as a baby cries out to be fed at the instant it senses hunger."

Bernstein deplored what he called "the instant generation" to be "patient but not passive. You have to recognize the hope that exists in you, but not let impatience turn it into despair."

The audience that filled the Tanglewood theater concert hall received Bernstein's speech with a standing ovation.

In a brief talk earlier, Gunther Schuller said that "training and learning" would be emphasized at the music center "as opposed to performance." He spoke as well of the need "to break down the artificial barriers between the traditional music and the music of our time," and promised to strive for "a greater continuum" between music center activities and those of the Boston Symphony in the shed on the other side of the lawn. Co-director Seiji Ozawa was conducting at Ravinia Park, Chicago, yesterday afternoon.

The opening exercises included words of welcome from Thomas D. Perry, Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony, and Robert Alsop, a member of the orchestra's board of overseers. Poulenc's trio for obeo, bassoon, piano was played by Ralph Gomberg, Sherman Walt, and Gilbert Kalish of the music center faculty.

Berkshire Music Center classes and rehearsals begin today. Other activities this week include a feculty recital by pianist Bela Boszormeny-Nagy tomorrow night, and open rehearsal of Bruckner's Ninth Symphony by Leonard Bernstein and the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra Thursday evening, and concerts by the Boston Symphony during the coming weekend, Seiji Ozawa and Leonard Bernstein conducting.

Bernstein Challenges Youths

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

LENOX — Leonard Bernstein received a standing ovation following his hard-hitting, nostalgic, visibly emotional address to students of the Berkshire Music Center, yesterday afternoon at Tanglewood.

Bernstein is an adviser to Tanglewood. He was a conducting student of Serge Koussevitzky during the Berkshire Music Center's first summer in 1940. He is the center's most famous alumnus.

His prepared address was delivered with the spontaneity of a musical improvisation. Its only musical content was an occasional fringe reference to what he called "The Principle of Hope."

To Bridge Gap

Bernstein made a valiant effort to explain and bridge the generation gap.

He went about it in a personal way.

"On July 8, 1940, I was sitting there where you are sitting," he said, "and Koussevitzky was standing here, speaking as I am today.

"He was talking about commitment — to art, devotion to music, dedication to one's work. I remember his using the phrase, 'the Central Line,' meaning the line to be followed by the artist at any cost, leading to perpetual discovery."

"Does anyone speak of dedication or commitment any more ? Bernstein asked. "Does one dare, in 1970, to speak of values, or of virtues such as hard work, faith, mutual understanding, patience?"

'Hopers' Sought

"You've had a bellyful of rhetoric; I know that. So have I, "Bernstein went on. "It's too easy to give advice. It comes cheap, as we all know."

Bernstein described his 1940 generation of musicians as "hopers."

"We were dedicated to social progress and the end of fascism in any form. We kids who had spent our college days marching with strikers, giving one benefit for one cause or another — we kids were committed to the future.

Despair

"Now all I hear from youth is despair. The constant refrain is hopelessness. The system is too big, too evil. You can't fight it except by extremist action.

"The world is divided between two mindless juggernauts, who are even now doing battle by proxy in Southeast Asia and the Middle East. Most students cannot identify with either side. They have no cause, and the result is hopelessness."

Bernstein described the young generation as not rebellious but impatient.

Instant Gratification

"We're in an age so hectically speeded up. . . in which instant gratification is offered by the advertising media — instant headache relief, energy, tranquilization.

"You grew up in this age," Bernstein said "so how can you expect to be patient?"

Bernstein opined that the dropping of the bomb on Hiroshima was the start of the "generation gap."

"At the moment of Hiroshima the Berkshire Music Center was five years old. Today it is 30 years old," he said.

"In that intervening span of 25 years resides the new generation — you. Of course you are impatient. How could you not be, growing up in a world of instant knowing, with the promise of instant gratification, and the threat of instant overkill? "

Bernstein's "Principle of Hope" was directed to his audience of about 250 young students, many from foreign countries.

"You are artists of the new generation," he sid. "It is the artists of this world, the feelers and thinkers who will ultimately save us, who can articulate, educate, defy, insist, sing and shout the big dreams."

"And I don't mean 'doing your own thing,' in the hip sense. That's passivity. That's dropping out."

Bernstein and other participants were introduced by Thomas D. Perry, Jr., manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Berkshire Music Center is the orchestra's "summer academy at postgraduate level."

Gunther Schuller, artistic director of the center, announced that performance would be "de-emphasized" this summer, with greater stree on "understanding of musical works, learning to love and live them."

However, the center will have two symphony orchestras instead of the previous one and there will be as many public concerts as formerly for the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

The audience of 1,250 was welcomed by Robert Alsop, Berkshire chairman of the Council of Tanglewood Friends.

Poulenc's Trio for piano, oboe and bassoon was played by Ralph Golberg, Sherman Walt and Gilbert Kalish faculty members of the Center.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

JUN 29 1970

New England Newsclip

Bernstein addresses 'Instant Generation'

★ MUSIC
Continued from Page A-19

a quality of man (he calls it dreaming foward" or "dreaming ahead"): it works like a precognition, sensing what is to come. It colors and shapes our dreams, day-dreams, wish-fulfillment drives. We non-philosophers call it, simply, hope.

Now the moment we apply this psychological force to living history, we can see the trouble beginning. Because the timing of the two does not always work out right: a crucial social change, something "not-yet-become" like universal justice, racial equality, or the end of war, can seem to be imminent, and when it does not occur it causes great frustration . . . But the youth today cannot wait; their great problem is massive impatience, sensing the changes that must come, and wanting them now, as a baby cries to be fed at the instant it senses hunger. This has always been the hardest obstacle of youth to overcome — in subconscious, that man does not exist without it. This built in anticipation is fact, all of growing up is simply the overcoming of infantile impatience. That is what we call maturity, and many of us never reach it — especially today.

How much harder it is to come to terms with impatience today, in an age so hectically speeded up, in which you take for granted instant knowing of all world events, problems, and catastrophes, and demand an equally instant remedy. An age in which instant gratification is offered by the advertising media — instant headache relief, instant energy, instant tranquilization. And an age in which instant destruction of the human race is a real possibility we live with day and night. You grew up in this age, you are the instant generation. How can we expect you to be patient?

And there lies the cause of the famous generation gap; we grew up before all this instantaneousness: you grew up after it. And the dividing line is Hiroshima. To quote the great scientist Albert Szent-Gyorgy, you've got the atom in you, we just know about it. . .

So OK, you say, thanks a lot. We've learned about progress and democracy and international brotherhood and racial equality and the elimination of class-struggle—OK,thanks very much, so where is it? Let's have it! Peace, freedom, United Nations, where are they? You told us there would never be political prisoners again after the defeat of fascism — so what's new in Greece, and Nigeria, and Russia, and in Chicago for that matter? What's a United Nations without China in? What do you mean, International Brotherhood, when national boundaries have never been tighter? What do you mean, Peace, when the whole world is being juggled and inflamed by two Superpowers.

Well, you're right, you're absolutely right. And thank God you're impatient, because — and this is the whole point — because that impatience is a certain signal of hope. Yes, hope. patience, that urge for instant dream-fulfillment, if you didn't feel hope. Then what is this despair we keep hearing about? It's not despair — it's impatience, frustration, fury. Let's go, all right already, enough talk, enough with political self-seeking, power-grabs, hate-campaigns. Enough with guns, and blood all over our TV sets, all over our consciences. Enough with black - white - red - pinko - Commie - fascist - faggot - hippie hatreds.

You're right, it's enough, but the solution is not going to come like instant gratification . . . It's going to take a lot of doing, and you've got the overwhelming problem of relearning patience — patience, that old-fashioned word which is still as relevant as it ever was . . . because the need for instant gratification is still the mark of infancy, and the instant remedy can be just as dangerous and foolish as the instant overkill.

It is the artists of this world, the feelers and thinkers, who will ultimately save us, who can articulate, educate, defy, insist, sing, and shout the big dreams . Only the artists can turn the "not-yet" into reality.

How do you do it? Find out what you can do well, uniquely well, and then do it for all you're worth. And I don't mean "doing your own thing" in the hip sense. That's passivity, that's dropping out, that's not doing anything. I'm talking about doing, which means serving your community, whether it's a tiny town or six continents. And there's no time to lose, which makes your position twice as difficult, because you're caught in a paradox. You've got to work fast, yet not be in a hurry. You've got to be patient, but not passive. You have to recognize the hope that exists in you, but not let impatience turn it into despair.

Does that sound like double-talk? Well, it is, because the paradox exists. And out of this paradox you must produce the brilliant synthesis ... with your new atomic minds, your flaming, angry hope, and your secret weapon of art.

Bernstein's message: hope

Tanglewood address stresses artist's role in chaotic world

By Leonard Bernstein
Advisor to Tanglewood
Conductor Laureate,
New York Philharmonic

(Extracts from an address given at the opening exercises at Tanglewood, June 28, 1970.)

We who were sitting here in 1940 (at Tanglewood's first opening exercises, when Serge Koussevitzky was Director and Bernstein a student) were a generation of hopers. We came out of the Roosevelt decade, educated by the Great Depression, the National Recovery effort, a great social spasm. We were filled with causes: Spain, China, Czechoslovakia, the labor movement, racial equality, anti-fascism. We were dedicated to social progress and the end of fascism in any form. We kids who had spent our college days marching with strikers, giving one benefit after another for one cause after another — we kids were committed to the future. We had hope.

Wheras now all I hear from youth is despair ... What I hear is a constant refrain: hopelessness. The system is too big, too evil. You can't fight it except by extremist action. You can't cope with the madness of a divided world (again, after 30 years!) — a world divided into two mindless juggernauts, who are even now doing battle by proxy in Southeast Asia and the Middle East. And most of these students cannot identify with either side; they have no cause; and the result is hopelessness. And that's the main difference between us then and you now . . .

I have been reading an extraordinary book called "The Principle of Hope" by the contemporary German philsopher Ernst Bloch . . ., a poet-historian-psycho-philosopher in the great German tradition of Hegel and Nietzsche, of Marx and Freud, and very much at the forefront of thinking among the German-speaking youth of today.

It seems really remarkable that Bloch, having once fled Germany during the Nazi period, and now once again having left East Germany for West Germany, should produce as his major philosophical work a book called "The Principle of Hope." And yet he has, and in it he demonstrates in the most convincing way that this principle is an absolute in the Platonic sense, that in a purely scientific way hope resides in us. He describes an aspect of consciousness that goes beyond Freud: he calls it the "not-yet-conscious," which is the psychic representation of the "not-yet-become" — in other words, that which has not yet happened, but which is sensed in anticipation. And he shows that this not-yet-consciousness is just an intergral a part of man's total consciousness as is the unconscious or the

MUSIC, Page A-22

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 29 1970

New England Newsclip

Hope for the Future Sounded by Bernstein

The annual opening exercises of the 1970 Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon included two impressive addresses. The artistic director of Tanglewood, Gunther Schuller, discarded all superficial frosting and penetrated directly to the purposes and aims of the concentrated schedule, "an academy at postgraduate level for young performing artists."

Leonard Bernstein, the Center's artistic adviser, who was given an enthusiastic greeting by the overcrowded Theatre-Concert Hall audience, plunged immediately into the larger issues which face our society and our culture.

"It is the artists of this world, the feelers and thinkers, who will ultimately save us," Bernstein told the students at the Berkshire Music Center at opening exercises. "You have to recognize the hope that exists in you, but not let impatience turn it into despair."

Koussevitzky Praised

Bernstein also paid tribute to the founder of the Berkshire Music Center, Serge Koussevitzky, whose inspiration has not diminished with the years and whose legacy of dedication included one factor, patience, on which the speaker dwelled with telling effect.

Bernstein remarked that when he came as a student to the Center 30 years ago "we kids" were a generation of hopers. "Now," he observed, "all I hear from the youth is despair."

The Berkshire Center alumnus enumerated the differences he discerned.

"In the decade surrounding 1940 the key to musical expression was nobility . . . all this music was heroic, it spoke of struggle and triumph. It reflected the basic nobility of man. Now, today, all that is gone. Our symphonic life no longer is fed by the noble symphony. Negativism ranges right across the arts into almost all thinking disciplines.

"University students," the composer continued, "have nothing to write but protest, nothing to sing but satire, nothing to feel but irony and despair." He stressed that when the end of war and universal justice do not seem imminent, it results in great frustration. This causes youth to be permeated with "massive impatience, sensing the changes that must come and wanting them now, as a baby cries to be fed at the instant it senses hunger."

This, Bernstein told the audience, has always been the hardest obstacle of youth to overcome, in fact, all of growing up is simply the overcoming of infantile impatience. That is what we call maturity and many of us never reach it, especially today.

Instant Generation

"How much harder it is to come to terms with impatience today, in an age so hectically speeded up, an age in which instant gratification is offered, instant headache-relief, instant energy, instant tranquilization and instant destruction. You are the instant generation. How can we expect you to be patient? There lies the real cause of th famous generation gap. At the moment of Hiroshima, the Berkshire Music Center was 5 years old. Today it is 30 years old."

Bernstein stated that "we oldies prepared you to be the best educated generation the world has ever known. The most sophisticated, the most politically oriented, best read, most informed, best equipped for a democratic society. We taught you to believe and expect that the world could work, that all mouths could be fed, that there is enough for all. All we have to do is find the simple means of distributing it all, fairly and universally. We taught you to hope as no one has ever hoped before. So where is it?"

Bernstein concluded by asking the students to rechannel their impatience and despair into a diligent and enthusiastic drive to solve the social and political problems of the world.

Schuller Philosophy

The ideals which Schuller inherited from previous Center directors included the obligations of "training in preparation for the rigors of professional life through daily contact . . . with a great symphony orchestra and master teachers." It was not conceived as a strictly academic system with degrees and credits. It was more an exposure to great musical ideas — to provide a stimulus for later commitment. The emphasis was go be on training and learning as opposed to performance.

Schuller disclosed that the Center had greatly expanded the instrumental forces this summer. There will be two complete orchestras which can be further divided into any number of smaller units. He also has an aim "to break down artificial barriers between music of our time and of the past" for we must all recognize that music is not compartmentalized into centuries and periods."

"Music," Schuller said, "is a continuous on-going process and the innovations of the past become the repertory of the present." Schuller said he would like to see Tanglewood continue to play an ever more significant role for the creative and re-creative artist, and the composer and the performer.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 29 1970

New England Newsclip

'The Principle of Hope'

A Famed Musician Offers an Antidote for Despair

A standing ovation was accorded Leonard Bernstein after making the following address yesterday afternoon at the opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. The noted conductor was a member of the first class in conducting taught by the late Serge Koussevitzky when the Center opened 30 years ago.

May I take the liberty of skipping the customary formal salutations to my learned colleagues, honored guests, et alii, and address myself directly to you, my young friends who have come here to work and live with music this summer at Tanglewood. Thirty years ago, almost to the day, I was sitting there, almost where you are sitting, a couple of hundred yards from here, in a state of wild excitement and anticipation. It was the first day of the first season of the Berkshire Music Center, and I had just miraculously been accepted by its founder and director, Serge Koussevitzky, as one of his conducting students. And Koussevitzky was standing here, speaking as I am today. I don't know if I can even begin to give you an idea of what that felt like—what Koussevitzky represented then in the world of music, what radiance emanated from him, what it was like to be in his presence. He was a man possessed by music, and a man whose possessedness came at you like cosmic rays, whether from the podium or in a living room or in this theatre.

You see, in all the years I had lived and grown up in Boston, I had never met Koussevitzky: For me, he was that distant, glamorous figure that I saw and heard from the dizzying height of the second balcony in Symphony Hall. It was only after I had graduated from Harvard, and had completed a long winter studying in Philadelphia, that I read in the paper of the impending openings of Tanglewood's new Music Center. I rushed up to Boston, armed with letters of recommendation from anybody who would give me one, gained entry into the Maestro's study, and—I don't remember a moment of that interview except his saying, at the end, "Of course, my dear, I vill accept you in my class." Fade-out, Fade-in, and I'm sitting there, where you are, July 3, 1940.

* * * *

And the great Koussevitzky was standing here talking to us. He was talking about commitment — commitment to art, devotion to music, dedication to one's work. I remember his using the phrase "The Central Line" — I've never forgotten that — meaning the line to be followed by the artist at any cost, the line leading to perpetual discovery, a mystical line to truth as revealed in the musical art. It was an inspirational kind of speech, full of phrases that I suppose today would be smiled at as old-fashioned cliches. Does anyone speak of "dedication" anymore, or "commitment"? Does one dare, in 1970, to speak of "values," or of "virtues" such as hard work, faith, mutual understanding, patience?

Well, the answer is yes; one does dare. Even though it's 30 years later, and I'm

Bernstein
Continued on Page 30

Whitestone

Leonard Bernstein acknowledges the ovation given after his address at Tanglewood.

not Koussevitzky with his inspirational oratory, and you're not in any mood to listen to it. You've had a belly-full of rhetoric, I know that. So here I stand. But here I am, standing in his place, bearing the title of adyunkt, bearing the title of senior member of the triumvirate, I am called upon to advise and advice comes cheap, as we all know. It's too easy to give, and too hard to give sincerely and with clarity, precisely because today is not 30 years ago. Let's see if I can make you feel something of the difference between then and now, and then perhaps we can level with each other.

* * * *

We who were sitting here in 1940 were a generation of hopers. We came out of the Roosevelt decade, educated by the Great Depression, the National Recovery effort, a great social spasm. We were filled with causes: Spain, China, the labor movement, racial equality, antifascism. We were dedicated to social progress and the end of fascism in any form. We kids who had spent our college days marching with strikers, giving one benefit after another for one cause after another — we kids were committed to the future. We had hope.

Whereas now all I hear from the youth is despair. I have spent long hours this last year just sitting with university students, in America and abroad, and rapping with them — but mostly listening. And what I hear is a constant refrain: hopelessness. The system is too big, too evil. You can't fight it except by extremist action. You can't cope with the madness of a divided world (again, after 30 years), a world divided into two mindless juggernauts, who are even now doing battle by proxy in Southeast Asia and the Middle East. And most of these students cannot identify with either side; they have no cause, and the result is hopelessness. And that's the main difference between us then and you now.

Perhaps we can see this difference with more clarity in musical terms. In fact, the clarity is startling. In the decade surrounding 1940, the key to musical expression was nobility. We still had a form called the symphony, the noble symphony. We had Shostakovich Fifth, Prokofieff Fifth, Copland's Third, and towering symphonic works by Hindemith, Bartok, Harris, Schuman, and what was perhaps the last of them, Stravinsky's symphony in three movements. All this music was heroic; it spoke of struggle and triumph, it reflected the basic nobility of man. And there stood Serge Koussevitzky, ready and eager to play them all.

* * * *

Now today all that is gone. Our symphonic life is no longer fed by the noble symphony—or by much of anything else, for that matter. New music has splintered into dozens of movements, groups and experiments ranging from the most didactic super-serialism to the most frivolous Dada. Some of it is fascinating, some titillating, some of it touching, even beautiful, some merely opportunistic—but one thing it almost never is is noble.

And this negativism ranges right across the arts into almost all thinking disciplines, so that these university students I meet with hardly know where to turn. One after another they tell me: There's nothing to write but protest, nothing to sing but satire, nothing to feel but irony and despair. So we drown ourselves in decibels of rock, we drop out with dope, we don't know what else to do. Even the most taciturn, the bitterest, bushiest radicals on campus break down after four hours of rapping and beg me to tell them what to do. We have no leaders, they say, no models, no idols, no heroes. One of them said to me: "What do you expect us to feel when we have grown up watching one hero after another being shot down before our eyes—John Kennedy, Martin Luther King, Malcolm X, Robert Kennedy?" And I have nothing brilliant to answer to that. I have nothing brilliant or immortal to say to any of you who feel despair. Of course, I can reach back to Serge Koussevitzky and retrieve his sense of commitment, his dedication and patience, and pass them on to you. I can do that, and I do; and I wish that were enough, now, 30 years later. But it isn's enough, we know that; something has changed. now, 30 years later. But it isn't enough, something very important, about the nature of despair.

* * * *

I have been reading an extraordinary book called "Das Prinzip Hoffnung" — The Principal of Hope — by the contemporary German philosopher Ernst Bloch. That name is a coincidence: This Bloch is not the composer of Schelomo, but a part-historian-psycho-philisopher in the great German tradition of Hegel and Nietzsche, of Marx and Freud, and very much at the forefront of thinking among the German-speaking youth of today. It seems really remarkable that Bloch, having once fled Germany during the Nazi period and now once again having left East Germany for West Germany, should produce as his major philosophical work a book called "The Principle of Hope." And yet he has, and in it demonstrates in the most convincing way that this principle is an absolute, in the Platonic sense — that in a purely scientific sense, hope resides in us.

He describes an aspect of consciousness that goes beyond Freud. He calls it the "Not-Yet-Conscious," Das Noch-Nicht-Bewusste, which is the psychic representation of the Not-Yet-Become (Das Noch-Nicht-Gewordene) — in other words, that which has not yet happened, but which is sensed in anticipation. And he shows that this Not-Yet-Consciousness is just as integral a part of man's total consciousness as is the unconscious or the subconscious, that man does not exist without it. This built-in anticipation is a quality of man (he calls it "Traumen nach Vorwarts," or "Dreaming Ahead"). It works like a precognition, sensing what is to come; it colors and shapes our dreams, daydreams, wish-fulfilment drives. We nonphilosophers call it, simply, hope.

Now the moment we apply this psychological force to living history, we can see the trouble beginning. Because the timing of the two does not always work out right. A crucial social change, something "Not-Yet-Become" like universal justice or the end of war, can seem to be imminent; and when it does not occur, it causes great frustration. It may skip a generation or more. It may lie dormant for innumerable reasons, and suddenly awaken in its own time. But the youth today cannot wait, their great problem is massive impatience, sensing the changes that must come, and wanting them now; as a baby cries to be fed at the instant it senses hunger. This has always been the hardest obstacle of youth to overcome — in fact, all of growing up is simply the overcoming of infantile impatience. That is what we call maturity; and many of us never reach it — especially today.

How much harder it is to come to terms with impatience today, in an age so hectically speeded up, in which you take for granted instant knowing of all world events, problems and catastrophes, and demand an equally instant remedy. An age in which instant gratification is offered by the advertising media — instant headache relief; instant energy; instant tranquilization. And an age in which instant destruction of the human race is a real possibility we live with day and night. You grew up in this age, you are the instant generation. How can we expect you to be patient?

And there lies the real cause of the famous "generation gap." We grew up before all this instantaneousness; you grew up after it. And the dividing line is Hiroshima. To quote the great scientist, Albert Szent-Gyorgy, you've got the atom in you; we just know about it. (That's a marvelous book, by the way, "The Crazy Ape" by Szent-Gyorgy. Read it — it's short, and it's in English, unlike Bloch; and once you read it, you'll understand why Hiroshima is the crucial point of division.)

* * * *

At the moment of Hiroshima, the Berkshire Music Center was five years old. Today it is 30 years old. And in that intervening span of 25 years resides the new generation — you. Of course you are impatient. How could you not be, growing up in a world of instant knowing, with the promise of instant gratification, and the threat of instant overkill?

And we can't cop out, we oldies. We prepared you very carefully; we made you the best-educated generation the world has ever know, the most sophisticated, the most politically oriented, the best-read, most-informed, best equipped for a democratic society. We saw to that. We taught you to believe, and to expect, that the world could work, that all mouths can be fed, every last Eskimo and Hottentot, that no man need ever again raise a gun-sight at another, that the world is rich and blooming, there is enough for all, enough food and clothing and music and leisure and love. All we have to do is find the simple means of distributing it all, fairly and universally. We taught you all that; we taught you to hope as no one has ever hoped before.

We developed your sense of the "Not-Yet," your forward-dreaming, to a boiling point.

* * * *

But there's a catch: We taught you what we had learned before Hiroshima. We taught you that there need never be a war again; but what you learned from us was that there must never be a war again, for then the world is finished. We talked and you heard, but between the talking and the hearing, the linguistics changed. How were we to know that the dropping of a bomb on Hiroshima would make every one of you a stranger to us; that what we had learned and would now pass on to you would automatically undergo chemical change because of the phenomenon of instantaneousness?

So okay, you say, thanks very much. We've learned about progress and democracy and international brotherhood and racial equality and the elimination of class struggle. Okay, thanks, so where is it? Let's have it! Peace, freedom, united nations—where are they? You told us there could never be political prisoners again after the defeat of fascism—so what's new in Greece, and Nigeria, and Russia and in Chicago, for that matter? What's a United Nations without China in it? What do you mean "international brotherhood," when national boundaries have never been tighter? What do you mean "peace," when the whole world is being juggled and inflamed by two superpowers?

* * * *

Well, you're right, you're absolutely right. And thank God you're impatient, because—and this is the whole point—because that impatience is a certain signal of hope—yes, hope. You couldn't feel that impatience, that urge for instant dream-fulfillment, if you didn't feel hope. Then what is this despair we keep hearing about? It's not despair—it's impatience, frustration, fury. Let's go, all right already, enough talk, enough with political self-seeking, power-grabs, hate-campaigns. Enough with guns and blood all over our TV sets, all over our consciences. Enough with black-white-red-pinko - Commie - Fascist - faggot - hippie-hatreds. You're right, it's enough. But the solution is not going to come like instant gratification, like mother's milk, like televised headache relief. It's going to take a lot of doing, and you've got the overwhelming problem of relearning patience—patience, that old-fashioned word which is still as relevant as it ever was.

So you see, we are back to Koussevitzky's morality after all, atom or no atom, Hiroshima generation gap or not. Because the need for instant gratification is still the mark of infancy, and the instant remedy can be just as dangerous and foolish as the instant overkill.

Nothing comes instantly except death, and every generation has to learn that anew, even yours. Nobody is going to dream on Sunday of becoming a great oboe-player and wake up Monday morning being one, or a great composer or a world-saving statesman. And social democracy is a hard proposition — nobody ever said it was easy; it just sounds easy. Good Lord, our own country is not yet 200 years old. There's still hope for everything; even patriotism can be rescued from the flagwavers and bigots. It's true that we have to work faster and harder if we're going to take our next social step before the overkill stops us dead in our tracks. But if anyone can do it, faster and harder and better, it's you, the best generation in history.

And especially you here today, artists of that generation. It is the artists of this world, the feelers and thinkers, who will ultimately save us, who can articulate, educate, defy, insist, sing and shout the big dreams. Only the artists can turn the "Not-Yet" into reality. How do you do it? Find out what you can do well, uniquely well, and then do it for all you're worth. And I don't mean "Doing your own thing," in the hip sense. That's passivity, that's dropping out, that's not doing anything. I'm talking about doing, serving your community, whether it's a tiny town or six continents. And there's no time to lose, which makes your position twice as difficult, because you're caught in a paradox. You've got to work fast, yet not be in a hurry. You've got to be patient, but not passive. You have to recognize the hope that exists in you, but not let impatience turn it into despair. Does that sound like double-talk? Well, it is, because the paradox exists. And out of this paradox you must produce the brilliant synthesis. We'll help you as much as we can — that's why we're here. But it is you who must produce it, with your new atomic minds, your flaming, angry hope, and your secret weapon of art.

If there are still any among you who doubt that you possess hope in you, I will now prove you wrong. You surely have hopes that this speech has reached an end. Well, congratulations, your hopes are fulfilled. Thank you.

TIMES
PEABODY, MASS.
WEEKLY 6,000

AUG 21 1970

New England
Newsclip

francis w. hatch

where but new england

a lost chord, quickly recovered

The reporting of Leonard Bernstein's speech at the opening of Tanglewood this summer struck a musical chord in memory. Thirty years ago Bernstein had occupied a seat in the audience as a student in the first class in the now - famed institution in the Berkshires. This year he was the speaker chosen to welcome the newest crop of hopeful youth, urge them to have hope and not let impatience turn into despair. Surely his achievemtns and stature in the musical world have proved that Tanglewood's instruction and inspiration are aptly designed for the care and feeding of musical genius.

There was another speaker on this occasion in an earlier year in the forties. I modestly admit having faced the same audience in what must have been one of the more impromptu addresses on record.

I hadreceived a note from Serge Koussevitzky, then the B.S.O.'s conductor asking me, as an orchestra trustee, to take part in the exercises. My assigned task wss simple and one I looked forward to. It would be my privilege to introduce my fellow - trustee, Lewis Perry, who would make the formal address.

I could think of no man for whom I had a greater respect or affection than Dr. Perry, the great school master of our generation who had turned Phillips Exeter from a first rate school into an academy, which, in plant and educational program, was to rank at the head of all American secondary schools.

Riding up from Boston to Lenox I picniced with my wife along a pretty stream a few miles from Lenox, having time to waste. I couldn't have been in a more relaxed mood.

Arriving at the amphitheater five minutes ahead of time, I joined Perry in the front row. In his hand were notes of what I knew would be the purest charm and inspiration for the young students.

Dr. Koussevitzky entered a moment later. He was wearing a cape that swished as he walked; very Napoleonic and quite romantic. We stepped up and shook his hand, and resumed our seats. Taking his place at the podium, he greeted his young students with a warm and quite wonderful smile and the announcement:

"And now I shall present Dr. Lewis Perry, one of my 'trustys' (his pronunciation of the title had overtones of Sing Sing), Dr. Lewis Perry, who will introduce the speaker of the day, another 'trusty,' Francis W. Hatch."

With that, Lewis Perry, the disciplined schoolaster, flashed a smile of compassion and moved to the podium. In order to give me a little running room and time to snatch for an idea, he made the introduction longer than was warranted. When his last word died away, I staggered up with the look of a boxer, groggy, coming out for the tenth and final round.

As for my remarks, I was grasping for straws. I threw my arms about the natural beauty of the Berkshire area and the inspiration it would supply, even as it did to Herman Melville. I threw in the suggestion that the Lenox Public Library would be well worth a visit. I knew the library, its depth in books relating to music, and its cozy atmosphere.

Bernstein, according to the press report, received standing ovation. I would bet twenty to one that I did not. However, after the singing of Randall Thompson's "Hallelujah," which ended my ordeal, a lady came to me with the comforting statement that, "You are the first speaker, in all the years I have been attending these functions, who has mentioned the library. I want to thank you, especially."

You have guessed it. She was the librarian!

THE BERKSHIRE MUSIC CENTER:

OPENING EXERCISES

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUN 29 1970

New England Newsclip

Berkshire Music Center Opens for 30th Season

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX —The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, began its 30th year Sunday afternoon on a note of nostalgia.

Bernstein Speaks

Leonard Bernstein's 25-minute welcoming address to the 160 advanced musical students attending the center this year was founded on his memory of Serge Koussevitzky, the center's founder and on his attendance, as a student, at the first opening ceremony of the center July 8, 1940.

There were another 1200 listeners overflowing Tanglewood's theater-concert hall, including about 150 students who will be attending the study programs to be presented by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music.

Bernstein talked of the difference of the students in 1940 and 1970 ("We had hope"), of the reasons why today's students are frustrated ("We taught you to hope"), of Koussevitzky's admonition (to be dedicated, to have patience).

"It is the artists of this world," he said, "the feelers and thinkers, who will ultimately save us . . .How do you do it? Find out what you can do well, uniquely well, and then do it for all you're worth. . ."

And I don't mean doing your own thing and dropping out. I'm talking about doing . . .serving your community . . ."

The program included, in chronological order, greetings from Tod Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; greetings from Gunther Schuller, one of two artistic directors this season at Tanglewood; Robert Alsop of Stockbridge, a member of the orchestra's board of overseers; a performance by members of the orchestra of Poulenc's trio for oboe, bassoon and piano, Bernstein's speech, the traditional singing by the student body, without accompaniment, of Randall Thompson's "Alleluia," composed for the first opening ceremony and sung every year since.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 23 1970

New England Newsclip

Berkshire Music Center Exercises Slated Sunday

The Tanglewood Music Festival will begin this Sunday with the traditional opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center. Leonard Bernstein, an alumnus of the school and newly appointed adviser to Tanglewood, will be principal speaker at the event that is scheduled for 2:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall.

This year's festivities mark the 30th anniversary of the center, founded in 1940 by Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as a school where young musicians could study under prominent artists. The Berkshire Music Center faculty, headed by Joseph Silverstein, includes members of the Boston Symphony, composers George Crumb and Mel Powell, violinst Paul Zukofsky, and pianists Claude Frank, Lilian Kallir and Gilbert Kalish. Soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janis, artist-in-residence at Tanglewood this season, will supplement the faculty. Seminars for string players are posted throughout the summer with such teachers as Josef Gingold, Aaron Rosand and Walter Trampler.

Events at the Center include concerts, composers' forums and a festival of contemporary music. A grant from the National Orchestral Association has enabled the school to expand its fellowship program for conductors. Courses in painting, theatre and dance are also offered at the Center.

COMMERCE DIGEST
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 13,000

JAN 1970

New England Newsclip

* * * *

The Berkshire Music Center will mark its thirtieth anniversary in 1970. It was established by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky in 1940, has a term of 8 weeks which runs concurrently with the Berkshire Festival. It is not a music "school," but an intensive session of rehearsals, coaching and performance . . . New word getting some usage by planners is "Suburbatropolis." Put this with Megalopolis and you really have a mouthful. As our Department's Bill Tsaffaras says: "Two nice Greek communities!" . . . A most charming place to visit in Western Massachusetts is the Robert Frost Library at Amherst College. It honors the famous poet who was an Amherst faculty member when he died in 1963 . . . Doesn't it make you feel proud to be a Bay Stater everytime an Apollo Spacecraft returns from outer space to a safe splashdown because the safe reentry shield is a product of Avco Lowell?

* * * *

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUN 24 1970

New England Newsclip

Bernstein Opens Music Center

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX Leonard Bernstein will deliver the principal address at the 30th anniversary Opening Exercises of the Berkshire Music Center, Sunday, June 28 at 2.30 p.m. in Tanglewood's Theater-Concert Hall.

Center's Alleluia

Randall Thompson's Alleluia, composed in 1940 for the Center's inaugural exercises, the audience is program. Following the zexercises, the audience is invited to a reception in Tanglewood's Formal Gardens.

The Berkshire Music Center, founded in 1940 by Boston Symphony Orchestra Music Director Serge Koussevitzky, provides an environment in which young musicians can continue their professional training and add to their artistic experience through the guidance of eminent musicians.

Activities of the BMC include orchestra and chamber music concerts, composers forums, and the "Festival of Contemporary Music." Sponsored by the BMC in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, the Festival of Contemporary Music will be held during the week of August 16.

The "Festival within a Festival" opens with a concert by the BMC Orchestra conducted by Gunther Schuller and will feature the American premiere of Luigi Nono's Canto Sospeso.

Four composers have received commissions to be premiered at the Festival. The composers are: Richard Felciano, Barbara Kolb, Olly Wilson, and Jurg Wyttenbach.

The BMC Faculty includes members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, composers George Crumb and Mel Powell, pianists Claude Frank, Lilian Kallir, and Gilbert Kalish, and violinist Paul Zukofsky. Two artist-in-residence will supplement the faculty: soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janis.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NEW YORK POST
Friday, June 26, 1970

Bernstein Talk to Open Tanglewood on Sunday

Leonard Bernstein will open the 1970 Tanglewood season under the auspices of the Berkshire Festival Sunday at 2:30 p. m. when he delivers the principle address for the opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy. Bernstein is an alumnus of the Center and newly appointed Advisor to Tanglewood.

The Boston Symphony gives its first Berkshire Festival concert in the Music Shed July 3 at 9 p. m. with Seiji Ozawa conducting. Ozawa and Gunther Schuller are artistic directors of Tanglewood. The program opens with Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms" with boy soprano Robert Puleo, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. July 4 at 8:30 Ozawa will lead Stravinsky's Violin Concerto and the "Firebird" Suite. Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, will be soloist in the Concerto. July 5 at 2:30, Bernstein will lead Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony with Sopranos Lorna Haywood and Christa Ludwig as soloists.

July 3 at 7 p.m., Richard and Rose Taylor will perform a program of Mahler songs. Chamber concerts or recitals will precede the Boston Symphony's event each Friday at 9 p.m. in the Shed, free to ticket holders.

Open rehearsals for the benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund, will take place Saturdays at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed. Seats are unreserved and go on sale the morning of the rehearsal.

Seats Through Ticketron

Seats may be purchased at the Festival ticket office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., 01240, or by phone: Code 413-637-1600. Mail orders must be accompanied by a self-addressed, stamped envelope. Tickets are also available through the 250 Ticketron locations within 500 miles of Tanglewood.

The Boston Symphony concerts in the Music Shed will continue for eight weeks, through Aug. 23.

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUN 29 1970 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Music Center Opens for 30th Season

By R. C. HAMMERICH

LENOX —The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, began its 30th year Sunday afternoon on a note of nostalgia.

Berstein Speaks

Leonard Bernstein's 25-minute welcoming address to the 160 advanced musical students attending the center this year was founded on his memory of Serge Koussevitzky, the center's founder and on his attendance, as a student, at the first opening ceremony of the center July 8, 1940.

There were another 1200 listeners overflowing Tanglewood's theater-concert hall, including about 150 students who will be attending the study programs to be presented by Boston University and the New England Conservatory of Music.

Bernstein talked of the difference of the students in 1940 and 1970 ("We had hope"), of the reasons why today's students are frustrated ("We taught you to hope"), of Koussevitzky's admonition (to be dedicated, to have patience).

"It is the artists of this world," he said, "the feelers and thinkers, who will ultimately save us . . .How do you do it? Find out what you can do well, uniquely well, and then do it for all you're worth. . ."

And I don't mean doing your own thing and dropping out. I'm talking about doing . . .serving your community . . ."

The program included, in chronological order, greetings from Tod Perry, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; greetings from Gunther Schuller, one of two artistic directors this season at Tanglewood; Robert Alsop of Stockbridge, a member of the orchestra's board of overseers; a performance by members of the orchestra of Poulenc's trio for oboe, bassoon and piano, Bernstein's speech, the traditional singing by the student body, without accompaniment, of Randall Thompson's "Alleluia," composed for the first opening ceremony and sung every year since.

COMMERCE DIGEST
BOSTON, MASS.
MONTHLY 13,000

JAN 1970 New England Newsclip

* * * *

The Berkshire Music Center will mark its thirtieth anniversary in 1970. It was established by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky in 1940, has a term of 8 weeks which runs concurrently with the Berkshire Festival. It is not a music "school," but an intensive session of rehearsals, coaching and performance . . . New word getting some usage by planners is "Suburbatropolis." Put this with Megalopolis and you really have a mouthful. As our Department's Bill Tsaffaras says: "Two nice Greek communities!" . . . A most charming place to visit in Western Massachusetts is the Robert Frost Library at Amherst College. It honors the famous poet who was an Amherst faculty member when he died in 1963 . . . Doesn't it make you feel proud to be a Bay Stater everytime an Apollo Spacecraft returns from outer space to a safe splashdown because the safe re-entry shield is a product of Avco Lowell?

* * * *

UNION
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
(M) 77,427

JUN 24 1970 New England Newsclip

Bernstein Opens Music Center

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX Leonard Bernstein will deliver the principal address at the 30th anniversary Opening Exercises of the Berkshire Music Center, Sunday, June 28 at 2.30 p.m. in Tanglewood's Theater-Concert Hall.

Center's Alleluia

Randall Thompson's Alleluia, composed in 1940 for the Center's inaugural exercises, the audience is program. Following the zexercises, the audience is invited to a reception in Tanglewood's Formal Gardens.

The Berkshire Music Center, founded in 1940 by Boston Symphony Orchestra Music Director Serge Koussevitzky, provides an environment in which young musicians can continue their professional training and add to their artistic experience through the guidance of eminent musicians.

Activities of the BMC include orchestra and chamber music concerts, composers forums, and the "Festival of Contemporary Music." Sponsored by the BMC in cooperation with the Fromm Music Foundation, the Festival of Contemporary Music will be held during the week of August 16.

The "Festival within a Festival" opens with a concert by the BMC Orchestra conducted by Gunther Schuller and will feature the American premiere of Luigi Nono's Canto Sospeso.

Four composers have received commissions to be premiered at the Festival. The composers are: Richard Felciano, Barbara Kolb, Olly Wilson, and Jurg Wyttenbach.

The BMC Faculty includes members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, composers George Crumb and Mel Powell, pianists Claude Frank, Lilian Kallir, and Gilbert Kalish, and violinist Paul Zukofsky. Two artist-in-residence will supplement the faculty: soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janis.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(S) 30,100

JUN 25 1970 New England Newsclip

Berkshire Music Center Exercises Slated Sunday

The Tanglewood Music Festival will begin this Sunday with the traditional opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center. Leonard Bernstein, an alumnus of the school and newly appointed adviser to Tanglewood, will be principal speaker at the event that is scheduled for 2:30 p.m. in the Theatre-Concert Hall.

This year's festivities mark the 30th anniversary of the center, founded in 1940 by Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as a school where young musicians could study under prominent artists. The Berkshire Music Center faculty, headed by Joseph Silverstein, includes members of the Boston Symphony, composers George Crumb and Mel Powell, violinst Paul Zukofsky, and pianists Claude Frank, Lilian Kallir and Gilbert Kalish. Soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janis, artist-in-residence at Tanglewood this season, will supplement the faculty. Seminars for string players are posted throughout the summer with such teachers as Josef Gingold, Aaron Rosand and Walter Trampler.

Events at the Center include concerts, composers' forums and a festival of contemporary music. A grant from the National Orchestral Association has enabled the school to expand its fellowship program for conductors. Courses in painting, theatre and dance are also offered at the Center.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

NEW YORK POST
Friday, June 26, 1970

Bernstein Talk to Open Tanglewood on Sunday

Leonard Bernstein will open the 1970 Tanglewood season under the auspices of the Berkshire Festival Sunday at 2:30 p. m. when he delivers the principle address for the opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center, the Boston Symphony's summer academy. Bernstein is an alumnus of the Center and newly appointed Advisor to Tanglewood.

The Boston Symphony gives its first Berkshire Festival concert in the Music Shed July 3 at 9 p. m. with Seiji Ozawa conducting. Ozawa and Gunther Schuller are artistic directors of Tanglewood. The program opens with Bernstein's "Chichester Psalms" with boy soprano Robert Puleo, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Tanglewood Festival Chorus. July 4 at 8:30 Ozawa will lead Stravinsky's Violin Concerto and the "Firebird" Suite. Joseph Silverstein, the orchestra's concertmaster, will be soloist in the Concerto. July 5 at 2:30, Bernstein will lead Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony with Sopranos Lorna Haywood and Christa Ludwig as soloists.

July 3 at 7 p.m., Richard and Rose Taylor will perform a program of Mahler songs. Chamber concerts or recitals will precede the Boston Symphony's event each Friday at 9 p.m. in the Shed, free to ticket holders.

Open rehearsals for the benefit of the orchestra's Pension Fund, will take place Saturdays at 10:30 a.m. in the Shed. Seats are unreserved and go on sale the morning of the rehearsal.

Seats Through Ticketron

Seats may be purchased at the Festival ticket office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., 01240, or by phone: Code 413-637-1600. Mail orders must be accompanied by a self-addressed, stamped envelope. Tickets are also available through the 250 Ticketron locations within 500 miles of Tanglewood.

The Boston Symphony concerts in the Music Shed will continue for eight weeks, through Aug. 23.

110

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 216,305 (S) 298,557

AUG 7 1970 New England Newsclip

Music: Two Different Concerts Given at Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD—Two recent concerts of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood wree different from those usually given in the shed. They go toward answering the search for the 20th Century mainstream in music which does not seem to lie in part or at all in the large symphony orchestra and operat.

On Tuesday, George Russell's "Electronic Sonata for Souls Loved by Nature" was a work for rock and dance band instruments over a continuous electronic tape. The musical and extra-musical meanings are clear. He uses many musical styles, from avant-garde jazz and serial music to ragas, rock and blues. The instruments are used in traditional stylistic patterns and in all the experimental patterns and in all the experimental patterns of the latest in the jusic world. There were occasional chaotic moments which were not helped by the inefficient sound system. Some added to the musical tension. Others might have been helped by a clarification of instrumental sonorities.

The sum total of the piece is moving and was helped by the performance, written and ad lib, of the fine players.

The Webster Lewis Quintet, which played the second half of the porgram, is an organized avant-garde group with Marvin Peterson-trumpet, (and high), Bobby Green-alto saxophone, James Hopps-percussion and Judd Watkins-vocalist. Lewis, on electric organ leads them through more traditional patterns that sometimes SWING and other times are non-rhythmic. Again sound was sometimes explored for its own sake and the social implications were clearly expressed in Watkins rocking, hypnotic chorus on "Freedom."

Thursday night's insight into the modern music world was led by Lukas Foss. He toured the recent world of art music that stems essentially from a European heritage. Included were the 30-minute-or-so "In C" by Terry Riley. Fifty-five simple patterns of music are set up to be played at the discretion of each of the 41 players. At the end the lights are dimmed and the orchestra leaves the stage. Unfortunately, much of the audience was gone this night, too.

In addition, two brief pieces by John Cage and Yuji Takahashi were played.

The most effective music of the evening seemed to be Foss' own "Paradigm" 'for my friends,' a five movement work that had virtually formal stop-go patterns and repetitions of ideas. In spite o fthis, the non-musical appeal to peace through words which are given as alternates to music at the discretion ofthe performer and the disarming clarity of the use of musical sounds in an atonal style made for a moving experience.

Straight on!

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 31 1970 New England Newsclip

Music Review

785

A Curious Recital

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

AN AUDIENCE of good will and patience paid "Lukas Foss and Ensemble" respectful attention last night in the Tanglewood Theatre-Concert Hall, where they presented an evening of musical recitations under the sponsorship of the Berkshire Music Center.

There may be debate on the term "musical recitations." There were sounds produced on strings, wind and keyboard instruments and percussive devices. With the utmost charity and tolerance, a message might be discerned in the compositions played and read.

* * *

JOHN CAGE'S "A Room" is written for prepared piano and consists of an endlessly repeated elementary idiom. His "She's Asleep" enlists four percussionists on tuned snares, using mainly their fingertips. This is not offensive and an atmosphere was conveyed. One is tempted in these particular days to use a word currently applied to the air over our cities, but wise ridicule should have no place in reporting what was quite evidently a serious attempt to depict musical literature, very often poetry, in strange and bewildering methods.

The sounds were most often reiterated in childlike patterns, sometimes soft to inaudible, other times vehement and clangorous. A violin was pitted hopelessly against electric guitar and electric harpsichord. A cello droned without deviation a half-step double stop in Yuji Takahashi's "Bridges I."

* * *

IN FOSS'S OWN "For My Friends," the program notes explained that the players have words to choose from. The second of the four sections is "a poem which will differ at every reading." A flexaton is one of the instruments used. It seemed to be a tall steel railroad switch, which when bent and struck, produced various sounds.

There were a few who left the audience during the performance, but the main body remained, possibly for curiosity and amusement if not for stimulation. The performers' reception was kindly and even vociferous. No one should miss the experience.

Music Review

Bernstein-Student Concert

By JAY ROSENFELD

THE BERKSHIRE Music Center Orchestra made its debut last night in the Theatre-Concert Hall at Tanglewood, playing Bruckner's Ninth Symphony under the leadership of Leonard Bernstein. Perhaps it might be more exact to say that Bernstein played the orchestra, youthful in age and infantile in integration. It was only last Monday that he assembled the orchestra for the first time, with an ineffable vibrancy achieved not by means of a bow, a keyboard or an embouchure, but by generating and transmitting a never-relenting galvanic intensity.

* * *

BRUCKNER'S Ninth was his last symphony. In fact, he did not live to complete it. What was intended to be the third of four movements, a slow and solemn celebration (adagio: langsam feierlich), proved to be the terminal. The three which he did complete require more than an hour for performance, an hour of pulsing and throbbing emotion and drama.

Bernstein made no concessions to his youthful forces, demanding of them what he would have expected of a mature professional orchestra. The students responded with the competency of veterans. The score is replete with climax and contrast, accumulating tension with Sisyphean unyielding drive. Bernstein never allowed a bland note to issue from his musicians.

The sonority which Bruckner envisions was immediately realized when the eight horns, four French and four Wagnerian tubas, announced the first theme with awesome solemnity in the fourth bar, after a unison tremolo in the strings. In the third movement, the profoundly eloquent first theme is played by unaccompanied violins, a leap from their lowest B to a C natural, a half-tone higher than an octave still on their deepest string. It was achieved with accuracy, confidence and rich resonance.

Girls outnumber men four to one in the string sections of the orchestra, a significant imbalance possibly revealing the current attraction of the vocation of music but in no way affecting the artistic results of the center concert last night. It was an evening of exalted music-making.

Theater News and Views

Tanglewood Students In Concert Saturday

LENOX — The Berkshire Music Barn Chamber Orchestra will give a two-hour concert beginning at 2.30 Saturday in the Barn amphitheater. Conductor is Guillaume Dennis Kalfas.

Special Program

The orchestra has about 25 members informally organized by Kalfas from among students at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

They are preparing a program which will include two movements from Vivaldi's "Seasons' '(Spring and Winter), Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Barber's "Adagio for Strings" and a new composition by the conductor titled "Four Songs for Jazz - Rock Ensemble" featuring David Baker, bassist, as soloist.

Other soloists will be Diane Halpirn, violinist, and Bob Stallman, flutist.

The concert is being presented as a benefit for the participating artists; all receipts from a $1 admission price will go to them.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 6 1970 New England Newsclip

Tanglewood Lists Scheduled Events

Three concerts by different orchestras are among the coming events slated at Tanglewood.

Members of the New England Conservatory Tanglewood Institute will perform Saturday afternoon at 2:30 in the Theatre-Concert Hall. The Berkshire Music Center chamber music group will give a concert Sunday morning at 10, and the Center orchestra will play Sunday evening at 8:30 in the Theatre Concert Hall.

HERALD TRAVELER
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 236,516 (S) 268,557

AUG 16 1970 New England Newsclip

Music

Classical

THURSDAY

Monadnock Music in works of Hummel, Foster, Steibalt, Strauss and others; Meeting House, Jaffrey Center, N. H., 8:30 p.m.

Contemporary chamber music program; works of Bezanson, Wuorinen, Wilson and Wyttenbach; Tanglewood, 8:30 p.m.

Turnau Opera Players in Verdi's "La Traviata"; Town Hall, Provincetown, 8:30 p.m.

Chamber Concert Set Tomorrow

A Berkshire Music Center chamber concert will be presented tomorrow morning at 10:30 in the Tanglewood Music Hall. The program will feature the Mozart Serenade No. 11 for Winds, the Schuller brass quintet and Beethoven's Piano Trio, Opus 1, No. 3.

Pianist Nagy To Give Concerts

Dr. Bela Boszormenyi-Nagy, noted Tanglewood instructor and musician, will give piano recitals Monday and Tuesday evenings at 8:30 in the Stockbridge School auditorium on Route 183.

Mr. Nagy, currently chairman of the piano department at Boston University, will do an all-Beethoven program Monday and will play Bach's Goldberg variations and Beethoven's Diabelli variations Tuesday.

The accomplished musician has appeared with all the major orchestras of the world. He studied under Bartok and was appointed professor of piano at the Liszt Academy at the age of 22. He formerly taught at the Royal Conservatory of Music in Toronto and at Indiana University.

The event is being sponsored by the New England Pro Art Society.

SYRACUSE
Herald Journal
D. 129,656

JUL 22 1970

Vivaldi music in concert

The Berkshire Music Barn at Lenox, Mass., will present in concert a collage of music Saturday at 2:30 p.m. Performing will be the Berkshire Music Barn Chamber Orchestra and Leaves of Grass, a jazz-rock ensemble.

Conducted by Guillaums Dennis Kalfas, the chamber orchestra, which has 30 members of the student body at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, will present two works by Vivaldi, one of which will be "Seasons," Samuel Barber's "Adagio for Strings" and a composition by Mozart.

Leaves of Grass will present original pieces written by its founder and leader, Kalfas, and will feature David Baker, bassist, who has performed with the late John Coltrane.

Kalfas is a student of both jazz and classical music. After studying keyboard with Oscar Peterson, he toured Europe in 1965-66 and won the best combo award while at San Francisco State College, the composition award, and the John Coltrane award.

He quit performing to continue his classical studies with Bernard Abramovitch, piano; Margaret Fabrizio, harpsichord, and conducting with Jean-Louis LeRoux of the San Francisco Symphony. Presently preparing for the concorde Internationale des Jeune Chefs d'Orchestre at France's Besacon Festival, he is studying with Seija Osawa at Tanglewood, a former winner of the competition.

Following this he will orchestrate his oretario entitled "A Psalm Upon The Gathering of All The Tribes", which was commissioned by the International Conference of World Religions, and includes a Mahler-sized orchestra with four soloists, two boy choirs and a jazz trio.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUL 15 1970 New England Newsclip

Vocal Concert Slated Tonight

The Vocal Fellows of the Berkshire Music Center will present their first concert tonight at 8:30 in the Tanglewood Theatre-Concert Hall. Dennis Helmerch will accompany five singers in a program of Webern, Bartok, Berg, Strauss and Wolf.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Violinists Gain Fellowship Distinction

NORWICH — Charles R. Pikler of 5 Huntington Place, Norwich, was accepted into the 1970 Fellowship Program of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., the summer residence of the Boston Symphony Ochestra. Another area resident, Miss Susan Slowick, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Slowick, 88 Gallivan Lane, Uncasville, was also accepted into the Boston University's Young Artists Program and is studying with Prof. Roman Totenberg for the summer session.

These talented young musicians are violinists and both have had their first eight years of training under Ben Ornstein in Norwich.

Pikler played in the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra last week under the baton of Leonard Bernstein. On July 28 he will be first violinist with a selected chamber music group performing a work by the distinguished American composer, Aaron Copland.

This concert notes Copland's 70th year and is part of the annual Tanglewood-on-Parade festival. Pikler also appeared last January as soloist with the Manchester Civic Orchestra and again in May with the University of Connecticut Symphony where he just completed his freshman year. His teacher at the university is the renowned concert violinist, Branislaw Gimpel.

CHARLES R. PIKLER

MISS SUSAN SLOWICK

Miss Slowick, a senior at St. Bernard Girl's High School, is concertmistress of the Eastern Connecticut Symphony Youth Orchestra, has been a member of Connecticut All-State Orchestra for three years and most recently appeared with the American Youth Performs National Orchestra at Carnegie Hall and Rockefeller Center.

The Boston University Young Artists Orchestra also had Leonard Bernstein as its conductor during the opening week of study at Tanglewood.

BULLETIN
NORWICH, CONN.
(M) 31,475 (S) 28,895

JUL 9 1970 New England Newsclip

M AMI BEACH, FLA.
REPORTER
TW. 50 000

MAY 31 1970

UM Music Students To Attend Center

Four University of Miami music students have been accepted as Fellows at the prestigious Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood (summer home of the Boston Symphony) in Lenox, Mass., this summer.

Larry Epstein, double bass; Sam Pilafian, tuba; Terri Sternberg, violin, and Jean Anderson, percussion, will join students from all over the world for study and work for eight weeks beginning June 25.

The Fellowship program is under the direction of Gunther Schuller, president of the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston and director of the Berkshire Music Center.

HAMILTON-WENHAM
CHRONICLE
HAMILTON, MASS.
WEEKLY 2,818

AUG 12 1970 New England Newsclip

Cumington plays viola at Lenox

Bryan Cumington, son of Mr. John C. Cumington of 35 Larch row, South Hamilton, is one of 60 young musicians from all over the United States participating in Boston University's Young Artists Program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass.

Mr. Cumington, who plays the viola, is taking part in an intensive eight-week session of study and performance. The program is designed to lend a new dimension in musical education for exceptionally talented high school musicians, and is in its fifth year. Mr. Cumington is studying with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and faculty from Boston University's Division of Music, and is undertaking private lessons and music theory study. He is also able to attend all open rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as other musical activities at Tanglewood.

Mr. Cumington is a student at Hamilton-Wenham Regional High School.

Local Girl Participates In Special Music Program

FRAMINGHAM — Miss Mary Lee Vichrek, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Vichrek of 7 Ruth Drive is one of 60 young musicians from all over the United States participating in Boston University's Young Artists Program at the Berkshire Music Center, Lenox.

Miss Vichrek, a senior at Framingham North High School, plays the harp.

The Young Artists Program is an intensive eight week session of study and performance, is designed to lend a new dimension in musical education for exceptionally talented high school musicians. Now in its fifth year, the Young Artists Program provides the aspiring musicians an opportunity to study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and faculty from Boston University's Division of Music.

Besides their membership in the Young Artists Symphony Orchestra, these young musicians attend private lessons and also perform in chamber groups of various sizes.

They attend music theory classes and during the course of eight weeks, many of the Young Artists also give recitals at Tanglewood, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. An added plus is the change the young musicians have to attend all open rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as well as other musical activities at Tanglewood.

NEWS
FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
(E) 19,654

AUG 11 1970 New England Newsclip

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,185 (S) 108,376

AUG 15 1970 New England Newsclip

NEWS
W. HARTFORD, CONN.
WEEKLY 7,000

AUG 13 1970 New England Newsclip

James Parone With Musical Young Artists

James C. Parone, son of Mr. and Mrs. Gerard Parone, 313 Beechwood Road, is one of 60 young musicians from all over the United States participating in Boston University's Young Artists program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Massachusetts.

Mr. Parone, a senior at Conard High School, plays the violin.

The Young Artists program, an eight-week session of study and performance in musical education for exceptionally talented high school musicians. Aspiring musicians are given an opportunity to study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and faculty from Boston University's Division of Music

IAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
OMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

ONKERS STATESMAN
ednesday, August 12, 1970

Violinist In Boston

Randy Bauer of 727 Bronx River Road is one of 60 young musicians from all over the country participating in Boston University's Young Artists Program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass.

A senior at Lincoln High School, he plays the violin.

The program is designed to give aspiring musicians an opportunity to study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the faculty of Boston University's music department. It is an intensive eight-week course of study and performance.

An 18-Year-Old Conservative Composer Decries an Establishment 'Grip' on Music

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Christopher R. Kies, an 18-year-old composer-pianist-cellist from Chevy Chase, Maryland, isn't particularly conspicuous in this age of the New Look.

He gets three haircuts a year when he goes home to visit his family. His father does the cutting.

Kies composes and performs in an age of ultraprogressiveness while defending his right to be a conservative.

Summer at Tanglewood

He has completed his first year at The New England Conservatory in Boston, majoring in composition and piano. This summer, he holds a fellowship in both subjects at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood.

There's nothing surprising about it.

He's described as "exceptionally gifted" by Donald Martino, chairman of the Conservatory's composition department.

Theodore Lettvin of the Conservatory's piano department says that Kies is "an extremely talented pianist but also a composer and cellist."

Kies is, we repeat, 18.

To give you an idea: Last year, he went to Europe as a cellist with the Montgomery (Md.) County Youth Orchestra. When they reached Vienna he appeared as soloist with the orchestra in Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto.

Kies must be considered something of an enigma in this age of uninhibited self-expression. To some, it's a virulent "anti-establishment" movement.

To keep in step, most young composers use the shock treatment. The nonagenarians (over 30) leave the concert hall with battle-scarred ears and shattered nerves.

Young and not-so-young composers proclaim the "new sound" but aren't particularly interested in explaining it to outsiders. Within their own bailiwick they carry on a vigorous competition in this gray area of cacophony.

'All a Good Thing'

"We're in a stage of experimentation," says Kies. "When this is over, the best streams will survive. It's all a good thing because people are being exposed to all kinds of music."

Speaking of his own writing, Kies says:

"The style in which I'm now writing reflects both my natural musical tendencies, which are hard to explain, and my musical background.

"This background, besides a familiarity with the old masters, includes my exposure and great attachment to many of Bartok's works, also an interest in the music of Ives, Schoenberg and Prokofieff."

The Musicians Will Decide

Unlike some who believe that audiences will decide the fate of music eventually, Kies is of the opinion that it will be done by those who perform the music.

"I enjoy my own music when I can respect it," he says, "and when it appeals to me emotionally. Many composers try to appeal primarily to the intellect."

It woulud be easy to understand Kies' conservatism if he were deliberately writing music for the majority. But he is trying to fill voids that were incomplete in the past. To do it, he has to rely on such basic factors as discernible melody, compatible harmony, and recognizable rhythm.

He says that "in writing music, I find myself on the conservative side of things. I don't think every composer can or has to be innovative in the same way that Beethoven was. In short, my main concern is to write music well with as much originality as possible, but I also want it to have a wide intellectual and emotional appeal."

Among his works are a sonata for flute and piano, two piano sonatas, a movement for string quartet, and variations for string trio.

Kies started piano lessons when he was nine.

"I was a poor student for three years," he admits. "I liked to play but not to practice. I wasn't ready to accept the work that goes along.

"When I was so-called practicing. I'd placate my parents by making up something that sounded like my assignment."

He has also played the cello for seven years.

Then came two summers at the Junior Conservatory Camp in East Burke, Vt.

Composition was encouraged but Kies also studied theory and courses in musicianship.

Developed a Repertory

During these few years, he has acquired a sizable piano repertory of Bach, Beethoven sonatas, a good part of Bartok's monumental "Mikrokosmos," and standard romantic works.

We asked him which Chopin ballades he plays. "All four." And Chopin etudes? "All of them." There happen to be 24 of the keyboard devils.

"I don't include Debussy among my clear-cut favorites," he says, "although I think his music is really beautiful. But where some people find everything in Debussy, to me Beethoven represents the complete spectrum of musical expression."

Kies isn't quite clear as to exactly what should be done to bolster the waning serious concert audience with an influx of young people.

The 'Establishment' Grip

"It would help a lot if the 'establishment' lost its grip," he declares. "How many students can afford to go to Boston Symphony concerts? I couldn't get to hear the orchestra in Boston if I weren't lucky enough to have a pass."

Kies believes that an important music may emerge from rock.

"It will be done much like Gershwin who got two forms to cooperate (jazz and serious composition). I hear a lot of rock, jazz, electronic music ... but I haven't written any of them.

"These types won't have to be handed down. They will revitalize themselves periodically.

"Some electronic pieces I like. But some are trash, and I have no respect for trash."

His main interest is the piano, then composition. He has combined them by playing his own works in piano recitals in Washington, D.C., and the University of West Virginia.

George Crumb is his composition teacher at the Berkshire Music Center.

"He would like me to experiment with some of the less conservative forms," Kies says. "I might like to write some piano pieces in which the strings are plucked, much as John Cage has done. But, of course, that was 30 years ago."

Chris has no feeling of indifference or detachment from extreme contemporary idioms that he hears from his colleagues at the Berkshire Center.

Nor does he automatically applaud contemporary works by famed composers.

Like the Schoenberg Piano Concerto that Peter Serkin played recently at the Berkshire Music Festival with the Boston Symphony.

"I found it difficult to listen to," Kies admits. "But some of the qualities of orchestration and how Schoenberg worked in the piano was beautiful."

Kies isn't really a "long-haired" musician. But shoulder-length coiffures on others don't make any difference to him.

Like Seiji Ozawa, Tanglewood conductor of the Boston Symphony ...

Says Kies, "He looks cool."

Terry Dickson and Miss Heidi Weber with the "musical" letter.

Greetings Set to Music

He Knows How to Score

Before he became a biology major at Wittenberg University, Terry Dickson had studied piano and musical composition at Tanglewood in Lennox, Mass., site of the spring festivals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

So the letter he sent to his friend, 19-year-old Heidi Weber, of 124 Yorkshire Road, Irondequoit, a few days ago is an oddly natural bit of self-expression — or, more correctly, the way it was sent.

Across the face of the envelope the 20-year-old junior had set Heidi's name and address to song as lyrics below a brisk ten bars of original melody.

The score was sent air mail and in the key of G from Dickson's hometown of Columbus, Ohio.

Heidi, a sophomore also majoring in biology at Wittenberg, gave the work an enthusiastic hearing when Dickson played the envelope on the family piano yesterday. The performer is visiting her during the Christmas recess.

Critical reaction from postal authorities was not immediately available.

Letter speaks, or should we say, sings for itself.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE
047
ROCHESTER DEM. CHRONICLE
Sunday, December 13, 1970

CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

WHITE PLAINS DISPATCH
Saturday, August 15, 1970

Cellist Joins B.U. Group At Berkshire

ARDSLEY—

David Schwartz, son of Seymour Schwartz of 4 Rest Ave., is one of 60 young musicians participating in Boston University's young artists program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass.

Mr. Schwartz, a senior at Ardsley High School, plays the cello. During the eight-week session he is studying with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the faculty of Boston University's division of music.

He is a member of the Young Artists Symphony of the program and is attending private lessons and performing in chamber groups. The musicians also give recitals at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and attend rehearsals and concerts of the orchestra.

CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Knickerbocker News
Sunday, December 4, 1960

Hudson Valley Orchestra Will Give Concert Sunday

Young American cellist James Kreger will appear with the Hudson Valley Philharmonic Orchestra under the direction of Claude Monteux at the Poughkeepsie High School Sunday evening.

Kreger, winner of the 1969 Young Artists Competition sponsored by the Friends of the Philharmonic, will be the guest artist in a presentation of the Tchaikovsky "Rococo Variations for Cello and Orchestra."

The Philharmonic will also be heard in performances of three canzone by the Italian Renaissance composer Gabrielli, Samuel Barber's Second Essay for Orchestra" and Anton Dvorak's "Symphony No. 7." The concert will begin at 8:30 p.m.

Kreger has previously soloed with several orchestras, including the Nashville Symphony and the Julliard Orchestra. He also served as first cellist of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf at Tanglewood.

HERALD
MANCHESTER, CONN.
(E) 15,210
JUN 1 1970
New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

Preston A. Trombly, a graduate at the Yale University School of Music, has been appointed a fellow of conducting and composition at Tanglewood, the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass., this summer. He is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Perley A. Trombly of 141 Waranoke Rd.

He received a $1,000 award from Broadcast Music, Inc. on May 26 at a reception held at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel in New York City for his electronic tape, "Kinetics I." This work was heard at Manchester Community College on May 1 when Trombly directed a group of Yale musicians and dancers in a contemporary concert.

In March, he conducted his composition, "Opera - Septima," at Lincoln Center in New York City. His electronic tapes have been heard at the University of Connecticut and the Solomon R. Guggenheim Museum, and his solo pieces for piano and oboe have been performed.

Yale has awarded him a $2,500 fellowship for continued studies.

Trombly graduated from Manchester High School in 1964, and received his bachelor of music degree with honors from the University of Connecticut in 1968. At MHS, he was active in band and orchestra, and received the Chaminade Club's Laurel Music Camp Award and the Daniel Manchuck Music Scholarship in 1963.

He was choir director of the Second Congregational Church choir for two years, a member of the Manchester Civic Orchestra, and an announcer for radio stations WILI in Willimantic and WCCC in Hartford.

He is married to the former Miss Gail S. Pomeroy of Danbury. They have two children, Bryan, 3, and Allyson, born on May 12 this year.

Star-News Photo

PRACTICE MAKES NATIONAL CITY MUSICIANS READY.
Patrick and Laura Kojima will spend summer at Tanglewood.

Siblings headed east— to music paradise

Laura and Patrick Kojima, young National City musicians, will spend the summer in a musician's paradise, Tanglewood, a 10-acre estate in the Berkshire Hills of Massachusetts.

The estate, reportedly unchanged since Nathaniel Hawthorne did his writing there, is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

LAURA and Patrick have each won partial scholarships to attend the Boston Symphony's unique summer school for the advanced study of music for young, gifted musicians from this country and abroad.

The son and daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Minoru Kojima of 1230 Palmer Way, Laura and Patrick both play with the San Diego Youth Orchestra which performed at the Invitational Music Festival at St. Moritz in Switzerland and gave concerts in Eurpoe last summer.

Laura, a senior at Sweetwater High School, plays the flute and violin and serves as concert mistress for the Youth Orchestra.

Patrick, a junior at Sweetwater, plays percussion, including the piano. The past three summers he has won the right to play in New York and Washington, D.C., with American Youth Performs, an orchestra composed of young musicians from all over the United States.

EACH OF the three summers, Patrick has been asked by persons he met in New York and Washington if he would like to come to Tanglewood when he was old enough.

Now a junior in high school, Patrick, 15, is old enough. He received a $700 scholarship to apply toward the $900 required to attend the summer session.

Laura, 17, made her first trip to be a part of American Youth Performs this past summer. She received a $400 scholarship to Tanglewood.

They will leave next week for Albany, N.Y., where they will take a bus for Tanglewood, located in Lenox, Mass.

THERE THEY will join the Young Artists Orchestra, receive private lessons, have chamber music sessions, concerts and, best of all, attend many concerts of the Boston Symphony and hear world renowned artists.

Famous conductors directing the orchestra this summer will include Leonard Bernstein, Aaron Copeland, Arthur Fiedler, Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, Alain Lombard, Charles Mackerras, Jorge Mester, Seiji Azawa, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Gunther Schuller, William Steinberg and Michael Tilson Thomas.

The list of guest artists appearing with the orchestra would make a musician's head swim. Concerts will be held Friday, Saturday and Sunday night — with some thrown in during the week for good measure.

THERE WILL also be time for some contemporary music, including an appearance of Peter, Paul and Mary.

The concentrated eight weeks of study will find both students and faculty giving public performances nearly every day.

Young musicians from all over the world apply for admission to Tanglewood. Of necessity, a very limited number can be accepted.

LAURA and Patrick, although invited to submit an application, had to send tapes of their work to be judged in competition with other applicants to secure their entry there.

When they return to National City and Sweetwater in the fall their heads — and their hearts — should be filled with music.

Realization of the fact that they were ready to take advantage of such an opportunity should make all their long hours and years of practice worthwhile.

CHRONICLE-CITIZEN
BROOKLINE, MASS.
WEEKLY
AUG 1970
New England Newsclip

Tumarkin at music center

Robert Tumarkin, son of Mr. and Mrs. Tumarkin, 34 Bellingham Rd., South Brookline, is one of 60 young musicians from all over the United States to participate in Boston University's Young Artists Program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass.

Tumarkin, who will enter Boston University in September, plays the piano. He was a recipient of the Harry Dubbs Memorial Award as well as having performed as a soloist with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

The Young Artists Program, an intensive eight-week session of study and performance, is designed to lend a new dimension in musical education for exceptionally talented high school musicians. Now in its fifth year, the Young Artists Program provides the aspiring musicians an opportunity to study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and faculty from Boston University's Division of Music.

Besides their membership in the Young Artists Symphony Orchestra, these young musicians attend private lessons and also perform in chamber groups of various sizes. They attend music theory classes, and during the course of the eight weeks, many of the Young Artists also give recitals at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. An added plus is the chance the young musicians have to attend all open rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as other musical activities at Tanglewood.

Terry Dickson and Miss Heidi Weber with the "musical" letter.

Greetings Set to Music

He Knows How to Score

Before he became a biology major at Wittenberg University, Terry Dickson had studied piano and musical composition at Tanglewood in Lennox, Mass., site of the spring festivals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

So the letter he sent to his friend, 19-year-old Heidi Weber, of 124 Yorkshire Road, Irondequoit, a few days ago is an oddly natural bit of self-expression — or, more correctly, the way it was sent.

Across the face of the envelope the 20-year-old junior had set Heidi's name and address to song as lyrics below a brisk ten bars of original melody. The score was sent air mail and in the key of G from Dickson's hometown of Columbus, Ohio.

Heidi, a sophomore also majoring in biology at Wittenberg, gave the work an enthusiastic hearing when Dickson played the envelope on the family piano yesterday. The performer is visiting her during the Christmas recess.

Critical reaction from postal authorities was not immediately available.

Letter speaks, or should we say, sings for itself.

Tumarkin at music center

Robert Tumarkin, son of Mr. and Mrs. Tumarkin, 34 Bellingham Rd., South Brookline, is one of 60 young musicians from all over the United States to participate in Boston University's Young Artists Program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass.

Tumarkin, who will enter Boston University in September, plays the piano. He was a recipient of the Harry Dubbs Memorial Award as well as having performed as a soloist with the Boston Pops Orchestra.

The Young Artists Program, an intensive eight-week session of study and performance, is designed to lend a new dimension in musical education for exceptionally talented high school musicians. Now in its fifth year, the Young Artists Program provides the aspiring musicians an opportunity to study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and faculty from Boston University's Division of Music.

Besides their membership in the Young Artists Symphony Orchestra, these young musicians attend private lessons and also perform in chamber groups of various sizes. They attend music theory classes, and during the course of the eight weeks, many of the Young Artists also give recitals at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. An added plus is the chance the young musicians have to attend all open rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as other musical activities at Tanglewood.

CAPITAL CITY NEWS BUREAU
ROCHESTER
CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

WHITE PLAINS DISPATCH
Saturday, August 15, 1970

Cellist Joins B.U. Group At Berkshire

ARDSLEY—

David Schwartz, son of Seymour Schwartz of 4 Rest Ave., is one of 60 young musicians participating in Boston University's young artists program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass.

Mr. Schwartz, a senior at Ardsley High School, plays the cello. During the eight-week session he is studying with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the faculty of Boston University's division of music.

He is a member of the Young Artists Symphony of the program and is attending private lessons and performing in chamber groups. The musicians also give recitals at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and attend rehearsals and concerts of the orchestra.

CITY NEWS BUREAU
ALBANY, N.Y.
NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS
COMPLETE NEW YORK STATE SERVICE

Times Union
Friday, December 4, 1970

Hudson Valley Orchestra Will Give Concert Sunday

Young American cellist James Kreger will appear with the Hudson Valley Philharmonic Orchestra under the direction of Claude Monteux at the Poughkeepsie High School Sunday evening.

Kreger, winner of the 1969 Young Artist's Competition sponsored by the Friends of the Philharmonic, will be the guest artist in a presentation of the Tchaikovsky "Rococo Variations for Cello and Orchestra."

The Philharmonic will also be heard in performances of three canzone by the Italian Renaissance composer Gabrielli, Samuel Barber's Second Essay for Orchestra" and Anton Dvorak's "Symphony No. 7." The concert will begin at 8:30 p.m.

Kreger has previously soloed with several orchestras, including the Nashville Symphony and the Julliard Orchestra. He also served as first cellist of the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra under Erich Leinsdorf at Tanglewood.

HERALD
MANCHESTER, CONN.
(E) 15,210
JUN 1 1970
New England Newsclip

At Tanglewood

Preston A. Trombly, a graduate at the Yale University School of Music, has been appointed a fellow of conducting and composition at Tanglewood, the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass., this summer. He is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Perley A. Trombly of 141 Waranoke Rd.

He received a $1,000 award from Broadcast Music, Inc. on May 26 at a reception held at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel in New York City for his electronic tape, "Kinetics I." This work was heard at Manchester Community College on May 1 when Trombly directed a group of Yale musicians and dancers in a contemporary concert.

In March, he conducted his composition, "Opera - Septima," at Lincoln Center in New York City. His electronic tapes have been heard at the University of Connecticut and the Solomon R. Guggenheim Museum, and his solo pieces for piano and oboe have been performed.

Yale has awarded him a $2,500 fellowship for continued studies.

Trombly graduated from Manchester High School in 1964, and received his bachelor of music degree with honors from the University of Connecticut in 1968. At MHS, he was active in band and orchestra, and received the Chaminade Club's Laurel Music Camp Award and the Daniel Manchuck Music Scholarship in 1963.

He was choir director of the Second Congregational Church choir for two years, a member of the Manchester Civic Orchestra, and an announcer for radio stations WILI in Willimantic and WCCC in Hartford.

He is married to the former Miss Gail S. Pomeroy of Danbury. They have two children, Bryan, 3, and Allyson, born on May 12 this year.

Star-News Photo

PRACTICE MAKES NATIONAL CITY MUSICIANS READY.
Patrick and Laura Kojima will spend summer at Tanglewood.

Siblings headed east— to music paradise

Laura and Patrick Kojima, young National City musicians, will spend the summer in a musician's paradise, Tanglewood, a 10-acre estate in the Berkshire Hills of Massachusetts.

The estate, reportedly unchanged since Nathaniel Hawthorne did his writing there, is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

LAURA and Patrick have each won partial scholarships to attend the Boston Symphony's unique summer school for the advanced study of music for young, gifted musicians from this country and abroad.

The son and daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Minoru Kojima of 1230 Palmer Way, Laura and Patrick both play with the San Diego Youth Orchestra which performed at the Invitational Music Festival at St. Moritz in Switzerland and gave concerts in Eurpoe last summer.

Laura, a senior at Sweetwater High School, plays the flute and violin and serves as concert mistress for the Youth Orchestra.

Patrick, a junior at Sweetwater, plays percussion, including the piano. The past three summers he has won the right to play in New York and Washington, D.C., with American Youth Performs, an orchestra composed of young musicians from all over the United States.

EACH OF the three summers, Patrick has been asked by persons he met in New York and Washington if he would like to come to Tanglewood when he was old enough.

Now a junior in high school, Patrick, 15, is old enough. He received a $700 scholarship to apply toward the $900 required to attend the summer session.

Laura, 17, made her first trip to be a part of American Youth Performs this past summer. She received a $400 scholarship to Tanglewood.

They will leave next week for Albany, N.Y., where they will take a bus for Tanglewood, located in Lenox, Mass.

THERE THEY will join the Young Artists Orchestra, receive private lessons, have chamber music sessions, concerts and, best of all, attend many concerts of the Boston Symphony and hear world renowned artists.

Famous conductors directing the orchestra this summer will include Leonard Bernstein, Aaron Copeland, Arthur Fiedler, Rafael Fruhbeck de Burgos, Alain Lombard, Charles Mackerras, Jorge Mester, Seiji Azawa, Kenneth Schermerhorn, Gunther Schuller, William Steinberg and Michael Tilson Thomas.

The list of guest artists appearing with the orchestra would make a musician's head swim. Concerts will be held Friday, Saturday and Sunday night — with some thrown in during the week for good measure.

THERE WILL also be time for some contemporary music, including an appearance of Peter, Paul and Mary.

The concentrated eight weeks of study will find both students and faculty giving public performances nearly every day.

Young musicians from all over the world apply for admission to Tanglewood. Of necessity, a very limited number can be accepted.

LAURA and Patrick, although invited to submit an application, had to send tapes of their work to be judged in competition with other applicants to secure their entry there.

When they return to National City and Sweetwater in the fall their heads — and their hearts — should be filled with music.

Realization of the fact that they were ready to take advantage of such an opportunity should make all their long hours and years of practice worthwhile.

From Mexico With Violin

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Juan Ruben Ramirez-Hernandez has a musical family in Salamanca, state of Guanajuato, Mexico.

He'll have plenty to tell them shortly when he visits home after being away for two years.

Like campus riots, America's musical standards, rock, hippies, and why he's determined to return to this country permanently.

In fact, he's going to apply for American citizenship.

Ramirez is 25, a violinist, and has the distinction of attending the Berkshire Music Center this summer for the third consecutive year.

In Conservatory at 14

He was born in Tampico on Mexico's east coast and showed such talent that he was enrolled at the National Conservatory of Music in Mexico City at 14.

"In Mexico there's no real music training in the public schools," he explains. "You have to attend a specialized school to learn music."

Juan wants to settle in this country because musical standards are higher than in Mexico.

"When I first came here, there was no thought of staying," he admits, "but this has been a rich experience."

Some things have bothered him during his last three-plus years in the United States but not enough to keep him away.

His reaction to campus disorders is mild, to say the least.

The 'Uncomfortable' Americans

"I can see that young Americans are uncomfortable," is his judgment. "It's pretty much the same situation as young Mexicans' behavior at the Olympic Games in 1969."

Anyone who has attended concerts in Latin America knows that audiences don't wait to express themselves in the lobby at intermission.

"Mexican audiences are very frank," he says, "especially if they don't like the music or performance. They might even start screaming. Don't forget, we Mexicans are pretty temperamental . . . and we live in a tropical climate."

With its sparsity of orchestras, opera companies, and recitals, it's difficult for a professional Mexican musician to have much of a career.

Conservative in Dress

Ramirez is a conservative in dress and behavior, but a liberal in understanding.

He sees something of real value emerging from rock and the hippy movement. But there's a hitch so far as he's concerned.

"If young musicians want to create something enduring to represent their own age, they need composers. Composers are trained. That's a basic fact.

"I don't see any real development yet, but someday it could happen. The whole rock-hippy picture needs unification."

Until it does happen, he believes that "the old generation is doing fine."

Favorite Violinists

His musical idols just happen to be from "the old generation." Favorite violinists are Jascha Heifetz, Henryk Szeryng, and Arthur Grumiaux.

One young violinist he admires is Joseph Silverstein, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony, who is his teacher.

According to Ramirez, most Americans have a curious concept of Mexican music. The insects seem to have an edge — la cucaracha (the cockroach) and el mosco (the fly).

This is a sore point with serious Mexican musicians, and it doesn't help to have Aaron Copland's "El Salon Mexico" cited as an example of national Mexican music. "The Fly," by the way, is a leading character in that American-bred opus.

It's like giving "Camptown Races" as an example of National American music and ignoring Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

Ramirez says that the serious Mexican composer has a problem in getting his music played abroad. For example, when did you last hear a work by Silvestre Revueltas?

He died in 1899, but is still considered to be the "modern Mexicanist of music."

Juan Ramirez, set for a concert. He plans to live in U.S.

"Revueltas has written pure and important Mexican music," says Ramirez. "He went back to the Aztecs for his inspiration, and even used some of their original instruments."

Although culture is partly subsidized by the Mexican government, music is still a prohibitively expensive luxury to the average Mexican.

"This is one of the reasons that Mexican standards are lower," Ramirez opines, "audiences are smaller and most of the best music is focussed in Mexico City."

"We should receive more help from the government," he continues. "The result is that other countries import and support Mexican musicians."

One of the largest "importers" is the Soviet Union. Ramirez has several Mexican musical friends who are now in Russia.

He is on full scholarship at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston and will begin his senior year in September.

Ramirez says music is admittedly improving in Mexico.

"It's better than it was," he reports, "little by little. There is some hope from those who train abroad and return to Mexico. They bring musical vitamins to the environment."

Unenchanting Americans

In view of the sometimes tempestuous reactions of Mexican audiences, Ramirez isn't entirely enchanted with Americans.

"I find that the nucleus of interested persons in an American audience is very small," he says. "People follow the polite rules. Serious music should be listened to very attentively."

He is downright concerned over the perilous financial straits in which most American musical institutions are finding themselves.

He should be in view of his hopes of earning a living as a musician in this country.

"It bothers me a lot," he affirms. "The government must come to the help of the arts, or private associations must. Students are worried about this. They don't know where they're going. It's like being in a depression."

Ramirez maintains high principles in his musical life.

As he puts it, "I guess you can do just about anything in music but tell a lie."

No matter what has already happened or is in the future, the young violinist from Tampico would follow exactly the same route.

Feather-Ruffling Work

"I have lived all my life in music," he says. "In Mexico, I started out playing in night clubs to keep going. In Boston, I play in symphony orchestras and for ballet companies. I have to be grateful to music. I have to find honesty in myself."

We recently heard Ramirez play — not the violin but the guitar — in a new work that ruffled the feathers of the conservatives.

What did Ramirez think of it?

"I thought it was beautiful," he says, "although I only played about five per cent of the notes."

He explained, "The mood was the thing. You must understand music by sound. There's no point to going into the text. Those instructions are for the performer."

"In other words," Ramirez says, "you do the listening and I'll do the thinking and hard work."

That's honest enough.

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 62,185 (S) 108,376
AUG 22 1970
New England Newsclip

CHICAGO
Daily Defender
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS
D. 37,506
JUL 14 1970

YOUNG CHICAGO COMPOSER Primous Fountain III is spending the summer at the internationally known Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood near Boston, Massachusetts, where he has received an associate fellowship. A student at the DePaul University School of Music, Fountain has had his works performed by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and has appeared on WLS TV's "For Blacks Only."

LOCK HAVEN, PA.
EXPRESS
D. 10,500
JUL 3 1970

Avis soprano will sing at Tanglewood

AVIS — Miss Joan M. Heller is one of eight singers awarded fellowships for study and performance at the Berkshire Music Center, affiliated with the annual international music festival at Tanglewood, Massachusetts. This summer will be her second at Tanglewood.

Miss Heller, a lyric coloratura, has a long list of awards and notable performances to her credit. In 1964, while an undergraduate at Oberlin College, she toured Europe and Russia with the Oberlin Choir. Last May she gave a recital at New York's Carnegie Hall with the Boston String Quartet. In addition she has sung with the Boston Symphony and at a composers' forum in Montreal. During the summer of 1968 she studied at the Mozarteum Summer Academy in Salzburg, Austria.

Miss Heller specializes in contemporary music. At Tanglewood she will sing "Weburn's "Five Songs of Stefan George," on July 14, and "Two Rilke Songs" by Donald Martino on July 28. Other performances have not yet been announced, but will take place throughout the eight-week session.

Miss Heller received a Master of Music degree in voice performance at New England Conservatory, Boston, earlier this month. She has studied voice with Ellen Repp, Re Koster, Gerald Moore and Lav Vrbanic.

MISS JOAN HELLER

DAY
NEW LONDON, CONN.
(E) 36,500
JUL 10 1970
New England Newsclip

Violinists Studying In Summer Programs

SUSAN SLOWICK

CHARLES PIKLER

Two Southeastern Connecticut violinists have been accepted into summer music programs.

Charles R. Pikler of 5 Huntington Place, Norwich, is in the 1970 Fellowship Program conducted by the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., the summer residence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Susan Slowick, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Slowick of 88 Gallivan Lane, Uncasville, is in Boston University's Young Artists Program and is studying this summer with Prof. Roman Totenberg.

Pikler played in the Berkshire Music Center Orchestra last week under the baton of Leonard Bernstein. He will be first violinist July 28 with a selected chamber music group performing a work by Aaron Copland. He recently completed his freshman year at the University of Connecticut.

Miss Slowick also played last week in an orchestra conducted by Bernstein. She is a senior at St. Bernard Girls' High School. Miss Slowick and Pikler had their first eight years of violin training with Ben Ornstein of Norwich.

GAZETTE
TAUNTON, MASS.
JUN 19 1970
New Engla. News

MUSICIANS

Two young Middleboro musicians have been accepted for their second year with the Greater Boston Youth Symphony Orchestra. Robert G. Nichols, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Nichols of 17 Webster St. and Paul Gross, the son of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Gross of Sproat St. were both selected following auditions.

Robert will enter his junior year at Middleboro Memorial High School in September. He studies trombone with Luther Churchill jr., and plays with the school organizations. He was a member of the SEMSBA band and played in the All State one year. He was chosen for district two years.

In addition to school activities, he is a member of the EYC and is an acolyte at the parish Church of Our Saviour, Episcopal.

Paul also will be a junior at MHS, and played percussion instruments, studying with Donald Leach. He played in the District Band, and was recommended for All State. Locally he plays with a group, "Prevailing Winds". Paul plans to attend the GBYSO workshop in Agassiz Village, Maine from Aug. 23-30.

He is an altar boy at the Sacred Heart Church, a member of the CYO and CCD. He also holds membership in the ECY. Paul sings with the Men's Choir at MHS and formerly played with the Hingham Civic Orchestra. He is employed part time by the Middleboro Housing Authority.

Saturday

WORCESTER TELEGRAM, AUGUST 15, 1970

An 18-Year-Old Conservative Composer Decries an Establishment 'Grip' on Music

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Christopher R. Kies, an 18-year-old composer-pianist-cellist from Chevy Chase, Maryland, isn't particularly conspicuous in this age of the New Look.

He gets three haircuts a year when he goes home to visit his family. His father does the cutting.

Kies composes and performs in an age of ultraprogressiveness while defending his right to be a conservative.

Summer at Tanglewood

He has completed his first year at The New England Conservatory in Boston, majoring in composition and piano. This summer, he holds a fellowship in both subjects at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood.

There's nothing surprising about it.

He's described as "exceptionally gifted" by Donald Martino, chairman of the Conservatory's composition department.

Theodore Lettvin of the Conservatory's piano department says that Kies is "an extremely talented pianist but also a composer and cellist."

Kies is, we repeat, 18.

To give you an idea: Last year, he went to Europe as a cellist with the Montgomery (Md.) County Youth Orchestra. When they reached Vienna he appeared as soloist with the orchestra in Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto.

Kies must be considered something of an enigma in this age of uninhibited self-expression. To some, it's a virulent "anti-establishment" movement.

To keep in step, most young composers use the shock treatment. The nonagenarians (over 30) leave the concert hall with battle-scarred ears and shattered nerves.

Young and not-so-young composers proclaim the "new sound" but aren't particularly interested in explaining it to outsiders. Within their own bailiwick they carry on a vigorous competition in this gray area of cacophony.

'All a Good Thing'

"We're in a stage of experimentation," says Kies. "When this is over, the best streams will survive. It's all a good thing because people are being exposed to all kinds of music."

Speaking of his own writing, Kies says:

"The style in which I'm now writing reflects both my natural musical tendencies, which are hard to explain, and my musical background.

"This background, besides a familiarity with the old masters, includes my exposure and great attachment to many of Bartok's works, also an interest in the music of Ives, Schoenberg and Prokofieff."

The Musicians Will Decide

Unlike some who believe that audiences will decide the fate of music eventually, Kies is of the opinion that it will be done by those who perform the music.

"I enjoy my own music when I can respect it," he says, "and when it appeals to me emotionally. Many composers try to appeal primarily to the intellect."

It woulud be easy to understand Kies' conservatism if he were deliberately writing music for the majority. But he is trying to fill voids that were incomplete in the past. To do it, he has to rely on such basic factors as discernible melody, compatible harmony, and recognizable rhythm.

He says that "in writing music, I find myself on the conservative side of things. I don't think every composer can or has to be innovative in the same way that Beethoven was. In short, my main concern is to write music well with as much originality as possible, but I also want it to have a wide intellectual and emotional appeal."

Among his works are a sonata for flute and piano, two piano sonatas, a movement for string quartet, and variations for string trio.

Kies started piano lessons when he was nine.

"I was a poor student for three years," he admits. "I liked to play but not to practice. I wasn't ready to accept the work that goes along.

"When I was so-called practicing. I'd placate my parents by making up something that sounded like my assignment."

He has also played the cello for seven years.

Then came two summers at the Junior Conservatory Camp in East Burke, Vt.

Composition was encouraged but Kies also studied theory and courses in musicianship.

Developed a Repertory

During these few years, he has acquired a sizable piano repertory of Bach, Beethoven sonatas, a good part of Bartok's monumental "Mikrokosmos," and standard romantic works.

We asked him which Chopin ballades he plays. "All four." And Chopin etudes? "All of them." There happen to be 24 of the keyboard devils.

"I don't include Debussy among my clear-cut favorites," he says, "although I think his music is really beautiful. But where some people find everything in Debussy, to me Beethoven represents the complete spectrum of musical expression."

Kies isn't quite clear as to exactly what should be done to bolster the waning serious concert audience with an influx of young people.

The 'Establishment' Grip

"It would help a lot if the 'establishment' lost its grip," he declares. "How many students can afford to go to Boston Symphony concerts? I couldn't get to hear the orchestra in Boston if I weren't lucky enough to have a pass."

Kies believes that an important music may emerge from rock.

"It will be done much like Gershwin who got two forms to cooperate (jazz and serious composition). I hear a lot of rock, jazz, electronic music ... but I haven't written any of them.

"These types won't have to be handed down. They will revitalize themselves periodically.

"Some electronic pieces I like. But some are trash. and I have no respect for trash."

His main interest is the piano, then composition. He has combined them by playing his own works in piano recitals in Washington, D.C., and the University of West Virginia.

George Crumb is his composition teacher at the Berkshire Music Center.

"He would like me to experiment with some of the less conservative forms," Kies says. "I might like to write some piano pieces in which the strings are plucked, much as John Cage has done. But, of course, that was 30 years ago."

Chris has no feeling of indifference or detachment from extreme contemporary idioms that he hears from his colleagues at the Berkshire Center.

Nor does he automatically applaud contemporary works by famed composers.

Like the Schoenberg Piano Concerto that Peter Serkin played recently at the Berkshire Music Festival with the Boston Symphony.

"I found it difficult to listen to," Kies admits. "But some of the qualities of orchestration and how Schoenberg worked in the piano was beautiful."

Kies isn't really a "long-haired" musician. But shoulder-length coiffures on others don't make any difference to him.

Like Seiji Ozawa, Tanglewood conductor of the Boston Symphony ...

Says Kies, "He looks cool."

Music Students and Berkshire Corn

8/-1/70

Padraic Spence

Students at the Berkshire Music Center were entertained at a corn roast last evening at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Curtis Buttenheim on Prospect Hill, Stockbridge.

High school students from all over the country are spending the summer at Tanglewood under the auspices of Boston University. They will present a concert in theatre concert hall tomorrow at 2:30 p.m. Tickets may be had by calling the box office

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52485 (S) 108,376

AUG 8 1970 New England Newsclip

This Classical Longhair Likes Rock

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

'Why? Rock appeals to more people's emotions. Music is nothing but emotion being written or played by an individual, whether he's a good technician or not.'

Most 23-year-old musicians with Franklin Cohen's record of achievement would feel that they had it made.

Cohen is on fellowship at the Berkshire Music Center, super graduate summer school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

Here's a young musician who takes a realistic view of things and expresses opinions without, as they say, gilding the lily.

He holds a plum job among the nation's bigtime orchestras as first clarinetist with the American Symphony in New York, conducted by the eminent Leopold Stokowski.

Going to Baltimore

In September, Cohen takes over a similar position with the Baltimore Symphony, conducted by Sergiu Comissiona. They appeared on Worcester Community Concerts at the Auditorium last March.

Cohen is fully aware of radical changes that are happening in the world of serious music, and how they might affect him.

"Sometimes it's bewildering," he says. "I'm in an art that might not exist in another 10 years."

Assuming that current orchestral maladies might be cured (little things like lack of money and support), Cohen is convinced that the whole structure of orchestras, programs, concert presentations and audiences will undergo drastic changes.

'Deaf, Dumb and Naive'

"You'd have to be deaf, dumb and naive to think that the orchestra will exist 100 years from now as it does today," he believes. "New instruments are being created constantly. Even today, instruments are not suited to new music."

For so young a musician, Cohen's career has been meteoric. Several of its highlights are the peak points of some successful musicians.

Two years ago, he won first prize in the Munich International Competition and has since concertized extensively in Germany and Switzerland — solo appearances with symphony orchestras and in recitals.

He has been clarinetist with the Stratford (Ont.) Music Festival Orchestra and Chamber Players. He has performed with the Aspen (Colo.) Festival Orchestra and was clarinet instructor in Aspen.

Graduate of Juilliard

After receiving a bachelor of music degree at the Juillard School in New York, the White Plains, N.Y., resident was appointed a fellow and has coached wind chamber music.

Cohen, whose friends call him Frank, believes that some of the problems agitating organizations of serious music in this country are due to mistakes made by the "establishment."

"It's the formal concert set-up," he says. "It's how you are expected to dress. You can't walk around. You should be able to approach musicians during a concert and closely observe the musicians that interest you."

(What a panic that would cause at Tanglewood!)

"Culture should be subsidized by the government in this country," Cohen believes. "The reason I say so is that I have concertized in Germany where music is government-supported. The people are really interested. Good attendance is a certainty."

"The reason for government subsidy here should not be to pay the musicians more money, but to make more music available to the people. There should be no control except by the people involved and not those giving the money."

Cohen isn't by any means enthralled by the life and situation he has found at the Berkshire Music Center.

"In artistic circles, one must have the freedom to live," he says. "The social aspect here is oppressive. Certainly a person in the arts should have a freer life than, say, a businessman.

"You can't create when you are being constantly watched and supervised."

Center's Musical Advantages

Cohen does acknowledge the musical advantages of the center.

"For young people, exposure to top figures in the field is very important," he states. "But once you've reached the pro status yourself, the advantages are limited."

The young clarinetist is highly enthusiastic over Gunther Schuller's insistence that students at the center be given wide exposure to contemporary music. Schuller is one of the center's artistic directors and president of The New England Conservatory of Music in Boston.

"I'm learning quite a bit of contemporary music," says Cohen. "According to Schuller, it's necessary to give young composers and conductors opportunities. It's a noble idea."

Cohen has no trouble relating to the young group that knows little, if anything, about Bach, Beethoven and Brahms.

He arrived for our interview on a motorcycle and carried his helmet onto the Tanglewood "campus."

Conversation inevitably turned to rock and the large audiences that come to Tangelwood for what are called "Contemporary Trends" concerts.

"One thing that impresses me is the crowds that come hours ahead of time to have a place on the lawn," Cohen says.

'Made to Feel Unwelcomed'

He went on: "There's so much talk about trying to win the rock audiences over to serious music. Well, there was a golden opportunity the day The Who was here, and they blew it.

"The orchestra was having a 10:30 a.m. rehearsal of Stravinsky's 'The Rite of Spring'. There were several dozen young people out on the lawns who would have liked to come in. They weren't invited. Who knows, this might have won them over. They were made to feel unwelcomed."

Does Cohen consider rock an important art form?

"Very important," he says. "I haven't really studied it but I recognize its marvelous inventiveness in new sound. Rock is making larger strides than serious contemporary music. Rock really turns me on."

"Why? Rock appeals to more people's emotions. Music is nothing but emotion being written or played by an individual, whether he's a good technician or not."

What does Cohen think of the rock musician?

"I listen to him with a great deal of respect. He loves his art as much as I love mine."

Much is said today about the immediacy with which young people want things to happen — end the war, put a stop to poverty, bring about reforms — now. Are young musicians impatient to get on with a career, seeking this same immediacy?

"I was," Cohen admits. "I wanted to be successful very quickly. As I became more successful, the immediacy was less important. But you know, if you don't make it, it's difficult to be happy."

Do serious musicians resent the astronomical fees that are paid rock musicians? There's talk around Tanglewood about an undercurrent of gripe from some members of the Boston Symphony.

Cohen says, "resentment is selfishness. It's the serious musicians' fault. They should try to create greater interest in their own music.

"Many of them treat music like a routine job. If they played better and built up a bigger following, they'd get paid more."

Cohen's ultimate ambition as a musician is to become involved with the art in many ways. He wants to continue being a soloist, play chamber music, play with orchestras, and he wants to teach. Besides playing with the Baltimore Symphony, he will also be teaching at the Peabody Conservatory of Music.

"But I certainly don't want to be a 52-week-a-year orchestra player," he insists, meaning to the exclusion of everything else.

Cohen's hobbies are his motorcycle ("if music, fails, I can always be a motorcycle racer") and tennis — all sports in fact.

"I'm a fidgety guy," he says. "I like to keep on the move. That's why music is good for me."

Cohen has listened to many recordings of great performers of the past. We asked him how he thinks the young virtuosos compare with them.

Standards Have Risen

"People are getting smarter," he replied. "They have better opportunities to learn and they learn faster. Standards are higher today. For example, Nielsen's Clarinet Concerto was thought to be prohibitive for a long time. A young soloist played it. Now it's a standard and it has to be played at least as well to make the grade at all."

About "avant-garde" music:

"I haven't played that much and what I have played I haven't enjoyed. At least it's challenging."

Cohen is one musician who can see some advantage in the menacing upheavals of his own generation, the wars in Southeast Asia and the Middle East, poverty, racial discrimination, and all the reasons for youthful protest.

"I can't understand why these things exist at all," he says. "Being exposed to all these horrors makes one a better musician because it explores regions of sensitivity that couldn't otherwise be touched."

Cohen: The rock musician "loves his art as much as I love mine."

Dawn Rita Involved in Young Artists Program

NORWICH — Miss Dawn M. Rita, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Rita Jr., 76 Newton Street, is one of 60 young musicians from all over the United States participating in Boston University's Young Artists Program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass.

Miss Rita, a senior at Norwich Free Academy, plays the violin.

The Young Artists Prom, an intensive eight-week session of study and performance, is designed to lend a new dimension in musical education for exceptionally talented high school musicians. Now in its fifth year, the Young Artists Program provides the aspiring musicians an opportunity to study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and faculty from Boston University's Division of Music.

Besides their membership in the Young Artists Symphony Orchestra, these young musicians attend private lessons and also perform in chamber groups of various sizes. They attend music theory classes, and during the course of the eight weeks, many of the Young Artists also give recitals at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An added plus is the chance the young musicians have to attend all open rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as other musical activities at Tanglewood.

BULLETIN
NORWICH, CONN.
(M) 31,475 (S) 28,895

AUG 13 1970 New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813

JUL 2 1970 New England Newsclip

MASTER CLASSES AT TANGLEWOOD

Two distinguished American artists, soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janis, will each present a series of master classes at Tanglewood this summer under the joint sponsorship of the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center and Boston University's Tanglewood Institute. Each will have the title Artist--in-Residence, Tanglewood 1970.

Miss Curtin will give master classes 10 hours each week during the eight-week Tanglewood season. She will also offer a special Fourth of July Weekend session, three master classes on July 3, 4, and 5. All participants in her classes have the privilege of attending rehearsals and Berkshire Festival concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center programs. For those attending the Fourth of July Weekend, there are two Festival concerts conducted by Seiji Ozawa and one by Leonard Bernstein.

Mr. Janis will be in residence July 27 through August 21. During his four-week session, attention will be given to his students' individual needs, although the main emphasis will be on the piano literature itself. Participants in Mr. Janis' classes are also invited to attend all Berkshire Festival rehearsals and concerts and Berkshire Music Center events.

The Tanglewood season began Sunday, June 28 with the Opening Exercises of the Berkshire Music Center's 30th Anniversary Season, at which Leonard Bernstein delivered the principal address. Mr. Bernstein is Advisor to Tanglewood beginning this season. Tanglewood's Artistic Directors, beginning this year, are conductor Seiji Ozawa and composer Gunther Schuller. Leon Barzin heads the Tanglewood conducting program, which this season is offered in collaboration with the National Orchestral Association of New York City.

Soprano Phyllis Curtin, a native West Virginian who recently was named "West Virginia Woman of the Year," has sung leading operatic roles at the Metropolitan Opera, La Scala, Milan, the Vienna State Opera, New York City Opera, and the world's other leading opera houses. She is widely known for her work on behalf of contemporary music, including singing the title role in the world premiere of Carlisle Floyd's opera, Susannah and in the American premiere with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Benjamin Britten's War Requiem. She has appeared often with the Boston Symphony and recorded with it for RCA. This summer, she sings July 11 with the Boston Symphony in a concert performance of Mozart's Cosi fan Tutte, conducted by Seiji Ozawa, and gives a Weekend Prelude recital on July 24. The Weekend Preludes are short programs by noted performers and are the initial musical events of each Festival Weekend.

Byron Janis, one of the few students of Vladimir Horowitz, has been sought after as a virtuoso performer and sensitive musician since his debut recital in Carnegie Hall in 1948. He has performed some fifteen times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1949, playing concertos of Beethoven, Liszt, and Rachmaninov, and has won the Grand Prix du Disque for his recordings. Following his Tanglewood classes, he embarks on a coast-to-coast concert tour during the 1970/71 season.

UNIONLEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
(M&E) 57,003

JUL 7 1970 New Englar Newsc

Tanglewood Has Soprano Instructor

LENOX, Mass. — Soprano Phyllis Curtin is the first Granrud artist-in-residence at the Berkshire Music Center.

A bequest of $75,000 has been received from the estate of the late Mrs. Marian D. Granrud of Springfield to be used to provide an instructor at the center for special seminars, workshops and master classes.

According to Talcott M. Banks, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's board of trustees, Miss Curtin will offer master classes 10 hours each week during the eight-week Tanglewood session. All class participants may attend rehearsals and Berkshire Festival concerts of the Boston Symphony and other Center programs.

SENTINEL
ANSONIA, CONN.
(E) 17

JUN 17 1970 New Englar Newsc

Tanglewood features two maser classes

BOSTON (AP) — Soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janis will be artists in residence at Tanglewood this summer. Each will give master classes.

Miss Curtin will give master classes 10 hours a week during the eight-week season. Janis will be in residence July 27-Aug. 21, with emphasis on piano literature.

Miss Curtin will sing in a concert performance of Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" on July 11 and give a short recital on July 24.

BULLETIN
NORWICH, CONN.
(M) 31,475 (S) 28,895

AUG 22 1970 New England Newsclip

Student at Berkshire Music Center

NORWICH — Miss Dawn Rita, recipient of a scholarship at Boston University's Young Artists Program, has been studying for eight weeks at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass. She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Rita, Jr. of 76 Newton St.

While at Tanglewood Miss Rita studied under Prof. Alfred Schnieder, quartet coach; Prof. Roman Totenberg and octet coach Prof. William Kroll. Being a member of Boston University Young Artist Orchestra, she played under the baton of Leonard Bernstein, Seiji Ozawa, James Yannatos and Michael Tilson Thomas.

Miss Rita, a senior at Norwich Free Academy, is concertmaster of the Academy Orchestra. She was also concertmaster of Eighth Concert Festival of Connecticut Eastern Division Symphony Orchestra; has been a member of Connecticut All-State Orchestra for three years; Eastern Connecticut Symphony Youth Orchestra, two years; and Connecticut College Orchestra for five years. She is presently studying under Mrs. Margaret Wiles, who is affiliated with the Music Department at Connecticut College in New London.

RANSCRIPT
IORTH ADAMS, MASS.
E) 13,500

UN 26 1970 New England Newsclip

Classes at Tanglewood

LENOX—Two distinguished American artists, soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janis, will each present a series of master classes at Tanglewood this summer under the joint sponsorship of the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center and Boston University's Tanglewood Intitute. Each will have the title Artist-in-Residence, Tanglewood 1970.

Miss Curtin will give master classes 10 hours each week during the eight-week Tanglewood season. She will also offer a special Fourth of July Weekend session, three master classes on July 3, 4, and 5. All participants in her classes have the privilege of attending rehearsals and Berkshire Festival concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center programs. For those attending the Fourth of July Weekend, there are two Festival concerts conducted by Seiji Ozawa and one by Leonard Bernstein.

Mr. Janis will be in residence July 27 through Aug. 21. During his four-week session, attention will be given to his students' individual needs, although the main emphasis will be on the piano literature itself. Participants in Mr. Janis's classes are also invited to attend all Berkshire Festival rehearsals and concerts and Berkshire Music Center events.

THE MIAMI NEWS
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 87,421 SAT. 80,390

JUL 8 1970

Prominent artists teach at Tanglewood

The Associated Press

BOSTON — Soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Jamis will be artists in residence at Tanglewood this summer. Each will give master classes.

Miss Curtin will give master classes 10 hours a week during the eight-week season. Janis will be in residence July 27-Aug. 21, with emphasis on piano literature.

Miss Curtin will sing in a concert performance of Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" on July 11 and give a short recital on July 24.

DAY
NEW LONDON, CONN.
(E) 36,500

AUG 27 1970 New England Newsclip

Miss Rita Ends Training At Tanglewood

NORWICH — Dawn Rita, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Rita Jr. of 76 Newton Street, has completed eight weeks at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass., a part of the Tanglewood Music Festival.

She studied violin under Alfred Schnieder, Roman Totenberg and William Kroll. She played in the Boston University Young Artist Orchestra under Leonard Bernstein, Seiji Ozawa, James Yannatos and Michael Tilson Thomas. In addition, she participated in a string quartet and an octet.

She was concertmaster of the Eighth Concert Festival of the Connecticut Eastern Division Symphony Orchestra, and she has played in the Connecticut All-State Orchestra for three years. She will be a senior at Norwich Free Academy.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

JUN 18 1970 New Englar Newsc

Tanglewood Artists In Residence

BOSTON (AP) — Soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Jamis will be artists in residence at Tanglewood this summer. Each will give master classes.

Miss Curtin will give master classes 10 hours a week during the eight-week season. Jamis will be in residence July 27-Aug. 21, with emphasis on piano literature.

Miss Curtin will sing in a concert performance of Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" on July 11 and give a short recital on July 24.

Dawn Rita Involved in Young Artists Program

NORWICH — Miss Dawn M. Rita, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Rita Jr., 76 Newton Street, is one of 60 young musicians from all over the United States participating in Boston University's Young Artists Program at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass.

Miss Rita, a senior at Norwich Free Academy, plays the violin.

The Young Artists Prom, an intensive eight-week session of study and performance, is designed to lend a new dimension in musical education for exceptionally talented high school musicians. Now in its fifth year, the Young Artists Program provides the aspiring musicians an opportunity to study with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and faculty from Boston University's Division of Music.

Besides their membership in the Young Artists Symphony Orchestra, these young musicians attend private lessons and also perform in chamber groups of various sizes. They attend music theory classes, and during the course of the eight weeks, many of the Young Artists also give recitals at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An added plus is the chance the young musicians have to attend all open rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as other musical activities at Tanglewood.

BULLETIN
NORWICH, CONN.
(M) 31,475 (S) 28,895
AUG 13 1970 New England Newsclip

JOURNAL
LAKEVILLE, CONN.
WEEKLY 3,813
JUL 2 1970 New England Newsclip

MASTER CLASSES AT TANGLEWOOD

Two distinguished American artists, soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janis, will each present a series of master classes at Tanglewood this summer under the joint sponsorship of the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center and Boston University's Tanglewood Institute. Each will have the title Artist-in-Residence, Tanglewood 1970.

Miss Curtin will give master classes 10 hours each week during the eight-week Tanglewood season. She will also offer a special Fourth of July Weekend session, three master classes on July 3, 4, and 5. All participants in her classes have the privilege of attending rehearsals and Berkshire Festival concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center programs. For those attending the Fourth of July Weekend, there are two Festival concerts conducted by Seiji Ozawa and one by Leonard Bernstein.

Mr. Janis will be in residence July 27 through August 21. During his four-week session, attention will be given to his students' individual needs, although the main emphasis will be on the piano literature itself. Participants in Mr. Janis' classes are also invited to attend all Berkshire Festival rehearsals and concerts and Berkshire Music Center events.

The Tanglewood season began Sunday, June 28 with the Opening Exercises of the Berkshire Music Center's 30th Anniversary Season, at which Leonard Bernstein delivered the principal address. Mr. Bernstein is Advisor to Tanglewood beginning this season. Tanglewood's Artistic Directors, beginning this year, are conductor Seiji Ozawa and composer Gunther Schuller. Leon Barzin heads the Tanglewood conducting program, which this season is offered in collaboration with the National Orchestral Association of New York City.

Soprano Phyllis Curtin, a native West Virginian who recently was named "West Virginia Woman of the Year," has sung leading operatic roles at the Metropolitan Opera, La Scala, Milan, the Vienna State Opera, New York City Opera, and the world's other leading opera houses. She is widely known for her work on behalf of contemporary music, including singing the title role in the world premiere of Carlisle Floyd's opera, Susannah and in the American premiere with Erich Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Benjamin Britten's War Requiem. She has appeared often with the Boston Symphony and recorded with it for RCA. This summer, she sings July 11 with the Boston Symphony in a concert performance of Mozart's Cosi fan Tutte, conducted by Seiji Ozawa, and gives a Weekend Prelude recital on July 24. The Weekend Preludes are short programs by noted performers and are the initial musical events of each Festival Weekend.

Byron Janis, one of the few students of Vladimir Horowitz, has been sought after as a virtuoso performer and sensitive musician since his debut recital in Carnegie Hall in 1948. He has performed some fifteen times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1949, playing concertos of Beethoven, Liszt, and Rachmaninov, and has won the Grand Prix du Disque for his recordings. Following his Tanglewood classes, he embarks on a coast-to-coast concert tour during the 1970/71 season.

UNIONLEADER
MANCHESTER, N. H.
(M&E) 57,003
JUL 7 1970 New Englar Newsc

Tanglewood Has Soprano Instructor

LENOX, Mass. — Soprano Phyllis Curtin is the first Granrud artist-in-residence at the Berkshire Music Center.

A bequest of $75,000 has been received from the estate of the late Mrs. Marian D. Granrud of Springfield to be used to provide an instructor at the center for special seminars, workshops and master classes.

According to Talcott M. Banks, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's board of trustees, Miss Curtin will offer master classes 10 hours each week during the eight-week Tanglewood session. All class participants may attend rehearsals and Berkshire Festival concerts of the Boston Symphony and other Center programs.

SENTINEL
ANSONIA, CONN.
JUN 17 1970 New Englar Newsc

Tanglewood features two maser classes

BOSTON (AP) — Soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janis will be artists in residence at Tanglewood this summer. Each will give master classes.

Miss Curtin will give master classes 10 hours a week during the eight-week season. Janis will be in residence July 27-Aug. 21, with emphasis on piano literature.

Miss Curtin will sing in a concert performance of Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" on July 11 and give a short recital on July 24.

BULLETIN
NORWICH, CONN.
(M) 31,475 (S) 28,895
AUG 28 1970 New England Newsclip

Student at Berkshire Music Center

NORWICH — Miss Dawn Rita, recipient of a scholarship at Boston University's Young Artists Program, has been studying for eight weeks at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass. She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Rita, Jr. of 76 Newton St.

While at Tanglewood Miss Rita studied under Prof. Alfred Schnieder, quartet coach; Prof. Roman Totenberg and octet coach Prof. William Kroll. Being a member of Boston University Young Artist Orchestra, she played under the baton of Leonard Bernstein, Seiji Ozawa, James Yannatos and Michael Tilson Thomas.

Miss Rita, a senior at Norwich Free Academy, is concertmaster of the Academy Orchestra. She was also concertmaster of Eighth Concert Festival of Connecticut Eastern Division Symphony Orchestra; has been a member of Connecticut All-State Orchestra for three years; Eastern Connecticut Symphony Youth Orchestra, two years; and Connecticut College Orchestra for five years. She is presently studying under Mrs. Margaret Wiles, who is affiliated with the Music Department at Connecticut College in New London.

TRANSCRIPT
NORTH ADAMS, MASS.
(E) 13,500
JUN 26 1970 New England Newsclip

Classes at Tanglewood

LENOX—Two distinguished American artists, soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janis, will each present a series of master classes at Tanglewood this summer under the joint sponsorship of the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center and Boston University's Tanglewood Intitute. Each will have the title Artist-in-Residence, Tanglewood 1970.

Miss Curtin will give master classes 10 hours each week during the eight-week Tanglewood season. She will also offer a special Fourth of July Weekend session, three master classes on July 3, 4, and 5. All participants in her classes have the privilege of attending rehearsals and Berkshire Festival concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Berkshire Music Center programs. For those attending the Fourth of July Weekend, there are two Festival concerts conducted by Seiji Ozawa and one by Leonard Bernstein.

Mr. Janis will be in residence July 27 through Aug. 21. During his four-week session, attention will be given to his students' individual needs, although the main emphasis will be on the piano literature itself. Participants in Mr. Janis's classes are also invited to attend all Berkshire Festival rehearsals and concerts and Berkshire Music Center events.

THE MIAMI NEWS
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 67,421 SAT. 80,300
JUL 8 1970

Prominent artists teach at Tanglewood

The Associated Press

BOSTON — Soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Jamis will be artists in residence at Tanglewood this summer. Each will give master classes.

Miss Curtin will give master classes 10 hours a week during the eight-week season. Janis will be in residence July 27-Aug. 21, with emphasis on piano literature.

Miss Curtin will sing in a concert performance of Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" on July 11 and give a short recital on July 24.

DAY
NEW LONDON, CONN.
(E) 36,500
AUG 27 1970 New England Newsclip

Miss Rita Ends Training At Tanglewood

NORWICH — Dawn Rita, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Rita Jr. of 76 Newton Street, has completed eight weeks at the Berkshire Music Center in Lenox, Mass., a part of the Tanglewood Music Festival.

She studied violin under Alfred Schnieder, Roman Totenberg and William Kroll. She played in the Boston University Young Artist Orchestra under Leonard Bernstein, Seiji Ozawa, James Yannatos and Michael Tilson Thomas. In addition, she participated in a string quartet and an octet.

She was concertmaster of the Eighth Concert Festival of the Connecticut Eastern Division Symphony Orchestra, and she has played in the Connecticut All-State Orchestra for three years. She will be a senior at Norwich Free Academy.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100
JUN 18 1970 New Englar Newsc

Tanglewood Artists In Residence

BOSTON (AP) — Soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Jamis will be artists in residence at Tanglewood this summer. Each will give master classes.

Miss Curtin will give master classes 10 hours a week during the eight-week season. Jamis will be in residence July 27-Aug. 21, with emphasis on piano literature.

Miss Curtin will sing in a concert performance of Mozart's "Cosi fan Tutte" on July 11 and give a short recital on July 24.

Janis takes on an 'adventure', looks to the future

TELEGRAM
WORCESTER, MASS.
(M) 52,168 (S) 105,000

AUG 23 1970 New England Newsclip

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

Byron Janis and his wife, Maria, play with their cat.

Byron Janis is a member of the socially prominent jet set and one of the finest pianists on the platform today.

He has just added a new activity to his brilliant 22-year career.

For the past several weeks, Janis has been conducting a master class for a dozen students at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood.

"It's quite an adventure," he says. "I am learning from teaching. A student will ask what's the best way to do a certain operation. That sets me to thinking and articulates my own ideas."

Janis is occupying a posh house in Sheffield with his wife and 15-year-old son Stefan, by a first marriage.

'Coop's' Daughter

Mrs. Janis is the former Maria Veronica Cooper, daughter of the late movie star Gary Cooper. Her mother was socially prominent Veronica Balfe.

Stefan will be a junior this year at Exeter Academy.

The Janises have a New York apartment on Park Avenue and a farm in France.

The last quarter-mile to the Sheffield house is a narrow, hilly, winding, bumpy road. It would be a catastrophe to meet a car coming from the opposite direction.

"It's never happened," says Mrs. Janis; "so we don't worry about it."

At any rate, their privacy is assured. He practices on a grand piano that must have been flown in by helicopter. She paints. Stefan uses the swimming pool in the center of the huge living room. What a surprise a prowler would get if he entered that house in the dark!

Biographies tell that Janis made his professional debut at 19.

Three years before that, he had an experience a lot more shattering than any debut.

Toscanini Encounter

He had just started rehearsing Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto with a New York orchestra. He came to the fourth measure when an agonizing shout was heard.

"No! No! There's no ritard All you pianists do it! Even Serkin"

Storm center was Arturo Toscanini. The old man and Janis later became fast friends. Janis was a pupil of Toscanini's son-in-law, Vladimir Horowitz.

Janis doesn't believe there's a "generation gap" so far as serious musicians are concerned.

"The whole thing is extremely exaggerated," he states. "I don't think there's that much difference, although I've talked with some young people who feel that whatever is past is wrong."

There is an alarming development, however. Janis is seeing fewer young people in his audiences.

He explains. "It's that old pendulum that's swinging again. The music that has been written during the past 10 or 15 years is not great. We're in a transitional period. Romance has been brought back in rock and folk-rock."

'On a False High'

Janis would receive strong opposition from those who seek a new performing arts center for Worcester.

"The music profession has gone through inflation," he believes. "It's been on a false high. I don't think that serious music will ever have a mass public. People wanted it to grow much more than it has. The beautiful new halls are empty. The first few years, they were sold out. Then things went back to what they were."

Depending on how you look at it, Janis has good or bad news for the starry-eyed young pianist who thinks he's all set for a professional career.

First of all, Janis wouldn't encourage him to hope for such a career unless he had "enormous talent."

What about repertory?

"He should have a a minimum of five complete recital programs in his fingers, and 10 concertos," Janis advises. "Demands are much greater on an artist today. Music has become much too exposed. You just can't have music around the clock."

Janis has run into challenging situations in his teaching.

Hits Exaggerated Styles

"Some play in a tremendously exaggerated manner," he says. "They say, 'I play as I wish because this is today.' I say, remember you're playing some one else's music. If you say to me that this is your real conviction, your real taste, then there's nothing more to be said."

At 42, Janis says, "I'm too young to say that I'm too old to listen to the young."

Famous throughout four continents, what are his great moments as a performer?

"It happens rarely," he admits, "but it's when I have the feeling that I'm out of the way as a performer. When I know that the audience is wholly absorbed in the music, and that I don't really exist."

Pianists' exaggerated mannerisms on the stage annoy Janis. So far as he's concerned, it all boils down to a simple fact: "The less you feel, the more you're going to look to external things to put yourself across."

Some of Janis' convictions would create surprise in some quarters.

Few pianists play as much as he does with orchestra, but recitals interest him more.

He believes that audiences for serious music will be smaller in the future.

Janis' technique has been compared to Horowitz', but he thinks it should be restricted to "virtuoso pieces."

He's an exceptional young pyrotechnician who states flatly that the great pianists of the past played as well, "if not better," than those of the present.

Furthermore, he claims that the instrument of the past was "easier to play."

Janis has no ax to grind with the critics, but it concerns him that "journalism has taken over for the sake of journalism."

"Critics should have more heart when they review young performers," he insists. "They should stop to think of the tremendous toil that the performer has gone through. It hurts me to see critics demolish a new artist without batting an eye."

Janis has had vivid experiences playing under young podium gymnasts.

"They try to take over and forget that the pianist is the soloist," he says. "Some of the best conductors have had experience in opera. They have a special talent for following a soloist."

Not long ago, Janis played three piano concertos in a single Paris concert.

He asked if he might conduct the Prokofieff Third from the keyboard. Permission granted.

"I had never raised my hand to an orchestra before," he recalls. "It was quite an experience, and I must say it went very well."

Adds to Repertory

In his 22 years on the concert stage, Janis has played a gigantic amount of repertory. He's still adding. Right now, he's preparing Brahms' First Piano Concerto, Rachmaninoff Fourth, Schumann's "Fantasiestucke," and Sonata No. 10 by Scriabin.

Janis foresees drastic future changes in concerts.

Mainly, he predicts that there will be a new piano in the next 20 years and it may even have quarter tones.

Janis first played in Worcester in 1949, the year following his sensational New York debut. He appeared on the Becker College series in Horticultural Hall.

The previous month, he had performed on Southbridge Community concerts. In 1957, he played Rachmaninoff's Third Piano Concerto at the Worcester Festival with the Philadelphia Orchestra and Eugene Ormandy.

BERKSHIRE EAGLE
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
(E) 30,100

AUG 21 1970 New England Newsclip

Whitestone

CONDUCTING FELLOW Isaiah Jackson, left, of the Berkshire Music Center discusses with Tanglewood adviser Leonard Bernstein the program he will conduct Saturday at 2:30 in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Works will include Reznicek's "Donna Diana Overture" and Debussy's "La Mer." Also participating for half the program will be another Center fellow, Mesru Mehmedov, conducting Copland and Strauss.

Saturday

WORCESTER TELEGRAM, JULY 18, 1970

Music 1: Getting Started at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

So far as his career is concerned, Isaiah Allen Jackson III of Virginia, New York and Tanglewood isn't worried that orchestras all over the country are screaming poverty and threatening suicide.

He has a fellowship in conducting at the Berkshire Music Center this summer. In the past that has proven to be almost a guarantee of success.

Among Jackson's predecessors at the Center are Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Carvalho, Lukas Foss and Seiji Ozawa.

Leon Barzin is his teacher at the Center. He most admires Bernstein.

Generation Gap in Music

"There's a generation gap in serious music, too," says Jack, as he's called. "What happens to music's future is up to us."

By "us" he means his own age group. He's 25.

"The responsibility lies with us. The older generation buys the tickets, but we've got to increase audiences. We've got to tap such young people as the nearly 19,000 who came to Tanglewood the other night to hear The Who."

Why don't they come to hear the Boston Symphony?

"Because they don't know the repertory," Jackson says. "Some of us know Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and when it's mentioned we think of that beautiful slow movement and the ridiculous third. But that doesn't mean a thing to most of the young generation."

The first opera Jackson conducted was Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte." It was at Harvard University, where he received his bachelor's degree.

More for The Who

"Cosi" was given in concert form at Tanglewood last Saturday night for an audience of 4,622. That's 14,000 less than The Who audience.

Would a young audience be turned on by "Cosi?"

"Not unless they could relate to it," says Jack. "In the first place, it was sung in Italian. But more important, the serious music audience is trapped in its seats. It has to stay trapped, without easy escape, until the end.

"Audiences should be free to move about, come and go, and be allowed spontaneous self-expression."

Soiling the Image

One of the headaches at serious music festivals that offer rock as extra-curricular attraction (for money, let's face it) is the ever-present possibility that serious trouble will develop. That would naturally soil the hallowed image.

Jackson believes that "when you get so many kids together, a euphoria sets in. Vibrations are active."

"They don't have a collective conscience," he says.

"Any one of them might feel that it's okay to throw the lunch box on the ground and stomp on it. They don't stop to think what a mess it would make if they all did it. Perhaps if they had to clean it all up, they would realize it."

"It goes on to the de-personalization of the individual," Jack says. "Somehow, the way one is brought up today, you feel like part of a mob.

'Merely a Coincidence'

"Music and violence together is merely a coincidence. I don't blame only the young people. The parents brought them up and made mistakes. But this doesn't relieve the young people of the responsibility of changing it."

Jackson started out in music as a four-year-old piano pupil. When he was ten he had a nerve injury in his arm. That spoiled his chances of studying the violin which he wanted to do. He took up clarinet.

At Harvard he joined the glee club. Director John Ferris offered a course in conducting. Jackson took the course.

Joined Tanglewood Chorus

His ambition was to conduct a Bach orchestra at Harvard. He needed more experience. He joined the Tanglewood Chorus, returned to Harvard and had a chance to conduct Mozart's "Cosi."

"One of my roommates did the directing. Another was the organizer. I conducted."

Jackson considers conducting opera the most challenging of all.

"A conductor gets his best experience in a pit," he believes. "You have to adjust to singers' whims. Sometimes you have to hold back 90 men while a soprano holds a high note until her vanity is satisfied and decides to come down from her lofty perch. After that, conducting just an orchestra seems easy."

His Teachers Well Known

Jackson's list of teachers reads like "Who's Who" — Nadia Boulanger at Fontainbleau, Jean Morel, Susanne Boch, Rence Longy, Jorge Mester, etc.

With that background and Bernstein as an idol, you might think it would be difficult for Jack to develop his own style. He adopts others' ideas only "when he can make practical use of them."

"In the first place," he says, "I don't conduct pieces I don't like. I'll admit it's part of professionalism to do so under extenuating circumstances.

"For example, if the orchestra commissions a new work that turns out to be bad and the conductor is expected to premiere it. He can't help thinking of all the bread it cost."

Complaints on the Slow Movement

We were reminded of a famed composer whose complaint to us against an equally famed conductor was that "he won't play the slow movement of my sixth symphony at my speed no matter how much I plead."

What would Jackson do under the same circumstances?

"Well, I'd try to persuade the composer that I could make it sound better at my tempo. When he wasn't around, I'd do it my way. A conductor has to make music as he feels it — otherwise it's not real. He has to BE the music. With a good conductor you can 'see' the music before it happens."

Semaphore Acrobatics

A surprise to those who are privileged to attend closed orchestra rehearsals is the calm with which the most agitated batonists behave themselves on platform when there's no one present but the orchestra. In the public performance, they suddenly become virtuosi of the signal corps.

"That conductor does his orchestra a disservice," Jackson opines. "His first duty is to the orchestra. He has to let them know what to expect of him. If he has his arms sticking out of a paper bag, he should still be able to do his job."

Jackson has a master's degree from Stanford University, another from the Juilliard School. He is now enrolled in the doctor of musical arts program at Juilliard.

He has three jobs at present: founder and director of New Amsterdam Chamber Orchestra; music director Youth Symphony Orchestra, Inc.; music director, Pre-College Orchestra at the Juilliard, all in New York City.

Jackson at the podium.

Photos for The Telegram by HEINZ WEISSENSTEIN

Jackson with Leonard Bernstein.

Jackson considers this the beginning.

"One has to be constantly learning," he says. "Music study is a lifetime job."

Unlike some conductors who have little interest or concern with players' performance problems, Jack learns as much as he can about the different instruments' idiosyncracies.

"When you're conducting and giving cues, you have to remember that the horn player's tone comes from his breath but the violinist's doesn't. It takes time for the horn player so I have to give him enough notice."

Musical Assassinations

Some major orchestras have been known to musically assassinate a conductor for whom they have no respect. It doesn't matter whether they like him personally or not.

Jackson is aware of this.

"It's as if the orchestra picks up vibrations and they know exactly what's going on in your head," he explains. "However, I certainly don't have a god complex. At the same time, it's impossible to have a total democracy in an orchestra. Only one person can give the orders."

Naturally, Jackson is vitally interested in his generation's new music. But with him it isn't automatically worthwhile only because it's a product of youth.

He's specific about it: "Of every twelve new compositions I hear, three are good, six are okay, and three are lousy."

Jackson has experienced no handicap as a serious musician because he's black.

"Everyone is wonderful to me and treats me only as a musician," he says.

"However, there have been other instances: Like the time I went home to Virginia by bus. The first bus took me as far as Washington, D.C. The driver was friendly. He spoke with a southern drawl. Then I took another bus from Washington to Virginia. The driver also spoke with a southern drawl and treated me as if I'd just rolled out from a cotton field."

Jackson feels that a conductor must be a well-informed person in other fields if he's to make his best music. He must take an interest in politics, world affairs, youthful developments, the general news.

Young Jackson doesn't need many words to sum up his opinion of the hottest subject to his own generation:

"There would be a lot more bread if there were fewer guns."

Clemens Kalischer

TOUCHÉ—It may look like a scene from "The Three Musketeers," but it's really conductor Leon Barzin, head of the Berkshire Music Center's Conducting Fellowship program, giving a pointer to Isaiah Jackson during a light moment in class. John Parass, Mr. Barzin's assistant looks on. The program, designed also for instrumentalists, composers and vocalists, continues at Lenox, Mass., through August 23.

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
DEC 21 1969

Ozawa Remembers One Who Helped

By RAYMOND ERICSON

TEN years ago when the late Charles Munch was musical director of the Boston Symphony, he was instrumental in bringing as a student to the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood, a young and obviously talented conductor. Next summer that same young man will be one of two artistic directors at Tanglewood, with special charge of the orchestral concerts that make up the Berkshire Music Festival. He is, of course, Seiji Ozawa, and his appointment to this post was announced last spring. But in the initial prospectus of the 1970 Tanglewood season, it is interesting to note that he will devote one program to Berlioz's Requiem as a memorial to Mr. Munch.

While all the details of the festival have not yet been planned, it is expected that Ozawa will conduct between 12 and 14 concerts, more than will be assigned to anyone else. Another of his programs will be a concert version of Mozart's "Così fan tutte," which he directed in his operatic debut at the Salzburg Festival this past year. If possible, he hopes to engage the same singers that performed for him at that time.

The list of festival conductors includes William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, who will present a six-concert Beethoven series (three concerts each on two successive weekends); Leonard Bernstein, who will lead Mahler's Symphony No. 2 during the opening weekend; Eugene Ormandy; Gunther Schuller, Tanglewood's other artistic director, who is in charge of the Center, and Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston orchestra's assistant conductor.

The eight-week festival will begin on July 3 and end on Aug. 23. The concurrent Center will have Leon Barzin as the new head of orchestral conducting and playing. The annual Festival of Contemporary Music, co-sponsored by the Center and the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, will take place from Aug. 15 to 20. Works have been commissioned from four composers for performance in this period: Richard Feliciano of Mills College, Barbara Kolb of the American Academy in Rome, Olly Wilson of Oberlin College and Jürg Wyttenbach of Switzerland.

CO-OP

"We were amazed that five people could come together and think so much alike," said Sara Tornay. She was speaking of a group of younger concert managers who have just incorporated themselves as the American-International Managers Society (AIMS). The organization came about because some normally competitive individuals found that they "weren't afraid of each other," and in cooperating discovered that they could be mutually helpful. They also discovered that they had similar ideas on benefiting the artists and impresarios they deal with.

The obvious advantages to themselves in working together include sharing—and thus reducing—expenses connected with printing, advertising, sending a representative to conventions around the country, hiring publicity writers and photographers. They will swap helpful information about out-of-town im-

Continued on Page 25

Ozawa Remembers One Who Helped

Continued from Page 19

presarios — those who are slow to pay bills, fail to make proper use of artist's publicity material furnished them or treat artists as something less than human.

On behalf of their artists they will set up a standard contract, which will, among other things, tell them exactly how much advance publicity material will be sent out on their behalf. It will also provide for advance payment to the artists of a portion of their fee by the out-of-town impresario. Too often, the latter is delinquent and fees arrive long after the artist has given his or her concert.

For the sake of impresarios who come to New York looking for a specific kind of artist (a soprano to sing Micaëla in "Carmen") AIMS will set up a single audition session. Frequently, a conductor has to contact several managements and arrange separate time-consuming auditions during a quick visit.

Beyond this, AIMS will consider broader policies on how foundations and industrial organizations might be persuaded to help artists or on fresh approaches to concert presentation.

Within the over-all organization, the managements retain their autonomy. Originally five, there are now eight managements in AIMS, those bearing the names of Miss Tornay, Albert Kay, Judith Liegner, Mary Spector and Bill Perrotta, Richard Torrence, Bernard and Rubin, Pacific World Artists (Kazuko Tatsumura Hillyer) and New Arts. AIM's office is at 230 West 79th Street, New York, N. Y. 10025.

RETIRING

This year meant the loss to the concert world of a distinguished soprano still at the height of her career. She is Maria Stader, who decided irrevocably that she would quit performing and go into teaching. Her final appearance before the public was made on Dec. 7 in New York as soloist with the Camerata Singers.

Although there have been no signs of deterioration in her singing, Miss Stader says that she knows time will take its toll and she does not want to begin reading in the press that her voice was not what it used to be. Her career spanned 30 years, beginning when she won the Geneva competition in 1939. However, the outbreak of the war meant the cancellation of some 60 engagements that her prize would have assured her. She had to confine her singing to Switzerland, and it wasn't until the late 1940's that she began to be known internationally.

Miss Stader had the legendary kind of training that made her an outstanding Bach and Mozart interpreter. "For three years," she says, "I and two other girls lived in the home of our teacher. We had lessons every day, and we were required to retire at 8 in the evening. No going out for us." The result was a vocal technique that seemed indestructible. "I never had to warm up before a concert," she says. "When others were vocalizing, I could sleep."

Short in height but very handsome, Miss Stader lives in Zurich, where she grew up, has a husband and two grown sons. (Oddly enough, she is Hungarian by birth.) America has not seen the last of her, since she plans to teach here as well as in Europe (she has already taught one summer at Aspen, Colo.). "I love teaching," she says, "and I think I can help many of the young singers today, particularly Americans, develop a proper Bach and Mozart style."

What did she remember best about her career? Singing a wartime Christmas Eve program in a candlelit church in Switzerland; singing with Bruno Walter, who brought her to Salzburg for the first postwar festival; a 12-hour recording session (piano rehearsals, then orchestral rehearsals, then the actual recording) with Fischer-Dieskau and the conductor Ferenc Fricsay, which none of them found tiring.

Saturday

WORCESTER TELEGRAM, JULY 18, 1970

Music 1: Getting Started at Tanglewood

By RAYMOND MORIN
Telegram Music Critic

So far as his career is concerned, Isaiah Allen Jackson III of Virginia, New York and Tanglewood isn't worried that orchestras all over the country are screaming poverty and threatening suicide.

He has a fellowship in conducting at the Berkshire Music Center this summer. In the past that has proven to be almost a guarantee of success.

Among Jackson's predecessors at the Center are Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Carvalho, Lukas Foss and Seiji Ozawa.

Leon Barzin is his teacher at the Center. He most admires Bernstein.

Generation Gap in Music

"There's a generation gap in serious music, too," says Jack, as he's called. "What happens to music's future is up to us."

By "us" he means his own age group. He's 25.

"The responsibility lies with us. The older generation buys the tickets, but we've got to increase audiences. We've got to tap such young people as the nearly 19,000 who came to Tanglewood the other night to hear The Who."

Why don't they come to hear the Boston Symphony?

"Because they don't know the repertory," Jackson says. "Some of us know Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and when it's mentioned we think of that beautiful slow movement and the ridiculous third. But that doesn't mean a thing to most of the young generation."

The first opera Jackson conducted was Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte." It was at Harvard University, where he received his bachelor's degree.

More for The Who

"Cosi" was given in concert form at Tanglewood last Saturday night for an audience of 4,622. That's 14,000 less than The Who audience.

Would a young audience be turned on by "Cosi?"

"Not unless they could relate to it," says Jack. "In the first place, it was sung in Italian. But more important, the serious music audience is trapped in its seats. It has to stay trapped, without easy escape, until the end.

"Audiences should be free to move about, come and go, and be allowed spontaneous self-expression."

Soiling the Image

One of the headaches at serious music festivals that offer rock as extra-curricular attraction (for money, let's face it) is the ever-present possibility that serious trouble will develop. That would naturally soil the hallowed image.

Jackson believes that "when you get so many kids together, a euphoria sets in. Vibrations are active."

"They don't have a collective conscience," he says.

"Any one of them might feel that it's okay to throw the lunch box on the ground and stomp on it. They don't stop to think what a mess it would make if they all did it. Perhaps if they had to clean it all up, they would realize it."

"It goes on to the de-personalization of the individual," Jack says. "Somehow, the way one is brought up today, you feel like part of a mob.

'Merely a Coincidence'

"Music and violence together is merely a coincidence. I don't blame only the young people. The parents brought them up and made mistakes. But this doesn't relieve the young people of the responsibility of changing it."

Jackson started out in music as a four-year-old piano pupil. When he was ten he had a nerve injury in his arm. That spoiled his chances of studying the violin which he wanted to do. He took up clarinet.

At Harvard he joined the glee club. Director John Ferris offered a course in conducting. Jackson took the course.

Joined Tanglewood Chorus

His ambition was to conduct a Bach orchestra at Harvard. He needed more experience. He joined the Tanglewood Chorus, returned to Harvard and had a chance to conduct Mozart's "Cosi."

"One of my roommates did the directing. Another was the organizer. I conducted."

Jackson considers conducting opera the most challenging of all.

"A conductor gets his best experience in a pit," he believes. "You have to adjust to singers' whims. Sometimes you have to hold back 90 men while a soprano holds a high note until her vanity is satisfied and decides to come down from her lofty perch. After that, conducting just an orchestra seems easy."

His Teachers Well Known

Jackson's list of teachers reads like "Who's Who" — Nadia Boulanger at Fontainbleau, Jean Morel, Susanne Boch, Rence Longy, Jorge Mester, etc.

With that background and Bernstein as an idol, you might think it would be difficult for Jack to develop his own style. He adopts others' ideas only "when he can make practical use of them."

"In the first place," he says, "I don't conduct pieces I don't like. I'll admit it's part of professionalism to do so under extenuating circumstances.

"For example, if the orchestra commissions a new work that turns out to be bad and the conductor is expected to premiere it. He can't help thinking of all the bread it cost."

Complaints on the Slow Movement

We were reminded of a famed composer whose complaint to us against an equally famed conductor was that "he won't play the slow movement of my sixth symphony at my speed no matter how much I plead."

What would Jackson do under the same circumstances?

"Well, I'd try to persuade the composer that I could make it sound better at my tempo. When he wasn't around, I'd do it my way. A conductor has to make music as he feels it — otherwise it's not real. He has to BE the music. With a good conductor you can 'see' the music before it happens."

Semaphore Acrobatics

A surprise to those who are privileged to attend closed orchestra rehearsals is the calm with which the most agitated batonists behave themselves on platform when there's no one present but the orchestra. In the public performance, they suddenly become virtuosi of the signal corps.

"That conductor does his orchestra a disservice," Jackson opines. "His first duty is to the orchestra. He has to let them know what to expect of him. If he has his arms sticking out of a paper bag, he should still be able to do his job."

Jackson has a master's degree from Stanford University, another from the Juilliard School. He is now enrolled in the doctor of musical arts program at Juilliard.

He has three jobs at present: founder and director of New Amsterdam Chamber Orchestra; music director Youth Symphony Orchestra, Inc.; music director, Pre-College Orchestra at the Juilliard, all in New York City.

Jackson at the podium.

Jackson with Leonard Bernstein.

Photos for The Telegram by HEINZ WEISSENSTEIN

Jackson considers this the beginning.

"One has to be constantly learning," he says. "Music study is a lifetime job."

Unlike some conductors who have little interest or concern with players' performance problems, Jack learns as much as he can about the different instruments' idiosyncracies.

"When you're conducting and giving cues, you have to remember that the horn player's tone comes from his breath but the violinist's doesn't. It takes time for the horn player so I have to give him enough notice."

Musical Assassinations

Some major orchestras have been known to musically assassinate a conductor for whom they have no respect. It doesn't matter whether they like him personally or not.

Jackson is aware of this.

"It's as if the orchestra picks up vibrations and they know exactly what's going on in your head," he explains. "However, I certainly don't have a god complex. At the same time, it's impossible to have a total democracy in an orchestra. Only one person can give the orders."

Naturally, Jackson is vitally interested in his generation's new music. But with him it isn't automatically worthwhile only because it's a product of youth.

He's specific about it: "Of every twelve new compositions I hear, three are good, six are okay, and three are lousy."

Jackson has experienced no handicap as a serious musician because he's black.

"Everyone is wonderful to me and treats me only as a musician," he says.

"However, there have been other instances: Like the time I went home to Virginia by bus. The first bus took me as far as Washington, D.C. The driver was friendly. He spoke with a southern drawl. Then I took another bus from Washington to Virginia. The driver also spoke with a southern drawl and treated me as if I'd just rolled out from a cotton field."

Jackson feels that a conductor must be a well-informed person in other fields if he's to make his best music. He must take an interest in politics, world affairs, youthful developments, the general news.

Young Jackson doesn't need many words to sum up his opinion of the hottest subject to his own generation:

"There would be a lot more bread if there were fewer guns."

The New York Times
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 895,505 SUN. 1,445,507
DEC 21 1969

Clemens Kalischer

TOUCHÉ—It may look like a scene from "The Three Musketeers," but it's really conductor Leon Barzin, head of the Berkshire Music Center's Conducting Fellowship program, giving a pointer to Isaiah Jackson during a light moment in class. John Parass, Mr. Barzin's assistant looks on. The program, designed also for instrumentalists, composers and vocalists, continues at Lenox, Mass., through August 23.

Ozawa Remembers One Who Helped

By RAYMOND ERICSON

TEN years ago when the late Charles Munch was musical director of the Boston Symphony, he was instrumental in bringing as a student to the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood, a young and obviously talented conductor. Next summer that same young man will be one of two artistic directors at Tanglewood, with special charge of the orchestral concerts that make up the Berkshire Music Festival. He is, of course, Seiji Ozawa, and his appointment to this post was announced last spring. But in the initial prospectus of the 1970 Tanglewood season, it is interesting to note that he will devote one program to Berlioz's Requiem as a memorial to Mr. Munch.

While all the details of the festival have not yet been planned, it is expected that Ozawa will conduct between 12 and 14 concerts, more than will be assigned to anyone else. Another of his programs will be a concert version of Mozart's "Così fan tutte," which he directed in his operatic debut at the Salzburg Festival this past year. If possible, he hopes to engage the same singers that performed for him at that time.

The list of festival conductors includes William Steinberg, music director of the Boston Symphony, who will present a six-concert Beethoven series (three concerts each on two successive weekends); Leonard Bernstein, who will lead Mahler's Symphony No. 2 during the opening weekend; Eugene Ormandy; Gunther Schuller, Tanglewood's other artistic director, who is in charge of the Center, and Michael Tilson Thomas, the Boston orchestra's assistant conductor.

The eight-week festival will begin on July 3 and end on Aug. 23. The concurrent Center will have Leon Barzin as the new head of orchestral conducting and playing. The annual Festival of Contemporary Music, co-sponsored by the Center and the Fromm Music Foundation of Chicago, will take place from Aug. 15 to 20. Works have been commissioned from four composers for performance in this period: Richard Feliciano of Mills College, Barbara Kolb of the American Academy in Rome, Olly Wilson of Oberlin College and Jürg Wyttenbach of Switzerland.

CO-OP

"We were amazed that five people could come together and think so much alike," said Sara Tornay. She was speaking of a group of younger concert managers who have just incorporated themselves as the American-International Managers Society (AIMS). The organization came about because some normally competitive individuals found that they "weren't afraid of each other," and in cooperating discovered that they could be mutually helpful. They also discovered that they had similar ideas on benefiting the artists and impresarios they deal with.

The obvious advantages to themselves in working together include sharing—and thus reducing—expenses connected with printing, advertising, sending a representative to conventions around the country, hiring publicity writers and photographers. They will swap helpful information about out-of-town im-

Continued on Page 25

Ozawa Remembers One Who Helped

Continued from Page 19

presarios — those who are slow to pay bills, fail to make proper use of artist's publicity material furnished them or treat artists as something less than human.

On behalf of their artists they will set up a standard contract, which will, among other things, tell them exactly how much advance publicity material will be sent out on their behalf. It will also provide for advance payment to the artists of a portion of their fee by the out-of-town impresario. Too often, the latter is delinquent and fees arrive long after the artist has given his or her concert.

For the sake of impresarios who come to New York looking for a specific kind of artist (a soprano to sing Micaëla in "Carmen") AIMS will set up a single audition session. Frequently, a conductor has to contact several managements and arrange separate time-consuming auditions during a quick visit.

Beyond this, AIMS will consider broader policies on how foundations and industrial organizations might be persuaded to help artists or on fresh approaches to concert presentation.

Within the over-all organization, the managements retain their autonomy. Originally five, there are now eight managements in AIMS, those bearing the names of Miss Tornay, Albert Kay, Judith Liegner, Mary Spector and Bill Perrotta, Richard Torrence, Bernard and Rubin, Pacific World Artists (Kazuko Tatsumura Hillyer) and New Arts. AIM's office is at 230 West 79th Street, New York, N. Y. 10025.

RETIRING

This year meant the loss to the concert world of a distinguished soprano still at the height of her career. She is Maria Stader, who decided irrevocably that she would quit performing and go into teaching. Her final appearance before the public was made on Dec. 7 in New York as soloist with the Camerata Singers.

Although there have been no signs of deterioration in her singing, Miss Stader says that she knows time will take its toll and she does not want to begin reading in the press that her voice was not what it used to be. Her career spanned 30 years, beginning when she won the Geneva competition in 1939. However, the outbreak of the war meant the cancellation of some 60 engagements that her prize would have assured her. She had to confine her singing to Switzerland, and it wasn't until the late 1940's that she began to be known internationally.

Miss Stader had the legendary kind of training that made her an outstanding Bach and Mozart interpreter. "For three years," she says, "I and two other girls lived in the home of our teacher. We had lessons every day, and we were required to retire at 8 in the evening. No going out for us." The result was a vocal technique that seemed indestructible. "I never had to warm up before a concert," she says. "When others were vocalizing, I could sleep."

Short in height but very handsome, Miss Stader lives in Zurich, where she grew up, has a husband and two grown sons. (Oddly enough, she is Hungarian by birth.) America has not seen the last of her, since she plans to teach here as well as in Europe (she has already taught one summer at Aspen, Colo.). "I love teaching," she says, "and I think I can help many of the young singers today, particularly Americans, develop a proper Bach and Mozart style."

What did she remember best about her career? Singing a wartime Christmas Eve program in a candlelit church in Switzerland; singing with Bruno Walter, who brought her to Salzburg for the first postwar festival; a 12-hour recording session (piano rehearsals, then orchestral rehearsals, then the actual recording) with Fischer-Dieskau and the conductor Ferenc Fricsay, which none of them found tiring.

In 1937, Leonard Bernstein, then a Harvard undergraduate, conducted the Onota Rhythm Band at Camp Onota where he was music counselor. Seven campers played triangles, tambourines and cymbals. Notice that for this conducting assignment, Bernstein uses a baton, a tool he later dispensed with.

Return of the Native

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

When Leonard Bernstein steps to the lectern in the Theatre-Concert Hall at Tanglewood on June 28 to address the incoming class of the Berkshire Music Center he will be standing where his famous mentor, Serge Koussevitzky, stood thirty years before when he greeted the first student body of which Bernstein then was a member.

Bernstein has made a few giant steps since then and many of us with possessive pride have been trying to decide into which of his magnificent talents we should channel him: pianist, conductor or composer. He has done pretty well in spite of all the body English we have exerted by remote radar.

His birth certificate may say "born in Lawrence" but that is not relevant to the fact that it was in the Berkshires that he really dug in, first as a camp counselor on Lake Onota and then at Tanglewood. Harvard '39 and Curtis Institute were but way stations en route to the most fortunate, for all concerned, matriculation in what Koussevitzky liked to call his 'academy.' Subsequent steps led on to an international stature surpassed by no one on the artistic horizon today.

I have heard Stokowski referred to as Stoky and Serkin as Rudi but I know of no one else of such musical eminence who retained in the general public's esteem the fond diminutive by which his early intimates got to know him. Koussevitzky became known as Koussy for purely time- and space-saving as well as phonetic reasons but Lenny reveals a devotion quite beyond his musical majesty.

Last year at age fifty Bernstein relinquished the post of conductor of the New York Philharmonic which he had held since 1957 and to which he had ascended by a series of dramatic steps — he is now designated by the unique title of "conductor laureate."

Where does one go from the top? He has not revealed his future plans but the recognition rendered him by all the leading orchestras and opera houses of the western world is testimony enough to show what might be his choice.

Bernstein's background is impressive. His piano teachers were Helen Coates, Heinrich Gebhard and Isabella Vengerova; his composition teachers Edward Burlingame Hill, Walter Piston and Randall Thompson; conducting tutors Fritz Reiner, Koussevitzky and, after Tanglewood, during his term as assistant conductor at the Philharmonic, Rodzinski. Everyone knows the story of his miraculous launching when he stepped in to replace an indisposed guest conductor, Bruno Walter.

The stature of Serge Koussevitzky grows cumulatively in hindsight, especially when one considers his discernment and cognizance in perceiving the potential of students of the class as Bernstein, Lukas Foss and Eleazar Carvalho and his willingness to grant every advantage to the

MONITOR
BOSTON, MASS.
(M) 210,850

AUG 1 1970

New England Newsclip

Bernstein & Co.

Tanglewood draws professionals, students, novices to explore the arts together in idyllic setting

By Louis Snyder
Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

Lenox, Mass.

Near the end of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's (BSO) first open rehearsal this summer at Tanglewood, a hard-working Leonard Bernstein had clarified a few points with the orchestra, and raised his baton to begin the last movement of Mahler's Second.

From the back of the holiday-crowded Berkshire Festival Shed came the loud, insistent, not-to-be-assuaged cry of a baby. Mr. Bernstein lowered his arms, bowed his head, and hunched his shoulders.

The wailing continued fortissimo. The conductor executed a three-quarter turn toward the audience, and in louder tones than had been heard all morning, crescendoed "A-U-S-S!" to the rear rows. Applause. The strident protests faded away across the green lawns, and the music resumed.

Let it not be thought that this reaction indicates Mr. Bernstein's or the BSO's attitude toward the place of receptive youth at Tanglewood. Far from it. Only a week before, Mr. Bernstein, now adviser to the Berkshire Festival here, had stirring, hopeful words for young professionals "who have come here to work and live with music" at the Berkshire Music Center, where he himself had been a student 30 years ago in its first season, under Serge Koussevitzky. (The galaxy of noted musicians who also benefited from early training at the center is legendary.)

EDUCATION

And today's contenders, born into quite a different musical and social ambience, had the Bernstein pledge "to help you as much as we can" to attainment, "with your new atomic minds, your flaming angry hope, and your secret weapon of art."

Five years ago, new strata of artistic potential were explored with the establishment of the Boston University Tanglewood Institute. In addition to music on the junior-high school, college, and postgraduate levels, the institute offered programs in art, theater, and dance, closely allied with festival activities. This summer, for instance, under dean Edwin Stein and director Mac Morgan, the institute includes some 65 high-school musicians chosen by audition from all over the United States to spend the eight-week session playing as a full orchestra, and in chamber groups coached by members of the BSO. Thus is forming a pool of instrumentalists qualified to move on in a few years to the Berkshire Music Center.

On the preprofessional college level, the institute's Young Artists Program offers applied music instruction by university faculty and BSO members, as well as by such artists-in-residence as Met soprano Phyllis Curtin and pianist Byron Janis. An opera workshop has been added this year, and there are music education courses for present and future teachers.

In the theater division, Boston University's Professional Playwrights' Workshop has been performing and discussing two plays-in-progress by Maxine Klein and A. R. Gurney Jr. Dance workshops and seminars are conducted independently, and in conjunction with opera and theater requirements. Art studies in basic and advanced painting and drawing round out this artistic community which, like the music center, has access to Tanglewood's open rehearsals and concerts.

For the first time this year, the youthful student population has been increased each week by the arrival on Tuesdays, for a four-day stay, of eight successive groups of 30 children, aged 11 and 12, from Boston elementary schools. Thanks to a grant from the Frederick J. Kennedy Memorial Foundation, 2,500 or more fifth- and sixth-grade students from 16 Title I school districts attended free Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall last winter.

From this number, 240 were selected by their schools for a summer visit to Tanglewood, under the Kennedy grant, to participate in music, theater, dance, and outdoor living, as well as having (for the first time in most cases) actual contact with profes-

Exuberance and white clothes are trademarks of Bernstein's rehearsals at Tanglewood.

ch had been allowed to st on back shelves. He a champion of Mahler kner. Indeed, Claude the Figaro Litteraire, when Bernstein ome rare (to Paris) at he was a "Porte- a jeu de mots, if I do by explaining, uttered in intention and not the nnotation which might 'porte-malheur.'

kshire welcomes the the native. For a week nts of the Center and, t, some of the faculty, the boons of his pres- experience, his compre- is perspicacity and his the future. On Sunday, he will make his sole e of the summer as , playing the Mahler ction" symphony, a draining work, but one admirably suited to the unlimited nobility of his attributes. Anything less demanding would be anticlimactic.

To a man who has climbed the loftiest peaks of several musical continents, is his return to the scene of his initial triumphs just an engagement in a busy schedule or will there be a special poignancy to the event for him? There would be little point in attempting to predict his reaction but what does seem certain is the temper of the audience which will welcome him. Ovations are no longer novelties to Bernstein but we wonder if any have included the quality of affection in which his original Berkshire friends hold him.

Bernstein, at a Tanglewood party in the early '40s, when he was a protegé of Serge Koussevitzky

In 1937, Leonard Bernstein, then a Harvard undergraduate, conducted the Onota Rhythm Band at Camp Onota where he was music counselor. Seven campers played triangles, tambourines and cymbals. Notice that for this conducting assignment, Bernstein uses a baton, a tool he later dispensed with.

Return of the Native

By Jay C. Rosenfeld

When Leonard Bernstein steps to the lectern in the Theatre-Concert Hall at Tanglewood on June 28 to address the incoming class of the Berkshire Music Center he will be standing where his famous mentor, Serge Koussevitzky, stood thirty years before when he greeted the first student body of which Bernstein then was a member.

Bernstein has made a few giant steps since then and many of us with possessive pride have been trying to decide into which of his magnificent talents we should channel him: pianist, conductor or composer. He has done pretty well in spite of all the body English we have exerted by remote radar.

His birth certificate may say "born in Lawrence" but that is not relevant to the fact that it was in the Berkshires that he really dug in, first as a camp counselor on Lake Onota and then at Tanglewood. Harvard '39 and Curtis Institute were but way stations en route to the most fortunate, for all concerned, matriculation in what Koussevitzky liked to call his 'academy.' Subsequent steps led on to an international stature surpassed by no one on the artistic horizon today.

I have heard Stokowski referred to as Stoky and Serkin as Rudi but I know of no one else of such musical eminence who retained in the general public's esteem the fond diminutive by which his early intimates got to know him. Koussevitzky became known as Koussy for purely time- and space-saving as well as phonetic reasons but Lenny reveals a devotion quite beyond his musical majesty.

Last year at age fifty Bernstein relinquished the post of conductor of the New York Philharmonic which he had held since 1957 and to which he had ascended by a series of dramatic steps — he is now designated by the unique title of "conductor laureate."

Where does one go from the top? He has not revealed his future plans but the recognition rendered him by all the leading orchestras and opera houses of the western world is testimony enough to show what might be his choice.

Bernstein's background is impressive. His piano teachers were Helen Coates, Heinrich Gebhard and Isabella Vengerova; his composition teachers Edward Burlingame Hill, Walter Piston and Randall Thompson; conducting tutors Fritz Reiner, Koussevitzky and, after Tanglewood, during his term as assistant conductor at the Philharmonic, Rodzinski. Everyone knows the story of his miraculous launching when he stepped in to replace an indisposed guest conductor, Bruno Walter.

The stature of Serge Koussevitzky grows cumulatively in hindsight, especially when one considers his discernment and cognizance in perceiving the potential of students of the class as Bernstein, Lukas Foss and Eleazar Carvalho and his willingness to grant every advantage to the buds of such rare promise which would develop and thrive when nurtured and 'forced' in an artistic hothouse.

There have been musicians who have worn two or more hats. Richard Strauss and Mahler were conductors as well as composers; Schumann and Wagner expressed themselves in words as well as music; Rachmaninoff, Ysaye, Gabrilowitch were conductors as well as performers; Bernstein in addition to all his talents is one of the most articulate and enlightened educators in music today, or of any other day, for that matter. His television concerts for young people magnetize audiences of all ages and no one has the faculty of elucidation to surpass him in that field.

While still on the grounds at Tanglewood his talents as a composer were exhibited. The short operetta "Trouble in Tahiti" and the song cycle "I hate music" were first heard here. His ballets, musicals, symphonies, these last of Mahleresque dimensions, have made us wonder whether this would be the direction toward which he would be attracted. To be sure, swinging a baton before great audiences is a glamorous vocation and to one whose endowments are limited to that skill it is sufficient. But to a man of the unusual attributes of Bernstein, many options are open.

